

✓ 43917

BUR. IN. GAMB.
PUB. LIB.
WB

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2013

<http://archive.org/details/nation118jannewy>

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART
FINANCE

FOUNDED 1865

43017

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXVIII

FROM JANUARY 2, 1924, TO JUNE 25, 1924

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

INDEX TO VOLUME CXVIII

JANUARY 2, 1924, TO JUNE 25, 1924

(Nos. 3052-3077)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
F Fiction
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Article
M Music
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

- Abbott, Edith
Chicago university appointment; EP..... 77
- Academic freedom
Faculty dismissals; EP..... 627
- Actors' Equity and the managers; EP..... 331
- Adams, C. F.
Putting Muscle Shoals on the map; S.... 338
- Adams, John T.
Scandal fisheries. W. Hard; S..... 281
- Addams, Jane. Opening speech to W. I. L.; EP..... 547
- Advertising
"Copy writer's prayer"; EP..... 413
- Advertising. See also Billboards
- Advice to a clam-digger. W. Snow; P..... 225
- Aeronautics. See also Airships; Aviation
- Agricultural legislation
Congressional swan song. W. Hard; S..... 637
- Fooling the farmers; E..... 549
- McNary-Haugen bill; EP..... 572
- Straightening the record. B. C. Marsh; C. 709
- Agriculture—Economic aspects
Distress of the western farmer; EP..... 127, 296
- Insolvency in Mississippi Valley; EP..... 244
- Airships
Loss of the Dixmude; EP..... 23
- Albanesi, Meggie; Dt..... 114
- Albee, Edward F.
Mr. Albee, meet Mr. Jefferson; E..... 195
- Alden, Stanley
Price of foreign books; C..... 480
- Alien property. See Enemy property
- Aliens
Aliens?; E..... 725
- Annual registration proposed; EP..... 722
- All God's chillun got wings. E. O'Neill; D... 664
- Allen, Harbor
Germany hungers; C..... 115
- Little matter of money; S..... 306
- Allen, Henry Ware
Kansas prohibition; C..... 346
- Alteration. M. Van Doren; P..... 308
- Amalgamated clothing workers of America
German unions fight for life; I..... 167
- American defense society
Dinner gets little attention; EP..... 492
- American federation of labor
Gompers and the Mexican revolution; EP. 21
- American Friends service committee
Magazines for Germany; C..... 259
- Task facing the Friends; I..... 43
- American legion
Anarchy at Wilkes-Barre; EP..... 153
- American literature
Books that bloom in the spring; E..... 416
- Of the making of books; E..... 155
- American mercury; EP..... 23
- American telephone and telegraph company
Attempted radio control; EP..... 330
- Amherst college
Meiklejohn reforms adopted; EP..... 129
- Amnesty
Against compromise. T. J. (Red) Doran; C 534
- Amnesty and the Civil liberties union. H. Lloyd and H. F. Ward; C..... 346
- From one of our martyrs. J. Manning; C 207
- Great battle for amnesty. A. De Silver; S 10
- No real amnesty. E. Herman; C..... 90
- Pennsylvania committee for amnesty. G. Gardner; C..... 63
- Amritsar massacre; EP..... 693
- Anagnostache, George
Both sides; C..... 35
- Ancient mariner. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D 486
- Anderson, William H.
Reformers must reform; E..... 155
- Andrews, C. F.
Credit where credit is due. Correction.... 570
- India today; IP..... 487
- India today. Correction..... 570
- Anti-saloon league
Reformers must reform; E..... 155
- Anti-Semitism. See Jews—Political and social conditions
- Antony and Cleopatra. W. Shakespeare; D... 289
- Applied psychology. See Psychology—Industrial application
- Arizona
Arizona backs Obregon; I..... 42
- Arkansas
Tardy justice to Orr and Wise; EP..... 245
- Armott, John
Plea for skepticism; C..... 399
- Art. See also Children's art
- Artists. New society of. See New society
- At the front. A. Young (cartoons)..... 737
- Athletics
For the athletic recognition of Russia. C. S. Thomas; C..... 13
- Atwood, Wallace W.; EP..... 695
- Australia
White Australia. G. C. T. Giles; IS..... 689
- Austria
South Tyrol—Austria's lost province. R. Dell; S..... 556
- Aviation
Aerial attack on the Arctic. D. M. LeBourdais; S..... 60
- B
B., W. L.
Greek letter patriots; C..... 12
- Bacon, Henry. E. Kebbon; S..... 255
- Bacon, Henry. Obituary; EP..... 219
- Baer, John M.
Progressivism and the third party; C.... 394
- Baker, M. F.
Florida's bosom and W. J. B.; C..... 13
- Baltic states
Germ of a Baltic alliance; IP..... 99
- Baltimore Evening sun
Difference between Republican and Democrat; EP..... 547
- Bankers
On "democratic government"; EP..... 102
- Banks and banking
Our downtrodden bankers; E..... 361
- Banks and banking—Russia
Back in the fold; I..... 152
- Position of the industrial bank; IP..... 691
- Barataria way. B. Thompson; P..... 400
- Barnard college
What angers undergraduates?; Dt..... 283
- Barnes, Harry Elmer
Historians and the truth; E..... 576
- Barnitz, Park
Two American poets; a study in possibilities. F. Dell; S..... 439
- Barron, Clarence W.
Defends Denby, Fall, etc.; EP..... 244
- Barzun, Henri Martin
French "Teapot Dome"; IS..... 541
- Becker, Maurice
Why we need a new party (cartoon).... 364
- Beethoven, Ludwig van. 153rd anniversary; EP..... 3
- Beffel, John Nicholas
Injunctions don't make dresses; S..... 558
- Beggar on horseback. G. S. Kaufman and M. Connelly; D..... 238
- Belgium
Rejects French treaty; EP..... 270
- Benedict, Libbian
Explanation; P..... 343
- Benét, Laura Islands; P..... 606
- Benét, Stephen Vincent
Carol: new style; P..... 428
- Bentley, Mildred Maddocks
Still eating; C..... 143
- Bergdoll, Grover C.
Kidnapping of Bergdoll. A. W. Kramer; C..... 586
- Reception of his lawless kidnapper; EP. 218
- Berman, H.
Sacredness of private property; C..... 258
- Berman, Max
Postman's lot; S..... 310
- Bessarabia
Russia, Rumania and Bessarabia; I..... 515
- Best, Mollie
Pacifist general; S..... 732
- Bevan, Ralph H.
Program for world team-work; C..... 347
- Billboards; EP..... 493
- Biography made to order; E..... 630
- Birds
Our animal life menaced. Country woman; C..... 612
- Birth control
Boston bans Sanger lecture; EP..... 359
- Chicago and New York clinics; EP..... 128
- Clinics and the law. M. W. Dennett; C... 207
- Cummins-Vaile bill; EP..... 384
- Mrs. Dennett's speech halted; EP..... 2
- Syracuse ordinance; EP..... 245
- Birth control conference, Syracuse, N. Y.
Physicians and clergy attend; EP..... 296
- Bitter summer thoughts. C. Sandburg; P.... 645
- Blanshard, Paul
Italian labor on the rocks; IS..... 123
- Bodenheim, Maxwell
Poems to Minna; P..... 613
- Servant of the prince; P..... 343
- Bok peace prize
Bok—peace or propaganda?; E..... 5
- Bok plan and the league. A. G. H.; C... 165
- Drifter's votes; Dt..... 89
- Great Bok humbug; E..... 50
- Levermore plan and The Nation. G. W. Kirchwey; C..... 231
- Peace prize referendum; EP..... 23
- Protest from Emporia. W. A. White; C. 165
- Senate investigates peace plan; EP..... 127
- Women's Peace union offer; EP..... 77
- Book prices
Price of foreign books. S. Alden, Brentano's, Inc.; C..... 480
- Book production, 1922; EP..... 193
- Books
Price of English books. H. W. Horwill; C..... 399
- Books and reading
Electing classics; E..... 362
- Books for ambassadors. C. Van Doren; S... 611
- Books that bloom in the spring; E..... 416
- Bootleggers and the income tax; EP..... 667
- Borah, William Edgar
Call for Borah and La Follette; E..... 194
- On source of political corruption; EP.... 411
- Boston
Mayor attacks "salacious" plays; EP.... 413
- Sanger birth control lecture banned; EP.. 359
- Boston Herald
Reason for election of Coolidge; EP..... 359
- Boys
Why boys leave home; E..... 106
- Boys. See also Child labor
- Boy's tent. M. Haller; P..... 391
- Boys' week
Taking them young. E. Wilson; C..... 641
- Brand, J. Henry Political prophecy; C..... 709
- Brentano's, Inc.
Another view; C..... 480
- Brinckmann, Hellmuth M.
These people must be helped; C..... 314
- Brown, William Montgomery, bishop
Heretic on trial. C. B. Driscoll; S..... 706
- Trial; EP..... 666
- Bruce, Geoffrey
Toward the top of the world; E..... 496
- Buckler, Helen
Women of all lands, unite!; IS..... 594
- Bug spots. C. Sandburg; P..... 645
- Bulgaria
Bulgarian reaction; I..... 293
- Burleigh, Harry C.
Anniversary at St. George's; EP..... 385
- Burns, William J.
And the oil scandal; EP..... 269
- Resignation; EP..... 572
- Butler, Nicholas Murray
Attacks prohibition; EP..... 547
- Sanity creeps back; E..... 105
- Butler, Smedley, in Philadelphia; EP..... 77, 154
- Bynner, Witter
Import of China; S..... 8
- Laughing diplomacy; S..... 479
- Byron, Lord
Byron—devil's disciple; E..... 495
- C
California
"When the bands begin to play." J. E. S.; C..... 710
- California university
Higher education in California. Californian; C..... 507
- Californian
Higher education in California; C..... 507
- Caliphs
End of the Turkish caliphate. W. J. Rapp; S..... 474
- Canada
Economic conquest of Canada. S. Nearing; IS..... 432
- Canby, Henry Seidel. Resignation; EP..... 573
- Capital—Taxation
Taxing capital in Czecho-Slovakia. F. Kuh; S..... 305

- Capital punishment
Do Americans believe in it? EP..... 627
- Caribbean region
Race problem in the Caribbean. R. Herrick; S..... 675, 699
- Carol; new style. S. V. Benét; P..... 428
- Carpenter, Paul L.
Returns from Oberlin; C..... 641
- Carrillo, Felipe
Felipe Carrillo. E. H. Gruening; S..... 61
- Cartoons..... 301, 303, 304, 306, 309, 673, 674, 727, 728, 730, 731
- Cartoons
Poincaré parcels out Russia. Pravda..... 516
Premier Poincaré resigns. Izvestia..... 541
- Cartoons. See also Young, Art
- Cartozian, T. O. Citizenship attacked; EP..... 330
- Censorship
Colorado bill; EP..... 102
Prisons for the mind; E..... 221
- Censorship. See also Moving picture censorship
- Centralia, Washington
Memorial to Armistice day victims fails;
EP..... 666
- Chak Hon Kee
No reason or justice; C..... 90
- Chamberlain, Beulah
Still eating; C..... 142
- Chamberlain, William Henry
Ku Klux Klan viewed from Moscow. W. H.
Chamberlain; C..... 507
- Trial of a communist bank president; S..... 501
- Chambers, Mary D., and J. M. Hill
Still eating; C..... 142
- Chase, Stuart
Pants vs. plus fours at Palm Beach; S..... 344
Pants vs. plus fours at Palm Beach. Correction..... 373
- Chemical foundation
Legalizing fraud; E..... 80
- Chicago Daily worker; EP..... 193
- Chicago Tribune
Its candidates defeated; EP..... 571
- Child labor—U. S.
Proposed amendment passes Congress; EP..... 693
Set the children free. H. F. Pringle; S..... 392
- Children and internationalism. H. Lofting; S..... 172
- Children's art
Professor Cizek's children. F. M. Wilson;
A..... 95
- China
American warships and Chinese money.
Ma Soo; S..... 82
China and the Boxer indemnity; L..... 266
Laughing diplomacy. W. Bynner; S..... 479
Russia, China and Mr. Hughes. N. Pfeffer;
S..... 499
Sedition in ancient China. D. Owen; S..... 370
- Chinese exhibition, Newark
Import of China. W. Bynner; S..... 8
- Chinese seamen's union
No reason or justice. Chak Hon Kee; C..... 90
- Chiropractic, Law and. F. X. Sauchelli; C..... 347
- Christianity
Against Christianity. C. R. Long; C..... 207
Revolutionary Christianity. A. Stewart; S..... 531
- Christy, Bayard H.
On Wilson; C..... 284
- Church
Church and war. G. Frank; S..... 638
Mobilization day and the church; EP..... 723
Movement against war; EP..... 598, 627
Shame of the churches. A. S. Crapsey; S..... 53
- Circus, as seen by the Drifter; Dt..... 480
- Cizek, Franz
Professor Cizek's children. F. M. Wilson;
A..... 95
- Clark university
Retirement of Atwood demanded; EP..... 695
- Cleveland's best minds. A. Young (cartoons) 704
- Cline, Charles. Plea for pardon; EP..... 22
- Clothing and dress
Pants vs. plus fours at Palm Beach. S.
Chase; S..... 344
Pants vs. plus fours at Palm Beach. S.
Chase. Correction..... 373
- Coal industry—U. S.
Human rights in the coal field—a debate.
"An operator" and W. D. Lane; S..... 633
- Cobb, Frank I.; E..... 8
- Cohalan, Daniel F. Resignation; EP..... 48
- College fraternities
Drifter's views; Dt..... 708
Greek letter patriots. W. L. B.; C..... 12
- College students
Drinking among students; EP..... 55
Indorse liberal men and platforms; EP..... 622
- Colleges and universities—Europe
Both sides. G. Anagnostache, M. Lewenthal; C..... 35
Helping Europe's students. R. T. Rich; C..... 373
- Colleges and universities—Germany
German students and the Jews; IP..... 148
- Colleges and universities—United States
Faculty dismissals; EP..... 622
- Colleges and universities—United States. See also Amherst college; Barnard college;
Columbia university; Dartmouth college;
Harvard university; Montana university;
Northwestern university; Oberlin college; Smith college; Vassar college
- Colum, Padraic
America in Polynesia; S..... 138, 251, 336
- Columbia university
Negro student in Fernald hall; EP..... 412
- Commencement addresses; EP..... 723
- Communist party (Russia)
Democracy in the Russian communist party; L..... 18
Russian Communist party. L. Fischer; S..... 6
- Conduct of life
Are we better than starfish?; E..... 470
- Conduct of life. See also Ethics
- Conference for progressive political action
Progressivism and the third party..... 394
- Connelly, Marc, and G. S. Kaufman Beggars on horseback. Criticism. L. Lewi-sohn; D..... 238
- Contempt of court
Not pardonable; EP..... 598
- Cook, George Cram. Obituary; EP..... 77
- Coolidge, Calvin
Associated Press speech; EP..... 519
Campaign for nomination; EP..... 243, 249, 571, 597
- Coolidge; E..... 696
- Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and
Coolidge; E..... 130
- Ford, Coolidge and Muscle Shoals; EP..... 519
- Herald's* reason for his election; EP..... 359
- Johnson chases Coolidge. W. Hardy; S..... 59
- Lights on or off; E..... 469
- "Lucky Cal." W. Hardy; S..... 9
- Mr. Coolidge dismisses Mr. Daugherty; E..... 586
- Mr. Coolidge rampant; E..... 522
- Mr. Farrar competes. R. Humphries; C..... 562
- President Calvin Coolidge; E..... 298
- Vote for Coolidge. N. Klein; C..... 740
- Cooney, Cecilia
Majesty of the law; E..... 602
- Cooper union, New York
Notable lecture courses; EP..... 271
- Cooperation
Two cooperative protests. A. D. Warbasse, C. Long; C..... 34
- Corfu—Occupation, 1923
Janina murders; L..... 125
- Cortambert, Louis
On Wilson; C..... 284
- Cosmetics
Why not variety in color?; Dt..... 561
- Country woman
Our animal life menaced; C..... 612
- Courts
Practice of other countries. C. G. Haines;
S..... 533
- Cowardice, Defense of. L. Powys; S..... 583
- Crapsey, Algernon S.
Shame of the churches; S..... 53
- Craven, Thomas
Art and the camera; A..... 456
John Marin; A..... 321
- Crime and criminals
Majesty of the law; E..... 602
- Critics
Carl Van Doren. C. Van Doren; S..... 170
Harry Hansen, reviewer of books. H. Hansen; S..... 646
- Llewellyn Jones. L. Jones; S..... 457
- Cuba
U. S. embargo on munitions; EP..... 546
- Cunningham, Leon
Neighbors. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D..... 40
- Currency. See Money
- Curtis, Cyrus H. K.
New York Evening post policies; EP..... 49
- Czechoslovakia
Enters Franco-Polish bloc; EP..... 48
Europe's sea power bloc; E..... 221
Franco-Czech alliance; L..... 241
Six new republics in central Europe. E.
Lengyel; S..... 801
- D
D. A.
In defense of lying; C..... 64
- Dakin, Edwin
Henry Ford, man or superman?; S..... 536
- Daly, Alice Lorraine
Progressivism and the third party; C..... 394
- Daninger, Samuel
Compensation for wrongdoing; C..... 208
Shall we restrict the courts?; C..... 683
- Dartmouth college
Succession for Dartmouth. A. S. Richards; C..... 372
- Das, Taraknath. See Taraknath Das
- Daulet, Leon. His unworthy role; EP..... 22
- Daugherty, Harry M.
Daugherty, agent of justice; E..... 553
- Department of justice scandals; EP..... 491
- Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and
Coolidge; E..... 130
- Mr. Coolidge dismisses Mr. Daugherty; E..... 586
- Oil and money. W. Hardy; S..... 256
- On our foreign policy. EP..... 103
- Sage for Mr. Daugherty. A. G. Hayes;
C..... 707
- Scandal fisheries. W. Hardy; S..... 281
- Still in office; EP..... 829
- Davis, John W.
Democratic nomination and "duty"; EP..... 388
- Dawes, Charles Gates
General Dawes and the politicians; E..... 414
- Nomination; EP..... 721
- Dawes and the diplomats. G. Glasgow; S..... 577
- Dawes commission. See Germany—Reparations; Reparations commission
- Death penalty. See Capital punishment
- "Death ray"; EP..... 694
- Debts, Public
Sacredness of private property. H. Berman; C..... 258
- Degrees, Academic; EP..... 728
- Dell, Floyd
Can men and women be friends?; S..... 605
- Two American poets: a study in possibilities; S..... 489
- Dell, Robert
Fascist rule in South Tyrol; S..... 581
- Fascist terrorism in the Tyrol; S..... 609
- German and French elections; IS..... 716
- South Tyrol—Austria's lost province; S..... 556
- Democratic infantry. W. Hardy; S..... 705
- Democratic party
Refined products of oil. W. Hardy; S..... 199
- Denby, Edwin
Denby's "lost" letter. O. G. Villard; S..... 228
- Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and Coolidge; E..... 130
- Denmark
German-Danish minorities. H. A. Harder;
C..... 709
- Golden rule in Europe. S. Toksvig; C..... 315
- Dennett, Mary Ware
Birth control clinics and the law; C..... 207
- Deportation of Nicholas Mansevich; EP..... 667
- De Silver, Albert
Great battle for amnesty; S..... 10
- Dexter, Robert Cloutman
Rhode Island, a lively experiment; S..... 226
- Dickens, Elizabeth
Ancient evolution; C..... 13
- Dinners and dining
Still eating. H. H. Smith, D. W. King,
B. Chamberlain, J. M. Hill, M. D.
Chambers, M. M. Bentley, E. L. Packard; C..... 142
- Dirigibles. See Airships
- Disarmament
Not opportune time for conference; EP..... 467
- Disarmament conference (proposed)
Submarines, world court, or what?; E..... 548
- Dock, Lavinia L.
Last of the politicians; C..... 613
- Doctors' union. R. Wheeler; C..... 740
- Doheny, Edward L.
Oil speaks. W. Hardy; S..... 133
- Dominican Republic
Cruise of the S. S. Henderson. C. B.
Driscoll; S..... 420
- Doran, T. J. (Red)
Against compromise; C..... 534
- Dorman, D. C.
Progressivism and the third party; C..... 394
- Doughty, Leonard
On pre-Adamic Hottentots, Mencken, The Nation, and others; C..... 316
- What to do with the Doughtys?; E..... 26
- Doumergue, Gaston. Election; EP..... 721
- Drake, William A.
Renunciation; P..... 707
- Drama
The trend. L. Lewisohn; D..... 592
- Drama. See also Actors
- Dramatic criticism
Art exists to be enjoyed; Dt..... 314
- Confession. L. Lewisohn; D..... 405
- Dress. See Clothing and dress
- Drifter unmasked by Mr. September; Dt..... 11
- Driscoll, Charles B.
Cruise of the S. S. Henderson; S..... 420
- Heretic on trial; S..... 706
- Driscoll, Henry W.; EP..... 76
- Du Pont-Nemours contest
Our animal life menaced. Country woman;
C..... 612
- Duse, Eleonora
Genius of Duse; E..... 524
- Obituary; EP..... 493
- E
Earle, Edward Mead
Poisoning peace by poisoning news; C..... 207
- Ratify the Turkish treaty?; S..... 86
- Earth, The Man and his young world. H. Shapley; S..... 529
- Earthquakes—Japan
Japanese massacres; IP..... 70
- Edelstadt, Vera
Pictures of "the patch"; F..... 503
- Edgerton, Charles E.
Wet blanket for warriors; C..... 232
- Education
Children and internationalism. H. Loft-ing; S..... 172
- Education—Mexico
Administration of Vasconcelos; EP..... 467
- Miracle school; Dt..... 428
- Education—United States
New education. A. de Lima; S..... 702

- Education—United States. See also Colleges and universities—United States; Public schools
- Edward Albert, prince of Wales; Dt. 371
- Egypt
Zaghlul party victory; EP. 102
- Eight-hour day. S. Kopald; IS. 717
- Eldridge, J. L.
Shall we restrict the courts?; C. 682
- Elections—France
After the French elections. I. Treat; S. 673
French revolution—1924; E. 573
German and French elections. R. Dell; IS. 716
Senatorial elections; EP. 48
- Elections—Germany
Elections in Germany—and women; IP. 354
German and French elections. R. Dell; IS. 716
Political shift in Germany; I. 692
Republican majority remains; EP. 545
- Elections—Great Britain
Election of the disfranchised; EP. 48
Results in 1923 and 1885; EP. 2
- Elections—Italy
Mussolini's victory; EP. 466
- Elections—United States
Winds of the west. W. Hard; S. 425
- Elia, junior
Casualty in France; C. 740
- Eliot, Charles William
President Eliot at ninety. W. A. Neilson; S. 313
Emergency foreign policy conference; EP. 722
- Emigration. See Immigration and emigration
- Enemy property
America and the Dawes plan; E. 629
Legalizing fraud; E. 80
- England and France
MacDonald vs. Poincaré; E. 273
- Episcopal church. See Protestant Episcopal church
- Epitaph. A. Guiterman; P. 647
- Esthonia
Esthonia and soviet Russia. A. Piip; C. 372
Six new republics in central Europe. E. Lengyel; S. 301
- Estournelles, Baron d'. Obituary; EP. 695
- Ethics
Are we better than starfish?; E. 470
Changes in sex relations. E. C. Parsons; S. 551
Styles in ethics. B. Russell; S. 497
- Ethics. See also Sexual ethics
- Europe
Europe 1919-1924. S. S. Fitz-Randolph; C. 430
New masters of Europe; E. 299
Suggestion from Germany. M. L. Raoul; C. 710
Victors, vanquished, and neutrals. S. Nearing; IS. 379
- Europe—Politics
Cheerful and promising outlook; E. 600
- European war
Building the national lie. J. de Pierre-feu; S. 28
- European war—Causes
Set the war truths free!; E. 247
- European war—Diplomatic history
How Poincaré prepared for war. L. S. Gannett; S. 197
- Evans, Elizabeth Glendower
Government put to the test; C. 12
- Everest, Mount
Toward the top of the world; E. 496
- Evolution
Anent evolution. E. Dickens; C. 13
- Exchange
Disasters follow rise of franc; EP. 520
Victors, vanquished, and neutrals. S. Nearing; IS. 379
- Experts as critics. Dt. 164
- Explanation. L. Benedict; P. 343
- Explorers; EP. 572
- Ex-service men. See Soldiers, Discharged
- F
- Fairs. See also Nizhni Novgorod
- Fall, Albert Bacon
Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and Coolidge; E. 130
Mr. Fall's $100,000. W. Hard; S. 107
Naval oil reserve case; EP. 101
Oil speaks. W. Hard; S. 133
- Farley, Edward P.
Resignation from Shipping board; EP. 23
Shipping board recommendations; EP. 76
- Farmer-labor party
Farmer-Labor—a misalliance? H. Lewis; C. 612
Farmer-Labor's rise, a new phase. M. H. Hedges; S. 390
- Farmers
Fooling the farmers; E. 549
Henry Ford and the farmers. B. C. Marsh; C. 481
Straightening the record. B. C. Marsh; C. 709
See also Agricultural legislation; Agriculture
- Fascism in Finland. J. H. Wuorinen; IS. 98
- Fascist labor federation
Fascist labor program; I. 216
Fashion. A. C. Mowatt; D. 213
- Fata morgana. E. Vajda; D. 321
- Fenn, W. W.
Puritan Providence; S. 84
- Fichandler, Alexander
Candidate for district superintendent; EP. 271
- Fiction
Modern love and modern fiction. J. W. Krutch; S. 735
- Finance. See also Debts, Public
- Finance—France
"Balancing" the budget; EP. 22
Battle of the franc; EP. 625
Fall of the franc; EP. 1, 295
France and soviet Russia join hands. S. Nearing; S. 33
Morgan loan; EP. 329, 665
- Finance—Germany
Mark stands still. A. Hohenemser-Salb; S. 82
Present rulers of Germany. B. Stern; IS. 621
- Finance—Germany. See also Germany—Reparations
- Finance—Hungary
Saving Hungary. E. Lengyel; IS. 214
- Finance—Russia
Russia's budget; IP. 542
- Financiers; EP. 665
- Fine, Nathan
Left and right in the needle-trades unions; S. 639
- Finland
Fascism in Finland. J. H. Wuorinen; IS. 98
Six new republics in central Europe. E. Lengyel; S. 301
- Fischer, Louis
National minorities in soviet Russia; S. 253
Russian Communist party; S. 6
What Mr. Hughes needs to know; S. 30
- Fisher, Arthur
Ejection from Montana university; EP. 357
- Fiske, Minnie Maddern. Criticism; D. 486
- Fitch, Edward
Next step or the horizon; C. 232
- Fitz-Randolph, S. S.
Europe 1919-1924; C. 430
- Florida
Florida's bosom and W. J. B. M. F. Baker; C. 13
- Folklore
Polynesian romance. P. Colum; S. 395
- Footmen. Shortage in six-footers; Dt. 34
- Ford, Henry
Coolidge, Ford, and Muscle Shoals; EP. 519
Henry Ford and the farmers. B. C. Marsh; C. 481
Mr. Ford is so good. W. Hard; S. 340
Muscle Shoals—sold. U. Sinclair; C. 429
Senator Norris on Muscle Shoals; EP. 466
Supports Coolidge for president; EP. 1
- Ford, Julia Ellsworth
America and world reconstruction; C. 399
- Ford hospital, Detroit
Doctors' union. R. Wheeler; C. 740
Medicine Fordized; EP. 492
- Fox, George
Pacifist general. M. Best; S. 732
- France, Anatole
Anatole France; E. 493
- France
Expels jazz players; EP. 667
French revolution—1924; E. 573
More about the "other France." S. Kopald; IS. 433
Morgan offers American aid; EP. 358
Other France. R. Rolland; I. 324
Poincaré vs. France. J. Mez; C. 315
Reconstruction scandal; EP. 218
- France—Army
Justice in the field. H. L. Stuart; IS. 620
- France—Elections. See Elections—France
- France—Finance. See Finance—France
- France—Foreign relations
As relentless as its policy in the Ruhr; IP. 74
Belgium rejects treaty; EP. 270
Czecho-Slovakian agreement; EP. 48
Europe's sea power bloc; E. 221
Feting the Rumanian king; EP. 465
France dips into Polish oil; I. 42
Franco-Czech alliance; I. 241
MacDonald-Poincaré notes; EP. 154
Russia, Rumania, and Bessarabia; I. 615
- France—Politics and government
Doumergue and Herriot; EP. 721
French "Teapot Dome." H. M. Barzun; IS. 541
German and French elections. R. Dell; IS. 716
Millerand also repudiated; EP. 665
Something is stirring; EP. 75
Two years of Poincaré; E. 105
- France and Germany
General Dawes and the politicians; E. 414
Hands across the Rhine. L. G. Heymann; S. 309
New Franco-German war. C. B. Thomson; S. 109
Political prisoners in the Rhineland; EP. 218
- France and soviet Russia join hands. S. Nearing; S. 33
- Frank, Glenn
Church and war; S. 638
- Franklin, Benjamin, trust fund; EP. 154, 492
- Fraternities, College
Drifter's views; Dt. 708
Greek letter patriots. W. L. B.; C. 12
- Free speech
Prisons for the mind; E. 221
- Free speech. See also Contempt of court
- Freeman, A. C.
Hint from Moscow; C. 399
- Freeman; E. 131
- French bureau of information, N. Y.; EP. 722
- Friends, Society of Franklin trust fund; EP. 154, 492
Pacifist general. M. Best. 732
- Friends, Society of. See also American Friends service committee
- Friendship
Can men and women be friends? F. Dell; S. 605
- Fundamentalism
Shame of the churches. A. S. Crapsey; S. 53
- G
- Gale, Zona
Mister Pitt. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D. 263
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
India today; IP. 487
India today. Correction. 570
Release from prison; EP. 153, 521
- Gannett, Lewis S.
"Fixing things up" in Washington; S. 389
How Poincaré prepared for war; S. 197
Secret corruption of the French press; S. 136
- Gannett, William Channing. J. H. Holmes; C. 89
- Gardens
Seed catalogues and city dwellers; EP. 297
- Gardner, Gilson
More light on "progressivism." 342
Pennsylvania committee for amnesty; C. 63
Runaway Congress; S. 701
- Geiser, Karl F.
Not a peace plan but a peace policy; C. 586
- George Dandin. Molière; D. 486
- Germany
Backward swing of the pendulum; EP. 270
German-Danish minorities. H. A. Harder; C. 709
Golden rule in Europe. S. Toksvig; C. 315
Ruhr miners' strike; EP. 694
Suicides and the aged needy; EP. 598
$10,000,000 for German children; EP. 357
These people must be helped. H. M. Brinckmann; C. 314
- Germany. See also France and Germany; Palatinate; Ruhr Valley
- Germany—Economic conditions
Present rulers of Germany. B. Stern; IS. 621
Starving the new generation in Germany; S. 303
- Germany—Economic conditions. See also Money—Germany
- Germany—Elections. See Elections—Germany
- Germany—Finance. See Finance—Germany
- Germany—Foreign relations
Embassy flag incident; EP. 191
- Germany—Political parties. See Political parties—Germany
- Germany—Politics and government
German and French elections. R. Dell; IS. 716
- Germany—Reparations
America and the Dawes plan; E. 629
Casualty in France. Elia, junior; C. 740
Dawes and the diplomats. G. Glasgow; S. 577
Dawes plan. G. Wells; C. 534
Dawes' opening speech; EP. 75
Enslaving the German people. W. N. Smith; C. 641
Europe breathes; E. 495
Experts' decisions; EP. 191
Hope in Europe; EP. 465
- Germany throws the dice. F. Kummer; S. 532
- Gibbons, Herbert Adams
Paris correspondents; C. 429
- Gibbs, Philip
Plea for peace; EP. 245
- Gibson, Roland A.
On Wilson; C. 284
- Giglio, Giovanni
Expelled from Italy; EP. 546
- Gilbert, Clinton W.
Nogin—industrialist and revolutionist; S. 678
- Gildersleeve, Basil Lanneau. F. Morley; S. 83
- Giles, G. C. T.
White Australia; IS. 689
- Gilman, Charlotte Perkins
Toward monogamy; S. 671
- Glasgow, George
Dawes and the diplomats; S. 577
- Gleason, Arthur Huntington. Obituary; EP. 23
- Spirit of Arthur Gleason. F. H. Simonds; C. 63
- C. 263
- Goose hangs high; D. 234
- Gordon, William
On Wilson; C. 234
- Gorki, Maxim
Mr. Gorki and the female sex. C. Z. Hartman; C. 481
Woman's sphere is man; IP. 353

- Minnesota
Tax on mining; EP..... 128
Minnesota daily star
Another newspaper tragedy; E..... 601
Miracle. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D..... 540
Miracle. Criticism. M. Van Doren; D..... 121
Mirault, Joseph
After the S.S. Henderson left Haiti; C.... 507
Mississippi
Mississippi, a ray of hope; E..... 361
Ray of hope gone; EP..... 412
Missouri
Simplification of legal procedure; EP.... 129
Mister Pitt. Z. Gale; D..... 263
Mobilization day; EP..... 722
Modern quarterly; EP..... 667
Moist moon people. C. Sandburg; P..... 645
Molière
George Dandin. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D..... 486
Money—Germany
German note circulation; I..... 152
Little matter of money. H. Allen; S.... 306
Monkey of stars. C. Sandburg; P..... 645
Montana university
Dismissal of Arthur Fisher; EP..... 357
Morel, E. D.
America and world reconstruction. J. E. Ford; C..... 399
Morgan, J. P.
Eclair interview; EP..... 358, 385
Gives library to public; EP..... 219
Morgan, J. P., & Co.
Loan to France; EP..... 329
Morley, Felix
Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve; S..... 83
Morocco
French-British-Spanish agreement; EP... 47
Morrison, Anne
Wild Westcotts. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D..... 40
Morton, C. W., jr.
Another Wyoming; C..... 259
Mosely, Oswald
Joins Independent labor party; EP..... 412
Mothers and babies in Russia; IP..... 100
Mo-ti
Sedition in ancient China. D. Owen; S. 370
Moving picture censorship
Kansas board and the Governor; EP.... 77
Mowatt, Anna Cora
Fashion. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D.... 213 Municipal music. See Music, Municipal Munitions
Arming the world?; E..... 51
Munsey, Frank A.
Buys New York Evening mail; EP..... 129
Munsey destroys another daily; E..... 334
Rise and fall of Mr. Munsey. R. Thomas; S..... 367
Murphy, Charles F.
Boss Murphy and civic progress; E..... 574
Murphy, Charles F. Obituary; EP..... 521
Muscle Shoals project
Committee recommends Norris bill; EP.. 665
Coolidge-Ford understanding; EP..... 519
Henry Ford, man or superman? E. Dakin; S..... 336
Keller bill commended; EP..... 545
Mr. Ford is so good. W. Hard; S..... 340
Muscle Shoals—sold. U. Sinclair; C..... 429
Putting Muscle Shoals on the map. C. F. Adams; S..... 338
Roosevelt on Muscle Shoals; E..... 385
Views of Senator Norris; EP..... 466
Music—United States
Jazz and "The rhapsody in blue." H. Straus; M..... 263
Music—United States. See also New York (city)—Music Music, Municipal
Municipal exploit in music. H. Straus; M 539
Myths
Two-edged sword. G. Taggard; S..... 648
- N Names
Ships and their names; E..... 300
Nation, The Change in literary editors; EP..... 573
Nation poetry contest
Friends and foes of Jezebel. J. Rorty, M. A. Owen, D. Horton, M. T., G. B. Vitter, W. Snow; C..... 430
Prize poem not chosen by Drifter; Dt.... 257
National conference for progressive political action
Progressivism at St. Louis. N. Thomas; S..... 224
National conference of Methodist students
Revolutionary Christianity. A. Stewart; S. 531
National conventions, Republican
Cleveland convention; EP..... 693
Convention of the fit-to-rule. O. G. Villard; S..... 730
Coo with Coolidge. W. Hard; S..... 729
Do conventions repeat themselves? J. A. H. Hopkins; C..... 315
Nordic jubilee. H. W. van Loon; S..... 727
National minorities in soviet Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 253
Naturalization—United States
Armenian's citizenship attacked; EP..... 330
Who is white? K. Miller; C..... 480
- Nearing, Scott
Crumbling British empire; IS..... 514
Economic conquest of Canada; IS..... 432
France and soviet Russia join hands; S.. 33
Victors, vanquished, and neutrals; IS... 379
Negroes in the United States
Arrest and abuse of the innocent; EP.... 296
Labor unions and the Negro press; EP.... 271
Mississippi, a ray of hope; E..... 361
Persecution in Oklahoma; EP..... 412
Ray of hope gone in Mississippi; EP.... 412
"You speak like a white man"; EP..... 48
Neighbors. L. Cunningham; D..... 40, 263
Neilson, Francis
Traveling fellowships for candidates; C.. 372
Neilson, William Allan
President Eliot at ninety; S..... 313
Nettels, Curtis
Shall we restrict the courts?; C..... 682
New Englander; D..... 263
New morals for old..... 497, 551, 605, 671, 735
New society of artists
Tea and art. H. J. Seligmann; A..... 68
New toys; D..... 263
New York (city)
Fulton ferry; Dt..... 141
New York (city)—Housing Houses or hovels?; E..... 25
Landlords and white-collar tenants; EP.. 358
Preliminary report; EP..... 2
Two cooperative protests. A. D. Warbasse, C. Long; C..... 34
New York (city)—Music
On some new music. P. Sanborn; M.... 189
New York (city)—Parks
What is a park?; E..... 550
New York (city)—Politics
Boss Murphy and civic progress; E..... 574
New York (city)—Public library
Whose library is it? A. S. Zavitsianos; C. 430
New York (state)
New York, state of unwilling progress. C. W. Wood; S..... 471
New York Commercial
On the oil inquiry; EP..... 384
New York Evening mail
Bought by F. A. Munsey; EP..... 129
New York Evening post
Experiments of Mr. Curtis; EP..... 49
New York Herald
Munsey destroys another daily; E..... 334
New York Herald-Tribune
Will launch literary magazine; EP..... 573
New York Tribune
Munsey destroys another daily; E..... 334
New York World
Credit where credit is due..... 570
Newark museum association
Import of China. W. Bynner; S..... 8
News
Vote Lenin's death biggest news; EP.... 154
Newspapers—France
How Poincaré prepared for war. L. S. Gannett; S..... 197
Paris correspondents. H. A. Gibbons; C. 429
Poisoning peace by poisoning news. E. M. Earle; C..... 207
Secret corruption of the French press. L. S. Gannett; S..... 136
Newspapers—Russia
Press in the soviet republics; IP..... 748
Newspapers—United States
Breakdown of the press. Republican; C.. 481
Defended by Mr. Ochs; EP..... 217
Watchung News; Dt..... 584
What do you read?; E..... 725
Newspapers—United States. See also Boston Herald; Chicago Daily worker; Chicago Tribune; Minnesota daily star; New York Commercial; New York Evening mail; New York Evening post; New York Herald; New York Tribune; New York World
Next war. A. Young (cartoon)..... 111
Night rider. R. Humphries; P..... 582
Night thoughts. W. L. Werner..... 230
Nizhni Novgorod
Fair at Nizhni Novgorod; I..... 20
Nobel prizes
No peace prize this year; EP..... 3
Nogin, Victor P.
Nogin, industrialist and revolutionist. C. W. Gilbert; S..... 678
Nordic jubilee. H. W. van Loon; S..... 727
Nordics. A. Guiterman; P..... 708
Norris, George W.
Candidate for reelection; EP..... 127
On Muscle Shoals and Ford; EP..... 466
Put not your faith in parties; S..... 369
Norris, William A.
Texas; P..... 683
North Carolina
Evolution and the Governor; EP..... 129
Northwestern university
Another victim of the newspapers. E. F. Tittle; C..... 561
Blessed are the peacemakers; E..... 416
Nation at Northwestern. Pacifist mother; C..... 641
Results of student pacifism; EP..... 384
Novels. See Fiction
- O
Oberlin college
Returns from Oberlin. P. L. Carpenter; C 641
O'Casey, Sean
June and the paycock. Criticism. E. A. Jewell; D..... 617
O'Connor, T. P. Honored by King; EP..... 695
Oil. See Petroleum
Oil and irony. W. Hard; S..... 256
Oklahoma
Persecution of Negroes; EP..... 2
Olympic games
Another war victim. I. Treat; S..... 738
Greeks, girls, and 1944; E..... 222
O'Neill, Eugene
All God's chillun got wings. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D..... 664
Welded. Criticism. L. Lewisohn; D.... 376
Opera
Eye and ear in opera. P. Sanborn; M.... 566
"Operator"
Dynamite versus profits; S..... 633
Orchestras
Municipal exploit in music. H. Straus; M. 539
Orr, Verlin D. Pardoned; EP..... 245
Osteopathy
In defense of osteopathy. E. R. Kraus; C. 165
Owen, David
Sedition in ancient China; S..... 370
Owen, Mary Alicia
Friends and foes of Jezebel; C..... 430
- P
Pacifist mother
Nation at Northwestern; C..... 641
Pacifists
At last a pacifist cabinet; E..... 131
Blessed are the peacemakers; E..... 416
General turns pacifist; E..... 195
Packard, E. L.
Still eating; C..... 143
Painting
Protest. B. Van Vostrow; C..... 258
Palatinate
Palatinate; E..... 79
Separatist movement; EP..... 128
Palmer, A. Mitchell, and the oil scandal; EP.. 269
Panama canal; EP..... 723
Papini, Giovanni
Sanity creeps back; E..... 105
Parable of paradise. G. Taggard; P..... 198
Paris
Ile St. Louis; E..... 669
Parsons, Elsie Clews
Changes in sex relations; S..... 551
Peace
Cart before the horse. N. J. Ware; C.... 231
Drifter's plan; Dt..... 230
Next step or the horizon. E. Fitch; C.. 232
Not a peace plan but a peace policy. K. F. Geiser; C..... 586
Our own peace program; E..... 104
Plea of Philip Gibbs; EP..... 245
Program for world team-work. R. H. Bevan; C..... 347
Women of all lands, unite! H. Buckler; IS..... 594
Women's peace union and the Bok plan; EP..... 77
Peace. See also Bok peace prize; Disarmament; War
Peffer, Nathaniel
Russia, China, and Mr. Hughes; S..... 499
Pei.....
H. J. Seligmann; A..... 68 a state college
ops student refusing military training; EP..... 219
Percin, Alexandre
General turns pacifist; E..... 195
Periodicals
For sheepmen's wives and others. B. W. Howe; C..... 13
Growth of liberal magazines; EP..... 413
Magazines for Germany. American Friends service committee; C..... 259
Periodicals. See also names of periodicals
Permanent court of international justice. See League of nations. Permanent court of international justice
Peru
War mongers; E..... 79
Petroleum
As relentless as its policy in the Ruhr; IP 74
Czecho-Slovakian scandals; EP..... 244
France dips into Polish oil; I..... 42
Philadelphia
Butler, director of public safety; EP.. 77, 154
Philippine Islands
Coolidge and independence; EP..... 295
Fairfield bill; EP..... 572
Fighting the Colorums; EP..... 127, 270
Investigate the Woods; EP..... 1, 102, 519
Secretary Weeks on independence; EP.... 270
Photography
Art and the camera. T. Craven; A..... 456
Progress medal to Stieglitz; EP..... 245
Sky-songs. A. Stieglitz, J. Marin; C.... 561
Pickens, William
"You speak like a white man"; EP..... 48

- Pictures of "the patch." V. Edelstadt; F. 503
 Pierrefeu, Jean de
 Building the national lie; S. 28
 Piip, A.
 Estonia and Soviet Russia; C. 372
 Pinkham, Henry W.
 How to outlaw war; C. 231
 Pioneer youth of America. N. Thomas; C. 284
 Platt, Chester C.
 On Wilson; C. 284
 Plecker, W. A.
 Protest from Virginia; C. 507
 Poems
 Advice to a clam-digger. W. Snow. 225
 Alteration. M. Van Doren. 303
 Barataria way. B. Thompson. 400
 Bitter summer thoughts. C. Sandburg. 645
 Boy's tent. M. Haller. 391
 Bug spots. C. Sandburg. 645
 Carol; new style. S. V. Benét. 428
 Epitaph. A. Guiterman. 647
 Explanation. L. Benedict. 343
 Hard girl. G. Taggard. 91
 Imminent doom. G. Taggard. 91
 Islands. L. Benét. 606
 Jezebel. S. Middleton. (Prize poem). 169
 Light sleep. H. Hall. 421
 Man and dog on an early winter morning.
 C. Sandburg. 645
 Moist moon people. C. Sandburg. 645
 Monkey of stars. C. Sandburg. 645
 Night rider. R. Humphries. 582
 Nordics. A. Guiterman. 703
 Parable of paradise. G. Taggard. 198
 Poems to Minna. M. Bodenheimer. 613
 Renunciation. W. A. Drake. 707
 Servant of the prince. M. Bodenheimer. 343
 Son. R. Wolfe. 562
 Spring thunder. M. Van Doren. 506
 Texas. W. A. Norris. 683
 Warning to a blasé lady. H. S. Gorman. 114
 Wife—civilian shell-shock. R. W. Weldon. 343
 Winter gold. C. Sandburg. 645
 Poems to Minna. M. Bodenheimer; P. 613
 Poetry
 Two-edged sword. G. Taggard; S. 648
 Poets
 Growing poets. Smith college press board;
 C. 35
 Poincaré, Raymond
 How Poincaré prepared for war. L. S.
 Gannett; S. 197
 MacDonald vs. Poincaré; E. 273
 New cabinet; EP. 384
 Poincaré—confidence man. Count H. Kessler; S. 308
 Poincaré vs. France. J. Mez; C. 315
 Two years of Poincaré; E. 105
 Poland
 France dips into Polish oil; I. 42
 Reaction in Poland. L. T.; IS. 568
 Six new republics in central Europe. E.
 Lengyel; S. 301
 Polar exploration
 Aerial attack on the Arctic. D. M. Le-Bourdais; S. 60
 Annexing the North Pole; EP. 103
 Political parties—Germany
 Germany throws the dice. F. Kummer; S. 532
 Political parties—Great Britain. See also Labor party
 Political parties—Russia. See also Communistic party
 Political parties—United States
 Borah on source of corruption; EP. 411
 Old parties, or new? H. Shipstead; G. W.
 Norris; S. 368
 Third party chances. B. Stolberg; S. 364; 422
 Third party facts. W. Hard; S. 363
 Third party vibrations. W. Hard; S. 679
 What is progressivism? W. Hard; S. 27
 Political parties—United States. See also National conference for progressive political action
 Political prisoners
 Against compromise. T. J. (Red) Doran;
 C. 534
 Baltrusaitis should be pardoned; EP. 412
 From one of our martyrs. J. Manning; C. 207
 Great battle for amnesty. A. De Silver; S. 10
 In occupied Germany; EP. 218
 Last of the politicals. L. L. Dock and E.
 Winsor; C. 613
 Pennsylvania committee for amnesty. G.
 Gardner; C. 63
 Release of state prisoners demanded; EP. 22
 Politics
 Cheerful and promising outlook; E. 600
 Politics, Corruption in
 "A business administration"; E. 220
 Scandal fisheries. W. Hard; S. 231
 Scandals of the seventies. A. Warner; S. 418 Politics, Corruption in. See also Teapot Dome scandal
 Politics by radio; E. 5
 Porto Rico
 Commission seeks home rule, etc.; EP. 77
 Politics and the A. F. of L.; EP. 694
 Postal service—United States
 Postman's lot. M. Berman; S. 310
 Potters; D. 263
 Power
 Survey Graphic's "Giant power" no.; EP. 245
 Power. See also Superpower
 Powys, Llewelyn
 Defense of cowardice; S. 583
 Pratt, Richard Henry. Obituary; EP. 331
 Praveda
 Poincaré parcels out Russia (cartoon). 516
 Presidential art. D. S.; C. 347
 Presidential campaigns—1924
 Call for Borah and La Follette; E. 194
 Case for "Al" Smith; E. 628
 Case for Mr. McAdoo; E. 724 Cleveland's best minds. A. Young (cartoons). 704
 Coolidge; E. 696
 Presidential campaigns—1924
 Democratic infantry. W. Hard; S. 705
 How to become President. W. Hard; S. 478
 I return to America. S. Lewis; S. 681
 Is it McAdoo? W. Hard; S. 505
 Johnson chases Coolidge. W. Hard; S. 668
 La Follette's "revolution"; E. 469
 "Lucky Cal." W. Hard; S. 9
 Mr. Coolidge rampant; E. 522
 Nomination forecasts; EP. 411
 Political prophecy. J. H. Brand; C. 709
 Premonitions. A. Young (cartoons). 677
 Presidency by default? E. 78
 Primaries; EP. 465
 Refined products of oil. W. Hard; S. 199
 Winds of the west. W. Hard; S. 425
 Presidential candidates
 Coolidge-Dawes ticket; EP. 721
 Traveling fellowships for candidates. F.
 Neilson; C. 372
 Presidents—United States
 Change in beginning of term; EP. 353
 Pringle, Henry F.
 Set the children free; S. 392
 Prisons for the mind; E. 221
 Prizes
 Difference between Republican and Democrat?; EP. 467
 Prizes. See also Pulitzer prizes
 Procedure
 Missouri proposes simplification; EP. 129
 Progressive education; EP. 667
 Progressive movement in politics
 More light on "progressivism." J. Gannett and D. Richberg. 312
 Progressivism and the third party; bulletin from one of the chief progressive headquarters of 1924. 394
 What after all is "Progressivism"? Senators, representatives, editors, poets, and private citizens compete in William Hard's prize contest. 160
 Prohibition—United States
 Drinking among students; EP. 75
 Kansas prohibition. H. W. Allen; C. 346
 President Butler and Gov. Pinchot; EP. 547
 Rum-runners strike; EP. 723
 Prohibition—United States. See also Anti-saloon league; Bootleggers; Liquor traffic
 Propaganda
 How Poincaré prepared for war. L. S.
 Gannett; S. 197
 Secret corruption of the French press.
 L. S. Gannett; S. 136
 Propaganda. See also War propaganda
 Protestant Episcopal church
 Heresy trial of Bishop Brown; EP. 666
 Heretic on trial. C. B. Driscoll; S. 706
 Psychology—Industrial application
 Page Dr. Coué. H. S. Stockton; S. 162
 Public debts. See Debts, Public
 Public opinion
 National public opinion. W. Hard; S. 560
 Public schools—United States
 New education. A. de Lima; S. 702
 Publishers and publishing
 Longmans' imposing list; EP. 521
 Pueblo Indians
 Protest religious interference; EP. 666
 Secretary Work at Taos. W. Ufer; C. 585
 Pulitzer prizes
 Jury recommendations disregarded; EP. 599
 1923 awards; EP. 573
 Puritans
 Puritan Providence. W. W. Fenn; S. 84
 R
 Race problem in the Caribbean. R. Herriek;
 S. 675, 699
 Race with the shadow. W. von Scholz; D. 147
 Races of man
 Who is white? K. Miller; C. 480
 Radich, Stephen
 Gandhi of the Balkans. E. Lengyel; IS. 642
 Radio broadcasting
 Censorship; EP. 413
 Politics by radio; E. 5
 Radio laws and regulations
 Government ownership in Britain; EP. 331
 Is there a trust?; EP. 330
 Railroad labor board
 Railway workers' rights; E. 669
 Railroads—United States
 Congressional swan song. W. Hard; S. 637
 Railroads and state—Canada
 Is Canada solving the railroad riddle? D.
 M. LeBourdais; S. 476
 Railway workers' rights; E. 669
 Angel, Jesus M. Plea for pardon; EP. 22
 Raoul, Margaret Lente
 Suggestion from Germany; C. 710
 Rapp, William Jourdan
 End of the Turkish caliphate; S. 471
 Rathom, John R.
 In defense of lying. A. D.; C. 64
 Rathliff, Beulah Amidon
 Shall we remake the Supreme court? May Congress limit the supreme court?; S. 579
 Reading. See also Books and reading
 Realism. Spring realism; E. 417
 Reformers
 Glass walls. W. Hard; S. 607
 Must reform; E. 155
 Reicher, Emanuel. A. von Heidenheim; D. 745
 Reinhardt, Max. L. Lewisoohn; D. 190
 Relief work
 Helping Europe's students. R. T. Rich; C. 373
 Task facing the Friends; I. 43
 Relief work—Germany
 Bills before Congress; EP. 625
 Germany hungry. J. Van Nuland, J. L.
 Kunz, H. Allen, J. Lachenbruch, G.
 Hübener; C. 115
 Needy aged in Germany; EP. 598
 Relief of German children; EP. 101
 $10,000,000 for German children; EP. 357
 Renunciation. W. A. Drake; P. 707
 Reparations. See Germany—Reparations;
 Reparations commission
 Reparations commission
 General Dawes and the politicians; E. 414
 Republican
 Breakdown of the press; C. 481
 Republican national committee
 Campaign contributions; EP. 243
 "Decent patriotic" murder; EP. 383
 Securing indictment of Wheeler; EP. 545
 Republican party
 Republican party, a ~~stricken~~ stricken only W.
 Hard; S. 163
 Republican party. See also National conventions, Republican Revolution
 Historical impromptu; I. 350
 Rhode Island
 Rhode Island, a lively experiment. R. C.
 Dexter; S. 226
 Rich, Raymond T.
 Helping Europe's students; C. 373
 Richards, Ansel S.
 Suggestions for Dartmouth; C. 372
 Richberg, Donald
 More light on "progressivism". 342
 Rockefeller, John D., jr.
 "Easter message"; EP. 492
 Rolland, Romain
 Other France; I. 324
 Roosevelt, Archie
 And the oil scandal; EP. 153
 Roosevelt, Theodore
 Roosevelt on Muscle Shoals; E. 385
 Roosevelt, Theodore, Jr.
 Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and
 Coolidge; E. 130
 Political course seems run; EP. 153
 Rorty, James
 Friends and foes of Jezebel; C. 430
 Ruhr Valley—Invasion
 Invasion and the franc; EP. 1
 M. Poincaré—confidence man. Count H.
 Kessler; S. 308
 Palatinate; E. 79
 Rumania
 Russia, Rumania, and Bessarabia; I. 515
 Rumely, Edward
 Prison sentence begins; EP. 338
 Russell, Bertrand
 Academic freedom in America; EP. 520
 Styles in ethics; S. 497
 Visit to United States; EP. 385
 Russia
 End of the Kiev trial; I. 484
 Fable. T. F. Hastings; C. 41
 Hint from Moscow. A. C. ~~Freeman~~ Freeman; C. 294
 Historical impromptu; I. 350
 Lenin's widow speaks; I. 288
 Mothers and babies in Russia; IP. 100
 Press in the soviet republics; IP. 715
 Russia, China, and Mr. Hughes. N. Pfeffer;
 S. 499
 Russia, Rumania, and Bessarabia; I. 515
 Russian unions defend the revolution; I. 643
 "To laboring humanity"; I. 167
 Trial of a communist bank president. W.
 H. Chamberlain; S. 501
 Russia. See also Baltic states Russia—Banks and banking. See Banks and banking—Russia
 Russia—Commerce
 Russia's foreign trade in 1923; IP. 356
 Russia—Economic conditions
 Economic crisis in Russia; I. 19
 Economic revival in Russia; I. 150
 Fair at Nizhni Novgorod; I. 20
 Russia—Finance. See Finance—Russia

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- Abseentee ownership. T. Veblen; B. 652
Adams, James Truslow
 Revolutionary New England; B. 655
Adams, Samuel. R. V. Harlow; B. 655
Adams, Samuel Hopkins
 Siege; AN. 130
Adventures in journalism; P. Gibbs; B. 47
Aethiopian romance. Heliodorus; AN. 454
After disillusion. R. L. Wolf; AN. 227
Against this age. M. Bodenheim; AN. 238
A Janov, M. A.
 Saint Helena; AN. 662
Alexander, F. Matthias
 Constructive conscious control of the individual; B. 35
Alexander, Ruth S.; R. 653
All God's chillun got wings. E. O'Neill; B. 713
Allen, T. George; R. 655
Alvord, Clarence W.; R. 184
American artists. R. Cortissoz; B. 482
American constitution. F. J. Stimson; B. 373
American drama. A. H. Quinn; B. 373
American judge. A. A. Bruce; B. 588
American labor yearbook, 1923-4; AN. 745
American looks at his world. G. Frank; B. 180
American public library. A. E. Bostwick; B. 687
American revolution. Sources and documents
 S. E. Morison, editor; B. 660
Anburey, Thomas
 Travels through the interior parts of America; AN. 320
Anderson, Sherwood
 Horses and men; B. 510
Andrews, Charles M.; R. 564
Anthology of magazine verse for 1923. W. S. Braithwaite, editor; AN. 147
Anthology of verse by American Negroes. N. I. White and W. C. Jackson, editors; AN. 688
Anthony Dare. A. Marshall; AN. 351
Anthropology. A. L. Kroeber; B. 118
Antic Hay. A. Huxley; B. 94
Antink, Scharhen. See Scharhen-Antink
Apollinaire, Guillaume
 Poet assassinated; AN. 404
Ariel, ou la vie de Shelley. A. Maurois; B. 712
Aristotle, Poetics of. L. Cooper; AN. 511
Armady, Anne
 Le livre des symphonies; AN. 351
Art of Terence. G. Norwood; AN. 455
Artzyt'sheff, Mikhail Petrovich
 Jealousy; Enemies: The law of the savage; B. 119
As I like it. W. L. Phelps; B. 67
Assyria. A. T. Olmstead; B. 236
At a venture. C. A. Bennett; B. 445
Aunt Polly's story of mankind. D. O. 118
Die ausbreitungspolitik der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika. E. Kimpen; B. 400
Auslander, Joseph
 Sunrise trumpets; B. 711
Austen, Jane
 Novels; edited by R. W. Chapman; AN. 453
Azorin, Jose Martinez Ruiz
 Don Juan; B. 320

B

- Bachelor, Joseph M., and G. Greever, editors
 Soul of the city; AN. 40
Bacon, Corinne, compiler
 Standard catalog, fiction section; AN. 211
Baerlein, Henry
 Over the hills of Ruthenia; AN. 212
Baikie, James
 Life of ancient Egypt; B. 236
Bailey, John
 Continuity of letters; B. 146
Bailey, Liberty Hyde
 Manual of cultivated plants; AN. 485
Baillère, Paul, translator
 Quelques poèmes de Shelley; B. 712
Ball, Oona Howard, editor
 Sidney Ball; memories and impressions; B. 144
Ball, Sidney
 Memories and impressions; B. 144
Ballantine, William G., translator
 Riverside new testament; B. 38
Barbed wire and wayfarers. E. F. Piper; AN. 454

- Barnes, Djuna
 Book; B. 14
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R. 741
Baroja, Pio
 Weeds; B. 36
Barratt, Louise Bascom, and H. S. Dayton
 Book of entertainments and theatricals; AN. 376
Barrett, Richmond Brooks
 Rapture; AN. 662
Baudouin, Charles
 Tolstoi, the teacher; AN. 617
Beals, Carleton
 Rome or death; B. 714
Beard, Mary; R. 590
Beebe, William
 Galapagos, world's end; B. 443
Beer, Thomas
 Stephen Crane; B. 66
Beerbohm, Max
 Yet again; B. 94
Begbie, Harold
 More twice-born men; B. 233
Bel ami. G. de Maupassant; AN. 320
Bell, Lisle; R. 235, 262, 287, 450
Bell, Violet Colquhoun
 Blindness of heart; B. 402
Bellah, James Warner
 Sketch book of a cadet from Gascony; AN. 351
Belloc, Hilaire
 Sonnets and verse; AN. 592
Belloc, Hilaire. P. Braybrooke; AN. 451
Benammi
 Aspects of Jewish life and thought; AN. 120
Benedict, Ruth; R. 118
Benet, Laura; R. 375
Bennett, Charles A.
 At a venture; B. 445
Benson, E. F.
 Visible and invisible; AN. 617
Bernays, Edward L.
 Crystallizing public opinion; B. 450
Bernhardt, Sarah. Mme Pierre Berton; B. 485
Berton, Mme Pierre
 Real Sarah Bernhardt; B. 485
Best British short stories of 1923. E. J. O'Brien and J. Cournois, editors; AN. 94
Best of Hazlitt. P. P. Howe; AN. 95
Best poems of 1923. L. A. G. Strong, editor; AN. 566
Bibesco, Elizabeth
 Fir and the palm; B. 655
Bible. Acts of the Apostles. A. W. F. Blunt; B. 38
Bible. New testament. Translated by E. J. Goodspeed; B. 38
Bible. Riverside new testament. Translated by W. G. Ballantine; B. 38
Bicknell, Percy F.
 Human side of Fabre; AN. 95
Bigham, Clive
 Chief ministers of England, 920-1720; B. 11
Billy Barnicoat. G. MacDonald; B. 120
Birds of the New York city region. L. Griscom; AN. 451
Birth. Z. Gale; AN. 662
Black Bryony. T. F. Powys; AN. 538
Black dog. A. E. Coppard; B. 590
Blake, George
 Minee collop close; AN. 486
Blathwayt, Raymond
 Tapestry of life; AN. 120
Blunt, A. W. F.
 Blindness of heart. V. C. Bell; B. 402
Blunt, Wilfrid Scawen
 Gordon at Khartoum; B. 188
Boccaccio's untold tale. H. Kemp; B. 743
Bodenheim, Maxwell
 Against this age; AN. 238
 Crazy man; B. 441
Bolitho, William
 Leviathan; AN. 644
Book. D. Barnes; B. 14
Book of Blanche. D. Richardson; AN. 662
Bookman anthology of essays. J. Farrar, editor; AN. 566
Borden, Mary
 Jane, our stranger; AN. 211
Borzoï cook book. Princess A. Gagarine; R. 234
Boston days of William Morris Hunt. M. A. S. Shannon; AN. 453
Bostwick, Arthur E.
 American public library; B. 687
Boyce, Neith
 Harry; AN. 263
Boyd, Woodward
 Lazy laughter; B. 145
Boyle, C. Nina
 Nor all thy tears; B. 402
Bradford, Gamaliel
 Soul of Samuel Pepys; B. 654
Bradley, Phillips; R. 482, 564
Bragdon, Claude
 Primer of higher space; AN. 321
Braithwaite, William Stanley, editor
 Anthology of magazine verse for 1923 and Yearbook of American poetry; AN. 147
Bramah, Ernest
 Eyes of Max Carrados; AN. 688
 Wallet of Kai Lung; AN. 40
Braun, Lily. J. Vogelstein; B. 538
Braybrooke, Patrick
 Gilbert K. Chesterton; AN. 95
 Some thoughts on Hilaire Belloc; AN. 454
Brewster, Dorothy; R. 119, 350
Broun, Heywood
 Sun field; B. 39
Brown, Charles Reynolds
 Faith and health; B. 444
Brown, Philip Marshall
 International society, its nature and interests; B. 286
Brown, William Adams
 Imperialistic religion and the religion of democracy; B. 444
Browne, Lewis; R. 38
Bruce, Andrew A.
 American judge; B. 588
Bryant, Marguerite
 Heights; AN. 455
Buccaneers of America. J. Esquemeling; B. 659
Buchan, John, editor
 Nations of today. v. 1-6; B. 537
Ruddenbrooks. T. Mann; B. 442
Buermyer, Laurence. Introduction to reflective thinking. See Columbia associates in philosophy Bulkeley, M. E.
 Bibliographical survey of contemporary sources for the economic and social history of the war; B. 448
Bullett, Gerald
 Innocence of G. K. Chesterton; AN. 456
Burlingame, Roger
 You too; AN. 591
Burns, C. Delisle
 Short history of international intercourse; AN. 745
Bursting bonds. W. Pickens; AN. 68

C

- Caesar remembers. W. K. Seymour; AN. 486
Campbell, Olwen Ward
 Shelley and the unromantics; B. 649
Campbell-Bannerman, Sir Henry. J. A. Spender; B. 711
Cane, J. Toomer; AN. 591
Cannan, Gilbert
 Letters from a distance; AN. 539
Carpenter, Frederiek Ives
 Reference guide to Edmund Spenser; AN. 237
Carson, Gerald Hewes; R. 67, 93, 319, 509
Carter, Howard, and A. C. Mace
 Tomb of Tul-an-ah-amen; B. 657
Case, Shirley Jackson
 Social origins of Christianity; B. 444
Cassol, Gustav
 Theory of social economy; B. 178
Cathedral folk. N. Lysekov; B. 565
Catullus and his influence. K. P. Harrington; AN. 351
Cavalier and puritan. H. E. Rollins, editor; AN. 455
Chambers, Henry E.
 Mississippi Valley beginnings; AN. 68
Changes and chances. H. W. Nevins; B. 482
Chapman, R. W., editor
 Novels of Jane Austen; AN. 453
Chase, Stuart; R. 187, 650
Chatterton, E. Koble
 Merchant marine; B. 536
Cheerful giver. S. McC. Crothers; AN. 40
Chehov, Anton. W. Gerhardt; B. 656
Cherry-stones. E. Philipotts; B. 566
Chesterton, Gilbert K.
 St. Francis of Assisi; B. 446
Chesterton, Gilbert K. P. Braybrooke; AN. 95
Chesterton, G. K., Innocence of. G. Bullett; AN. 456
Chew, Samuel C.; R. 118
Chicago university. Poetry club
 Collected verse; AN. 120
Chief ministers of England. C. Bigham; B. 11
Children of the age. K. Hamsun; B. 563
Churchill, Winston S.
 World crisis, 1915; B. 92
Civilization and the microbe. A. I. Kendall; B. 15
Claw and fang. E. Glanville; B. 347
Clemens, Samuel L.
 Europe and elsewhere; AN. 237
Cleveland, Grover. R. McElroy; B. 446
Collins for two. V. Starrett; AN. 662
Cole, G. D. H.
 Trade unionism and munitions; B. 448
Collector's whatnot. C. O. Van Loo, and others; B. 118
Colonial lighting. A. H. Hayward; AN. 211
Color of a great city. T. Dreiser; B. 176
Colum, Padraic; R. 182, 590
Columbia associates in philosophy
 Introduction to reflective thinking. L. Buermyer and others; B. 401
Come hither. W. De La Mare, editor; AN. 511
Coming of man. J. M. Tyler; B. 66
Community playhouse. C. J. De Goveia; AN. 376
Conrad, Joseph
 Rover; AN. 538
Conrad, Lawrence H.
 Temper; AN. 617
Consciousness, life, and the fourth dimension. R. Erickson; AN. 351

Consett, M. W. P.	208
Triumph of unarmed force; B.
Constitution of the United States. R. L.
Schuyler; AN.	538
Constructive conscious control of the individual.
F. M. Alexander; B.	235
Consumption, Theory of. H. Kyrk; B.	146
Continuity of letters. J. Bailey; B.	146
Coolidge, Calvin
Price of freedom; B.	683
Cooper, Lane
Poetics of Aristotle; AN.	511
Cooperative democracy. J. P. Warbasse; B.	187
Coppard, A. E.
Black dog and other stories; B.	590
Cortissoz, Royal
American artists; B.	184
Cournos, John, and E. J. O'Brien, editors
Best British short stories of 1923; AN.	94
Crane, Stephen. T. Beer; B.	66
Crazy man. M. Bodenheim; B.	441
Creative experience. M. P. Follett; B.	713
Cresson, W. F.
Diplomatic portraits; B.	209
Crichton, C. H.
Lure of old Paris; AN.	716
Crimson cloak. L. Montross; B.	711
Crocker, Bosworth
Humble folk; B.	287
Cronwright-Schreiner, S. C.
Life of Olive Schreiner; B.	653
Crothers, Samuel McChord
Cheerful giver; AN.	40
Crystallizing public opinion. E. L. Bernays; B.	450
Cultivated plants. L. H. Bailey; AN.	485
Cumberland, Gerald
Written in friendship; AN.	566
Cure of souls. M. Sinclair; B.	535
Curie, Marie
Pierre Curie; B.	686
Curie, Pierre. M. Curie; B.	686
Curran, Henry H.
Van Tassel and Big Bill; AN.	566
D Damrosch, Walter
My musical life; B.	144
Dana, John Cotton; R.	687
Dancers. H. Parsons; AN.	376
Dark, Sidney
Story of the renaissance; AN.	486
Dark frigate. C. B. Hawes; B.	234
Dark night. M. Sinclair; B.	711
Davey, Norman
Good hunting; AN.	716
Davidson, Donald
Outland piper; AN.	376
Davies, William H.
True travellers; AN.	662
Dayton, Helena Smith, and L. B. Barratt
Book of entertainments and theatricals; AN	376
De Goveia, C. J.
Community playhouse; AN.	376
Deirdre. J. Stephens; B.	182
De La Mare, Walter, editor
Come hither; AN.	511
Deledda, Grazia
The mother; AN.	238
Dell, Floyd
Janet March; B.	14
Dell, Floyd; R.	14. 741
Dendy, Arthur, editor
Problems of modern science; AN.	147
Deportations delirium of 1920. L. F. Post; B.	317
De Silver, Albert; R.	317
Deutschland, Frankreich, England. M. Har- den; B.	93
Development of international law after the war. O. Nippold; B.	286
D'Ewes, Sir Simonds
Journal; edited by W. Notestein; B.	564
d'Hartoy, Maurice. See Hartoy, Maurice d'
Dickinson, Charles Henry
Religion of the social passion; B.	444
Diplomatic portraits. W. P. Cresson; B.	209
Dobson, Austin
Complete poetical works; AN.	376
Dog and duck. A. Machen; AN.	591
Don Juan. J. M. R. Azorin; B.	320
Doomsland. S. Leslie; AN.	538
Dos Passos, John
Streets of night; AN.	662
Dos Passos, John; R.	36
Douglas, Norman
Together; AN.	289
Doves' nest. K. Mansfield; B.	210
Dramatis personae. A. Symons; B.	93
Dreier, Katherine S.
Western art and the new era; B.	184
Western art. Protest. B. Van Vostrow; C.	258
Dreiser, Theodore
Color of a great city; B.	176
Ductless and other glands. F. E. Wynne; AN.	16
Dukes, Ashley
Youngest drama; B.	293

E

Echo de Paris.	L. Housman; B.	483
Eclipses of the sun.	S. A. Mitchell; B.	688
Economic imperialism and international relations during the last fifty years.	A. Viallute; B.	400
Economic theory.	S. N. Patten; B.	178
Edward IV. Life and reign of.	C. L. Scofield; B.	260
Eighth wonder.	A. S. M. Hutchinson; AN.	120
Eldridge, Seba	Political action; B.	374
Elliot, Hugh	Human character; B.	36
Elliott, Maud Howe	Three generations; B.	186
Emergent evolution.	C. L. Morgan; B.	66
Enemies.	M. P. Artzybsheff; B.	119
Enock, Arthur Guy	Problem of armaments; B.	236
Entertainments and theatricals.	H. S. Dayton and L. B. Barratt; AN.	376
Eriksen, Richard	Consciousness, life, and the fourth dimension; AN.	351
Esquemeling, John	Buccaneers of America; B.	659
Essays in economic theory.	S. N. Patten; B.	178
Essays of a biologist.	J. Huxley; AN.	262
Ethics and some modern world problems.	W. McDougall; B.	664
Euripides and his influence.	F. L. Lucas; AN.	351
Europe and elsewhere.	S. L. Clemens; AN.	231
Europe and the Monroe doctrine one hundred years ago.	W. P. Cresson; B.	209
Europe since 1815.	C. D. Hazen; BN.	576
Europe since 1789.	E. R. Turner; BN.	576
European and oriental literature.	L. Hearn; B.	450
European war	Bibliographical survey of contemporary sources for the economic and social history of the war. M. E. Bulkley; B.	448
Evans, Ernestine; R.		589
Everyday biology.	J. A. Thomson; AN.	745
Evolution and genetics.	S. J. Holmes; AN.	211
Evolution and religion.	H. F. Osborn; B.	66
Expressionism in art.	O. Pfister; B.	37
Eyes of Max Carrados.	E. Bramah; AN.	688

F

Fabre, Human side of. P. F. Bicknell; AN.....	95
Failure. G. Papini; B.....	483
Faith and health. C. R. Brown; B.....	444
Famous tragedy. T. Hardy; B.....	38
Farrar, John, editor
Bookman anthology of essays; AN.....	566
Fascism. O. Por; B.....	714
Faust and the city. A. V. Lunacharski; AN.....	454
Federal centralization. W. Thompson; B.....	533
Feminism in Greek literature. F. A. Wright; B.....	686
Fichter, W. L.; R.....	146
Ficke, Arthur Davison
Out of the silence; AN.....	688
Finck, Henry T.; R.....	234
Finger, Charles J.
Highwaymen; B.....	259
Finger, Charles J.; R.....	188, 659
Fir and the palm. E. Bibesco; B.....	655
Firbank, Ronald
Prancing nigger; B.....	685
Firkins, Ina Ten Eyck, compiler
Index to short stories; AN.....	211
First time in history. A. L. Strong; B.....	350
Fisher, Clarence Stanley, and others
Harvard excavations at Samaria; B.....	452
Fitch, Albert Parker
None so blind; B.....	714
Folk-lore in the Old Testament. Sir J. G. Frazer; AN.....	211
Follett, M. P.
Creative experience; B.....	713
Fontaines, André, translator
Odes, poèmes et fragments lyriques choisis. P. B. Shelley; B.....	712
Ford, Worthington C.; R.....	537
Fourth dimension. C. Bragdon; AN.....	321
France, Anatole
On life and letters; B.....	615
Francis of Assisi, Saint. G. K. Chesterton; B.....	446
Frank, Glenn
An American looks at his world; B.....	180
Frank, Grace; R.....	655
Fraser, Henry S.; R.....	348
Fraser, Sir James George
Folk-lore in the Old Testament; AN.....	211
Freeburg, Victor O.
Pictorial beauty on the screen; AN.....	262
French revolution. S. Mathews; AN.....	237
From pinafores to politics. Mrs. J. B. Harri- man; B.....	186
From Whitman to Sandburg. B. Weirick; AN.....	666

G

Gagarine, Princess Alexandre
Borzoï	cook book; B.....	234
Galapagos.	W. Beebe; B.....	443
Gale, Zona
Birth:	AN.....	662

Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
Young India, 1919-1922; B.	91
Gandhi, Mahatma. R. Rolland; B.	658
Gannett, Lewis S.; R.	67, 400, 443
Garahan, Melbourne
Stiffs; B	374
Gardner, Linda, editor
Rare vanishing and lost British birds. W.
H. Hudson; AN.	617
Garnett, Edward, editor
Letters from W. H. Hudson; B.	67
Garrett, Garret
Satan's bushel; AN.	688
Garrulities of an octogenarian; H. H. B.	633
Gay ones. C. H. Towne; AN.	591
Génération du feu. M. d'Hartoy; B.	184
Gerald, Paul
The prelude; B	617
Gerhard, William
Anton Chehov; B	656
German revolution and after. H. Ströbel; B.	403
Gevaerts, Jean Gaspard. M. Hoc; AN.	512
Ghosal, U.
History of Hindu political theories; B.	260
Gibbs, Philip
Adventures in journalism; B.	67
Gide, André
Strait is the gate; B.	447
Giles, H. A., translator
Travels of Fa-hsien; AN.	456
Gillette, King C.
People's corporation; B.	650
Gissing, George. F. Swinnerton; B.	146
Glanville, Ernest
Claw and fang; B.	347
Gloucester by land and sea. C. B. Hawes; B.	536
Good, J. W.; R.	508
Good hunting, N. Davey; AN.	715
Goodspeed, Edgar J., translator
New testament; B.	38
Gordon at Khartoum. W. S. Blunt; B.	188
Gorki, Maxim
My university days; B.	712
Gorman, Herbert S.
Procession of masks; AN.	15
Graham, Stephen
In quest of El Dorado; B.	234
Grainger, Boine
Hussy; AN.	617
Grattan, C. Hartley; R.	683
Great game of politics. F. R. Kent; B.	564
Green shoots. P. Morand; B.	685
Greene, Everts B.; R.	562, 660
Greever, Garland, and J. M. Bachelor, editors
Soul of the city; AN.	40
Griscom, Ludlow
Birds of the New York city region; AN.	454
Gruening, Ernest H.; R.	237, 450, 686
Guedalla, Philip; R.	649
Guéraud, A. L.
Reflections on the Napoleonic legend; B.	649
Guide for the greedy. E. R. Pennell; B.	234
Guthrie, Ramon
Trobar Clus; AN.	212
H
Haliburton, Thomas Chandler
Sam Slick; AN.	455
Hall, G. Stanley
Life and confessions of a psychologist; B.	176
Hall, G. Stanley; R.	64
Hamilton, Spencer
When there is no peace; B.	510
Hamsun, Knut
Children of the age; B.	563
In the grip of life; B.	563
Hansen, Harry; R.	259, 441, 485
Harden, Maximilian
Deutschland, Frankreich, England; B.	93
Hardy, Thomas
Famous tragedy; B.	38
Harlow, Ralph Volney
Samuel Adams, promoter of the American revolution; B.	655
Harp-weaver. E. St. V. Millay.	210
Harriman, Mrs. J. Borden
From pinafores to politics; B.	186
Harrington, Karl Pomeroy
Catullus and his influence; AN.	351
Harris, Julia Collier; R.	743
Harrison, Marguerite E.
Red bear or yellow dragon; B.	590
Harry. N. Boyce; AN.	263
Harte, Bret
Notice; a request for his letters.	262
Hartoy, Maurice d'
Génération du feu; B.	484
Harvard dead, Memoirs of. M. C. Howe and others; AN.	147
Harvard excavations at Samaria. G. A. Reisner and others; B.	452
Hawes, Charles Boardman
Dark frigate; B.	234
Gloucester by land and sea; B.	536
Hayward, Arthur H.
Colonial lighting; AN.	211
Hazen, Charles Downer
Europe since 1815; BN.	576
Hazlitt, Best of. P. P. Howe; AN.	9

- Some authors. W. Raleigh; B. 146
 Some thoughts on Hilaire Belloc. P. Braybrooke; AN. 454
 Soul of the city. G. Greever and J. M. Bachelor, editors; AN. 40
 Souls in hell. J. O'Neill; AN. 539
 Sources and documents illustrating the American revolution. S. E. Morison, editor; B. 660
 Speaking of the Turks. Mufty-Zade K. Ziabey; B. 744
 Spender, J. A.
 Life of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman; B. 711
 Spenser, Edmund, Reference guide to. F. I. Carpenter; AN. 237
 Spingarn, J. E.
 Poems; AN. 591
 Standard catalog, fiction section. C. Bacon, compiler; AN. 211
 Stanton, Theodore; R. 712
 Starrett, Vincent
 Coffins for two; AN. 662
 Stephens, James
 Deirdre; B. 182
 Stevenson, Robert Louis
 Complete poems; AN. 147
 Stevenson, R. L. F. Swinnerton; B. 146
 Stevenson, Robert Louis. Intimate portrait. L. Osbourne; B. 565
 Stewart, Donald Ogden
 Aunt Polly's story of mankind; B. 118
 Steuart, W. K.; R. 403
 Stiffs. M. Garahan; B. 374
 Stimson, Frederic Jesup
 American constitution; B. 482
 Stolberg, Benjamin; R. 742
 Stork, Charles Wharton, translator
 Modern Swedish masterpieces; B. 350
 Story of a great schoolmaster. H. G. Wells; B. 144
 Story of man's mind. G. Humphrey; AN. 212
 Story of the renaissance. S. Dark; AN. 486
 Strait is the gate. A. Gide; B. 447
 Straus, Henrietta; R. 661
 Street, C. J. C.
 Treachery of France; B. 316
 Streets of night. J. Los Passos; AN. 662
 Ströbel, Heinrich
 German revolution and after; B. 403
 Strong, Anna Louise
 First time in history; B. 350
 Strong, L. A. G., editor
 Best poems of 1923; AN. 566
 Struggle for power in Moslem Asia. E. A. Powell; B. 440
 Studies in evolution and genetics. S. J. Holmes; AN. 211
 Suetonius
 History of twelve Caesars; AN. 454
 Sun field. H. Broun; B. 39
 Sunrise trumpets. J. Auslander; B. 711
 Swedish masterpieces, Modern. C. W. Stork, translator; B. 350
 Swinnerton, Frank
 George Gissing; B. 146
 R. L. Stevenson; a critical study; B. 146
 Symons, Arthur
 Dramatis personae; B. 93
 Synon, Mary
 McAdoo, the man and his times; B. 741
- T
- Talmy, Leon; R. 509
 Tapestry of life. R. Blathwayt; AN. 120
 Tarkington, Booth
 Midlander; B. 318
 Taxation, the people's business. A. W. Mellon; B. 613
 Tellez, Gabriel
 Love-rogue; B. 146
 Temper. L. H. Conrad; AN. 617
 Terence, Art of. G. Norwood; AN. 455
 Terms of conquest. H. V. O'Brien; AN. 212
 Tharaud, Jerome and Jean
 Long walk of Samba Diouf; AN. 662
 Theory of social economy. G. Cassel; B. 178
 31 stories. E. Rhys and C. A. D. Scott, editors; AN. 94
 Thomas, David Y.
 One hundred years of the Monroe doctrine; B. 209
- Thomas, Norman; R. 374, 444, 564
 Thompson, Walter
 Federal centralization; B. 536
 Thomson, J. Arthur
 Everyday biology; AN. 745
 Thousand and first night. G. Overton; AN. 566
 Three fountains. S. Young; B. 511
 Three generations. M. H. Elliott; B. 186
 Thy neighbor's wife. L. O'Flaherty; AN. 486
 Tirso de Molina, pseud. See Tellez, Gabriel
 Together. N. Douglas; AN. 289
 Told by an idiot. R. Macaulay; B. 288
 Tolstoi, the teacher. C. Baudouin; AN. 617
 Tomb of Tut-ankh-amen. H. Carter and A. C. Mace; B. 657
 Toogood, Hector B.
 Outline of everything; B. 118
 Tooker, L. Frank; R. 349
 Toomer, Jean
 Cane; AN. 591
 Tormay, Cécile
 Outlaw's diary: the commune; B. 484
 Towne, Charles Hansen
 Gay ones; AN. 591
 Trade unionism and munitions. G. D. H. Cole; B. 448
 Train, Arthur
 Tut, tut! Mr. Tutt; AN. 40
 Travels of Fa-hsien. H. A. Giles, translator; AN. 456
 Travels through the interior parts of America. T. Anburey; AN. 320
 Treachery of France. C. J. C. Street; B. 316
 Trevelyan, Janet Rose
 Life of Mrs. Humphry Ward; B. 509
 Trisevvene. Kostas Palamas; AN. 662
 Triumph of unarmed forces. M. W. P. Consett; B. 208
 Trobar Clus. R. Guthrie; AN. 212
 True travellers. W. H. Davies; AN. 662
 Turner, E. R.
 Europe since 1789; BN. 576
 Tut, tut! Mr. Tutt. A. Train; AN. 40
 Tutankhamen. A. Weigall; B. 657
 Twain, Mark. See Clemens, Samuel L.
 Tyler, John M.
 Coming of man; B. 66
- U
- United States—Foreign relations
 Die ausbreitungspolitik der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika. E. Kimpen; B. 400
 Hispanic-American relations with the United States. W. S. Robertson; R. 400
 United States, Constitution of the. R. L. Schuyler; AN. 538
 Unity of science. J. Hjort; B. 66
- V
- Vail, Lawrence
 Piri and I; AN. 321
 Van Doren, Carl
 Many minds; B. 741
 Van Doren, Mark; R. 38, 66, 146, 210, 288, 401, 445, 589, 654, 711
 Van Loot, Cornelius Obenchain, and others
 Collector's whatnot; B. 118
 Van Tassel and Big Bill. H. H. Curran; AN. 566
 Van Tyne, Claude H.
 India in ferment. B. 260
 Vasilisa the wise. A. V. Lunacharski; AN. 454
 Vehlen, Thorstein
 Absentee ownership; B. 652
 Verrill, A. Hyatt
 In the wake of the buccaneers; B. 234
 Viallate, Achille
 Economic imperialism and international relations during the last fifty years; B. 400
 Vinogradoff, Sir Paul
 Jurisprudence of the Greek city; B. 348
 Visible and invisible. E. F. Benson; AN. 617
 Vivas, Eliseo; R. 320
 Vogelstein, Julie
 Lily Braun; B. 538
 Vogue's book of etiquette; B. 651
- W
- Wade, John Donald
 Augustus Baldwin Longstreet; B. 743
 Wager, Charles H. A.; R. 285, 446, 652
 Waite, Arthur Edward
 Lamps of western mysticism; B. 285
 Waldron, Webb
 We explore the Great Lakes; B. 536
 Wallet of Kai Lung. E. Bramah; AN. 40
 Warbasse, Agnes Dyer; R. 261
 Warbasse, James Peter
 Cooperative democracy; B. 187
 Ward, Mrs. Humphry, Life of. J. R. Trevelyan; B. 509
 Warner, Arthur; R. 234, 536
 Warren, Dale; R. 15
 Waste. R. Herrick; B. 588
 Watts, Mary S.
 Luther Nichols; AN. 376
 We explore the Great Lakes. W. Waldron; B. 536
 Weeds. E. S. Kelley; B. 65
 Weeds. P. Baroja; B. 36
 Week. I. Libedinsky; B. 119
 Weigall, Arthur
 Tutankhamen and other essays; B. 657
 Weirick, Bruce
 From Whitman to Sandburg; AN. 664
 Weirick, Bruce, editor
 Illini poetry, 1918-1923; AN. 120
 Welded. E. O'Neill; B. 743
 Wellesley college
 Catalogue of early and rare editions of English poetry collected and presented to Wellesley college by George Herbert Palmer; AN. 455
 Wells, Henry W.
 Poetic imagery illustrated from Elizabethan literature; B. 401
 Wells, Herbert George
 Story of a great schoolmaster; B. 144
 Western art and the new era. K. S. Dreier; R. 184
 Western art. K. S. Dreier. Protest. B. Van Vostrow; C. 258
 What the butler winked at. E. Horne; AN. 591
 When there is no peace. S. Hamilton; B. 510
 White, Newman Ivy, and W. C. Jackson, editors
 Anthology of verse by American negroes; AN. 688
 Wife of the centaur. C. Hume; B. 262
 Wiggin, Kate Douglas
 My garden of memory; AN. 538
 Wolf, Robert L.
 After disillusion; AN. 237
 Wood, Edith Elmer
 Housing progress in western Europe; B. 261
 Woodward, W. E.; R. 445
 World Crisis, 1915. W. S. Churchill; B. 92
 Wright, F. A.
 Feminism in Greek literature; B. 686
 Wright, F. A., translator
 Lover's handbook. Ovid; B. 288
 Wright, Harold, editor
 Letters of Stephen Reynolds; B. 286
 Wright, Harriet Sabra; R. 120
 Written in friendship. G. Cumberland; AN. 566
 Wynne, Fred E.
 Ductless and other glands; AN. 16
- X
- "X"
 Myself not least; B. 319
- Y
- Yearbook of American poetry. W. S. Braithwaite, editor; AN. 147
 Yet again. M. Beerbohm; B. 94
 You too. R. Burlingame; AN. 591
 Young, Kimball; R. 176
 Young, Stark
 Three fountains; B. 511
 Young India. M. K. Gandhi; R. 91
 Youngest drama. A. Dukes; B. 592
- Z
- Zia, Mufty-Zade K., bey
 Speaking of the Turks; B. 744

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1924

No. 3052

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	1
EDITORIALS:
Frank I. Cobb	2
Mr. Hughes Says: "Thumbs Down"	3
Bo's View on Postponement	4
Politics by Radio	5
THE RUSSIAN COMMUNIST PARTY. By Louis Fischer	6
AN IMPORT OF CHINA. By Witter Bynner	8
"LUCKY CAL." By William Hard	9
THE BATTLE FOR AMNESTY. By Albert De Silver	10
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	11
CORRESPONDENCE	12
BOOKS:
Man and Woman. By Ludwig Lewisohn	13
History by Personality. By William MacDonald	14
Irrelevant. By Floyd Dell	14
For the Lay Reader. By Lucy Humphrey Smith	15
A Confession. By Dale Warren	15
Books in Brief	15
DRAMA:
Irene Triesch. By Ludwig Lewisohn	16
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Democracy in the Russian Communist Party	17
The Economic Crisis in Russia	18
The Fair at Nizhni Novgorod	20
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER
LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY
MANAGING EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN
LITERARY EDITOR
ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON
H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS
CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 4, England.

DEFENSE by a hypothesis—to that is the dictator of France reduced. To allay the fears of anxious French financiers desirous of ascertaining the meaning of the serious fall of the franc, the deft M. Poincaré assures them that if France had not taken the Ruhr "our money would be considerably more depreciated than it is and the cost of living increased even more than it has." But only last January he said that he had "no intention to carry out at the present time an operation of a military nature, nor an occupation of a military character. It is merely dispatching into the Ruhr a mission of engineers and officials whose object is clearly defined. . . ." Not a word then about safeguarding the franc, and not a word on March 29 when he assured the Chamber of Deputies that "we went into the Ruhr to get reparations and for no other reason." But the French public apparently forgets all this and much more; in its present state of mind, apparently, it would believe Poincaré if he should explain that the fall of the franc was due to the earthquake in Japan. Of course, in his speech he forgot to say that the franc stood at 7.42 cents just before the Ruhr invasion and that it stands at 5.06 today, a loss of a third in one year. He also forgot to point out that in October the Ruhr crime cost the French 109,000,000 francs and brought in only 79,000,000 francs—perhaps he would argue that this too had nothing to do with the fall of the franc.

GREECE has had another revolution, but it would be naive to assume that the Greeks of Greece were responsible for it. The newspaper correspondents send us as inadequate dispatches as in 1917, when they described the action of French marines in expelling King Constantine as a "Greek revolution." The aloofness maintained by the wily Cretan, M. Venizelos, in Paris is not convincing, and the suggestion emanating from Athens that M. Venizelos's "angel," Sir Basil Zaharoff, might be made the first republican president, recalls the days when Sir Basil financed and Lloyd George urged the disastrous Greek advance into Asia Minor. To understand the "revolution" one will have to watch London and Paris as well as Athens.

REPRESENTATIVE Frear's proposal for a congressional investigation of the administration of Governor Leonard Wood in the Philippines is excellent, but it will be permanently useful only if it forces a definite statement of our policy and intentions toward the island. Mr. Frear calls attention to charges that General Wood has been using his power to repay the contributors to the enormous fund, some $1,773,000, that was raised to get the Republican presidential nomination for General Wood in 1920, but it would be drawing a red herring over the trail to allow the investigation to narrow itself to an attack upon the present governor. America, it should not be forgotten, has promised independence to the Filipinos. Richard V. Oulahan, in his current dispatches to the New York Times from Manila, confirms the statements of Professor Maximo M. Kalaw of the University of the Philippines in his article in The Nation of December 5 that the natives are almost unanimous in their desire for independence. General Wood has perhaps served a useful purpose in bringing the fundamental issue of independence to a head—possibly we ought to decorate rather than belabor him.

HENRY FORD'S coming out for President Coolidge has mightily stirred the political dovescotes. It is variously held to insure Mr. Coolidge's nomination; to defeat Senator Johnson and to clear the road for him; to drive Senator La Follette out of the race and greatly to encourage his candidacy; it is a defeat for the liberals and a victory for them. You pays your money and you takes your choice. The only clear thing is that the politicians have now revealed how greatly they fear the candidacy of the richest man in the world. We want, however, to give them a word of warning: Henry Ford is as unaccountable as an earthquake or a volcano. It would be quite in keeping with his past if next week he should decide to run. He has been for and against war and peace and so many other things so many times that no one ought to wager a cent of money upon his staying put politically a week or a day. We rejoice, none the less, that he has spoken as he has, for he has now revealed himself to multitudes who thought him a champion aching to unhorse the powers of privilege and plunder. Instead of which the rebel West now learns that Mr. Ford is quite content with things as they are, will not return the profits he made out of the war, and is very ready to have business go on as usual under a thoroughgoing reactionary Republican Government. He has painted a bold, clear-cut picture of himself for all to study who care to see.

"KENNELS"—so Mr. Victor H. Lawn described in The Nation for December 19 the hovels in which New York City's poor are compelled to live. Governor Smith has just made public a preliminary report of a survey of nine typical blocks which gives a lurid statistical background to Mr. Lawn's picture. While factory wages have decreased in the past three years, rents have risen from 40 to 93 per cent, and the tenements rented have been slipping into worse and worse condition. "In general no repairing has been done for three years"—and where it has been done it brought doubled rents. Sanitary conditions have gone steadily downward. Every block studied showed examples of six people sleeping in two small rooms, both sexes forced to share rooms; bad plumbing, leaking pipes, rotting floors. "The tenant is worse off than ever in things affecting his very life and the health and welfare of his children," comments Governor Smith. We believe that a nation-wide survey would show such degeneration to be general. The cheering reports of building progress refer to high-priced homes; cheap dwellings are not being built. Private capital is not interested; the profit margin is too slight. Is it not plain that housing is as much a matter of public concern as schools, water supply, and sewage disposal?

THERE are two points that interest us especially in the furor that has developed over our proposed treaty with Turkey and the effort to prevent its ratification by the Senate. Speaking in behalf of those who oppose the treaty on the ground that it is unfavorable to the continuance of our religious, educational, and commercial effort, Oscar S. Straus complains that Americans would have only "the same rights in Turkey as the natives." That is all they ought to have. The attempts of powerful and "highly civilized" nations to get special privileges for their citizens in the less developed parts of the world is the foundation of modern imperialism and a most dangerous cause of war. It has led to the long train of aggression of which we have been guilty in Mexico and the Caribbean. Our citizens may rightly claim equality before the law wherever they go—and no more. If that is not sufficient guaranty, they should get out, at no matter what loss to our religious and educational effort—and our trade. The other point of especial interest is the retort by a State Department official that the critics don't know what they are talking about because they have never seen the text of the treaty. Well, why haven't they? To withhold the terms of the agreement from the public until all is over but the shouting is secret diplomacy at its worst. Let us have the proposed treaty with Turkey, Mr. Hughes, and while you are about it, give the public the proposed convention with Mexico as well.

OKLAHOMA citizens seem to possess an inordinate desire to help the Avenging Angel with his job. By their record of 2,000 whippings in a year they were recently in the news from Peking to Cape Town and from Punta Arenas to Nome. Their latest bid for publicity is the murder of a hotel proprietor who had the temerity to hire a Negro porter and then to refuse to turn him over to the first lynching party that came seeking him. The Negro's crime, for which he was to be lynched but was, as it turned out, only "fatally wounded," was that of breaking the "custom of many years' standing" in Marlow that a colored person must not remain in town after dark. "The situation was not unusual," says the assistant prosecuting attorney, J. H. Long, who explains that "there are many towns of Oklahoma where Negroes are not welcome." Also, we understand, where whites are unwelcome if they are unfortunate enough to be Jews or Catholics. However, Mr. Long is convinced that "no evidence has been found to prove the Ku Klux Klan responsible." "A party of youths constituted the mob that attacked the Birch Hotel, and Marvin Kincannon, a lad of bad reputation who had served in the reformatory, did the shooting." Whether it was the Klan or only the Klan spirit that was responsible is immaterial. The community that cherished this "custom of several years' standing" and provided the moral sanction for this caper cut by "a party of youths" stands self-convicted.

WHEN Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, director of the Voluntary Parenthood League, attempted to read a paper before the National Immigration Conference in New York City, she was summarily halted and ruled from the platform by Peter Brady, the chairman. "We are not here to discuss birth control," declared Mr. Brady. Mrs. Dennett had been invited to address the meeting and said she had discussed her speech with an officer in charge of the program, but Mr. Brady did not feel that the paper was in keeping with the subject, whether special legislation should be enacted to secure better selection, distribution, and assimilation of immigrants. Mr. Brady was wrong. Fewer children in the families that pack our foreign quarters would certainly make assimilation an easier task. The "100 neediest cases" that fill the newspapers every Christmas season would be largely reduced and much of poverty checked at its source if parenthood were voluntary.

THE full particulars of the British general election now available to supplement the cabled dispatches reveal several points of interest as regards the personnel of the new House. Among the new members is Ramsay Muir, for several years professor of modern history at Manchester, a leader in broadening the program of the Liberal Party and making it more responsive to social ideals. He recently became editor of the Weekly Westminster. J. H. Harris, who has won a seat for the Liberals at North Hackney, is secretary of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society. He spent many years in tropical Africa and has rendered valuable service in defense of the rights of the natives of that region. T. E. Harvey, elected for Dewsbury, is a former warden of Toynbee Hall and an authority on unemployment and kindred subjects. He is a Liberal Quaker, while George Gillett, the Quaker member for Finsbury, has the distinction of being a banker who advocates the capital levy. Bertrand Russell, Norman Angell, and J. Howard Whitehouse were unsuccessful. As against the success of Mr. Muir, the profession of journalism has to deplore the failure of the editor of the Economist, W. T. Layton, and of that brilliant essayist, Philip Guedalla, as well as of two distinguished Labor journalist-candidates, George Young and Phillips Price.

SOMETIMES when the two-party system is spoken of as the unvarying rule of the British Parliament before the appearance of Labor, it is forgotten that for a long period the Irish Nationalists were strong enough to need to be taken into account by both the major parties. In June, 1885, the Gladstone Government was defeated by a combination of Conservatives and Nationalists. It resigned, and Lord Salisbury took office. At the general election in November and December, the Liberals were returned with 333 seats, the Conservatives with 251, and the Nationalists with 86. Salisbury resigned in January, 1886, and Gladstone formed a government. His position corresponded to Mr. Baldwin's today, for although his party stood first numerically it was in a minority of the whole House. The electoral results in Ireland, where 85 Nationalists had been returned as against 18 Conservatives and no Liberals, led him to accede to the Irish claim for self-government, and accordingly in April he introduced his first home-rule bill, which led to a disastrous split in his own party. The defeat of the bill in June was followed by another general election, which brought back the Conservatives with 316, the Gladstonian Liberals with 196, the dissentient Liberals with 74, and the Nationalists with 84. The Conservative minority maintained a government for six years.

DECEMBER 16 marked the 153rd recurrence of the birthday of Ludwig van Beethoven. Various societies, including the Society of the Friends of Music, have been, as usual, devoting their recent programs to the celebration of this anniversary. But the most vivid of these events was the Beethoven program rendered at Aeolian Hall in New York by Frederic Lamond, the only virtuoso, we believe, who devotes himself exclusively to the interpretation of the master. Mr. Lamond played with a force that seemed sheathed in velvet. His interpretations were restrained and exquisitely just. He has both poetry and energy, grace, speed, and elevation. We call attention to this concert because we believe it sets an admirable example. Our musicians give programs built to exhibit their skill, and the poor lover of music is left with scraps in his memory and a cloying sense of technical proficiency. Almost never is he permitted to sink himself into the mood and mind and art of a great master.

THERE is a fitness in the decision of the Nobel Prize Committee to award no peace prize this year. There is no peace this year to celebrate. Fridtjof Nansen's brave struggle has already been recognized; Lord Robert Cecil, since taking office in the Baldwin Government, has let his once powerful voice be stilled; no statesman of Europe has raised his voice in any serious plea for a warless world, or has molded the foreign policy of his nation as a world policy. We in America have huddled in isolation. General Smuts spoke out nobly two months ago, but what could the prime minister of an African dominion do when no European leader stood up to join him? Off in Asia, Mahatma Gandhi is still in prison; and the one man who in our time has stirred millions to abjure all force is cut off from his people and vilified by their enemies. When his people, awakened by the nationalism of the West, use force as men—particularly Western men—do, this Eastern saint is blamed. But if there had been a Nobel prize committee sitting in Rome, or Arles, or in the ancient predecessor of Delhi, some nineteen hundred years ago, it would, we suspect, have paid no more attention to a young man then preaching non-resistance in Galilee and stirring up excitable people than our modern committee pays to Gandhi.

Frank I. Cobb

AMERICAN journalism has suffered a severe loss in the death of Frank I. Cobb, editor of the New York World. A man of absolute honesty and of great personal charm, possessor of an admirable style, and equipped with a wide knowledge and understanding of American political life, his vigorous writing illuminated many a dark situation with insight and the searchlight of truth. At a time when so many of our chief editorial writers are mere hirelings with little force of character or learning, the loss of Frank Cobb seems well-nigh irreparable. In the first place, there are few men similarly gifted with pungent style and expression; in the second place, he was fortunate in having the freedom of the World's editorial page. Thanks to the wisdom and the generosity of the Pulitzers, there was never any doubt that Mr. Cobb's pen was unchained.

In its range it covered a wide field; in its sympathies it was almost invariably on the side of the people against privilege. When nearly all the other New York dailies were silent in the face of corporate wrongdoing, the World spoke out. When the public was misled as to those behind the bosses, Mr. Cobb tore aside the masks that hid them. When it came to the tariff fraud, his irony and his direct onslaughts reached the mark every time. He had a way of exposing a sham by a touch of brilliant sarcasm which undoubtedly had something to do with Henry Watterson's declaration that he was by all odds the most brilliant editorial writer of his day. If that estimate was open to challenge, it could be on behalf of only one or two others; above the rest Frank Cobb stood head and shoulders. For one thing, he was a convinced democrat, and when your liberal writes he is likely to do so with a fire and passion which can never be equaled by a defender of stand-pattism and the existing order—the conservative editor resembles nothing so much as a balky mule, with his forefeet outstretched and braced lest anybody try to shove him and his wagon along. Mr. Cobb knew that there was much grievously wrong in the state of Denmark and he dared to say it. He was not afraid to declare that our Constitution, long outworn, had become a straitjacket preventing the normal development of our political entity; nor to point out that the new states formed during or after the World War were careful not to take over our much-vaunted political system or to shape their parliamentary organization after our own.

All of which makes it the more lamentable that when the war came Mr. Cobb and his paper were both stampeded into supporting it. He was one of the first among liberal editors to believe that the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, as voiced in the "New Freedom," gave the best opportunity for the development of a liberal and progressive America that had come in their lifetimes. He could not see that our entry into the World War would not only cure nothing, but that it would be almost a death-blow to every progressive and reform movement in America. During the war he was silent when the Constitution was outraged and the most sacred rights of the American citizen were trampled under foot. Afterward he spoke out, but never with a clear realization of the fact that an alliance of liberalism and war invariably means disaster for the former. His last years he devoted vigorously to combating the dire reaction which our plunge into the war had insured. To that fight his loss is altogether stunning.

Mr. Hughes Says: "Thumbs Down!"

"THUMBS down!" says Mr. Hughes in answer to Chicherin's proposal for the recognition of Russia. It is an old answer—so old, indeed, that it has become tiresome, and Mr. Hughes has felt it necessary to liven it up with a little jazz supplied by the Dime Novel Bureau of the Old Sleuth Division of the Department of Justice. The Secretary of State repeats the hoary old arguments against recognition: Russia's confiscation of American property, the repudiation of her debt, and her support of communist propaganda in the United States. Then seeing that his audience is going to sleep on his hands, he hastily calls on Mr. Daugherty for a saxophone sextette and some black-face artists to introduce an interlude of jazz. Mr. Daugherty kindly obliges, and the country is treated to a tale of alleged instructions recently sent by Zinoviev to the Workers Party of America, calling for the organization of "fighting units" and looking toward a day when it would be possible to "raise the red flag over the White House."

The whole tale sounds like fiction—far too naive to be believed of the Soviet Government in its present situation and mood. Senators Norris and Borah have challenged its authenticity with such insistence that Mr. Lodge has felt obliged to promise an investigation by the Foreign Relations Committee. The public will do well not to swallow the story until this inquiry shows on what base it rests. Mr. Hughes tacitly admits that he knows nothing of the truth of the tale himself, but says he has the assurance of the Department of Justice of its authenticity. If he had the assurance of the Department of Agriculture, of the Director of the Mint, or of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the story might merit at least superficial credence, but in its post-war dealings with "red activities" the Department of Justice has such a record of fakes that it is entitled only to suspicion until it has produced convincing evidence.

Leaving aside for the present, therefore, Mr. Hughes's jazz interlude, what is there to the stipulations which he makes for recognition of Russia? The general demand that the Soviet Government shall not conduct propaganda in this country for the violent overthrow of our Government is reasonable, and not unacceptable to Russia. Yet there are certain difficulties here which need to be understood. Communist doctrine is aimed primarily at achieving a new industrial system. Nobody can predict how the workers of any particular country would carry it out, or how far, even if they were generally convinced of its justice. The assumption that widespread belief in communism here in America would be accompanied by a violent overturn of existing government is a conclusion unwarranted by history and resting largely on the fears of those who profess it. In any event, active propaganda for an industrial and political revolution in the United States does not now and probably never will come primarily from Russia. The convincing arguments against conditions in this country are not in manifestos from Moscow but in the facts which our own press, however unwillingly, is obliged to give us in regard to coal-mine monopoly, insufficient housing, profiteering merchants, greedy bankers, swindling business men, and corrupt politicians. This is propaganda dipped in fire.

And has Mr. Hughes forgotten that our own Government not merely propagandized for the overthrow of the Soviet Government but in common with the other Allies made actual war against it, although it never had the courage or the honesty to issue a declaration of hostilities? Has Mr. Hughes forgotten that "our boys" were sent to Archangel in the effort violently to overthrow the Bolshevik Government and to raise upon the Kremlin the flag of some scoundrelly adventurer who was willing to lick the boots of the Allies in return for their support?

Beside his fear of propaganda for the violent overthrow of the Government of which he is a nervous part, Mr. Hughes mentions two other stumbling blocks in the way of recognition of Russia: confiscation of American property and repudiation of the old debts. We are not aware that American property has been treated differently from that of anybody else. Confronted with complete ruin and industrial collapse in Russia, the Soviet leaders have been obliged to take many drastic steps, but they have played no favorites. Americans have been treated on a par with other foreigners or with natives. Besides, what right have we to talk of confiscation after our seizure of the chemical patents of private citizens in Germany, or after destroying the property of numerous foreigners as well as Americans by the prohibition amendment?

Russia's repudiation of the foreign debt contracted in pre-bolshevik days has been the strongest and most enduring excuse urged against her recognition both here and in Europe since the Soviet regime began. Is it not time to strip this argument of its humbug and hypocrisy? Russia's chief crime was her honesty. In a burst of open diplomacy the Soviet leaders declared that the Government would not pay the enormous obligations occasioned by the Czar or the war—a burden impossible to shoulder. France, Italy, and other debtors to the United States have been more canny: they have said they could not pay. But the result is the same. They have not paid, and in all probability they never will pay, either interest or principal.

The repudiation of debts by governments is a wholly familiar fact in history. It is often as necessary and as legitimate as for an individual—for whom we have provided a legal method through bankruptcy. Within even the present century Greece, Spain, Rumania, and Portugal have defaulted on large amounts of their public debt. A large number of our own States, not only in the South after the Civil War, but including Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Michigan, and Minnesota, have been guilty of defaults. Every one of our European Allies in the World War has repudiated large amounts of public debt through the depreciation caused by going to a paper-currency basis. All Americans who bought French or Italian internal bonds during the early years of the war—as many living in those countries did—have had those obligations repudiated by 75 per cent through the fall of the exchange rate.

Mr. Hughes is harassed by fictitious fears and clings to outworn shibboleths. The Soviet Government can no longer be viewed as an accident or an experiment. Russia is the most hopeful country in Europe from the standpoint of the latter's industrial reconstruction and revival. Russia's fields can grow the grain of which her neighbors are in want. But first the barriers must be removed. We have our choice. We can recognize Russia and cooperate with her in reestablishing industry on a basis of self-help or we can ladle out charity to Europe by means of the soup kitchen.

Bok—Peace or Propaganda?

IF there were a Pulitzer prize for the most successful piece of publicity done each year, the prize for 1923 should certainly go to Mr. Edward Bok, late of the Ladies Home Journal, now best known for his "peace prize." As publicity it has been an unqualified success. As an effort for peace it is perhaps open to some question.

As publicity it will continue a success. No mere announcement of the award is to satisfy these indefatigable workers. There is to be a national referendum on the plan. Organizations totaling millions of members are to poll their members; every newspaper and magazine in the country is being asked to cooperate in the voting. Never was peace so well advertised; it would be worth while, some suggest, if only because it has turned so many million minds to the problem of world peace. Other voices raise a curious question. What if the whole business were not so much an objective attempt to move the world toward peace as an effort to propagate a particular program for peace? What if it were at root an attempt to "educate" the American people to the League of Nations or to its World Court?

Suspicious men are all too ready to impute subtle Machiavellianism to those with whom they disagree; and it is hard to believe that Mr. Bok and his associates are such deep-dyed conspirators. Yet when one considers the names of the members of the jury of award: Elihu Root, General Harbord, Colonel House, Miss Pendleton of Wellesley, Dean Pound of the Harvard Law School, William Allen White, and Brand Whitlock, one realizes that these are all likely to be sympathetic to the League. One feels that, distinguished and above suspicion as they are, they may have been—well, carefully selected.

It is the form of the referendum which most excites distrust. We understand that well-paid young students did the preliminary reading of the 22,000 manuscripts submitted, and that some two hundred plans went to the jury. Presumably these two hundred included a variety of programs. But only one winning plan is to be submitted to the voters. There is to be no alternative. Readers of the cooperating magazines and newspapers, members of the cooperating organizations, are to give an unqualified yes-or-no answer to one plan. Suppose, as seems likely, it is one form of the World Court plan. Voters cannot express reservations or suggest amendments. They must answer, like a miserable witness in a court room, yes or no. There is no choice. And with their votes Mr. Bok and his able publicity agents will make magnificent propaganda for the winning plan. Was there ever a more perfect method of pushing a political campaign?

There is a fairer way, still open to the committee. Suppose that instead of one, three plans were submitted to the voters. Suppose that beside the one involving some form of participation in the League or the World Court, real alternatives were submitted: a plan involving participation in Europe while remaining aloof from the League, and a plan involving maintenance of isolation. Then the referendum would mean something; the suspicion of propaganda would be avoided. We shall await the announcement of the winning plan and the final decision upon the method of referendum with interest. It would be a pity if the public were left doubtful whether Mr. Bok was more interested in peace or in propaganda.

Politics by Radio

IT may be that in after years men will look back upon the campaign of 1924 as "the radio year." Every important speech will go out on the air to hundreds of thousands, sometimes to millions, who would never dream of packing themselves into tight, stuffy halls to hear the candidates—and many an unimportant speech will reach the same vast audience. More effective than pamphlets, mass meetings, or street orations will be these speeches to the great home audiences receiving through the single sense of hearing. It is something new in politics, something totally, amazingly new, which in two short years has become almost as commonplace a part of our civilization as the telephone, the automobile, and the motion picture—all inventions within the memory of the youngest editor of The Nation.

Yet it is possible that radio will never again play so important a part in a campaign. Radio has come to stay, but it is none the less a fad. Like the bicycle, it may have overreached its market—and broadcasting stations may follow the cinderpath into oblivion. There are millions "listening in" every evening this year. Some other fad will hold the attention of most of them in 1928. And as the fad dies, broadcasting will decline.

Eight hundred and fifty broadcasting stations have been licensed in the United States since radio began to conquer the national imagination, but already half of them have ceased operation. They are too expensive. In England the receiver is licensed, and the receipts from the licenses help pay for broadcasting. Here the receiver pays nothing for the music, politics, propaganda, or what-not which he receives out of the air. The dealer in radio material refuses to tax himself to pay for broadcasting. Some of the best broadcasting is done by manufacturers who seek thereby to build up the radio audience and maintain the demand for receiving apparatus. But as the craze dies down (and manufacturers admit that the market already shows a tendency to stabilization), the incentive will decline. Broadcasting is expensive, and when the public ceases madly buying new radio apparatus every week the economic excuse will be gone. Other broadcasting is pure advertising. Many newspapers, particularly in the West and South, have maintained broadcasting stations. But their number is declining; it costs too much. Unless some way is found to finance it, broadcasting must die.

Politics may, for a time, provide such a method. It will be worth while for candidates to pay for the privilege of broadcasting. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company is already experimenting with paid radio advertising from its WEAf station in New York City. It does not, of course, accept obvious and direct advertising. It does accept, at the rate of $100 for ten minutes, radio advertising in the form of lectures or children's stories that have a moral—an advertising moral. And it expects, in 1924, a considerable income from political speeches.

There is an opportunity and a menace in this use of the radio. The big radio companies are frank to say that they will broadcast only the propaganda of the two major political parties. The minority parties will be left in the cold. Perhaps we shall ultimately come to regard the air as something like a public park, and shall provide free concerts and free lectures, and give the various parties as much opportunity to exercise their lungs as they know how to use.

The Russian Communist Party

By LOUIS FISCHER

THE Moscow Control Commission has decided to expel from the Russian Communist Party N. S. Popov for practicing religious ceremonies and H. H. Andreyevitch, keeper of a cafe." A small notice of this sort in an inconspicuous corner of a morning's Pravda gives one a correct notion of the exclusive nature and disciplinary strictness of that aristocratic order of approximately half a million members which has been ruling Russia since November, 1917.

The Russian Communist Party combines the secrecy of the Masons and the fanatic devotion of the Jesuits with the worldly adaptability of a modern political organization. The high quality of its membership is attained through a hesitancy to accept new recruits and a readiness to rid itself of old human material which has been weighed in the balance of experience and found wanting. These are the elements that have enabled the Soviet regime to maintain power despite the opposition, active as well as passive, of a hostile world, and notwithstanding the innumerable difficulties inherent in the domestic situation.

Theoretically and constitutionally the Russian Government derives its power from local soviets. Actually it takes its orders from the leaders of the Communist Party, which has neither a mandate from nor a responsibility other than self-imposed to the inhabitants of the vast country. There are, of course, provincial and federal congresses of soviets whose legislative and executive organs do exercise certain prerogatives and perform certain definite functions, but real authority resides with the local Communist groups and, in final form, with the Communist Party's Central Committee of Nine, or Political Bureau, as it is known in Russia. When an important note from a foreign government is to be answered these nine—Lenin, Trotzky, Stalin, Kamenev, Dzerzhinski, Rykov, Bucharin, Zinoviev, and Tomski—decide upon the tone and trend of the reply and then approve its text. On the arrival in May of the Curzon ultimatum, which threatened for a time to cause a rift in Anglo-Russian relations, representatives of the Foreign Office made no secret of this fact. Yet the "Politbureau" is not a government body, nor are Bucharin, Zinoviev, and Tomski officials of the Government. And just as the Communist Party puts its stamp on Soviet diplomacy, its direct authority permeates every department of the state as well as such semi-governmental institutions as the trade unions and the cooperatives. For all of these the resolutions of a Communist Party conference are law.

But the Russian Government is in reality so closely identified with the Russian Communist Party that an attempt to discover where the authority of the one ends and that of the other begins amounts to little more than academic hair-splitting. Most responsible positions in the Government are held by Communists. The tendency to man the state apparatus with Communists to the exclusion of non-party individuals increases as the ideal of communism retreats before the prosaic difficulties of the present. In the army trained officers of the Czar's army are gradually being replaced by pro-Soviet graduates of the Red military academies; in the industries and the ministries the attempt is being made to supplant anti-Soviet specialists with Communist. It was the opinion of the Twelfth Congress of the Communist Party which met last April that the monopoly of Communist government officials ought to be made as complete as possible.

If this is as yet only an aim in the administrative department of the local and federal governments, it is almost a fully achieved fact in the legislative and executive department of these governments—in the soviets. It is inconceivable that the first Soviet of the land, the Council of People's Commissars, over which Lenin presides, should include anyone who is not a Communist. The city soviets do count some non-party members but the number is always small. Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that the nonpartisan, if he objects to the tenets and practices of the Communists, does not often dare seriously to oppose them, so that Communist unanimity remains undisturbed. The Moscow Soviet contains 1,902 Communists and 175 non-partisans. The ratio in most urban soviets will approximate that of the capital. In the villages the number of Communists is comparatively smaller.

Because of the Government's natural desire to intrust responsible, non-technical positions as far as possible to Communists, and because of the scarcity of Communists in comparison to the number of posts, membership in the Communist Party may easily become a straight road to an administrative job with the state. Thus it is that many workingmen who join the party and even many of those peasants who have little fitness for administrative work will probably leave the factory or the field and drift into the office.

Whether this development, now only in its inception, will have the ultimate effect of making the Communist Party identical with a government bureaucracy it is too early now to say. At present government employees constitute only 22.2 per cent of the membership of the Russian Communist Party; peasants, 26.7 per cent; workers, 44.4 per cent; "others," that is, intellectuals, artists, and professional people, 6.7 per cent.

It is the frank aim of the leadership of the party to increase the percentage of factory workers at the expense of other social elements. The annual conference in April resolved that "the Russian Communist Party, being a proletarian party, must systematically increase the percentage of industrial workers and simultaneously regulate and limit the admission into the party of all other elements." The previous conference had adopted a similar decision. During the year 1923-1924 only industrial workers will be accepted into the party; all others must pass the period as candidates under probation.

The preference for factory workers arises from the conviction that the city proletarian is naturally more radical and advanced than the peasant or the official. Time and again at congresses Communist leaders have warned against the infiltration into the party of "petty bourgeois" blood from the villages and elsewhere. For the Communist Party enjoys a growing popularity which was not its portion at the beginning of the bolshevik regime; if the doors were thrown wide open membership would undoubtedly leap to many times the 410,430 of the last census of January, 1923.

From 1898, when the Russian Social Democratic Party was formed, until 1903, when it split into Majority or Bolshevik and Minority or Menshevik factions on a question of program in which the Bolsheviks had a majority of two votes (hence the present name of the party) and on to the end of the Czarist regime, the Communist Party was illegal and underground. To join the party was to incur the danger of death or of life-long exile in the Siberian salt and gold mines. These objective circumstances, together with the strict inner discipline, limited membership to a few tried and tested persons of the most idealistic and intellectual type who lived in foreign exile and to a select nucleus of radical workingmen, so that at the time of the abortive 1905 revolution, for instance, the Communists were only 8,400 strong. And when in 1917 they seized the reins of government, which they still hold, the party was a mere handful of 25,000. Since then membership has increased with impressive leaps and bounds. In 1918 there were already 115,000 enrolled Communists; in 1919, 251,000; the next year brought the total to 431,000; and in 1921 the pinnacle was reached with 585,600.

With so rapid a growth and despite occasional individual expulsions much undesirable material found its way into the ranks. Accordingly a general wholesale cleansing was ordered in 1921 which resulted in the exclusion of 24.1 per cent of the entire membership of the party. Members were expelled because they had not attended the political party courses, because they had not been regular in performing the duties imposed on them by the party, because they had married into bourgeois families or undergone a religious marriage ceremony, because they had submitted their sons to baptism or circumcision, because they had lived in too great luxury, finally because they were known to gamble, take bribes, engage personally in capitalistic enterprises, or to make improper use of their influence as Communists for the benefit of a friend or relative. In this general purification of the party all members, from the most ordinary worker and peasant to the highest personality in the organization, were summoned before examining commissions and subjected to pitiless and often embarrassing third degrees in which intimate, private matters, such as a man's relations to women, were not avoided. Communism involves the negation of the individual and while, in the recent history of the party, practice has strayed somewhat from this theory, it would naturally reassert itself in a process of purification.

Localized cleansings take place as the occasion arises. Any person's doings may at any time become the subject of a public discussion at the meeting of a Communist group. A Communist's political and private behavior is under as close a scrutiny during the entire length of his adherence to the party as it is during the period of probation which precedes his entrance into it.

No person enters the Russian Communist Party without passing through a purgatory as candidate. The period of candidacy is never less than six months, but generally lasts from one to two years and may be extended to even greater limits, as it is this year for persons outside the working class. A person is accepted as a candidate upon the recommendation of several well-reputed Communists of long standing. He is subjected to tests and examinations; he must learn the Communist catechism and perform numerous duties without enjoying any of the privileges that attach to membership in the party. If his political backbone appears weak the period of his candidacy is correspondingly prolonged; if his case proves hopeless he is dismissed without further ado. At present there are 117,924 candidates in Russia, making the total number of declared Communists 528,354. In addition the League of Communist Youth, functioning as a stepping-stone to the senior party and consisting of persons between the ages of 18 and 21, has close to 300,000 members.

Heavy duties and irksome tasks increase rather than decrease when finally the candidate has been promoted to full-fledged membership. Likewise the responsibilities and the dangers. A Communist may any day be ordered to proceed to India or to Spain, or to go to the Caucasus or into a factory for secret political work, and his only choice is to obey. On the other hand, if he desires to quit Russia for personal reasons he cannot do so without the party's consent. Where the fire is hottest and the risk greatest a Communist is dispatched to stand guard. This was so in the civil wars, when the Communists constituted special shock companies always thrust first into battle. The same was true of the storming of Kronstadt; in 1919 and 1920, when many villages were resisting with armed force the attempts of the Government to requisition their grain, picked troops of Communists were detailed to cope with the situation. For the Communist on duty is never subject to disaffection. Where an ordinary Red Army detachment occasionally conceived a sympathy for the cause of the recalcitrant peasants—in certain cases the soldiers permitted themselves to be disarmed—the Communist groups suppressed ruthlessly every revolt they encountered. A Communist with an order in his pocket ceases to be a person and becomes a machine to execute that order. It is this military discipline to which every Communist subjects himself voluntarily that has made for the success of the Communist regime in Russia. I once addressed myself to a member of the G. P. U.—the peacetime successor of the dreaded Cheka—and asked him whether the work he was doing was not repulsive to his nature. He replied: "I am a Communist. This is the task to which I have been assigned." Nor is it merely a child's obedience to a higher will. The Communist is convinced that discipline is the strongest pillar of the party, but more important than this, his agreement with the principles and tactics of the person, also a Communist, who gave the order leads him to a belief in its justice and necessity. What remains is the effacement of self if the duty is unpleasant. For this he is prepared—it is the Communist's first commandment.

The standard which the Communist Party sets for its members is much higher than any that in ordinary life is expected of the average individual. The leaders present an example of disdain for luxuries, fine dressing, and high living which has become a code of honor for the whole organization. A Communist holding one of the highest positions in the Government who had probably grown accustomed to physical comforts through earlier experience in America was recently called to task by his colleagues for living in too high a style. Bucharin, dressed in simple Russian clothing, jogging the streets of Moscow when he could easily have an auto, is a well-known figure, while Lenin's and Chicherin's indifference to new clothing has become proverbial. Lunacharski, seen several times during the better part of a year in Russia, always wore the same threadbare jacket and trousers of different color and texture. Naturally there are exceptions when one is dealing with a body of half a million persons of varying antecedents and training, and whereas gambling and drinking, for instance, are offenses to be followed by expulsion from the party there are not a few who indulge.

When a Communist commits a wrong he is the loser for being a Communist. Last winter there were several interesting cases in the Moscow courts of officials tried for taking bribes. The non-Communists were sentenced to imprisonment and fines; the Communists were shot.

But just as the lex talionis never prevented murder, and as punishment never deters the criminal, so human frailties are not altogether to be eradicated by the high moral code of the Communists, nor the tendency to misuse power by the knowledge that Communist vengeance awaits the sinner. Moreover, neither the strict discipline that obtains within the party, nor the added duties and dangers, nor the constant surveillance, periodic examinations, and occasional purifications to which every member is exposed, prevent the entrance into the party of a class that assumes the cloak of communism merely because it opens the road to a career and success. In the course of time many of these persons will be discovered and eliminated, but there is certainly an appreciable remnant which avoids the weeding process and remains to discredit the organization as a whole. The presence of these careerists in the party, reinforced as it is by a fairly thick sprinkling of "petty bourgeois" individuals most of whom have sprung on to the band-wagon since the Communists seized power in 1917, has made for considerable demoralization within the party and has lowered it far below the level of purity which was maintained when Lenin was still a scribbler in Zurich and Trotzky a poorly c'ad lecturer in various parts of Europe and America.

The rule limiting admission to industrial workers is an attempt to bring back part of the quality which vanished from the party with its rapid growth. Individuals, furthermore, are encouraged to leave the party and many do, for membership is a bar to those who are ambitious for wealth through participation in private enterprise.

Communists constitute a privileged class in Russia. The real Communist, to be sure, expects nothing in return for the extra burdens and responsibilities he carries except the satisfaction of knowing that he is working toward his ideal, and that he, only a few years ago downtrodden and pursued, is now part of a great workers' government. But objective conditions force upon all Communists advantages which certain of those who sit atop the pyramid are eager to add to. All things being equal, or even when many things are unequal, the Communist will be chosen for a job above the other candidates. Because, after the experience that Soviet Russia has passed through with sabotaging specialists, devotion is often preferred to knowledge and expert training, the Communist worker will receive more rapid advancement than his colleagues not enrolled with the party. If a pay roll is to be shortened the Communist will probably be kept longest on the staff. In Moscow the housing problem is very acute, but the Communist is always certain to be accommodated; elsewhere in the provinces he gets the choice of the best dwellings. If a gubernia must send a representative to the capital, or Moscow must delegate someone abroad, a Communist will be first in line for the trip. Under the hard and trying material circumstances of present-day Russia these are considerations not to be underestimated.

[A second article by Mr. Fischer will discuss the treatment of national minorities by the Soviet Government.]

An Import of China

By WITTER BYNNER

NEWARK, New Jersey, is too near New York for New Yorkers to realize how large a town lies across the Hudson River—the twelfth or thirteenth largest, I believe, of American cities. At the moment, however, it will be well worth the while of New Yorkers and of others within easy reach of Newark to realize that such a city exists and to understand how large-minded a director is shaping the policy of the Newark Museum Association. John Cotton Dana and members of his staff, notably Mrs. Theodora Rhoades, have been at work for many months assembling from all over the world an exhibition designed to convey to the attending American mind a rounded sense of the spirit and activities of China. Until January 1 that exhibition is on view at the Newark Public Library every afternoon and evening; and during 1924 the exhibits, lacking only some of the valuable art objects, will go on tour among twenty cities.

The scope of the exhibition is wide: detailed evidence of Chinese life, ancient and modern, agricultural and industrial, public and domestic, educational and religious, aesthetic and utilitarian. There are clothes, furniture, toys, musical instruments, implements of shop and field, maps, charts, photographs, an actual illustration of silk culture, from the worm to the brocade; a multitude of practical objects and at the same time a rich display of ornaments, of jades, of bronzes, and of masterly paintings. A mere enumeration of the persons, firms, corporations, and officials contributing to the exhibition makes a pamphlet of twenty-six pages.

Art and daily living are closer bound with the Chinese than they are with us; and Newark has done well to give us a combinedly practical and aesthetic revelation of our Pacific neighbors: a reminder of the history of China, its vast extent, population, and endurance, its absorbing conquest of its conquerors; a reminder that these Orientals are not sinister barbarians but a race founded in deep wisdom and culture; a reminder that the Chinese were a practical people long before American civilization began and that they may remain an artistic people long after American civilization has perished. The present political chaos in China is nothing compared to that in Europe. Mechanistic industrialism is bending the edges of China, but has not as yet, as it has done with us, warped the whole body of national life. Perhaps it will be the Chinese who will teach us what to do with this perilous monster we have created, how to change him from a deadening to a quickening dragon.

Forgetting culture for a moment, thinking merely in terms of commerce, exhibitions like this one at Newark and the internationally cooperative spirit behind such exhibitions are likely to correct a deplorable American error familiar to many travelers in China. Chinese after Chinese has said to me, speaking of Americans: "We like you best, best of all the peoples. You have been kindest to us. Nation to nation, you have treated us honestly. We know that Britain, as a nation, has treated us dishonestly, and continues to do so on every occasion. And yet we have to trade with the British in preference to you, because, trader to trader, they deal with us honestly. Your American business men will sell us one thing and deliver another, not quite what we ordered, and will then refuse to make good. They are not scrupulous with us, because we are only Chinese. We put up with it once or twice, because we like you. Your American business men make us pay on their accustomed dates, instead of on ours, and we do it for a while. But finally we deal with the British, who in trade treat us humanly. Whatever villainies they may practice against us in politics, they are more honest with us than you are in business. Even the Japanese are more honest than you in business and more considerate of our feelings as individuals. When you have learned to do as well by us individually as you have done nationally, it will be a happier day for both countries. We know you better than you know us. We understand you better. And we'll be ready for you with warm hearts, and with our trade, when you understand us better, not just as a nation, but as people."

Mr. Dana and his associates in Newark are to be complimented upon calling our attention to people whom in every way it behooves us to know and upon encouraging among those people faith in the development of interracial understanding and sympathy, a sympathy which has been instinctively but not as yet very intelligently felt in America's traditional gesture of friendliness toward the oldest of living civilizations.

'Lucky Cal'

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

SOME of Mr. Coolidge's luck he contrives for himself. Some of it just settles upon him like dew. The total of the two sorts continues to accumulate.

When Mr. Gifford Pinchot of Pennsylvania was engaged in his stupendous attack upon the federal Government in the matter of prohibition enforcement, the ex-Governor of a Western State said to Mr. Coolidge:

"Is this sort of attack going to hurt you?"

"Never has," said Mr. Coolidge succinctly.

Today Mr. Pinchot has little time to press home upon the federal Government his thoroughly substantial charges against the federal Government's highly political prohibition enforcement service.

God on behalf of Calvin Coolidge has raised up great crops of enemies for Mr. Pinchot in Pennsylvania. By act of Providence the Secretary of the Treasury is a Pennsylvanian. The Secretary of the Treasury, by a strange development of historic fate, is the federal official in chief charge of prohibition enforcement. By a freak of circumstance the present Secretary of the Treasury, besides being a Pennsylvanian, is the richest Pennsylvanian in existence and one of the most formidably powerful. Mr. Pinchot, in attacking the federal prohibition enforcement service, was accordingly obliged to sow dragons' teeth for himself in Pennsylvanian soil. From that sowing there now arise enemies who give him large occupation at some distance from Washington.

Simultaneously it happens, through the mysterious mercy which watches over Calvin Coolidge, that the organization chiefly responsible for the highly political character of the federal prohibition enforcement service is precisely the Anti-Saloon League. This organization is supposed to sympathize with Mr. Pinchot. It is obliged, however, still more to sympathize with the nature which it itself has imposed upon the federal office enforcing the Volstead law. The Anti-Saloon League cannot say that the federal prohibition enforcement service is improperly organized. That service is organized in total separation from civil-service rules and in total subordination to direct political influences precisely because the Anti-Saloon League has wished to have it so organized. In effect accordingly the Anti-Saloon League may feel for Mr. Pinchot but in effect accordingly it works for Mr. Coolidge.

Meanwhile Mr. Pinchot, by divine interference accomplished through Mr. Coolidge's own immediate thought and act, is further engaged in still solving the problem of anthracite coal. If anybody would rather solve a problem than run for the presidency, Mr. Coolidge gratifies him. Mr. Pinchot wanted to solve anthracite coal and Mr. Coolidge accommodately permitted and even urged him to do so. It now begins to be seen that Mr. Pinchot is primarily solving prohibition enforcement and anthracite coal and only incidentally running for the presidency, while Mr. Coolidge is only incidentally solving anything and is primarily engaged in the prime object of politics—namely, the managing and ruling of problem-solvers.

Undeterred by the fate of Mr. Pinchot, Mr. Lowden of Illinois manifested an interest in solving the problem of wheat. He felt that it was a great problem and that it ought to be solved. Mr. Coolidge agreed with him and sent him forth to solve it by bringing together the wheat farmers of America into cooperative organizations which would control—or, at any rate, dominate—the wheat market of America. At the end of a long time Mr. Lowden is still bringing them together. It is reported that in one State he has succeeded in bringing them together sufficiently to insure the organization of an organization committee. It is progress, but small and slow progress. The mass of the wheat farmers of the United States remain thoroughly unorganized. To bring them together will be the labor of years. No shining results will be reported by Mr. Lowden by the time the next Republican national convention meets.

It then further fortunately happened—fortunately for the favorite son of Vermont, Massachusetts, and Chance—that Mr. Ford aspired to solve something. He wished to solve fertilizers. He had to solve fertilizers. His tractors are substituting themselves for horses on the farms of America. Horses, besides dragging plows, are sources of the means of natural fertilization for the farms which they inhabit. Tractors are not. It was incumbent upon Mr. Ford to make amends. It was incumbent upon him to sell to his farmer clients the equivalent of a horse in two sales—first the sale of tractors and then the sale of fertilizers.

Hence he desired Muscle Shoals. From previous administrations he had received only a grudging sympathy. From Mr. Coolidge he received a quite earnest cooperation. Mr. Ford was pursued with a two-tined fork. One tine was the possibility that he might actually get and take Muscle Shoals. If he did, he then would have a great personal private financial contract with the Government and would be morally and perhaps even legally embarrassed in getting and taking the presidency. This view of the matter may not have occurred to the mind of Mr. Coolidge. It lay, however, in the situation; and Mr. Coolidge's luck in truth is very largely the accommodatingness with which he permits nature to take its course. If a rival of Mr. Coolidge's wishes to debar himself from the presidency by taking a contract with the Government, Mr. Coolidge is not stirred to try to injure his rival by preventing him from having his heart's desire.

The other tine of the fork was that Mr. Ford might be overcome with gratitude and might go to work politically for Mr. Coolidge and that then it would make no political difference whether Congress gave Muscle Shoals to Mr. Ford or not.

By deduction this killing kindness can be regarded as intentional. By observation it seems to have something to do not with malignancy but even with a certain sort of magnanimity. Mr. Coolidge does not conduct personal feuds. If he had been in President Wilson's place he would have allowed Theodore Roosevelt to have a military command in the World War. He does not involve himself in verbal attacks upon his rivals or implicate himself in official hindrances of them in their personal specialties. He plays the political game with an absolutely professional impersonality.

Not by one word since he became President of the United States has he added one shred of personal fuel to the fire of the forces which seem likely to burn up the Republican Party in the election of 1924.

If he is defeated in 1924 he will be defeated on issues. He will not be defeated on entanglements of personal affections and personal animosities. Now, that's something.

The Great Battle for Amnesty

By ALBERT DE SILVER

THE long campaign for amnesty for the federal political prisoners is over. President Coolidge has had the courage and the common sense (against the advice of his Attorney General, I believe) to release unconditionally the last of the men who were jailed for unpopular speech and writing during the war.

The amnesty campaign has lasted for five years—for a little more than four years after our Allies had released their war-time political prisoners. And the strange part of it is that when it began it did not look as if a long campaign would be needed. The special assistants in the Department of Justice who had charge of the prosecutions, Mr. John Lord O'Brien and Mr. Alfred Bettman, both realized that the cases were war cases in which abnormal penalties had been imposed. In the early days of 1919 they reviewed all of the cases which had then been concluded, and so drastically reduced the sentences in two hundred cases that the prisoners went free in a short time. But then Attorney General Gregory resigned and Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer took his place. Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Bettman soon retired, leaving the problem of the political prisoners to the routineers and politicians of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Palmer himself at first seemed encouraging. When an amnesty delegation called upon him, he told us that as a Quaker he understood better than most the motives of the political heretic, and we came away with the feeling that the matter of amnesty was on his conscience. We hoped for reasonably quick action. What Mr. Palmer did not do for political heretics and what he did to them (or to such as were aliens) is now a matter of record. He came and went, but the political prisoners remained.

Then came Harry Micajah Daugherty. He also received an amnesty delegation, but not being a Quaker, he did not understand the motives of the political heretics. In fact, I doubt if he had ever heard of such a thing. He seemed to think that the political offenders were in prison for overt acts against the law, not merely for having spoken or written anti-war or radical beliefs. By way of analogy, he asked whether a Democrat had a right to smuggle dutiable imports into the country because he disbelieved in a Republican tariff! Clearly he needed considerable instruction. The delegation then went to the President. Mr. Harding, kindly, courteous man that he was, received us in a friendly but vague spirit, but by his very lack of explicitness, it was evident that he too had little comprehension of the questions involved in the political cases.

It may be that Eugene Debs's visit to Washington on parole while still a prisoner at the Atlanta Penitentiary brought some light to the President and the Attorney General. It may be that the picketing of the Disarmament Conference by medal-of-honor veterans asking amnesty made some action seem advisable. In any event the first action by President Harding came just before Christmas two years ago. Twenty-one out of about one hundred and forty political prisoners received commutations of sentence. But it was clear from the President's action that the Administration, although it had learned something of the problem, had not learned much. No line of policy governing the release was evident. Recantation of their industrial philosophy was given as a partial reason for the release of two of the men, although the others, notably Debs, had retracted nothing. Another man was released because "he has now served a sufficient length of time," although thirty-one of his co-defendants had served precisely the same length of time. The amnesty advocates were able to discover no policy governing the choice of the lucky twenty-one; indeed, I do not believe there was any.

The Administration then rested on its oars and was stirred to action again only after another embarrassing public demonstration. Mrs. Bertha Hale White of Chicago had spent considerable time in Texas and Oklahoma gathering information about the cases of a number of tenant farmers who had fallen foul of war legislation. She found the cases so pathetic and the condition of the prisoners' families so desperate that it was decided to form them into a sort of living petition for amnesty, to be presented to the President at Washington. Thirty-three wives and children were brought to Washington under the guidance of Mrs. Kate Richards O'Hare. They went to the White House daily, only to be refused an audience with the President each time. But these repeated visits drew a good deal of attention.

Remarks were made even by Republican Senators, and the situation, coupled with the Democratic attack upon the Attorney General's former activities on behalf of Mr. C. W. Morse, caused Mr. Daugherty to recommend the release of twelve more politicals, including a majority of the men whose families had been making the daily call at the White House.

Meanwhile amnesty sentiment out through the country had been growing and was making itself felt in Washington. The educational campaign conducted by the American Civil Liberties Union under the vigorous and dramatic leadership of Roger N. Baldwin, its demonstrations and its work with the Department of Justice, were beginning to tell. Senator Borah's active support was enlisted. The General Defense Committee of the I. W. W. had secured and sent to Washington an enormous amnesty petition. Delegations of disinterested citizens had been calling on the President urging amnesty. Finally on July 19, 1922, the President gave one such delegation to understand that action would be taken within sixty days. Then came a time of industrial unrest. The sixty-day period passed and no action was taken, the President deeming it unwise to release radicals at such a time.

Then began the drive which culminated in the release of the last of the federal prisoners. Most of the amnesty activity throughout the country was fused in a Joint Amnesty Committee in Washington, headed by Gilson Gardner and conducted by Miss Mary Gertrude Fendall and Mrs. Abby Scott Baker, both of whom worked with tireless energy and with extraordinary tact, ability, and political shrewdness. In Washington they kept forever on the trail of the Department of Justice and the White House, and they enlisted the support of scores of senators and representatives. Throughout the country they organized amnesty committees which had as members bishops, governors, supreme court judges, leaders of thought in their communities. They secured statements recommending clemency from the judges and prosecuting officials who had tried the most important cases. The political pressure which they thus focused was more than enough to force action. On June 19 President Harding issued an order which resulted in the release of sixteen men, and on December 15 President Coolidge completed the task by unconditionally commuting the sentences of the rest.

It must be said that this result was hastened by Senator George Wharton Pepper, who, becoming interested in the I. W. W. cases as a disinterested lawyer and citizen, made an exhaustive study of them and concluded that not one of the defendants in those cases should ever have been convicted. Senator Pepper's brave espousal of the cause of justice for the despised and unpopular is a distinguished exception to the general lack of interest in the subject on the part of the American bar.

The federal amnesty campaign is over, but there are still more than a hundred political prisoners in jail under State statutes, and in California the number is being increased. The governors of New York and Illinois have shown the way by pardoning the political prisoners in their States. The amnesty sentiment must now be directed at the governors of the States where political prisoners are still held. The longer political prosecutions flourish in our country, the more abjectly will we be ashamed when in the future we look back upon the history of these troubled times.

In the Driftway

THE allurements of Hunt the Slipper are as nothing compared to the joys of Exposing the Drifter and bringing him into the blushing light of day. So far he has been able to resist queries, polite or pressing, as to his age, color, social status, and weekly stipend—not to mention his Favorite Color of Hair, Favorite Girl's Name, Address, and Motto. Indeed, there seems to be no real need for an answer to any of these interrogations. By his works he may be known, as the following letter, which he prints with a humble and grateful heart, plainly shows:

SIR: For several months I have been reading your column in The Nation, and at the same time wondering what sort of man the Drifter was. The inquiry appeared hopeless until I ran across Taine's introduction to his "History of English Literature." "Eureka!" I shouted, "I will now proceed to walk up one side of this indifferent Drifter and down the other and tell him right to his face just what sort of person he is." For, as I read the paragraphs of the Driftway (they remind me of Lamb, by the way) I say, with Taine, these pleasing sentences were not created alone. They are but molds, like fossil shells; an imprint, like one of those shapes embossed in stone by an animal which lived and perished. Under the shell there was an animal, and behind In the Driftway there is a man.

* * * * *

READING this far, the Drifter's interest rose to fever heat, his forehead grew damp, his pulse registered 110; and his excitement was well rewarded:

Here, then, is the Drifter:

Sex: Male; shown by masculine tone and subject matter.

Age: Forty-five or thereabouts. Thinks, therefore must be over forty.

Appearance: Prepossessing.

Wealth: Little, if any. Has not the smug cocksureness of the rich.

Education: Self-taught. No doubt has a degree but has shed most parrot-knowledge.

Religion: Mildly Protestant.

Is either a bachelor or a widower. Gentle natured and gently bred men are usually unfortunate in their love affairs; are seldom, if ever, loved by women.

In common with most men is defeated but in what I cannot make out. Perhaps along literary lines.

A slender man (have you ever noticed that most men of violent expression are not thin waisted?), smooth shaven; of aristocratic bearing. Takes pleasure in thinking.

You may address the prize for unmasking the Drifter to STEPHEN SEPTEMBER, New Jersey.

* * * * *

THIS is a flattering and romantic picture and the Drifter is not disposed to alter a tittle of it, particularly the reference to his figure. The next time any one of his associates calls him crabbed or violently and irrationally partisan or old or young or blasphemous or sentimental or any of the extremely varied epithets that have lain in wait for him in the past he will, while maintaining a dignified silence, merely wave the maligner to Mr. September's kind and obviously just remarks. He will not even suspect Mr. September of being a practical joker, though his choice of a pen-name might point in that direction. No, hereafter the Drifter will never be without a character, a past, or a person. Let all who have yearned to pierce his anonymity or make him pay his debts or talk with him over the telephone read, mark, and forever hold their peace.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

[Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.]

The Government Put to the Test

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There have been surprising developments in the Sacco-Vanzetti case in connection with recent hearings on motions for a new trial. It will be remembered that the case for the Government, based originally on identifications, proved disappointing, and that the Government came to rest its case largely upon a so-called tell-tale scratch upon the "mortal" bullet which, it was claimed, proved it to have been fired by Sacco's gun.

Recently, this bullet and the other similar exhibits which were in evidence at the trial have been examined under a compound microscope and photographed by a camera equipped with a micrometer so delicate that it registers measurements to a scale of one hundred-thousandths of an inch. The results are astonishing. And unless they can be somehow discounted, they demolish the Government's case by a physical demonstration.

For one thing, the photographs show that the scratch on the mortal bullet supposed to have been fired from Sacco's pistol does not correspond either in character or in position with the markings upon the trial bullets which had been fired from Sacco's pistol shortly before the trial.

Second, the measurements of the lands in the barrel of Sacco's pistol do not correspond with the land marks which were cut in the "mortal" bullet. When photographs of the two objects were made on transparent disks, the one did not fit the other.

Third, the marks of hand-made filings on the face of the breech block which give individuality to every pistol do not correspond between Sacco's pistol and the impress of the breech block upon a shell which it is claimed that Sacco had fired in the act of committing the murder of which he stands accused.

Of course the Government would not concede the above assertions. The district attorney had his own set of photographs, taken, he it said, under a camera which lacked the proper adjustment for micro-photography, and taken moreover without a soul present to represent the defense—which it would seem should be quite outside the code of professional ethics. Be that as it may, these photographs showed certain marks which did not correspond with those on the photographs of the defense, and which did not correspond with the objects themselves when scrutinized by William G. Thompson, counsel for the defense, through the microscope.

However, one discrepancy revealed by the defense photographs was not disputed by the district attorney, and it led to a dramatic situation. The dent of the firing pin on the base of the shell which it was claimed by the Government had been fired from Sacco's pistol was in the exact center, whereas in every one of the trial shells which had been put in as exhibits the firing-pin dent is twenty-three degrees off center.

At the trial, the Government expert had asserted that the firing-pin dent of the shells under comparison was in the same "general area." When a wide discrepancy was revealed by the micro-photographs, the district attorney argued that it was not important, and was to be accounted for by a "tolerance of the firing pin" or a "shifting of the breech block." And he claimed that, had a larger number of trial shots been fired, it would undoubtedly be seen that the firing pin would strike sometimes in the center and sometimes off center within a "general area" of twenty-three degrees. Having made this astonishing argument, the district attorney put the pistol in the judge's hands and told him to see how the breech block rattled.

Thereupon Mr. Thompson observed that the pistol was uncocked when its parts rattled; so he cocked the pistol and gave it back to the judge, and asked him to observe that its breech block was perfectly firm. "I was formerly a student at the Worcester Polytechnic," Mr. Thompson commented upon this incident, "and I would like to know what would have happened if its graduates had gotten employment at the Colt factory and had turned out pistols with 'shifting breech blocks' and with a 'tolerance' in their firing pins." Such pistols could not be sold. And then he threw down a challenge to the Government.

"This issue need not rest on speculations and violent assertions. It can be put to a practical test. The same mechanical forces act the same way under the same circumstances. They are not erratic. The district attorney claims that if a larger number of shots had been fired, it would have been found that in some of them the firing pin would have struck in the center. Why didn't he fire some more shots to prove his assertion? Why don't he fire them now? Let him try it on one hundred shots, try it on one thousand—we will supply the cartridges. Let's go out in the lot and fire the shots as quickly as they can be fired. We will pick up the shells and put them in a basket and bring them here to be filed as exhibits. Let's see if in one single instance the dent in the shell is in the center. That's the way to put this thing to a test."

The Government has not yet accepted this challenge. But meanwhile, one of two things is certain: If a new trial is granted, these shots will be fired and the accused will be set free. Or, if a new trial is denied, until these shots have been fired, it will be very difficult for the judge to pass sentence and send Sacco and Vanzetti to the electric chair.

Boston, December 21

ELIZABETH GLENDOWER EVANS

[A pamphlet on the Sacco-Vanzetti case verifying these statements, which the New England Civil Liberties Committee has in preparation, can be obtained for ten cents in coin or stamps from Anna N. Davis, Secretary of the New England Civil Liberties Committee, 44 Edgehill Road, Brookline, Mass., or from the League for Democratic Control, 16 Carver Street, Boston.]

Greek Letter Patriots

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The national organ of the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity has recently printed articles from which I have taken the following passages—typical but not necessarily as inspiring as some others:

"Calvin Coolidge, who was initiated into Alpha Chi Chapter of Amherst College, in his undergraduate days, is the man of destiny, whom a swift stroke of fate elevated to the leadership of the great nation within whose boundaries the college fraternity . . . was born. . . ."

"Let Communism lift its head among the cloisters of college or university and as long as there's a Greek letter man left on the campus there will be somebody to stamp upon the reptile, though he spoil his tango pumps."

"Mrs. Mary Love Collins represents the sorority world in assuring Mr. Burns [William J.] that he may look to the Greek letter world for aid in combating radicalism. She is not only president of Chi Omega, but also head of the National Pan-Hellenic Congress, composed of all sororities in America.

"Patriotic," she declared. "Indeed they are! Fraternities and sororities are but a part of the great group movement of the middle class. The middle class is a stable one. You find no radicals therein. Hence, in my opinion, these school groups are bands of clear thinking young people already organized to uphold the United States Government in any crisis."

The sad fact, of course, is that Mrs. Collins's remarks are probably true, surely true in the great majority of cases. A "liberal college" only means that there are a few intelligent undergraduates in the upper two classes and a professor or two who dares teach.

Amherst, Massachusetts, November 20

W. L. B.

For the Athletic Recognition of Russia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is the economic blockade against Russia as practiced by Messrs. Hughes and Coolidge to be applicable to athletes of Russia?

Will the athletic committee of the coming sesqui-centennial invite the Russians or will they be excluded?

In defense of the Russians let me say that I have played soccer with them and that they are as good sports as ever dribbled a ball, and for clean playing they are equal to the players in the Philadelphia Cricket League or the Intercollegiates.

This year they have played games with Germany and with Sweden and each time the Russian team was victorious.

The Russians under the Czar were not allowed to take part in sports other than at colleges and in the army. Since the revolution they have organized sport centers in various cities. In 1922 when I was in Minsk, the center sent the Minsk Soccer Club trunks, discus, shot, and hammer. At that time the Quakers were in Minsk and they supplied the soccer balls. The players had no regular shoes but they played in spite of them, and with smooth soles we won the championship of White Russia.

The government to encourage us gave us free transportation on the railroads, for they recognize the benefit that youth derives from taking part in athletics.

Athletics are international, and how will the American team be able to say they have won the championship if the Russians are not present? Let not politics enter into the discussion but bring together the best athletes from the whole world.

CLEAVER S. THOMAS

Buzuluk, Samara, Russia, October 14

Anent Evolution

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In an address delivered at the First Baptist Church of Albuquerque, N. M., October 17, T. T. Martin, Baptist evangelist of Blue Mountain, Miss., admitted the following:

1. That William Jennings Bryan is the greatest statesman the world has ever known.

2. That the evolutionary theory was responsible for the World War.

3. That not even liquor has been as great a curse to the country as the evolutionary belief.

4. That the present divorce rate is due to the acceptance of the evolutionary theory.

5. That the Bolsheviks (who are spending five million dollars for propaganda within the United States) are all evolutionists.

6. That even the Catholics are superior to the evolutionists.

7. That a belief in evolution makes impossible any standard of right and wrong (for if there is no hell there is no incentive for morality).

8. That the anti-evolutionary fight soon will be carried to Kansas.

9. That the State universities and normal schools, by their instruction in the evolutionary doctrine, have poisoned the public school teachers, whose salaries are paid by taxes upon the common people.

10. That the authors of the most frightful of German atrocities were angels in comparison with the teacher of evolution.

11. That evolution is the greatest curse since Adam.

12. That the speaker is the author of "Hell in the High Schools," an anti-evolutionary booklet selling for seventy-five cents.

Albuquerque, November 1

ELIZABETH DICKENS

Florida's Bosom and W. J. B.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is too much! I rise to protest that Florida did not take "William Jennings Bryan to her bosom with the instant mutual recognition that they were made for each other." It is true that Miami—that glorified Main Street, if one dare call her so—"ate him up," but Miami is, as Mrs. Stillman says, 75 to 85 per cent Northern, a fact which she impressively emphasizes in speaking of the intolerance Miami shows toward the Negroes.

When W. J. B. coyly let it be known that he was willing to wear the senatorial toga of Florida if it were forced on him, the genial welcome Florida accords celebrities was disturbed. Good Democratic editors through the State agreed that Bryan, as "the Senator from Florida," would serve the great god Publicity, and "advertise" the State, but they, strangely, preferred to sacrifice the publicity. Said one in his paper: "Florida does not care to be represented by a man who has not been in Florida long enough to know the difference between a kumquat and a razor-back hog."

Although Mrs. Stillman's article is excellent, from one who evidently knows only a small part of Florida, there is one statement which, were it known, would cause a broad, broad laugh up and down the length of the peninsula. Our State geologist would be amazingly excited to know of her discovery of potash in Florida, and might inquire why she kept her knowledge hidden during the war, when potash was almost unobtainable, and citrus growers were forced to go without the quantity they needed. Hard as it is to deny any possibility to Florida, it must be admitted that her geological past has not been conducive to deposits of potash. Especially would the owners of our phosphate mines laugh—long and loud. In regard to naturalists, Mrs. Stillman omits, among other names, that of Dr. J. K. Small of the New York Botanical Garden, an indefatigable explorer of southern Florida, and a most interesting and accurate writer.

The school question presents unusual difficulties in Florida, as we have to accommodate and educate the large and rapidly increasing number of Northern children whose parents are winter residents, in the majority of cases boarding or renting, and paying no taxes. As is wise in a warm climate, the school year is usually a month shorter than in the North.

I wish that Mrs. Stillman had mentioned our State prison farm, to which very high praise was given in an article in a recent number of the Century Magazine.

Winter Park, Florida, November 7

M. F. BAKER

For Sheepmen's Wives and Others

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At the suggestion of Mr. Hartley H. Hepler, of Shiner, Texas, writing in The Nation some months ago, I have been sending such magazines and reviews as I had on hand to a list of persons furnished by him. In each case I have had a grateful response, and I write to ask if the system cannot be extended?

I do not know how Mr. Hepler obtained his list of persons who would like to have literature sent to them, but have no doubt anyone seeing this letter and sending his name to him, with an indication of the kind of reading matter desired, would be taken care of through Mr. Hepler's "clearing house." One young mother of four children living in Idaho writes me that she is a sheepman's wife, and that they are just now unable to pay for subscriptions. They live fourteen miles from town, and she hopes that I mean her to hand the magazines on to friends rather than to return them. This is pleasant work. If you don't believe it, try it!

New York, November 7

BERTHA W. HOWE

Books

Man and Woman

Janet March. By Floyd Dell. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE merits of Mr. Dell's "Moon-Calf" and "The Briary Bush," genuine as they were, were not strictly novelistic in their nature. Something of the autobiography, the essay and the sketch clung to them both. In "Janet March" Mr. Dell has become an authentic novelist. He has grasped things and characters quite objective to himself; he has absorbed people and events and has projected both plastically. "Janet March" is a very imperfect book, but at its best it represents the highest point that Mr. Dell has yet reached.

I call "Janet March" an imperfect book because I do not think that Mr. Dell himself could have been happy over its structure. He evidently had two stories to tell, that of Janet March and that of Roger Leland. Neither was full-bodied enough in his conception of it for a novel. The novelette, that useful and fascinating form, is discredited among us. Mr. Dell had to produce a novel. He yielded to the temptation of uniting his two fables by a device that is clever, suggestive, not infelicitous in any way, and yet quite unconvincing.

This structural looseness is the only reproach to be brought against "Janet March." It is a very thickly peopled book and has this constant mark of fine creative work that very minor and incidental characters—the friends of the March couple, Roger's relations, the professors at Herald College—stand forth from the few passages that are given to them human, authentic, three-dimensional.

The attention of readers will, of course, be centered on Janet March. Roger Leland is as important a figure. But Janet is controversial. She is the young girl of the period studied and portrayed very seriously and very closely. And there is no doubt that she is fascinating and profoundly interesting if altogether true. One hopes that she is. Such essential reasonableness, such a use and yet subordination of instinct, such courage, coolness, clarity is superb. Doubtless, too, all these characteristics are to be found among the young girls of Janet's generation. But was there one, is there one—I ask this question sincerely and hopefully—so wholly, so magnificently released from superstition, moralistic terror, ungenerous tenacity, social confusion? I hope that Janet is a fact; there is no question concerning her splendor as an aim and an ideal.

The second part of the book which deals with the life, the inner and outer fortunes of Roger Leland, has in it no element of the problematic. We have had many accounts of the development of an American youth of intellectual instincts from the dust and clamor of Main Street. We have had, I think, none that is better or more veracious than this. Nor have we had anywhere else so frank, serene, and understanding an account of the sexual seekings and frustrate adventures that are typical of the youth of the country. In this part of Mr. Dell's book episode follows episode in rapid succession. And each of these episodes has compactness and finish, inner truth and brilliant surface execution. Nothing could in its own way be much better than the account of Plainsburg, of Herald College, than the strong and tragic and finely handled brothel scene, than the whole episode that begins in "Fancyland" and reveals the inner facts in the lives of Pansy and Cecile or the story of Sally and her fate. Here there is a blending of wealth and precision, of truth and delicacy, of insight and feeling that are very rare indeed. Pansy and Cecile and Sally, poor things, are much less questionable than the gallant and splendid Janet. They are little masterpieces of direct characterization through action and passion alone. Their creator has broken new ground in the practice of his art. He has left behind him vagueness and mere sophistication. He shapes people.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

History by Personality

The Chief Ministers of England, 920-1720. By the Hon. Clive Bigham. E. P. Dutton and Company. $8.

MR. BIGHAM'S book should prove especially acceptable to the large number of readers who like to take their history in the form of biography, or who in any case care less for the "course of events" than for personalities. The volume deals with the chief ministers or advisers of the English Crown from Dunstan to Godolphin and Harley, thus bringing the story down to the point, 1720-21, at which the author's earlier volume, "The Prime Ministers of England," began. The difference between a chief minister and a Prime Minister is, of course, more than a difference of name, the former designation attaching to those early advisers whose influence depended actually upon either the will or the acquiescence of the sovereign, while the office of Prime Minister, in the proper sense, emerged only when the parliamentary system of party government had clearly developed. Given the differing circumstances of early and later times, it cannot be said that personality was a very much greater force in the later period than in the earlier; on the contrary, the fact that the Prime Minister after about 1720 represented a party majority in the House of Commons, while it often added to his authority, did not always mean a demand for the same alertness, audacity, and resource that those who held favor before that date were often called upon to show.

The twenty-seven ministers whose careers Mr. Bigham sketches—Saxons and Normans, prelates and nobles, reformers and king-craftsmen, defenders of the established order and time-serving schemers in periods of change or revolution—form a parti-colored list, and the student of political morals will find many a dark thread drawn through the fabric which is here spread before him. Clearly, in its centuries of beginnings, England grew quite as often in spite of its ministers as by aid of them. As a piece of popular exposition, however, Mr. Bigham's work has been commendably done. He knows his authorities and uses them, his judgments are sympathetic as well as scholarly, and his style is always readable. As examples of his method the sketches of Stratford, Burleigh, Buckingham, and Clarendon may be particularly cited. The common mistake of using names as little more than pegs on which to hang a continuous narrative has been avoided, at the same time that the successive biographies, taken as a whole, give a fairly connected view of the period on its political side. The illustrations, drawn from contemporary sources, are a feature of value.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Irrelevant

A Book. By Djuna Barnes. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

IN the details of Djuna Barnes's stories there is a great deal of fine observation, clearly as well as beautifully phrased. It is the larger outlines of her stories that are obscure. This is perhaps because she sees in detail what the rest of us see, but feels about life as a whole differently from the rest of us. Each of her stories seems to be leading impressively up to an inevitable end; but the inevitable never happens. Perhaps it would seem to her too obvious. What happens is almost always brutally irrelevant to what has gone before.

Doubtless life seems like that to her. "Anything," says one of her heroines, "is a reason for using a pistol, unless one is waiting for the obvious, and the obvious has never been sufficient reason."

But to evade the obvious thus consistently is to embrace the oblivious. By this method, fiction is reduced to just such a meaningless chaos of accident as life itself appears to sensitive and troubled minds. But we are accustomed, in fiction, to find life's chaos thought out and arranged in some fairly orderly and intelligible pattern: that, indeed, is supposed to be one of the purposes of art, and the chief difference between art and life.

But Djuna Barnes is one of those writers, of a recent school, who defiantly refuse to find any sort of significance in the rank welter of life. Or so it would seem; the plain fact is that these stories are on the whole meaningless; the ascription of a highly philosophical intention to their meaninglessness is a mere critical guess.

There remains, of course, the possibility, in this as in other similar cases, that such meaninglessness is a deliberate and possibly mischievous affectation. The sometimes brilliant but more wildly exasperating irrelevance of the dialogue in her plays, in this same volume, gives support to the notion that there is a certain amount of "blague" mixed up with what is otherwise an earnest and sincere attempt at self-expression. After all, if one's sense of life is so profoundly different from that of most people as to be self-condemned to unintelligibility, there is no reason why one should not get a little fun out of it by mystifying the bourgeois. Literature depends so essentially on a community of interest between writers and readers, and the stray writer who fails to feel such a bond is so decidedly out of luck that even reprisals in the form of practical jokes must be forgiven. The play Three from the Earth seems to me to be such a reprisal; and I imagine the author has enjoyed to the full the mental suffering of those who, as upon the occasion of its performance by the Provincetown Players, have labored stubbornly at the task of trying to make out what it is all about!

The pictures in the book are of a different and less untraditional character; one of them, of which I recognize the subject, seems to me a cruel and clever caricature. The poems have still another difference; with a few exceptions, they are ingenuous and pretty.

The whole book, when one has ceased to ponder its unintelligibilities, leaves a sense of the writer's deep temperamental sympathy with the simple and mindless lives of the beasts: it is in dealing with these lives, and with the lives of men and women in moods which approach such simplicity and mindlessness, that she attains a momentary but genuine power.

FLOYD DELL

For the Lay Reader

Civilization and the Microbe. By Arthur I. Kendall. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

IT is fortunate for the "average" person that it is now customary for scientists and scholars to write non-technical "Outlines" for those readers who have neither time nor opportunity for technical studies. It is the fashion to smile at these "Outlines," but we all like to read them. The present volume, prepared by Dean Kendall to elucidate the wonderland of bacteria, gives a clear account of the marvelous activities and habits of these minute organisms. The recent anniversary of the birth of Pasteur has stimulated our interest in the study of bacteriology and helped us to realize its importance in our daily lives. We cannot plant our gardens, or care for and preserve our food, or nurse our children in contagious diseases, or postpone the encroachment of old age without some understanding of the science of bacteriology. While Mr. Kendall treats of all of these practical subjects, his main thesis is to prove "that in reality civilization owes much to the microbe. We have an impression of a world teeming with deadly germs, awaiting an opportunity to infect mankind. Man is surrounded by a microbic environment over which he has not as yet attained mastery. He is, however, slowly and laboriously acquiring practical control."

Microbic action is for the most part beneficent and essential for the maintenance of the human species, notwithstanding the obvious opposition which a very small group of bacteria offers to the well-being of mankind. In time, the conquest of these antagonistic bacteria will be accomplished. Also, and even more important, the hidden, even unsuspected, microbic adjutants of man will be exploited to do his bidding and enrich his life. Civilization and the microbe go hand in hand.

The history of bacteriology is here entertainingly set forth; the theories of Ehrlich and Metchnikoff are discussed, with the conclusion that neither is wholly correct. Altogether it is a most readable and informing book.

LUCY HUMPHREY SMITH

A Confession

A Publisher's Confession. By Walter Hines Page. Doubleday, Page and Company. $1.50.

WHEN a book listed at ten dollars holds its own as a "best-seller" for a year or more, it is not surprising that the publishers should search their files for further material by the author. One, therefore, does not wonder at the reappearance of Walter Hines Page's "Confession," first published anonymously in 1905. So effectively did the late ambassador's "Life and Letters" reveal the man that these chapters on publishing, although more restricted in appeal and far less significant in their revelation, are not to be passed over lightly. One finds in them the delicate sense of humor, graceful simplicity, and intensely human approach so characteristic of all that came from the pen of Mr. Page.

Looking upon the publishing business, not as a trade but as a profession, Mr. Page aimed throughout his career as a publisher to give the public books of a permanent rather than sensational quality. As he expressed it: "I feel no interest in anything that comes this month and goes the next." The "Confession," however, shows that he placed even greater importance on the service which a publisher can render an author: "My wish and aim is to become a helpful partner of some of the men and women of my generation who can, by their writings, lay the great democracy that we all serve under obligations to them for a new impulse. By serving them, I, too, serve my country and my time. And, when I say that this is my aim and wish, I could say with equal truth that it is the aim and wish of every other real publisher."

Mr. Page takes the reader behind the scenes and gives him an intimate view of the interior of the workshop in which an ill-prepared manuscript is clothed in its final raiment. The policy of paying large royalties is discussed, with the conclusion that the integrity and personal interest of his publisher are worth more to an author than a large semi-annual check. Mr. Page has a convincing explanation of why some bad novels succeed and good ones fail, but admits that "about the advertising of a book, nobody knows anything." He speaks words of encouragement to the "unknown" author, and his warning to beware of what he calls "fake" publishers is frank and to the point.

DALE WARREN

Books in Brief

The Procession of Masks. By Herbert S. Gorman. B. J. Brimmer Company. $2.

Mr. Gorman, at thirty, characterizes himself as a "reviewer in mid-channel." His perceptions have, in any event, been warmed by trade winds of tolerance, and he has kept out of the choppy seas of mere cleverness. One feels that whatever he writes about has been given the benefit of the best thought of which he is capable, and if the result is not invariably stimulating, it is genuine and honestly stated.

The Love Child. By Bertha Pearl Moore. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

This narrative of life on the lower East Side presents a sharp and teeming picture of New York's melting-pot. The author knows her subject, and has managed to get the idiom and the broken rhythm of ghetto existence tangibly into these pages.

ORIENTALIA

The Only Shop in America Dealing
Exclusively in Books on the East

The following catalogues and lists may now be had free on application:

*Books on the Arts and Crafts
of Asia*
Books on China and Japan
Books on Mythology and Folklore
Books of Voyages and Travel to the East from Earliest Times
New Holiday list of books
List of Oriental art objects and textiles suitable for gifts

ORIENTALIA

32 West 58th Street New York City

GERMAN BOOKS

NEW and OLD

Large Representative Stock at

BEYER'S BOOKSHOP

207 FULTON STREET NEW YORK

Opp. Terminal, Upstairs

*The Sign
"Books"
Means
Welcome*

International Book and Art Shop

3 Christopher Street, New York City
We have the largest and choicest selection of

PRINTS

in the city. Etchings, lithographs, water-colors, drawings, original and reproduction, framed and unframed.
Prices, the lowest in the city.

Also a large stock of

BOOKS

on art, current fiction, drama, poetry, etc.,—new and second-hand.

Progressive

BOOKS and PERIODICALS

Fiction Classics
Current Literature

Mail orders filled Catalogue on request

JIMMIE HIGGINS' BOOK SHOP

127 University Place

Stuy. 5015

New York City

Ductless and Other Glands. By Fred E. Wynne. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

A popular, compact, and unsensational exposition of a still relatively unexplored branch of medicine.

Paul, Son of Kish. By Lyman I. Henry. The University of Chicago Press. $3.

The evil that men did in Biblical times lives after them; the good is oft interred in well-intentioned fictional biographies—too devout to be good romance, and too stodgy to be good literature. The present instance is rather above the usual work of its type, although there is nothing about it to kindle enthusiasm.

Drama

Irene Triesch

FOR a number of years Frau Triesch has been considered the leading tragic actress on the Central European stage. She has played the conventional roles of classic tragedy, such as that of Lady Macbeth. But her chief activities have been in the field of modern tragedy, the tragedy of compassion, error, fate, nerves, the tragedy of Hebbel, Ibsen, Strindberg, Hauptmann, Schnitzler. The tragic situations created by these dramatists she has absorbed both intellectually and emotionally; she is with them, of them; she derives—her personality, gifts, mind—from that difficult and intricate modern life which she interprets on the stage. Hence she does not need to create a medium out of which to project character and text, though she has shown her ability to do that as Lady Macbeth and Iphigenie. She herself is her medium—she who vibrates to every word of her dramatists, she out of whose very heart and nerves these dramatists speak.

How shall I make this point as clear as it needs to be made? We have at least one American actress who approaches greatness. Yet when Margaret Anglin appeared in New York now, alas, several seasons ago, she appeared in "The Woman of Bronze" and in "Joan of Arc," a brassily false French play and an empty and sentimental bit of pageantry. Why did she not play Strindberg? Because she does not believe in Strindberg; because she thinks Strindberg depressing, extreme, ugly, unholy, because, in other words, her mind is not the contemporary of her art. Why does Mrs. Fiske play trash? For the same reason, despite her keen intelligence. "The Woman of Bronze" and "Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary" would revolt Frau Triesch's intelligence, taste, insight into the realities of our mortal lot in such a measure that she could not play in them, could not, however much for practical reasons she might perhaps want to do so. Something within would resist. It would not be pride precisely, nor even the conscience of the artist; it would be her overwhelming and nauseated sense of the falseness of these theatric contraptions; it would be her loyalty to that inner truth without which all art is but as sounding brass. That is why, beyond technique, knowledge, energy, passion, grace, Irene Triesch is a great tragic actress. That is why she is an actress to whom we should listen, whom we should watch, whom we should study, whose art has a superlative usefulness to us.

She gave, on the afternoon of Sunday, December 16, a performance of Strindberg's "Dance of Death" at the Princess Theater. And some very intelligent critics declared, alas, that the play—as though they had neither read it nor seen it—was depressing. These critics, too, are not their own contemporaries. It would be about as seemly for a critic to call "A Doll's House" revolutionary or votes for women subversive or any dancing but the minuet immoral or the later works of Beethoven cacophonous or, like Dr. Johnson, the odes of Gray obscure. Why must the dead and decayed adjectives of archaic reactions always be injected into dramatic criticism? The truth is, of course, that "The Dance of Death" is not only a great modern tragedy but that it has precisely that quality of the universal within the concrete which is of all the notes of literature the most enlarging and liberating. Something of what is shown here, much of what is shown here, goes on and on and on eternally in the house across the way, in the apartment next door. To know, to understand, to exercise the creative vision which is understanding, forgiveness, compassion—this is to undergo in the only conceivable modern sense that purgation of the emotions through pity and terror of which Aristotle has written.

Frau Triesch as Alice made one feel all that. She relied upon no external graces. She was, until the brief last scenes when she suddenly became strangely and yet so autumnally radiant, the bedraggled woman in that hopeless house. I watched her and noted neither her magnificent passing from mood to mood, nor her inevitable yet significant gesture, nor the superb clarity and naturalness of her speech. I saw the suffering human creature, the perhaps immortal creature in the galling web of fate, and behind and above that creature the mind of the actress understanding, molding, pitying, herself this woman yet full of an understanding and compassion for her from that never aloof but elevated station from which the artist sees. The artist—who could not act "The Woman of Bronze," because that artist is, in the final words of Goethe on this subject,

"Zum Sehen geboren, Zum Schauen bestellt."

Frau Triesch was supported by Max Montor in the role of Edgar and by Ulrich Haupt in that of Kurt. And all that I have said of Frau Triesch is in a generous measure true of both Herr Haupt and Herr Montor. I should do them an injustice if I were to say, in the ordinary phraseology of theatrical criticism, that they gave superb performances. They gave life and a criticism of life; they gave art and its background in both observation and thought.

We cannot keep Moskvín and Kotchloff with us. Nor can it be denied that their dramatic and linguistic medium is dangerously remote from us. But I can conceive of nothing more useful to us in the course of our education toward an American theater and, above all, an American drama than for Frau Triesch and her associates to play Strindberg and Ibsen and Hauptmann and Schnitzler for us throughout at least one season.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

The SELWYNS in association with ADOLPH KLAUBER present
JANE COWL in Maeterlinck's
Pelleas and Melisande
TIMES SQ. THEATRE Evenings 8:20
Matinee Thursday—Saturday 2:20

BELMONT TARNISH Evs. 8:30. Mats.
48th St. East of Broadway Thurs. & Sat. 2:30
"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."—
Ludwig Lewisohn, THE NATION.
"Mr. Emery writes with a command of the English language, which is not given to any other native playwright, not even excepting Eugene O'Neill."—Heywood Brown, WORLD.

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!
DAVID BELASCO Presents
LIONEL BARRYMORE
with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Eves. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Theatre, 41st St., West of Broadway, Evenings 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander
Woollcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

"Miss Vollmer's presentation of folk life is rich and authentic; she tells us what we are most eager to know—the inner truth of human lives."
Ludwig Lewisohn—THE NATION
THE SHAME WOMAN
An American Drama by LULA VOLLMER
Produced by THE INDEPENDENT THEATRE, Inc.
COMEDY THEATRE 41st St. E. of Bway. Matinees Thurs. and Sat.
at 2:30. Evenings at 8:30

YIDDISH ART THEATRE 27th St. and MAURICE SWARTZ, Director Madison Ave.
Now Playing
Friday evening, 8:30; Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30
Osip Dymow's new comedy of American life
"BREAD"

AMBASSADOR 49th, W. of Bway. Eves. 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
RICHARD BENNETT in
THE DANCERS
"I have not seen a better play than 'The Dancers' for a long while."
—JOHN BARRYMORE.

Opening Wed. Eve., Dec. 26
New American Comedy
By PERCY MACKAYE
FINE PRETTY WORLD
Every eve. (except Mon.) at 8:30.
Mat. Sat. 2:30
Orch., $1.50-$2. Bal., $1.
Phone Dry Dock 7516

RAND SCHOOL Beginning
Jan. 2, 7:30, 8:40 P.M. . . . A. A. Goldenweiser
"Theories of Cultural Progress"
"Psychoanalysis after Freud"
Jan. 4, 8:40 P.M. Leo Saidla
"Main Currents of Recent Literature"
Jan. 8, 9:00 P.M. Margaret Daniels
"Social Psychology"
Jan. 19 & 26, 3:15 P.M. . . . Bertrand Russell
"European Chaos," "Mechanism and Life"

7 East 15th Street

International Relations Section

Democracy in the Russian Communist Party

THE fight over the democratization of the Russian Communist Party is causing much comment both in Russia and abroad. The situation arose out of the new conditions which are shaping themselves in the life of the workers in the Soviet republic. These new conditions and the problems involved in them were first formulated in the Soviet press by Gregory Zinoviev in an article published in the sixth anniversary number of the Pravda (November 7) in which he says in part:

... Whoever follows closely the molecular processes going on within the ranks of our working class cannot overlook the following fact as well: that the cultural standards of the average nonpartisan worker have been raised during the past years to a considerable height. ... There was a time (during 1919, 1920, 1921) when only the older workers remained in our factories. The cream of the proletariat was busy on the different fronts or generally scattered over Russia. The workers who are now returning to their factories are not the same as when they left. During these six years every one has undergone experiences which, in other times, it would take more than a generation to live through. ... The workers have learned to understand what is going on. The revolution has not had the material resources to improve the situation of the mass of the workers at once. But culturally the mass of the workers has risen to heights never reached before.

... At the nonpartisan workers' conference each question is intelligently discussed by the bulk of the delegates. The attitude manifested at such meetings as the provincial conventions of the trade unions or the district conventions of the Soviets is quite different from that of past years. There is more activity and intelligence; more nonpartisan workers are making themselves heard. And the talk is no more of their own needs, as was previously the general rule, but of general problems which are discussed with understanding and knowledge of the subjects.

The cultural level of the mass of the workers has been raised. This is an axiom. And the new problems before the party must be approached with this basic fact in view. ...

Of course, in many respects the average member of our Communist groups is more highly developed than the nonpartisan mass, if only for the fact that the members are organized while the nonpartisans are not. In questions of a political order the members of our groups display more intelligence than the nonpartisan mass. But when it comes to questions of economic organization, of cultural activity, or concerning the mode of life the reverse is very often the case. ...

The higher cultural level attained by the nonpartisan workers may become a source of the greatest strength for our party and the Soviet power, but only if we recognize this important phenomenon without further delay and if we prove able to draw the necessary conclusions from it. Otherwise this fact may become a source of numerous misunderstandings between the party and the nonpartisan workers, and however strange it may sound it may even create many difficulties for us.

The average worker who has reached a higher cultural level strives, and very properly too, to take a greater part in the economic life of his factory, to exercise his influence in the trade union and in the Soviet of the workers' deputies. Our main duty at present is to provide leadership for this movement of the nonpartisan workers, to be able to find, in cooperation with them, the best ways of satisfying these natural wishes of the workers who have grown up during the past years. ...

Our party groups in the factories must give up the practice of deciding questions concerning the management of the factories only at the meetings of the groups. The groups in every factory must begin to look upon themselves only as the Communist faction of the whole factory. This concerns also the Communist members of the factory committees, shop-delegate meetings, and other organizations. The main task of the Communist groups must be the political work for the party. Of course, it is impossible mechanically to separate politics from economics. Our party groups, as political organizations, certainly have their party interests also in the field of economics. ... But above all we must not forget that we are only a part of the factory. It is time for us to learn to fight for our influence among the mass of the workers by systematic creative work in all fields of the life of the factory. We must consider ourselves a political faction of the whole workers' population of the given enterprise. ... We still meet with isolated cases of the "autocratic rule" of the party groups in enterprises. We must strive to make an end to every manifestation of this sort of rule.

All this implies that the question of raising the cultural level of the average membership of our party groups is a question of supreme importance for the life of the party. ... We must consider with all due attention the question of the mutual relations between the factory committees and the party groups on the one hand, and between the factory committees and the trade unions on the other.

The trade unions are not taking an adequate part in the activities of the economic organs. Let us not try to find who is to be blamed for this. Let us not discuss the past. But in the immediate future the trade unions must become more closely associated with production. We can and must find the adequate form also for the control to be exercised by the trade unions over the trusts. This control will be worthless if it assumes the forms of the usual bureaucratic control. But it will become invaluable if it is based upon the participation of the nonpartisan workers who have attained a higher degree of cultural development, as was pointed out above.

Within our own party ... it is necessary to see to it that our internal party life becomes more intensive. It is necessary that the workers' democracy within the party of which we have talked so much shall become clothed with flesh and blood to a greater degree than before.

Our main difficulty lies often in the fact that almost all important problems are decided in the higher party councils before they are submitted to the bulk of the membership. This narrows the creative activity of the membership, it diminishes the activity of the "lower" party groups. It is true ... our party is built upon the principles of democratic centralism. In a country like ours the Communist Party cannot but be a strictly centralized organization. But to a considerable degree these conditions are explained by the fact that the bulk of the party membership is too far behind the most advanced sections of the party. Many of our best workers have been assigned by the party to economic or administrative work which makes it difficult or impossible for them to participate in the party work among the mass of the workers. Some comrades who have been assigned to party work are not always competent to meet the new great demands put forward by the growing needs of the masses. The party must give its fullest attention to these problems which at present assume a dominating significance.

Our conclusions, in general, are these:

1. It is necessary to strengthen educational work among the average party members. ...
2. We must meet the natural desire of the ... nonpartisan workers to participate more actively in the life of their enterprises, in the work of the trade unions and of the soviets.
3. The trade unions must become more closely connected with the questions of production. Adequate forms of organization must be evolved for the participation of the trade unions in the control of the trusts.

4. It is necessary again to put and solve the question of the mutual relations between the factory committees and party groups on the one hand, and the factory committees and the trade unions on the other. But this question must be put and solved in the light of the new conditions of the labor movement.

5. It is necessary to wage a systematic and stern fight against the misdoings of individual representatives of the state trusts and economic workers, as well as against so-called luxury in general.

6. It is necessary to begin systematic work to swell the ranks of our party with those nonpartisan workers who are anxious to take an active part in our social life and who are really very kin to us in spirit.

7. . . . It is necessary to put into practice the workers' democracy within the party; to introduce a fuller degree of free discussion of political, economic, and other questions. . . .

. . . In this article the problems are merely stated but not solved. The real solution of the problems will be attained only as a result of a general exchange of opinions within the party. In the collective experience of our party we shall find the practical measures which will lead us toward our goal. . . .

The Economic Crisis in Russia

IN connection with recent reports about the critical situation of the Russian industries the vice-chairman of the Council of Labor and Defense, Mr. Rykov, made the following statement in the Moscow Izvestia of November 27:

The full freedom with which questions have been discussed concerning the temporary slow-down in trade during the harvesting of the last crop has given rise to exaggerated rumors and falsifications which have appeared in the foreign press.

In Soviet Russia every drawback not only in the organization of the exchange of goods but also in the activity of individual state institutions is discussed openly and freely. Therefore the rumors appearing in the foreign press are no more than an interpretation—on the basis of Western European bourgeois conditions—of those conditions of work and that freedom of criticism which prevail in Soviet Russia.

There has been no breakdown of Russian industry and there is none in sight. During the last two years the production of Russian industry has more than doubled.

During this year steps were taken to deliver the necessary manufactured goods into the rural districts in due time and to stimulate our trade during the fall after the harvesting of the crop. It appears now that the peasants used the crops in the first place to pay up the taxes before the terms set down by the government. The September and October sales of manufactured goods in the villages have therefore not reached the amount anticipated last spring. Since the trade organizations working in the villages received from the industrial enterprises short-term credits to be paid up after the sale of goods during the fall some of these trade organizations were not able to meet their obligations.

But beginning with the month of November the situation improved. The demand for the products of the city increased after the rural population had paid up most of the taxes and started to sell grain and other agricultural products for the export trade. In connection with this not only goods previously sold are being paid for but the provinces are sending in many new orders. Thus the business crisis is being overcome.

Concerning the situation of the factories and industrial enterprises generally, I know of only a few cases where factories have reduced production and worked on part time for a few weeks, but from the beginning of November all the factories have been working on full time.

The New School for Social Research

PURPOSE: To seek an unbiased understanding of the existing order, its genesis, growth and present working, as well as of those circumstances which are making for its revision.

Second Term:
January 2—March 25

JOHN B. WATSON—Behavior Psychology.
Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

OTTO GLASER—Physiology of Development.
Saturday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

MORRIS R. COHEN—The Thought of the Nineteenth Century.
Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

HORACE M. KALLEN—Dominant Ideals of Western Civilization.
Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

HORACE M. KALLEN—Beauty and Use.
Thursday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

FRANKWOOD WILLIAMS—Mental Hygiene.
Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

A. A. GOLDENWEISER—Problems of Race.
Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

W. I. THOMAS—Personality Development.
Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

HARRY E. BARNES—The History of the Human Mind.
Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

THORSTEIN VEBLEN—Economic Factors in Civilization.
Wednesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

DAVID FRIDAY—Causes of Variations in the Rate of Interest.
Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

DAVID FRIDAY—The Principles of Price Determination.
Thursday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

LEO WOLMAN—Unemployment and Unemployment Insurance.
Monday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

FREDERICK R. MACAULAY — Statistical Method.
Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

STARK YOUNG—The Art of the Theatre.
Tuesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

H. W. L. DANA—Social Currents in Modern Literature.
Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

Tuition for each course of twelve lectures, $15

Write for catalogue to

465 West 23rd Street, New York City

The Fair at Nizhni Novgorod

THE traditional annual All-Russian Fair at Nizhni Novgorod was revived by the Soviet Government after the introduction of the new economic policy, with the aim of stimulating internal trade, but chiefly to establish trade relations with the peoples of the East, particularly of Persia. The results of the fair which was closed on September 15 were given out by the chairman of the fair committee, S. S. Malishev, in an interview published in the Moscow press. Part of his statement follows:

The results of the fair have surpassed all our expectations. The turn-over in business transactions amounted to 370,000,000 gold rubles. This does not include the turn-over of internal business transactions between the cooperatives amounting to about 50,000,000 gold rubles, which have been recorded by our committee but not registered at the bourse. In all we have moved more than 400,000,000 gold rubles' worth of commodities from producer to consumer. Considering the fact that the prices have risen about 30 per cent over the pre-war level, we still have a turn-over amounting to 300,000,000 gold rubles in pre-war prices. . . . This exceeds the turn-over of the fair in 1913 when the total of business transactions amounted to only 220,000,000 rubles. . . .

The fair has played a great role in establishing commercial communications within the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. But still greater has been its role in stimulating business connections with the East, and its significance in this respect will soon be felt in our intercourse with the Eastern countries. Each day I receive telegrams and letters from Eastern governments and commercial groups pointing out the significance of the 1923 fair.

In an article The Fair and Trade with the East the Moscow Economic Life in its September illustrated supplement writes:

Nizhni has long been the center of lively trade with the countries of the East: Persia, Bokhara, Afghanistan, etc. Every year numerous Eastern traders have come to the fair by the great water route—the Volga—and brought with them raw materials such as cotton and wool, and also dried fruit, rice, caracul, various oriental goods. Here they bought the manufactured products of Russian industry: cloth, sugar, glass, etc.

After years during which Soviet Russia has been isolated, friendly economic intercourse with the Eastern peoples has been renewed. The present fair was preceded by a campaign to encourage the participation of Persian merchants in the fair operations. The chairman of the fair, Malishev, made a special trip to Persia, visiting the most important commercial centers, informing the Persian merchants of the fair and inviting them to participate. Comrade Malishev met with a warm response, and the Persian traders demonstrated a lively interest in the forthcoming event as a chance for trade relations with the Russian markets best known to them. The central organs of the Soviet Government adopted the necessary measures to make it easy for Eastern traders to come to the fair and to participate actively. At the fair the Russo-Eastern trade chamber organized a special bureau to aid the Eastern merchants. The bureau had among its members representatives of the Eastern traders.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER has recently returned from Russia where he spent eight months as correspondent for the New York Evening Post.

WITTER BYNNER, widely known as a poet, has spent several years in China and has made a special study of Chinese painting.

ALBERT DE SILVER is associate director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

This $10.00 FOOD PACKAGE will be delivered to any place in GERMANY

49 lbs. Flour
25 lbs. Rice
8 lbs. Cooking Fats
3 lbs. Cocoa
10 lbs. Sugar
24 1-lb. Cans Evaporated Milk
119 lbs.

Apply by mail or in person to American Committee for Relief of German Children
Major-General Henry T. Allen, Chairman,
42 Broadway, New York City.
In cooperation with The American Friends Service Committee (Quakers)
(This advertisement donated by a friend of the cause)

BRYANT BOOKSHOP

Jack G. Karpf

MAKE 1924

A year of good reading. All the "Brighter Books" of the day are to be found on our well-stocked shelves. Social Science, Psychology, Economics, Labor, Literature and Art. Mail orders handled with intelligence and despatch.

Proprietor

FICTION DEVOTEES are invited to drop in and browse among the season's best sellers.

The Bryant Circulating Library of Newer Novels offers you a wide choice at a cost of a few cents daily.

Open evenings to 9 P. M.

66 W. 47th St. New York

FOOD TO EUROPE

Practical food-package assortments, ready at our Hamburg warehouse for prompt delivery to friends, relations, or any hungry communities or institutions you designate; prices range from $5 to $20.

We recommend our Metas Special: 24½ lbs. wheat flour, 10 lbs. sugar, 5 lbs. lard, 10 lbs. rice, 1 lb. each coffee, cocoa, tea, 2 lbs. farina, 10 tins milk, ½ qt. olive oil. Delivered free house for $10. To countries other than Germany add 10 per cent. Cable charges only 75 cents. (Just pin a $10 check to this advertisement and write the name of the recipient on the margin.)

METAS

Price List mailed on request 147 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1924

No. 3053

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	21
EDITORIALS:
His Majesty's Labor Government.....	24
The Nervousness of Mr. Hughes.....	25
What to Do with the Doughtys?.....	25
Houses orhovels?.....	26
WHAT IS PROGRESSIVISM? By William Hard.....	27
BUILDING THE NATIONAL LIE. By Jean de Pierrefeu.....	28
WHAT MR. HUGHES NEEDS TO KNOW. By Louis Fischer.....	30
AMERICAN WARSHIPS AND CHINESE MONEY. By Ma Soo.....	32
FRANCE AND SOVIET RUSSIA JOIN HANDS. By Scott Nearing.....	33
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	34
CORRESPONDENCE	34
BOOKS:
Aids to Psychological Thinking. By Joseph Jastrow.....	36
Building Lots. By John Dos Passes.....	36
Expressionism in Art Psychoanalyzed. By Temple Scott.....	37
Thomas Hardy's Tristram. By Mark Van Doren.....	38
Zion's Best Seller. By Lewis Browne.....	38
The Book of Judith. By Ben Ray Redman.....	39
Books in Brief.....	40
DRAMA:
Christmas Rush. By Ludwig Lewisohn.....	40
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Arizona Backs Obregon.....	42
France Dips into Polish Oil.....	42
The Task Facing the Friends.....	43

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY
MANAGING EDITOR

IRITA VAN DOREN
LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

ANATOLE FRANCE
ROBERT HERRICK

JOHN A. HOBSON
H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS
CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.—Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION. New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: Ernest Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N. W. 11, England.

SAMUEL GOMPERS has written a superb chapter into our history. His condemnation of the De la Huerta treason in Mexico gives American labor a new international standing. President William Johnston of the International Association of Machinists and Governor Hunt of Arizona, whose proclamation appears in this issue, have vigorously seconded him. But Gompers went beyond mere verbal indorsement of the Obregon-Calles regime. It is largely through his vigorous appeals to the State Department and to organized labor in the Gulf ports and along the border that arms-smuggling to the counter-revolutionists is being made so difficult. Meanwhile the wholly reactionary character of the rebellion grows increasingly plain. Its three leading generals, Sanchez, Estrada, and Maycotte, have issued a manifesto calling for a military dictatorship and the postponement of constitutional government until 1928—if they win. In Merida, Yucatan's capital, the first acts of the revolting commander were to burn the building of the Liga Central de Resistencia and to proclaim the immediate restoration of the distributed lands to the former owners. Yet the Chicago Tribune is already shouting for intervention and in a leading editorial entitled Mexico: Platt It, demands a Platt Amendment for Mexico reducing her to the status of Nicaragua, Haiti, and Cuba. The right policy for our Government is: Hands off! Deeply as we sympathize with President Obregon, Washington's decision to give, lend, or sell him arms as a measure of "stabilization" establishes a thoroughly dangerous precedent. It is not our function, in Mexico, Honduras, or anywhere except in the United States, to determine which faction is stable and which is unstable.

ARE there any progressive or liberal or radical policies abroad in the land? Are there any conservative ones? Has any program appeared, to lead the unhappy voter out of the political wilderness? How is the average citizen to know what is progressive and hopeful and what is reactionary and discouraging when almost every national policy has its liberal supporters and its conservative supporters and is claimed by each as one of the tenets of his liberalism or his conservatism? William Hard raises these questions in his Washington letter in this issue of The Nation, seeking a way out into the light of a real and cohesive program which might form the basis of a new party of intelligent change. The Nation urges its readers to respond to Mr. Hard's invitation with every ounce of political and social sagacity they can command. We may be able to get on without the proffered lock of Senator Shipstead's hair, but we cannot get on much longer without a new party. The soul and body of such a party will spring from the conditions of life in America today; but its mental content, the formulation of the ideas it stands for, must come from smaller groups of alert and thoughtful citizens. Of such are the readers of The Nation. The results of Mr. Hard's contest will appear from time to time in our pages.

LESS than half as many men were lynched in this land of freedom in 1923 as in 1922. Tuskegee Institute reports that 46 lynchings were prevented last year by officers of the law. This is an encouraging record. James Weldon Johnson of the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People attributes the change to the northward migration of hundreds of thousands of Negroes and to the fear of federal intervention inspired in the South by the Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill. Doubtless the growing desire for better inter-racial relations in the South has its roots in these movements, but there is still work to be done. Even twenty-six violent deaths suffered for such crimes as "mistaken identity, aiding in escape, associating with white women, being in an automobile accident, remaining in a town where Negroes were not wanted, and frightening white children by walking on a country road" make an irreparable blot upon any country. And every year in the smaller villages of the South some of these bestial things go unrecorded. In this year of Klan activity fear probably kept many such crimes hidden. Mr. Dyer's job is not done yet.

WHEN the naval inquiry into the loss of the destroyer squadron wrecked near Point Honda began, The Nation was convinced that those responsible would practically escape punishment. That has come to pass. The commander of the squadron, Captain E. H. Watson, will lose one hundred and fifty numbers in the grade of captain as the result of his court martial, and Lieutenant Commander Donald T. Hunter will lose one hundred places on the lineal list. This is considered a fitting punishment for an accident in which twenty-three sailors were drowned and seven ships were totally wrecked. It is a disgrace to the service that only two officers were punished and these so inadequately. But navy court martials rarely do their duty when it comes to punishing commissioned officers. The ordinary seaman who offends gets short shrift; he is not within the charmed circle. A commander may cast away his ship, but the service's "loyalty" will save him nine times out of ten.

PUBLISHED

112

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S release of the last of our federal political prisoners should be, as we pointed out at the time, not the end of public interest in the subject, but the beginning of a united national agitation for freeing the other political prisoners who are still in jail because of conviction under State laws. They, like the federal prisoners, were convicted not for any acts but for expression of opinion or membership in radical organizations. They were prosecuted under the criminal-syndicalism or anti-sedition laws which more than three-quarters of our States passed during the period of "Red" hysteria and violent alien-baiting that followed the armistice. These laws were largely stimulated by the infamous Palmer and his prostitution of the Department of Justice. They all violate the spirit of free speech and have not even the excuse of "war emergency" to justify them. The Civil Liberties Union lists 114 men as strictly political prisoners serving sentences for their beliefs in the States of California, Washington, Idaho, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Illinois. Agitation within these States has not proved effective in ending this meanest and most cowardly species of persecution and injustice; the pressure of outside condemnation and scorn is needed.

IN connection with the political prisoners still held under State laws, our attention has been called to the fate of five Mexicans and one American who have been in jail in Texas more than ten years. From the statements of their attorney it appears that the leader of the group, Jesus M. Rangel, had for some years previous to 1912 been a Mexican revolutionary with his headquarters in Texas, which he used as a base for organizing armed bands and conducting them across the border. In one of these expeditions Rangel and a party among whom was an American, Charles Cline, were halted by a deputy sheriff and an assistant who is alleged to have been a Mexican spy. Subsequently, the latter was found dead from bullet wounds. Rangel and his men were pursued, and those who were captured were tried, convicted of conspiracy in the murder, and sentenced to life imprisonment. The evidence that any of these men was responsible for the killing seems to have been hazy, and the fact that they were revolutionaries and "greasers" undoubtedly worked against them. Their only certain crime was violation of the neutrality laws, which would have been punishable with one year in jail. President Obregon and other Mexicans are asking for the release of these men. Whatever the facts, the prisoners have been punished enough. We hope Governor Neff will pardon them.

"BALANCING" the French budget is more a matter of intellectual acrobatics than of public accounting. "French Budget Shows a Surplus," say the headlines in the newspapers; "Estimates for 1924 Put Balance on Right Side of Ledger at 568,000,000 Francs." This seems, indeed, extraordinary news in days when France, although unwilling to pay interest to England or the United States, is lending hundreds of millions of francs to the little countries of Central Europe for their expanding military establishments. Scott Nearing tells how the French politicians divide their budget into two sections: the "ordinary" and the "extraordinary." The ordinary budget balances; no attempt is made to balance the extraordinary budget. It consists of expenses which Paris thinks Germany ought to pay—of pension allowances and the costs of reconstruction (which, according to some French deputies, have been grossly swollen by scandalous intermediary profits). No, there is no real prospect of a balanced budget in France. The public debt on January 1, 1924, stood twenty billion francs higher than a year before; and the Ministry of Finance is proposing another loan issue of thirteen billions. No wonder the franc has just touched its lowest mark in the foreign exchange market.

LÉON DAUDET, son of the novelist, and leader of the French royalists, played a strange part in the death of his own son and in the acquittal of Germaine Berton, the "Red virgin" who had killed Marius Plateau, Daudet's subordinate in his newspaper office. There is something pathological in this vile-tongued man who has been on all sides of the political fence; his political enemies once compiled a "Directory of Defamation" in which they quoted his abuse, at one time or another, of every politician or statesman of importance in France. Pressure from his own Catholic church recently forced him to withdraw from sale one of his pornographic novels. Yet this man has power. He has forced many a man from public office; and although it was his paper which led poor Villain to assassinate Jean Jaurès in 1914, Daudet's influence obtained an acquittal for the boy when he came to trial. That fact undoubtedly played a heavy role in the acquittal of Germaine Berton. To have convicted her, after Villain had been acquitted, would have been to give effective ammunition to the orators of the Left. Daudet is in a real sense responsible for the unpunished death of his friend Marius Plateau. But his indecency is greater than that. Recently, when his own son turned anarchist and then, possibly in an epileptic fit, shot himself, the father first concealed the fact. Then, when it was revealed, he charged the anarchists with murder and actually had his own son disinterred before the falsity of his charge was proved.

IF anybody had predicted a couple of years ago that the day would come when an American citizen could not bring his wife into the United States, he would have been laughed out of countenance. He would have been told that Americans could never so lose their sense of humor—even if they did lose their sense of justice—as to perpetrate such incredible nonsense. Yet, as we pointed out recently, such incredible nonsense is not only on our statute books through the joint operation of the immigration law and the new citizenship act, but it has been specifically invoked to bar from this country Anna Lerner, the wife of an American veteran of the World War. Since we wrote on this subject, Senator Copeland has introduced a bill providing for the mandatory admission of wives of American citizens "without reference to quota or to any other provision of the immigration or naturalization laws." Immediate passage of this bill is the least we can do to save ourselves from becoming the butt of the whole world's ridicule; and we should add a provision making it equally possible for an American woman to bring in her alien husband.

"YES or no? Do you like our plan or not? We are offering peace in only one style this year. Those who prefer war will vote no." The Bok peace-prize committee might as well have made the announcement of its gigantic referendum in these terms. The committee's statement, given out after The Nation had gone to press last week, confirms the apprehensions described in our editorial, Bok—Peace or Propaganda? Whether the plan is for or against the League, whether we like it or not, the method of balloting makes popular indorsement both inevitable and meaningless. The committee unconsciously admitted this when it announced, according to the New York World's report, that "the remaining $50,000 will be paid when the plan has met the approval of a majority in the nation-wide test." "Do you approve the winning plan in substance," says the ballot; and the small-type note "If you wish to express a fuller opinion also, please write to the American Peace Award" will pass unnoticed by most. A fair referendum would have included alternative plans.

THE tragic loss of the Dixmude brings out anew the weakness of dirigibles. In the air such craft are relatively safe; they seem able to ride through the worst storms. It is when it comes to landing that the difficulty arises; all the passenger Zeppelins lost in Germany before the war were destroyed in descending to earth. If, as is presumed, the Dixmude suddenly developed engine trouble and could not return to her landing-place, her commander was faced with a practically insoluble problem. In the lightest of summer zephyrs one of these mammoth airships floats over the land with a momentum taxing the power of 150 to 200 men to hold her. The Dixmude's commander would have had difficulty in bringing her to earth at any point, but without a landing crew to aid him he could only hope with luck to save his men while losing his ship. The mooring masts which have been successfully used by our own great Shenandoah may eventually be developed into stations of refuge at frequent intervals. But this question how landings may be made in all weather without requiring the constant presence of a large gang is causing more worry to the engineers who are planning the New York-Chicago line of night flyers than all the rest of their difficulties. It is an appreciation of this unsolved element in the airship problem which makes us doubt the wisdom of using the Shenandoah for polar exploration next summer.

EDWARD P. FARLEY'S resignation as chairman of the Shipping Board is a genuine loss to the government. The Senate was technically right in rejecting Mr. Farley's nomination because he hailed from a section of the country already represented on the board—the law specifies that only one person from a district may be appointed to the board. But as the law appears to have been similarly violated in Mr. Lasker's case with the Senate's consent and approval, one must regret that the Senate's sudden spasm of virtue deprives the government of the best chairman the board has yet had. Whereas Mr. Lasker was an advertising agent, Mr. Farley was a real steamship man. Himself an owner and operator of steamships, he knows by practical experience the problems to be faced, and he has brought enthusiasm, common sense, and a clear-cut judgment to their study and solution, in addition to a winning personality. It is so rare that a combination like this is to be found in a man able and ready to take public office that Mr. Farley's retirement is a public misfortune.

ARTHUR GLEASON'S sudden death comes at a singularly inappropriate time. He had been the ablest interpreter of the British labor movement to this country, and he dies just as it seems about to assume power. When, during the war and after, in his "Inside the British Isles," in "British Labor and the War" (in which Paul U. Kellogg collaborated), and in "What the Workers Want," he traced the germination of the democratic industrial movement which is flowering in the British Labor Party and predicted for it the success which now seems so certain, most Americans put him down as a rosy-visions dreamer. Gleason was always thinking in the future tense; when he was an associate editor of The Nation his colleagues learned to respect his stubborn contempt for conventional news standards. Perhaps his greatest contribution to American thinking was in connection with the movement for nationalization among the coal miners. As in England he became the intimate friend of Robert Smillie, the British miners' leader, so here he was very close to John Brophy, long chairman of the Nationalization Committee of the United Mine Workers of America, and profoundly influenced Mr. Brophy's thinking. He was never a propagandist; he was always puzzling things out himself and questioning others, forcing them to think. His loss is a loss to the undercurrent of thinking in America which molds the future far more than the noisy political campaigns.

THE American Mercury has at last got itself born. Beautiful in form, stimulating in the variety of its matter, it is frankly iconoclastic, avowedly concerned with "proving to all men that doubt, after all, is safe." Its credo is consciously, carefully different from that of any of its rivals and predecessors:

[The magazine is to be] entirely devoid of messianic passion. The editors have heard no voice from the burning bush. . . . The world, as they see it, is down with at least a score of painful diseases, all of them chronic and incurable; nevertheless, they cling to the notion that human existence remains predominantly charming.

Its own pet hallucination will take the form of an hypothesis that the progress of knowledge is less a matter of accumulating facts than a matter of destroying "facts."

Neither [editor] is a radical. . . . Both view the capitalistic system, if not exactly amorously, then, at all events, politely. . . . They believe that it is destined to endure in the United States, . . . if only because the illusion that any bright boy can make himself a part of it remains a cardinal article of the American national religion. . . ."

Mr. Mencken and Mr. Nathan have taught their readers to expect of them a certain tempo which they do not always achieve in this new venture. The Clinical Notes suffer by comparison with the Répétition Générale of the old Smart Set. There are surprising sobernesses here and there. But these after all are minor points when "Castor and Pollux are out again."

His Majesty's Labor Government

OF profound import to all the world will be the assumption of the British Government by a Labor minority if, as now appears probable, that takes place soon after Parliament meets. The reasons lie far deeper than the mere fact that this new party to come into power bears the tag of labor. It is not, of course, simply a party of hard-fisted laborers. Its astounding rise to power is perhaps as much due to the leadership of intellectuals like Sidney and Beatrice Webb and the Fabian Society group as to the class-consciousness of the workingmen. There is here, as we have frequently pointed out, a most fortunate blending of intellectual leadership and of labor aspirations, both united in a common determination to take the control of British life out of the hands of the few, away from those fortified by special privilege, by monopolies, by inherited possession of natural rights which should be the property of all the people. The spirit of the new Labor Ministry, if it takes office, should prove a complete break with British tradition. Surely no English ministry has ever been so conscious of the solidarity of all mankind, so imbued with unselfish ideals, and so determined to improve British living conditions, not at the expense of other peoples, but through cooperation with others and by means which should benefit all concerned.

We are naturally aware that not all the members of the Labor Party are idealists or unselfish; we are aware that there are rifts within that party, cross-currents that may prove profoundly detrimental to its higher aims. We are well aware, too, of the comparative inexperience of many of those who must come to the front and of the power of tradition and established privilege everywhere to thwart reformers. We cannot forget for a moment that if the Labor Ministry takes office it will be as a minority party and that its leaders will never be able to free themselves from the consciousness that their existence as a ministry may be terminated any moment on any motion before the House against which the other two parties may unite. This is a terrible handicap, indeed, to place upon men who ought to have years in which to work out solutions for domestic and foreign problems that have been years in coming to their present menacing state. Yet we feel that even the attempt to govern one of the greatest of countries in a new spirit, and with new aims and a new philosophy, is of the deepest significance and the profoundest moment to all the world.

Just what we mean by the new spirit we may perhaps best illustrate by recalling to our readers the record of the man chosen to lead as prime minister if the Labor Party takes office. It is exactly five years ago that J. Ramsay MacDonald was overwhelmingly defeated for Parliament. He was then an outcast, almost a pariah—precisely as Campbell-Bannerman and Lloyd George had been in the days of the Boer War. A consistent pacifist, Mr. MacDonald opposed the World War, declining high office in the ministry and all the honors ensuing therefrom, to vote and work against the war. His voice was never still during that struggle in its demand for peace, upon the basis of human brotherhood and the teachings of Christianity. He was one of the minority of the European Socialists who held true to the pacifist teachings of that party whose apostasy when war came has been its undoing. Now the J. Ramsay Mac-Donald who is about to be inducted into the highest office is the same Ramsay MacDonald. He has not changed an iota in his creed or one paragraph in his beliefs. He can look upon the European problem from the point of view of one who abhors war and will not yield a single inch to the war-god, from the standpoint of one who thinks internationally and is in no wise interested in governing England from the point of view of grab and of conquest, of iron and of oil. If he is not aboveboard in all his international dealings, then will he do violence to much that he has stood for. We cannot conceive of his regarding any problem solely from the point of view of what his countrymen may get out of it.

We venture to predict that whether it lasts six weeks, six months, or six years, the Ramsay MacDonald Ministry will carry on in the spirit of charity for all and malice toward none. So we shall consider its taking hold the very best assurance that the now threatening "next war" in Europe will be indefinitely postponed. We believe that this ministry will offer a court to which the peoples oppressed by the British militarism and imperialism of the past may repair, confident that they will receive a just, fair, and sympathetic hearing. We do not for one moment fear that it will be a class-government bent on asserting its will at the expense of other classes as classes. It cannot even attempt to put through a capital levy when it is still a minority government. We doubt if it will even have time or opportunity to dispossess the coal lords and barons and transfer their holdings to the people of England, as it ought to if it can. But we believe that the spirit in which it will go about such reforms as it may be permitted to achieve will hearten the masses all over the world and give a profound impulse to that democracy which has been so nearly destroyed by the war that pretended to safeguard it.

For us in America the experiment we are to witness must be of the greatest value, besides giving ground for boundless envy. Where in England men are coming to rule who have risen by sheer merit, integrity, and courage, and because they had a program and constructive ideas, we Americans seem destined for a presidential campaign offering no hope for advance or reform, which will be an utterly meaningless contest as to whether one group or another shall hold the offices and award the spoils. Between the two groups there is no difference; they are alike as twins; they both have the same characteristics and neither has a program worthy of a moment's serious consideration. We are destitute of leadership; in England men have come from laboratories, libraries, mines—there are forty-six miners in the new Parliament—forges, shipyards, mills, and factories, who have something to give, within whom there are the stirrings of leadership based upon the common belief that England will go down to ruin if the present order of selfishness and self-seeking is not ended. More than that, the mere fact that these men have come to the top in England will bring cheer to the conquered peoples of Europe now under the brutal heel of French militarism, to the struggling masses everywhere, as it will give pause to Poincaré himself. Their assumption of office will give the first real hope that, if they are given time, the problems of Europe may be settled, the wickedness and folly of Versailles overcome.

The Nervousness of Mr. Hughes

THERE seems to be something in the very word "Russia" which makes men who talk about it lose their common sense. Mr. Hughes and Mr. Steklov, the editor of the Moscow Izvestia, alike have gone up into the thin clouds of abstract discourse. The wrangle began upon the question whether the Soviet Government was today engaged in an endeavor to overthrow by force and violence the Government of the United States and to hoist the red flag upon the White House flagpole. Today these two gentlemen are bitterly debating the question whether the Moscow editor, in an article written a year and a half ago, meant to imply that the Russian Government and the Third International were at heart akin, or whether he meant that the kinship was between the International and the Russian people. For the life of us, we cannot see that it matters.

Mr. Hughes will have no difficulty in proving that there is a relationship between the Soviet Government and the Third International, and if he wants to dig into the past he will be able to prove the most intimate coordination between the two organizations. In the days when the French, British, and American governments were invading Russia from Archangel and Vladivostok, and the German Government through Poland, the Third International was born as a weapon of war. In the days when these same governments were outfitting and financing hordes of freebooting adventurers who made themselves out to be devout counter-revolutionaries, the Soviet Government continued to utilize the revolutionary movement of the West for its own national purposes. That the leaders of the Soviet Government hoped for a Western revolution, both for social and national reasons, is undoubtedly true. Chicherin would have been as delighted to see Lord Curzon and Mr. Hughes pitched out of office by angry fellow-countrymen as those two estimable gentlemen would have been delighted to hear that Admiral Kolchak or Baron Wrangel had been able to order Chicherin, Lenin, and Trotzky shot against the Kremlin wall. But what has that got to do with the present question: Should the United States recognize the Government which has been ruling Russia for six years and more and has every prospect of continuing to do so for many years to come?

Russia's economics and rulers are her own business. If Mr. Hughes wishes to, he can discover abundant reason for believing, with his own chief, Mr. Coolidge, that Russia is returning to those "ancient ways" of capitalism which he so heartily approves. For our part, we regret it. We wish that Russia had been given an honest chance to try out the revolutionary theories of her rulers. For better or worse, the change is there. But what difference does it make? Does Mr. Hughes think that divine Providence has appointed him to watch over the internal economy of Russia? Surely he is not the man to refuse to deal with a country which refuses to pay its debts; he has not recalled his envoys from France, Italy, Rumania, or Poland. There remains but one question: Is the Soviet Government at present endeavoring to start a revolution in the United States?

On this question we urge our readers to study the article printed elsewhere in this issue by Mr. Louis Fischer, who has lately returned from a sojourn in Moscow. Mr. Fischer thinks that the Moscow Government is embarrassed by the Third International, but that it rather likes to have it somewhere in the background, partly to keep up the spirits of those who still like to consider Soviet Russia a revolutionary country, and partly as a possible weapon in case the Western governments again try to overthrow the soviets. Mr. Hughes, who seems excessively nervous, may regard that as a threat to his continued tenure of office; we regret to report that we do not. We are not interested in it, anyway. The stability of the United States Government has never been threatened by European revolutionaries and it is difficult to believe that even in his most nervous moments Mr. Hughes is afraid that it will be.

Houses orhovels?

HOUSING in America has grown not better but worse in the last three years. At least this is demonstrated for New York City by a survey just completed, and reports from other localities indicate that the situation is fairly typical. Three years ago, as a result of an inquiry into housing authorized by the Legislature of New York State, laws were passed placing certain limitations on rents and exempting from taxation for a period of ten years new construction for residential purposes. Both sets of legislation were bitterly assailed by interested parties as socialistic and unjust, and it was insistently argued that the rent laws would defeat the aim of the tax-exemption privileges by so restricting profits from building that nobody would erect houses even under favored conditions.

Experience has proved this argument to be false. Both sets of legislation have worked and worked well—but they have not worked well enough. The rent laws have saved many tenants from eviction and the more outrageous forms of exploitation, but in spite of them rents have been going up; likewise new houses have been built, but only of two sorts: expensive apartments for the well-to-do or single houses, not for rental but for occupancy by the owner. It has been found impossible to erect new apartment houses for people of small or moderate means, not because of the rent laws but because such tenants simply could not afford to pay the rentals that would have to be asked in order to return to the owners sufficiently large profits to make the investment attractive.

In consequence of this lack of building, coupled with a constantly increasing population, rents have been going up and congestion has been increasing in New York City, both at a rate that may truly be called startling. The Commission of Housing and Regional Planning has completed a survey of nine typical blocks, eight of which were reported on three years ago by the Reconstruction Commission. Some of the facts learned we referred to briefly last week. Rents show an increase of from 40 to 90 per cent, although factory wages—which are a fair test of workers' incomes—averaged $28 a week for September, 1923, against $28.44 for the same month in 1920. A change of tenant invariably means an increase in the rent of a given apartment. In the houses investigated, it was found that in instance after instance new tenants were called upon to pay 50 to 300 per cent more than the previous occupants. "Improvements" are always made an excuse for higher rents, usually on a scandalously exorbitant basis.

Most of the families included in the survey reported incomes under $2,000 a year. The proportion spent for rent was 21.3 per cent. A study by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1918-1919 showed that a comparable group (having incomes of $2,100 a year) in New York City spent 14.4 per cent on rent. In other words, higher rents have been paid, not out of higher wages but by a decrease in the amount spent for food, education, health, and other items essential to a civilized life. Many cases of inability to give children high-school or vocational education are attributed to soaring rents.

Perhaps even worse than increasing rents is the evidence of greater congestion and the sanitary and moral evils that result. In 1920—when congestion was regarded as menacing—there were, nevertheless, 125 vacant apartments in the blocks surveyed. This year there proved to be only twenty-five. In each block conditions of crowding were found to exist such as the following: 14 persons in 6 rooms, 12 in 4 rooms, 10 in 3 rooms, 6 in 2 rooms. Families are forced to double up in single apartments, or boarders are taken in. There is no chance for privacy, cleanliness, or quiet.

What do these facts mean? Plainly, that the construction of new houses, or even the repair of old ones, for people of small and moderate means has ceased; not only that, but there is no visible prospect of its resumption by private capital seeking profits. In other words, private initiative as a means of furnishing homes for the great mass of our people has broken down. New York and our other industrial States ought therefore at once to appoint commissions to recommend alternatives. Some slight hope may be placed in cooperative building and in organizations able to raise money for homes from persons willing to accept a nominal return on their money; but such efforts are likely to be too scattered and too meager to fill the need. We must accept the necessity of State or municipal building, and it must not consist merely of a few charity tenements for the professional poor. It should embrace various kinds of housing, not to be rented at a loss but at the lowest terms possible in order to cover the cost of construction plus interest and sinking-fund charges on the money invested.

What to Do with the Doughtys?

IT was Mr. H. L. Mencken who, in the course of his invaluable researches into the curiosities of American life, discovered the redoubtable Professor Leonard Doughty of Austin, Texas. In the Alcalde of Austin, Doughty had fulminated against the newer literature not only of America but of the world, and in a weighty and compact article in the Literary Review Mencken set forth that Doughty had, in the great words of Dogberry, written himself down an ass. This was self-evident to some as soon as the words of the eloquent Doughty were exposed to their eyes. What, however, of those to whom the mental outfit of Doughty did not so immediately reveal its true character?

They exist; they swarm over mountains and prairies. They are not always devoid of intelligence. The Dallas News, which carries, once a week, a not altogether despicable book page, calls Doughty "a critic whom lesser men may well fear." Yes, Doughty is mighty. He represents the critical reactions of the Ku Klux mind, the belligerent sense of election cherished by vulgar and ignorant men. Like these he has a shattering sense of inferiority, for which he compensates by an insane exaltation of himself and his kind.

These terms are mild enough if one takes the trouble to analyze a little the central philippic of Doughty as quoted by Mr. Mencken. Our modern literature, according to the Texan, is the result of the "nadir of sordidness or moral perversion" reached by the literature of the Germans.

The stain of that yellow, bastard blood is upon much of the "authorship" of the United States. . . . The modern "authorship" that makes the "books" upon our stalls is of those dread middle races, Aryan indeed but interminably mixed and simmered in the devil's cauldron of Middle Europe, and spewed out of Italy and France, and off the dismal Slavic frontiers, and out of that dismal and cankered East, that like a horde of chancre-laden rats are brought to swarm down the gang-planks of a thousand ships upon our shores.

Thus, in one sentence, Doughty destroys the world. It is foul. Only America is clean—and only white, Protestant America.

Nothing can be done with Doughty. Something can, perhaps, be done with the people who hold Doughty's general views in a less virulent and morbid form. We are not altogether guiltless of the ease with which they yield to these particular fallacies. They think that Theodore Dreiser and Sherwood Anderson are corrupt and wicked men who deliberately and coldly manufacture sinful books for sale. We know better than that; we know that art, when it is truly art, is inevitable expression, that it obeys an unanswerable inner voice. But have we ourselves—liberal critics, editors, thinkers—been wholly guiltless of creating in life the groundwork and foundation of the violent moralistic superstitions of the Doughtys?

We set them a bad example by our little cowardices, our unobtrusive evasions. We shrink from noble and creative living; we speak softly of the incomparable achievements of the German genius; we apologize for the strength and veracity of the most notable writing which, since Emerson, Thoreau, and Whitman, America has produced. In brief, the intellectuals of America have an inveterate habit of cat-like treading. They mask that tread as fastidiousness, as aloofness, as objectivity. It is nothing of the sort. It is prudence; it is fear of the Doughtys next door and across the way.

In the life of the spirit he who is prudent is lost. He who counts the cost has already stripped himself of his all. In these matters there must be no regard for any Doughtys nor for anyone's prejudices, nor for anyone's feelings. The life of art and thought is betrayed by even a consciousness of allegiance. Identification with it must be complete; questioning of its nature, freedom, aims must be unthinkable. Doughty and his followers are not unconscious of our apologies, our underemphasis, our strange internal dissensions. People who think are a minority in every country. There are Doughtys in every land the sun shines upon. But except in America even the peasantry is a little ashamed not to laugh at them. Here we are deadly solemn. Why shouldn't it be so, when our most intelligent and liberal papers discuss the morality of Sherwood Anderson, wonder whether a limited censorship would not be wise, call Hauptmann depressing and Bataille brilliant, and pretend to have soot in their eyes when some one strikes out for the necessary freedom of a humane and honorable life? To jeer at Doughty is not even to touch him. We can destroy him only by purging our souls of all in them that resembles him.

What Is Progressivism?

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

I HEREWITH offer a lock of Senator Shipstead's hair to the person who will provide the best and most useful answer to the question: What is "progressivism"? The public necessity for this nation-wide epoch-making prize contest is as follows:

In each house of Congress we now have a "progressive group." At the core of it in each house there is the Republican Party of the State of Wisconsin. In the Senate this core is Robert Marion La Follette himself. In the House of Representatives it is ten La Follette Republican Wisconsin congressmen.

Additionally in the Senate and in the House of Representatives there are various wrappings around this core. The first wrapping consists of senators and of representatives who are so "progressive" that they belong to the progressive group and act with it steadily. Among such senators may be mentioned Brookhart of Iowa and among such representatives may be mentioned Woodruff of Michigan.

The second wrapping consists of senators and of representatives who belong to the progressive group but act with it only part of the time. Among them may be mentioned Senator Capper of Kansas and Representative Schall of Minnesota.

The third wrapping consists of senators and of representatives who esteem themselves as "progressives," but who do not belong to the progressive group at all. Without belonging to it, they nevertheless go about wearing the progressive label. Among such mavericks of the progressive fold may be mentioned Senators Johnson of California and Norbeck of South Dakota, along with Representatives Kelly of Pennsylvania and Rathbone of Illinois.

Finally there is, for instance, Senator Medill McCormick of Illinois, who by championing the budget system became the author of the most useful practical measure for the improvement of governmental administration in this day and who now, by championing the federal anti-child-labor constitutional amendment, is about to become the chief legislative author of the most broadly useful federal social reform likely to be enacted by this Congress. He is also the Senate's most drastic champion of enlarged inheritance taxes. It happens, however, that he is regarded by the core of the progressive group and also by all of its wrappings as an alien.

Moreover, it appears that McCormick is in favor of a bonus to ex-soldiers and it would accordingly appear, if McCormick is a conservative, that the bonus is conservative. This supposition regarding the bonus is increased by the fact that Senator Borah is anti-bonus. Borah is a progressive and it must be (must it not?) that the bonus is therefore conservative and even reactionary.

At the same time it is perfectly clear that the bonus must be progressive. Robert Marion La Follette is in favor of it. So is Hiram Johnson. And Calvin Coolidge is against it. This proves that it is progressive.

A similar clarity in the matter of the meaning of progressivism can be observed in the field of the tariff. La Follette and Borah opposed a high tariff. This proves that a high tariff is reactionary. Senators Brookhart and Ladd and Frazier, however, are trying to get the high tariff on wheat made higher. This proves that a high tariff is radical.

Senators Borah and Shipstead are vigilant enemies of bureaucracy. They are distressed to see federal employees multiplying like locusts over the land. Senator Norris of Nebraska, however, an indubitable progressive, goes in for large governmental endeavors in the buying and selling of farm products.

The use of governmental money for the rescue of farmers is sometimes thought to be a proof of progressivism. The difficulty in accepting that proof is that by the same line of reasoning it would be possible to prove that our present "revolving fund" for railroads is progressive. Large sums of governmental money have been loaned out of that fund to railroads during the last few years to rescue them from their troubles. I shall be unable, as a judge in this prize contest, to admit that the Atlanta, Birmingham and Atlantic and the Kansas City, Mexico and Orient railroad companies are illustrations of the operations of progressivism simply because they have been permitted in their poverty to borrow money from the federal Government, while I in similar circumstances have to persuade a banker.

What the judges in this contest will require is that the contestants shall lay down the philosophic difference between "progressivism" and "conservatism." It will not be enough to say that the government shall make the taxpayer work for a certain class just because the taxpayer is already made to work for a certain other class.

Nor, I may add, will it be enough to pick on some one special problem and elevate it into the total salvation of humanity. Senator Shipstead, on being reproached by me the other day on the failure of the progressive group to come forward with an agreed bill for the improvement of our well-known "agricultural depression," remarked:

"The trouble is that it is like the blind man and the elephant. Grasping his tail, some of us say that he is like a snake and that the way to solve him is through railroad rates. Fondling his ear, some of us proclaim his resemblance to a fan and declare that the only way of solving him is through the Federal Reserve Board and the control of credit. Grasping his legs, some of us undertake to say that he resembles a planting of large trees and that what is needed is an ax to be laid to the roots of the high prices of the commodities which the farmer has to buy. Everybody is perfectly sure of a leg or an ear or a tail, but nobody yet has a picture of the elephant."

The purpose of this prize contest is to develop a picture of the elephant in the matter of agricultural improvement and in the matter of all other improvement nationally and socially considered.

The definition which will win the prize will be one which will clearly show to every citizen of the United States whether he is a progressive or a conservative. This will be an inestimable boon to the whole country politically and conversationally. When a candidate arises on a platform to commend himself to the electors, somebody in the audience will at once read off to him the definition of progressivism, as in this contest developed and adopted; and the candidate will instantly have to choose between running as an authoritative standard-bearer of progressivism or as a confessed adherent of conservatism or worse.

Imitating the managers of the Bok peace plan prize contest, I intend to choose as judges a set of persons whose opinions I absolutely perfectly well know beforehand. Unlike Mr. Bok's managers, however, I intend to have a set of judges who are not overwhelmingly in favor of the League of Nations or of federal financial aid to farmers or of any other one theory of peace or prosperity. My judges are going to be persons of diverse views.

I ask my readers to remember that we are going into a national election in which there is a certain chance that progressivism may step forward as the organizer of a new party. I ask them to remember that while this party may be relatively small this year it may grow into a great party if it is based on a sound philosophy and a clearly defined and readily understood distinction between itself and the older parties already existing. It is not out of mere flippancy that I suggest to the readers of The Nation an effort to try to find out—and to try explicitly to say—just what progressivism is and just what it is not. No new progressive party will get very far simply on a grouch or simply on a fad. It will need two things: a point of view and an outstanding issue illustrating that point of view.

Here accordingly I ask my readers: What is that point of view? I ask them what is it—what is it in essence—to be a progressive?

If they all of them are stumped, and cannot reply, I will print the answer myself. If I hear from them, at the Washington office of The Nation, 505 Albee Building, Washington, D. C., I will submit their suggested definitions to Robert Marion La Follette, who ought to know what progressivism is, and to Senator Reed Smoot of Utah, who ought to know what it is not. Any answer that gets through that sieve ought to be a good answer. It ought to be non-partisan and realistic. If the two judges should by any chance disagree, I will make the decision.

In truth, being myself somewhat puzzled as to what progressivism is, I herewith invoke as a jury the country's corps of greatest experts, longest trained, and most zealously informed—namely, the readers of The Nation. I clear my desk and await the answer.

Building the National Lie

By JEAN DE PIERREFEU

(This article is taken from a book by M. de Pierrefeu entitled "Plutarch Lied," to be published in the United States by Alfred A. Knopf. The author was a lieutenant of reserves in the French army during the war attached to General Staff Headquarters, where he wrote the official communiques and was responsible for the dispatches from the front given out to the press.)

THE belligerents in the Great War did not ask their propagandists, disguised as historians, to be either loyal or truthful: they asked for the direct contrary. To understand the difficulties which the historians of the future will have to surmount when they come to write the history of the Great War, it is necessary to understand the nature of this institution of propaganda. I believe that in no previous century has reality been so openly travestied as in the period through which we have just passed. The tremendous struggle between two groups of nations necessitated the employment of every means both of attack and defense. The "moral arm" could not be neglected.

To gain the sympathy of the neutrals, to obtain from them the material support which was expected of them, while persuading them to withhold it from the other side, to succeed in the end in launching them in their turn against the enemy—such were the various aims upon which each of the two groups of allies concentrated their activities.

With a due regard to the question of being in the right—strange, indeed, in this unloosing of brute force—each side was in the first instance zealous to place the onus of having been the aggressor on its adversary. But since, in the decisions of nations, interest prevails over sentiment, it was essential for each belligerent to prove himself the stronger in the eyes of the neutrals. Thus from these two motives there developed two kinds of propaganda, parallel but contradictory, which for a long time kept the neutrals hesitating and perplexed.

The Germans, better prepared than we were at the start, and induced by temperament and by education to accept the national lie, showed us the way. With a rare insolence, their agents all over the world spread the most tendentious rumors; their communiques, supported by telegrams, wire-less "news," newspaper articles, pamphlets, and tracts, presented the course of operations in the most favorable light. The Allies, in their turn, gradually instituted a vast network of propaganda inspired by the same necessity of emphasizing successes and minimizing reverses. In every country the intellectuals were called upon to furnish arguments in this new kind of war. The world became like an immense Sorbonne, resounding to the noise of controversies, denials, replies, and explanations. In those four years the human brain enlarged its paraphernalia of sophisms and quibbles more than it had done during several preceding centuries of brilliant civilization.

In this struggle France showed that she was the intellectual nation par excellence. She realized at once that the systematic lie might easily be of disservice to her interests. What mattered above all else was to win the confidence of the neutrals, to make them sure that our information was true. For this purpose it was necessary to avoid a blunt denial of matters of actual fact, against which even the most audacious falsehoods will not prevail. There was a subtle art in our propaganda: Ludendorff himself has bitterly admitted its results. The natural vulgarity of the Germans, their lack of taste, their cynicism, and their contempt for the niceties inevitably incited them to exceed the bounds of plausibility. In reality the greatest of our advantages came from our opponents; for most frequently our task was simply to emphasize their inept impostures. The common sense of the nations themselves did the rest. But, however honorable the French share in this campaign of persuasion may have been, its productions have no pretensions to being a supplement to history. This is easily understood. The historian, in obedience to a disinterested sentiment, forces himself to portray events in an exact manner. He loosens the chain of cause and effect. Placed above the protagonists, he favors neither the one nor the other, but he ought to enter into the mind of both, in order to scrutinize their actions from within and from without. His final aim being to make clear the lesson to be learned from the facts and the meaning of events, he is not afraid either to do justice to the enemy or to emphasize the mistakes of his own country. This latter task, if he wishes to remain above the foibles of men, he must fulfil in the spiritual interest of truth: he carries it out even more conscientiously if he is zealous for the interests of his own country. This is the only kind of patriotism which is permitted to the historian. Such an attitude was not fashionable during the war: the necessity of winning came before any other preoccupation. But unfortunately we have got into the way of prolonging such ambiguity beyond the time when it should be permitted.

Propaganda at home, intended to sustain the morale of the nation, could count upon admiration without reticence or restriction. How could one keep the nation confident unless one could persuade it that everything was going well, that its leaders were without blemish, that everything which was undertaken succeeded? The censorship came to the assistance of the propagandists, toning down the zeal of the critics or else suppressing them altogether. Hence arose an official optimism, a process of wheedling, the habit of exalting merit above its true worth, of concealing what was ugly or mediocre, of excusing errors; and hence, again, a kind of freemasonry of indulgence and blindness, calculated to prevent an accurate view of the situation and to atrophy common sense.

It can be understood that those who benefited by this wonderful optimism became accustomed to it and therefore unable to recognize the truth. During the war, to speak frankly, to give evidence of possessing the critical spirit, as did Georges Clemenceau during the three years when he was only a journalist, was equivalent to being regarded as a danger to one's country. It was useless for him to justify himself, to affirm his zeal for the public well-being and his passionate desire to see the nation shake itself free of routine and galvanize all its energy toward victory: he was execrated by the Staff and abused as a defeatist. His paper, l'Homme Enchaîné, was frequently seized and confiscated in the armies, on the ground that it was guilty of demoralizing the troops and furthering the plans of the enemy by ruining that blind trust in his leaders which is indispensable to the soldier. But was not this equivalent to proclaiming the outstanding virtue of the lie? As if the spectacle of the mistakes which were made and the deplorable abuses which were so abundant in the course of the campaign were not sufficient in themselves, had they ever been fully known, to spread discouragement among the fighting men! That Germany finally became panic-stricken was largely due to the fact that the critical spirit, under the iron hand of Ludendorff, could not break through to the light. Once facts could speak, the tissue of lies, official and military, was revealed as powerless to persuade the Germans that all was well.

But it will be remembered amid what a babel of curses the voices of truth had to enforce a hearing. The "good fellows" never ceased to cry: "Sacrilege!"; the High Command said that its task was being made impossible; the censorship thundered its denunciations. The politicians became an object of public contempt because of it. Clemenceau alone, by virtue of his vigorous action as head of the Government and as a reward of victory, managed to obtain total absolution for his past lack of discipline.

This obliging spirit, this patriotic modesty, this wish for admiration at all costs have not disappeared. Even nowadays whoever attempts to judge the men and the circumstances of the Great War is still regarded as contemptible. Because the struggle ended in our favor we have forgotten those evil days when, with victory turning her face away from us, we took stock of our inadequacies and our weaknesses. An incredible conspiracy exists in France at this very moment. No one dares to write the truth. It is no more than whispered, and when someone or other breaks the pact, people disown him rather than recognize that he is right.

For my part, the spectacle makes me indignant. And I have reached the point of saying: Of what use were so many sacrifices?

I have no respect for that kind of patriot who, under the pretext of putting his country on its guard against the lethargy of common sense, loads it with reproaches and unites his voice with those of its worst enemies. One must avoid extremes. The search for truth must be undertaken calmly. One cannot, it is true, even by exercising wisdom, moderation, loyalty, have the least hope of soothing the irritation of inveterate optimists or of ferocious defenders of the official truth. For these are not to be convinced. Those who meddle with the edifice of legendary history, that marvelous romance of pure glory and easy genius which—according to the theories of those propaganda agents, Plutarch and other inventors of the Lives of Illustrious Men—is unfolded, devoid of all shadow, by dint of miracles and the lightning strokes of genius, ought to realize that no distinction will be made between them and those who insult their own country. This sad fate awaits them because in a matter which is essentially military they have tried to introduce common sense and a spirit of criticism.

The history of the war, as it is concocted today, depends upon material which has a military origin. Now one need go no further than to discover that the realities are toned down. I have already said that at the height of the struggle it was important to sustain morale and to seem victorious. All the documents drawn up during the campaign bear the mark of this preoccupation. Not that the truth is omitted from them, but it is so cleverly concealed that at first sight one is not able to discover it. I have quoted at length in "G.Q.G. Secteur I"* an official paper in which it is shown that Verdun was not a surprise for the High Command and that all dispositions to meet the attack had been arranged beforehand at leisure. In "L'Offensive du 16 avril" I have given General Nivelle's report to the Government, in which this disastrous operation was glorified as a brilliant success. It is enough to read the memoirs of Ludendorff and Hindenburg to realize that the position is the same among our late enemies. The military mind does not regard things in the same light as the historian. The documents drawn up by the staff are intended to screen itself and not to bring out the truth. By virtue of these documents, it happens nearly always that in some regrettable affair both chiefs and subordinates seem entitled to congratulations. Whether orders were of any value, and whether they were given at the right time and place, are details into which the Staff does not enter. I am not in the least afraid to say that one cannot accept what emanates from the Staff without a most searching criticism. By simply reading them through, one gets the impression that everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds. In the whole series of communiqués there is not a single one which does not infer success, and does not imply, in its very mode of expression, a certain satisfaction, however disappointing may be the facts which it contains.

* The author's first book, a collection of military reminiscences, attacking the methods of the French High Command.

History, given the links of a certain chain of facts, joins them together afterwards in a logical way. It is an abstract science which has only a distant bearing on reality. An historical account is always a transcription from the real. It is quite natural that this work of abstracting and arranging becomes more delicate when those who carry it out are directly interested in it. Already, under these influences, the history of the war has undergone modifications which, though they are easy to detect now, will be impossible to perceive ten years hence.

The slow transformation of historical events takes place in the form of embellishment. Each nation creates an idealized image of itself which its citizens unconsciously carry about with them and which is gradually built up in the course of centuries. This embellished image represents what the nation would like to be, the ideal to which it desires to attain. In its more pathetic periods the nation sometimes tends, by a noble effort of will, to approach this ideal. Every story which reflects the image is declared true, and every man who appears to be of a type more or less approaching the ideal is admired without reserve.

Hence, certain national defects are exalted above the most solid qualities. The man who is the incarnation of the brilliant faults of his race is, unfortunately, more popular than he who is the incarnation of its useful aspects. Mangin and Pétain furnish a perfect illustration of this. He who is, with Joffre and Foch, the great craftsman of the war, enjoys a personal prestige infinitely less than the intrepid general whose name is synonymous with attack, with the furia francese.

History has not been evolved like psychology. When the latter, in order to get closer to reality, was including within its range the facts of semi-consciousness, history still remained in the stage of abstraction. The historian, favored by being thus behindhand and working on materials which are already the result of a simplification, of a filtering of reality, traces his pattern of events and his historical line, but omits, because they are exceptions, a mass of facts which are often of capital importance.

For a great length of time history has been the military history of nations, just because in this domain the primary aim is to simplify and on no account to become embarrassed by holding too close to reality. The result alone is of importance: and the result is attributed directly and entirely to a few eminent personalities, "representative men," as Emerson called them, who are drawn as ideal and as in harmony with their deeds. The same thing happens in political history: and hence comes that long line of statues, painted either black or white, which are the landmarks of the past.

With what zeal have those who undertake to write the official history hurried back to simplification and idealization, in their eager desire to safeguard the national interest, to avoid wounding our amour-propre, and to exalt our country!

What a ray of light is given us by the works which have appeared in such strange haste! But should history be written for the beati possidentes, with a view to keeping the people to a certain way of thinking and creating useful idols for it? Instantly the whole historical edifice of past ages appears to us as suspect.

Plutarch lied—either to order, or through artlessness, or because he was afraid! Great men, if I may judge them by those whom I have seen with my own eyes, are not as the historian makes them out to be. We need actual experience before we can realize that there is a gulf fixed between historical reality and history.

What Mr. Hughes Needs to Know

By LOUIS FISCHER

AT a public meeting last winter in Moscow Trotzky stated that there was very little chance for a communist revolution in the United States. At about the same time Karl Radek, who has come to be known as the Third International's arch-propagandist, told the writer that "revolutions cannot be transported in suit cases." Neither pamphlets nor money, he explained a moment later, can produce a revolution in a country where the objective facts are not likely to bring that revolution to the point of precipitation.

From November, 1917, till the end of 1920 the Bolsheviks were convinced that the world was ripe for an international upheaval engineered by advance-guard proletarians. During that period the Soviet Government felt, and its leaders often reiterated, that it could not exist side by side with a hostile capitalist world. One or the other must go, and they were intent on making the other go. Accordingly they spent much time, energy, and money in attempting to further the world revolution.

Internationalism reached its climax in the Russo-Polish war of 1920. The decline was immediate and precipitous. Russia today is no longer prepared to pull revolutionary chestnuts out of the fire to its own hurt. The slogan now is, "Russia first." Many Bolsheviks feel that they must intrench their own position before they try to extend the revolution. In fact, there is a growing feeling that unless they make a success of the task they have undertaken in Russia no nation will be willing to follow their example.

There are other elements in the Russian Communist Party (which controls the Russian Government in the same way as the Republican Party controls the present federal Administration in the United States) which insist that if no international revolution develops within, say, the next ten or fifteen years the Soviet system will be modified beyond recognition and assume the form of a half-radical regime much like that of New Zealand or Australia. Radek once wrote this sentiment into a pamphlet. Rather than risk such moral defeat Radek, and with him Bucharin, Zinoviev, and others, would stake the safety of the Russian regime in order to effect a revolution in some European countries.

Between these two points of view—the national and the international—there is a constant struggle in the Communist Party. The proponents of the international viewpoint are too weak to determine the actions of the Russian Government (though sometimes when their case is good they score a victory) but they are strong enough to keep the Communist International alive and to extract some minute measure of aid for it from the Government.

The German situation last summer and autumn mirrored these divergences. Those who were close to German and Russian affairs were convinced that the Russian Government did not want a Communist revolution in Germany. Much of the editorial writing in the Pravda and Izvestia, and of the orating in Moscow and the provinces, which might have led one to believe otherwise, was for home consumption—the Communist leaders dared not permit their revolutionary elements in Russia to suspect them of betraying the international revolution. Part of the Third International's exchequer probably was put at the disposal of the German Communist Party, but it failed to gain that without which it would have been folly to try a revolution: the promise of support from the Russian Government. (Speaking of the possibility of a German revolution, Trotzky said to Senator King: "In any case, we certainly should not intervene in any internal civil war.") And even Radek, who felt that the situation called for a revolution, was not certain that the German Communists could carry the day unaided; for a time therefore he flirted with other non-Communist German revolutionary forces.

The Russian Government withheld its support because it had too much to lose from a German upheaval. Had the Germans succeeded in setting up a Communist regime Russia would have been called on to send money and food; had serious consequences developed (if, for instance, Germany had been attacked by a foreign counter-revolutionary force) the Russians would have been obliged to overrun Poland and march the Red army to the defense of their German comrades, which might have meant a war with France and a general European imbroglio. Moreover, an upset in Germany would at least temporarily have paralyzed its industrial life and thus interfered with the importation into Russia of large quantities of machinery and supplies which are indispensable to the process of economic rehabilitation to which the Soviets are bending their every effort.

Here was the Communists' "best bet." All were agreed that at no time had Germany been riper for a Left revolution and at no time was it more likely to succeed than in the summer and autumn of 1923. A word from the Moscow Kremlin would have started the revolt; but that word was not forthcoming. The only word to the German Communists came from the Communist International's headquarters just outside the Kremlin, but that was not sufficient.

If then the Russian Government did not favor a revolution in Germany where all the objective factors in the situation were propitious, how far-fetched is it to speak of a Russian attempt to precipitate a revolution in England or France, or, of all places, in the United States where capitalism is young and virile, the labor movement weak and conservative, and the Communists a handful. (In Germany there are more organized Communists than in Russia.)

Nevertheless the Third International talks world revolution—that is its stock in trade. In the first half of the revolutionary period when the Soviets were convinced that for them it was either "world revolution or death" the Communist International was a convenient instrument through which propaganda could be conducted. Then the Government seconded the efforts of the International. But at present, when Moscow seeks to enter into diplomatic and commercial relations with all capitalistic countries, when it has decided that it can exist side by side with these capitalistic countries, the Third International has become an impediment and an encumbrance, from which the Soviet Government has clearly been trying to disassociate itself.

The last congress of the Third International (Moscow, November, 1922) received notoriously little attention from the Government. Stalin, Kalinin, Dzerzhinski, Kamenev, Chicherin, Krassin, and others of the very highest government officials did not participate in the proceedings; some did not even attend a single session. Lenin came once and talked Russia but not world revolution; Trotzky, having told the congress that a world revolution was not imminent, made one address in which he expressed himself more bitterly against Mensheviks and Social Revolutionaries than against the capitalist nations. These men have ceased to be merely Bolsheviks—they are bolshevik statesmen and diplomats, which is quite another thing. The Russian leaders were forced, by reason of the destruction wrought in the country by intervention, blockade, and the effects of their policies, to adopt a nationalist program which was not only incompatible with the International's policy; it was anti-International. When to send the Red army to Germany might have meant the setting up of a Communist regime in Poland and Germany and perhaps the precipitation of red revolts in other countries, the Red army remained at home because the venture would have been expensive for Russia. When Fascism conquered in Italy, the Bolsheviks, with an eye to fortifying Russia's diplomatic position, flirted with Mussolini for de jure recognition instead of doing the communistic thing and declaring war to the knife against him. There are many more instances to show that the Soviet Government, the creature and tool of the Russian Communist Party, is pursuing a policy diametrically opposed to the fundamental and most important principle of the Communist International: the promotion of the world revolution.

This assuredly is an anomaly; the Russian Communist Party, the most important component part of the Third International, pursues a policy antagonistic to that of the Third International. But it is no greater an anomaly than a Communist party which permits and even encourages private capitalism. Through the Russian Government the Russian Communist Party is negotiating with oil trusts and with imperialists; its representative kisses the hand of the Pope's emissary, and boards a battleship to bow to a king. This is the curse the Bolsheviks brought upon themselves when they became a government. It is an anomaly and it is incongruous, but it is a product of necessity. In the same way the Russian Government's renunciation of the ways of the Third International is the product of necessity. In their heart of hearts the Communists have no more given up the hope for an ultimate world revolution than they have forever renounced socialism in Russia. But they realize that for a protracted period both the world revolution and Russian socialism must be shelved.

It is the price the Russian Communist-Nationalists are willing to pay in order to help Russia back to its feet. Whether they will be willing to continue to pay the price and whether the Communist-Nationalists will maintain the upper hand over the Communist-Internationalists depends to a very large extent on how much Russia gets for the price it pays. If by the victory of the moderates Russia wins trade and recognition and peace they will not consider the cost too excessive; if it brings them nothing but recrimination, criticism, and a continued diplomatic blockade they may act like the bad boy who feels that if he isn't being rewarded for it there's no use being good.

American Warships and Chinese Money

By MA SOO

IT is claimed by the United States and the other Powers that in sending warships to Canton they have only done what is required of them by treaty for the proper protection of the revenues of the Chinese customs. This claim, however, is not borne out by the facts of the case. The Canton Government has never sought and is not seeking to interfere with the customs revenues earmarked for the payment of the Boxer indemnity to the foreign Powers. Nor is it questioning just now the right of the foreign Powers to control the Chinese customs, although as exercised at present that right cannot be justified by the terms of the Peace Protocol of 1901.

What the Canton Government demands and insists upon is that after the Powers have deducted the proper share from the customs revenues required for the service of foreign debts charged on the customs of the whole of China, the surplus funds of the Canton customs should be used for the benefit of the people and government of Canton and not be given over to the Peking Government to make war on the Cantonese people. The Canton Government contends that this is an act of simple justice.

The foreign Powers are concerned with the Chinese customs revenues only in so far as these revenues are used for the payment of the Boxer indemnity and certain foreign debts charged on the customs. They are not concerned with what is left over after they have received the payments due them. How these surplus funds shall be employed is not a matter for the Powers to decide; it is a purely internal affair, the settlement of which lies with the Chinese people. For the Powers to dispatch warships to Canton to dictate the disposal of these surplus funds, at a time when Canton is at war with Peking, is an unjustifiable intervention in the interests of one faction in a civil war.

It cannot be said that the United States is intervening as required by treaty, for the matter in dispute has been shown to be outside the scope of the protocol of 1901. The Powers themselves admitted this when they permitted 13.7 per cent of the total surplus of the entire Chinese customs to be paid over to the Canton Government in 1919. This payment continued until the spring of 1920 when at the instance of the State Department in Washington it was stopped, for reasons known only to that Department.

Neither can it be said that the United States is intervening to protect the lives and property of its nationals, for both American lives and property are safe in Canton. Indeed, it will be interesting to recall in this connection that during the recent bandit raid at Lincheng when Americans were kidnapped and their lives were in danger, the American Government contented itself with merely sending notes of protest to Peking, and not a single American soldier was dispatched to rescue the victims although at that time there was an American regiment stationed at the Peking end of the railway line. And now when Americans are not even molested in Canton, the United States Government has seen fit to send six warships there, with their guns trained on that unfortified city.

What, then, are the reasons for this intervention on the part of the United States? It is easy to understand why Great Britain seeks to withhold the surplus from the Canton customs, because British bankers have made large advances to the Peking Government and they hope to retrieve themselves from these funds. It can also be explained why France is holding up these surplus revenues, because she is trying to get her portion of the Boxer indemnity paid her in gold francs instead of francs paid at the rate of exchange fixed in 1901 by treaty. But the United States—why should its naval power be employed for the forcible collection of customs revenues from Canton so that the Peking militarists may flourish? Is it to the interest of American wireless corporations that the present regime in Peking be maintained? Or is the United States doing this for the benefit of the few Chicago bankers who have lent five million dollars to the Peking Government? Or, again, is it exerting itself on behalf of the great house of Morgan which has bought up all the Hukwang Railway bonds formerly owned by the German Government but canceled by China since the Great War?

Whatever the reasons, the sending of warships by the United States and the other Powers in connection with the Canton customs funds is a distinct violation of the Nine Power Treaty signed at the Washington Conference, in which the Powers solemnly agreed to respect the sovereignty of China. Since the Powers only recognize the Peking Government as the Central Government of China, it is with that Government alone that they should deal in regard to any alleged violation of treaty rights by the provinces. In intervening in the matter of the Canton customs surplus, the Powers have, in addition to violating China's sovereignty, stultified themselves by admitting in fact that the government which they have recognized as the Central Government of China does not really govern the whole of China and is unable to collect taxes from the provinces without foreign armed assistance.

In spite of the threatening attitude of the United States and the other Powers, with their naval demonstration in Canton waters, the Canton Government cannot allow the customs revenues collected at the Port of Canton to go into the hands of the Peking Government with which to buy arms to kill the Cantonese people. To permit this would be treason against the people of Canton and an act of self-destruction by the Canton Government. It is therefore the sacred duty of the Canton Government to prevent this money from being turned over to Peking at all cost. If, however, the Canton Government, on account of outside interference, is unable to preserve the Canton customs surplus for the use of the Cantonese people; or, if for some reason it is rendered powerless to prevent this surplus from being made use of by the Peking Government against Canton; then it will be compelled, as a matter of self-preservation, to declare Canton a free port, abolishing all import and export duties. That, at least, will save the Canton Government from being forced to give aid to its enemy.

In the meantime, the continued presence of the foreign warships in Canton with their warlike preparations is a source of great irritation to the Cantonese people. There is no doubt that with an incensed mob provoked into being by the overbearing conduct of the Powers, the landing of marines from the foreign warships in Canton will surely meet with resistance and be the occasion for much bloodshed. If that should come to pass, the United States, which has the largest naval force in Canton, together with the other Powers, must be held morally responsible.

France and Soviet Russia Join Hands

By SCOTT NEARING

FRANCE emerged from the war with a home population of 41 millions, living in an area about four times the size of New York State, and with an additional 50 millions of colonial populations scattered over four million square miles in Asia and Africa. Before the war France was rated as the wealthiest country in Europe, and the events of the past ten years have enhanced this position by weakening some of her most formidable rivals. Superficially France is both rich and powerful.

But empires are costly. France has not only the expenses of imperial administration in the colonies, the cost of maintaining a huge army, of building a great air fleet, and of supporting a navy—but also the expense of preserving imperial influence in the "kept" countries erected around Russia as a barrier against sovietism and as a possible market for French goods and French investments. Such diplomatic and financial adventures are very expensive. A recent estimate places the French loans to satellite states, made since the armistice, at 5,161 millions of francs, distributed as follows: Anti-Bolshevik Russia, 481 millions; Esthonia, 17 millions; Latvia, 6 millions; Lithuania, 1 million; Czecho-Slovakia, 574 millions; Jugoslavia, 1,795 millions; Rumania, 1,181 millions; Poland, 1,056 millions; Hungary, 1 million; and Austria, 55 millions. In addition there is a pending loan of 1.5 billions to Hungary and the Little Entente. Can France hope to carry these necessary costs of modern imperialism?

France has behind her a thousand years of aristocratic culture and civilization, of agriculture and of craftsmanship. Under the Old Regime, the rulers made merry at the expense of an impoverished peasantry. To be sure there was always the skilled craft-worker, but the peasant was and is the backbone of France, and until the French Revolution he was exploited and landless. There has been a slight decrease in the proportion of the rural population of France. In 1870, two-thirds of the population was rural; in 1901, 59 per cent; and in 1911, 55.8 per cent. In Germany, with a total gainfully occupied population of 28 millions (1907), 12 millions were classified as industrial. In France, with 13 millions gainfully occupied (1911), only 4.9 millions were classified as industrial.

The heavy industries of France, like her population, have grown slowly. The French population was 36 millions in 1871 and 39 millions in 1911 (as compared with Germany's 40 millions in 1871 and 70 millions in 1914). France's coal production between 1870 and 1910 increased less than 200 per cent (as compared with 600 per cent for Germany). During the same time her production in pig iron increased only from 1.2 million tons to 4 million tons. On the face of things, therefore, while France is a rich country in the sense of being economically self-sustaining, she is not rich in the rapid production of industrial surplus.

In view of this handicap France's expenditures during the past few years have increased with alarming rapidity. Take her taxes, for example. In 1913, they amounted to 5 billions of francs, in 1919 to 11.6 billions, and in 1923 to 23.4 billions.

The French budget adopted July 1, 1923, tells the story.

Under the French financial system there is a general budget and a special budget. The general budget for 1923 provides for an expenditure of 23.4 billion francs, of which a little more than half is for "debt service." The receipts from taxes meet these expenditures and allow a tiny surplus.

Then comes a special budget. The reports of the United States Department of Commerce show that "the total expenditures for which the French Government is responsible have aggregated about 50 billion francs annually for the past few years." Under the "special budget" there are the costs of reestablishing life in the devastated areas, the costs of pensions, and the like. Many of these costs are being charged to the account of Germany. But during the present year, unless Germany should pay an unexpected amount, the deficit on the French budget will equal more than 20 billions of francs. In other words, the French Government will be spending more than 2 francs for every one that it receives through the normal channels of taxation.

The chief burden on the French budget is the French debt. To be sure this debt consists of nothing more than promises to pay, but let it be once repudiated and the heart is cut out of European imperialism. The French debt at the present moment is approximately 430 billion francs. This amount is made up as follows:

Pre-war debt	25	billion francs
War loans	120	" "
Short-term notes	114	" "
Owing Bank of France.....	24	" "
Foreign debt	124	" "
Miscellaneous	23	" "
Total	430	" "

At the moment France is not paying interest on the $3,340,000,000 which she owes the United States and is pursuing a similar course with England. This interest, however, has not been "defaulted." It has merely been "funded"—that is, added to the principal of the debt. If France were to pay 5 per cent on all of her present obligations, it would absorb more than nine-tenths of her annual income.

What more need be said? The French have established a great empire without having at home an economic organization capable of producing the necessary surplus wealth for financing an empire. What then is to be done? If France does not produce, she must borrow or steal. France has engaged in the gigantic game of international plunder, emerging from the war of 1914 with Alsace-Lorraine, the Saar, and important concessions in Africa. But international robbery costs money, and the French find that their total available income covers less than 50 per cent of the necessary annual outlay.

Perhaps the matter can be best stated in a series of questions:

1. Can France demoralize the economic life of her great rival, Germany?

The treaty did that and France is now completing the work by occupying the Ruhr.

2. Can she become an industrial nation, taking Germany's place in Central Europe?

Probably not. Certainly not for some time to come.

3. How then can she retain her cherished position as first power of Europe?

Only by robbery (exploitation and imperialism).

4. Can she carry on this robbery successfully?
Only by paying her debts.
5. Can she pay her debts?
Not unless Germany pays for the war.
6. Can Germany pay for the war?
No, because French policy has already crippled German economic, commercial, and financial life.

The Nationalist Party in France has embarked on a venture that is not only economically unsound, but that will destroy what is left of European imperialism as it is now undermining imperial France.

The French statesmen were forced to choose between a ruined Germany and a paying Germany. They chose to ruin Germany and by that decision joined hands with Soviet Russia to crush European imperialism.

In the Driftway

IT is not enough that American collectors make way with English objects of art and first editions of all exclusively English authors. That, in the course of ordinary living, might be forgiven, for after all man does not live by first editions alone. The latest English grievance is much more real: the supply of six-foot footmen is almost exhausted, and the Americans are to blame. Recently a royal household advertised for footmen of the proper size and not only were there none to be had, but a miscreant measuring only five feet seven inches actually applied for the job. The royal households could talk of nothing else for nearly a week: it is, of course, well known that rich Americans will have nothing but six-foot footmen; and it is equally well known that there are thousands, nay, probably millions of rich Americans. Why were the American colonies ever given their independence!

* * * * *

EVIDENTLY in this state of affairs lies cause for serious international complications. Even the Drifter can see that the comity of nations depends on things not much more momentous than this. But there are grounds for comfort both for Americans and English; "the canned-fruit kings and peanut-paladins of Hoochland," to quote the London Daily Herald, are not alone to blame. It seems that not all men suitable for footmen embrace that occupation, either in England or the United States; many of them go into the movies, as actors—who has not thrilled to see them?—or as the uniformed attendants outside the moving-picture theaters, equally thrilling and more colorful. War between the nations may yet be averted. And yet the Drifter is not satisfied. He deplores the lack of six-foot footmen just as he deplores the fact that the pageantry of life in general is disappearing. In modern civilization there are too many white porcelain bath-tubs and too few footmen in red and gold. The Russian Soviet Government, though it has achieved a sort of communism and aspires to more, has recognized this great truth. It dispensed with the trappings of royalty and the gilded ornaments of the church, but recently an infant was formally dedicated to communism with as much ceremony as is required to christen a prince. The parents were reported to have been pale and trembling with the solemnity of the occasion; the great audience witnessing the event sang the International fervently and religiously and tears were shed.

IT is this tear-compelling aspect of ceremony that will make it essential in any future communist state. The king may be set to peeling potatoes, and the royal heir, divested of his ermine, may try his hand at mopping floors, but something must be provided for their erstwhile subjects to weep over in unison. The red flag will do, possibly, or the martyrs who shall have given their lives for the revolution. And yet, if the Drifter should be around to observe and give advice—which, considering his advanced age, is extremely unlikely—he will suggest, as an indispensable addition to the entertainment, a striped flagpole, or a martyr's crown, or a six-foot gentleman in gold knickerbockers who had once been a footman.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

[Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.]

Two Cooperative Protests

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For once, Mr. Editor, you really are mistaken when you say in your editorial of October 24: "In the last three years only one building has been completed with apartments to let for as little as $10 per room per month—and that by a philanthropic organization." You refer to New York City, where the State housing commission has been investigating emergency rent legislation. Do you not?

But there are groups of citizens who have supplied themselves with homes to live in, apartments which cost them on an average less than $10 a month per room, even here in New York City, where the housing situation is most acute. But these are not profit-making enterprises; that's the point. They are cooperative.

There are twenty-five cooperative apartments in South Brooklyn—three erected within the last year—housing from sixteen to thirty-two families each. The purchasing of land, the erection of the buildings, the securing of funds, the administration of the enterprises from start to finish have been carried on by the home-makers themselves. No speculative real-estate corporation has promoted these projects, to turn over when completed at an inflated valuation to credulous tenants. In the apartments to which I refer the risks as well as the savings have all been assumed by the cooperators themselves.

However, this is not the case in the present housing investigation where practically all the testimony has been sought from those who build to sell or rent for profit. Of course they testify that no apartments can rent for less than $10 a room per month today, because they represent the system of housing in which profit must be collected all along the line—by the land speculator, the loaning agency, the building contractor, the real-estate promoter—all demanding their toll.

This is the reason why cooperators, even in this crisis, can build four- to six-room apartments, whose operating charges (rents) amount to from $35 to $65 a month, per apartment, according to location. This is also the reason why, as their loans or mortgages are paid off, these monthly charges regularly decrease.

How is it that these facts are not more generally known? I believe it is because the American public unquestionably accepts private profit as the motive behind all economic enterprises. Such facts should be reassuring to Nation readers. It is good to know that there are groups of self-reliant citizens who are solving their housing problems; who form and finance their own building associations; and who supply themselves with attractive homes, free from philanthropy, free from graft, and free from profiteering landlordism.

New York, November 1

AGNES D. WARBASSE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have been reading Victor H. Lawn's article, The Kennels of New York, in the number for December 19. The pictures he sketches of bad housing conditions are well done, but we have seen them many, many times; and most of us have experienced more inconveniences than we care to boast about. So I, for one, skipped very hurriedly over these descriptions and over the stories of the iniquities of the bankers, another familiar tale, to find the remedy. The heavens shriek for a remedy these days. And what did I find?

Municipal housing! To save us from the extortions of the landlords he would give us a glorified landlord in Tammany Hall! Can there still be folks in New York, writer-folks, who do not know of the munificent graft game played upon all of us, tenants and landlords alike, by the agents, inspectors, and whatnots of city pay rolls already?

There is a definite cure for the housing evil: cooperative housing. The Consumers Cooperative Housing Association of 70 Fifth Avenue is one effort toward housing for the workers without a penny of private profit for the promoters; and there are others. The possible retort that cooperative housing has not yet been tried on a large enough scale to demonstrate its feasibility is beside the point. How far has municipal housing been carried in this city, either? We can, however, go to those who have studied both kinds of housing in Europe where each has been tried extensively and ask for their judgment of the merits of the two programs, which is cheaper, which enlists the greater interest on the part of the tenants, which insures the best care of the property. Those of us who are political-minded and want some kind of a powerful institution to do things for us will perhaps turn to municipal housing. Those with initiative who prefer to face and solve their own problems independent of bureaucrats and politicians will turn to cooperative housing.

New York, December 14

CEDRIC LONG

The Fruits of Revolution

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a recent traveler in Soviet Russia and a recent purchaser of the shares of stock recommended by President Hillman of the Russian-American Industrial Corporation, I am prompted to supplement his report printed in your issue of November 7 announcing the first dividend declared by that very interesting organization.

The Russian Clothing Syndicate is all that Mr. Hillman says it is, and more. It is, as one of my Quaker friends remarked after visiting several of the factories, a "syndicate with a soul—if such a thing is possible." It follows the usual processes of trade in providing itself with raw material and disposing of its product, but in its twenty-five productive units—factories employing some 15,000 workers—it appears that the worker has a voice and finds interesting avenues of expression that have not been opened for the workers in any other land. Something of both the depth and the gaiety of the workers' life is suggested in Magdeleine Marx's story of the Russian women in that excellent Russian number of The Nation.

The fact that all these workers who now enjoy these very tangible and, I believe, tasty fruits of revolution lived only seven years ago in virtual industrial servitude makes the present life, hard though it may be at times, in these Russian shops the more intensely dramatic by contrast. I remember how in one clothing factory I found the headquarters of the kult komissia (Culture Committee) flooded one noon hour with workers inquiring of this omniscient committee about a dozen phases of the intellectual and social work of the plant. To sit in that small room and watch the eager faces coming, questioning, going, and then to think of the cold and cynical exploitation of these same workers before 1917, was to sense in a single moment, in a single scene, the change wrought in these six years.

Of course "industrial credits to Russia" through RAIC or any other corporation created for this purpose make possible just so much more breadth of life and experimentation in these Russian factories. I can think of no industries, here or abroad, where I would sooner invest a ten dollar bill or two. I know of no groups of workers anywhere who have the chance and are at the same time capable of doing so much for themselves and for the world on so little capital. Americans who have more than a platonic sympathy for Soviet Russia's great people and her social laboratory can do no better than take Mr. Hillman's practical hint and help the Russians to help themselves. For everything that he predicted a year ago has apparently come true and the picture that Mary Heaton Vorse painted in your columns of the Amalgamated's enterprise in Russia seems to have materialized. Once more the Russian realists have delivered the goods.

New York, November 13

SYDNOR H. WALKER

Both Sides

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In Mr. Marvin Lowenthal's article on Anti-Semitism in European Universities, in your issue of November 14, I found the following phrase: "The Rumanian students demanded, with usual rioting, that the Jews be excluded from the college unless the Jewish community furnished corpses for dissection." The facts are different; 70 per cent of the medical students at the university in question are Jews, and there was not one Jewish corpse for dissection, the argument being that the Jewish belief forbids the dissecting of the dead (as if our Christian religion allows it). Then the conflict started.

I think we ought to see the question from both sides.

Cleveland, November 20

GEORGE ANAGNOSTACHE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since a practical dearth of Jewish corpses exists in the dissection rooms of the universities throughout the world and has so existed since dissection was first practiced, it is curious that only today and in Eastern Europe this dearth has become a subject of violent conflict and bloody encounter. Have Rumanian physicians recently discovered a difference between Jewish and Christian physiology? Is therefore the taboo of the Jewish religion against dissection, hitherto respected by all civilized medical schools, an obstacle to science? Unless this is so, I hardly think that the conflict really "started" in the fashion Mr. Anagnostache suggests. I suspect that the attitude of mind which registers excitement, indignation, and a sense of unfairness over the religion of a corpse is at bottom responsible; and the origin of this attitude lies in the social and political conditions I touched on in my article.

New York, December 23

MARVIN LOWENTHAL

Growing Poets

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your interesting editorial on resident poets in our colleges and universities in the issue of November 21 discusses the transporting and transplanting of such poets but makes no mention of a system we have found so satisfactory that we should like to recommend it to others—that is producing them yourself. Grace Hazard Conkling is a graduate of Smith College and is now an associate professor in its department of English, giving courses in Browning, in contemporary poetry, and in versification, sometimes referred to as the Poetry Workshop.

SMITH COLLEGE PRESS BOARD

Northampton, Massachusetts, November 17

Books

Aids to Psychological Thinking

Readings in General Psychology. By Edward S. Robinson and Florence Richardson Robinson. The University of Chicago Press. $4.50.

General Psychology. By Walter S. Hunter. The University of Chicago Press. $2.

Intelligence Testing. By Rudolf Pintner. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

Human Character. By Hugh Elliot. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

THE rapid spread of psychological modes of thinking, for the student as pedagogical discipline, for the layman in application to current interests, requires guiding appliances: texts, readings, special manuals, surveys of interesting sections and cross-sections of the extensive mental domain. The examples here assembled are typical alike of interests and contributions. Mr. and Mrs. Robinson have compiled the first source-book in general psychology—"general" as excluding the special fields and addressed to broad aspects of mental functions. What the problems of psychology are and how they are to be formulated; the nervous system and its modes of behavior; reflex action, instinct, habit; the range of sensations; the supporting processes of attention, perception, personality; dreams, language, individual differences: such are the materials of this volume. Its purpose is to provide concise and authoritative—at times suggestive—statements that will orient the general reader and the student seeker for information in the several topics.

To maintain proportion in such an enterprise requires experienced judgment. The task is handicapped in this case by the nature of the available selections, for the most part prepared for unrelated purposes, varying in scale, in point of view, in emphasis; compromise is inevitable. My chief criticism of the volume is the too generous inclusion of abstracts from articles of but temporary or controversial bearing; these have the further disadvantage that they emphasize points of limited interest, and fail to furnish the larger outlines which form the standard need of the standard reader. Considering the shifting state of opinion in many of the problems and issues in contemporary psychology, much of this is inevitable; a source-book, however, aims at a moderate longevity.

Mr. Hunter's "General Psychology," presented in a revised version, is "general" in another sense; it includes the fields of animal, applied, abnormal, and social psychology, as well as the traditional survey of the mental processes typical of normal, adult, human mentality. That such surveys meet a need is indicated by their ready acceptance. The present text is based on a teaching plan open to criticism; if absorbed or dispensed in the printed order, confusion is likely; for to plunge the novice into the intricacies of animal behavior technique, abnormal complexities, social involutions and evolutions, and later supply the knowledge and concepts needed for their digestion, invites a false reaction, if not a blank one.

Few topics in recent psychology have received larger publicity than intelligence-testing. Mr. Pintner's book combines with an account of the methods of conducting tests—the chief emphasis of most handbooks—a well-executed historical statement and a more concise and discerning summary of the results issuing from this mass of testing than is elsewhere available. What the tests tell of the status of the feeble-minded and the superior, of the child at school and the student at college, of the delinquent and dependent, of the deaf and blind, of the Negro and the foreign-born, of the soldier, the employee in general, is itself told in tables and conclusions, often tentative and with gaps at vital points, yet with sufficient positive results to make it abundantly clear that testing, though a crude instrument, has justified the labor spent upon it and even excuses much of the misspent energy.

The value of such a survey depends upon the critical ability of the author. Mr. Pintner holds himself rigidly—perhaps too rigidly—to the objective role of interpreter of the findings. His ventures into broader conclusions and suggestions are few and reserved. A consistent and conservative attitude permeates the volume and gives confidence to the points selected for emphasis. On such general issues as the parts played by heredity and by environment, on the distinction between knowledge and mental alertness, on the issue of general and special ability, on the nature of an aptitude and the mode of its application, the positions taken are sound and helpful. The volume aims directly to place before the serious reader the essential contributions to the intelligence function that have thus far emerged from the ingenuity and labor expended upon testing; it accomplishes its purpose by an adjustment of critical and practical considerations.

As the consequence of a definite shift of interest, psychologists have settled down to a workable definition of their science as that dealing with human behavior and human nature; of the clue-words significant of the latter, "character" is the most engaging, while "temperament" may be the most basic. Disquisitions on character range from orderly gossip to erudite confusion. Despite its dragnet inclinations, the term has an accredited status in psychology, though the tolerant psychologist is not disturbed, and may be helped, by its more popular and "literary" affiliations. Mr. Hugh Elliot considers it from the non-professional approach, making "Shakespeare the greatest psychologist the world has ever known." He has, indeed, a cavalier attitude toward the dyed-in-the-wool psychologists that is out of keeping with the evident and discerning use he has made of their contributions. Discursive, eclectic, unconventional, the chapters tend to take the form of sketchy essays. The psychologist, scanning the volume too casually, would be tempted to put it aside; the loss would be his own, as Mr. Elliot happens to have the gift of psychologizing. Indeed, the book is full of keen observation and shrewd analysis, which, though often skin-deep, penetrates far enough and is distinctly stimulating.

Everywhere trends of thought and activity are seeking the stimulus of a psychological interpretation. Psychologists have invited the responsibility of guidance by accepting the pragmatic implications of their science; it behooves them to maintain a free development of the problems which their best judgment holds to be significant and profitable.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Building Lots

Weeds. By Pio Baroja. Translated by Isaac Goldberg. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IT'S curious rereading after seven years—this trilogy of Baroja's of which "Weeds" is the central novel. Then I was a newcomer in a Madrid that had been unchanged for two or three decades, the Madrid of Galdós and the Café Suizo; the war was in its less horrible slaughterhouse stage; the first thing you did every morning was still to look out of the window to see if the great revolution had burst with the dawn; now Madrid is an Americanized town with its subway and its skyscrapers at Cuatro Caminos; soccer is taking the place of bullfights, and at last Spain is being sucked into the current of industrial life. The Pyrenees are leveled.

"La Lucha por la Vida" is the epic of a period in Spanish life, a not at all despicable period, of which the close was symbolized by Primo Rivera's coup d'état last summer. Then, in 1916, the three novels still seemed actual, fresh off the presses as a bulldog edition; roaming through the clattering Madrid streets with "Weeds" in one pocket and M. Garnier's dictionary in the other, you seemed to have the keys to every alley and wine-shop, to the iron-bound doors that opened on the breakneck stairs, with their invariable smell of scorched olive oil, of all the tenement houses, to every courtyard and rag market. These books led you through all the back lots and bad lands and cabbage patches that filled the valleys round the city, through suburbs like Kafir kraals out along the old royal roads where great painted carts drawn by four mules tandem navigated creakily like galleons, over the bare hills of the Castilian desert with the Sierra always bright and gleaming in your face. They were the true Baedeker to that seething maze of rebellious, unkempt, louse-bitten, soaring life that was Madrid, the clotted center and heart of the peninsula. Under the thin veneer of a nineteenth-century city the old Adam was still rampant. Everything was leading to the great revolution that was to be the old Adam's victory and transfiguration. The angels and demons were spoiling for Armageddon.

Now we have seen Armageddon, the marvelous year has been laid away among the other years in the smoothing presses of history. The old Adam wears Arrow collars and Walkover shoes and the machine he was to make his own is in the hands of Henry Ford and Mussolini and other less personable marionettes. From being the actual tidings from a picket on guard "La Lucha por la Vida" has become a document and a work of art.

In spite of an unimaginative and frequently incorrect translation, "Weeds" and "The Quest," the two novels already published in English, are worthy, I think, of being set a little apart from the flood of translations out of all languages annually dumped into the receptive but expressionless maw of the American public. They are a genuine and non-literary account of an almost extinguished flare of revolt against the great machine. These humble people, Manuel, Jesus, La Justa, the Baroness, fitfully and helplessly as they stray along their appointed paths, are none of them mob minded; the old Adam glows in them at times; they are unwillingly driven to the treadmill. Their children, the inhabitants of the new white stone Madrid that has sprouted in five years, go consentingly. Business and sport, industry and prosperity are undisputed gods. The lazy, knotty-minded inhabitants of this old Madrid, contentious and noisy and fond of laughing, have disappeared like the goats that used to browse in the back lots full of shacks and beggars and little drinking dens where now straight fences of barbed wire mark off the limits of the Garden City. As a record these books are immensely valuable, and perhaps there is more than that to them. There is a dignity and restraint in the writing, a quietly distilled poetic energy that is very hard to describe. Baroja is a great novelist, not only in his time, on railway bookstalls and in editorial offices, but in that vigorous emanation of life and events that for some reason people garner up and desiccate in libraries and call literature. That's all there is to it.

JOHN DOS PASSOS

Expressionism in Art Psychoanalyzed

Expressionism in Art; its Psychological and Biological Basis.

By Oscar Pfister. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

PFISTER confines his study of expressionism to those abnormal products of the modern art movements which have aroused such scorn and derision, and which exhibit a revolutionary spirit akin to the bolshevist spirit. This art, he says, is the picturing of "subjective presentation, accompanied by total or almost total distortion of nature . . . or by suppression of all external reality." Picasso, Matisse, Picabia, the Cubists, Futurists, Vorticists, and Dadaists may differ from each other in their forms of expression, but the common characteristic of their art is the "psychical discharge." What, he asks, is the psychological and biological background of this expressionism, and what is the relation between it and art in the normal sense?

Pfister was led to deal with this subject by the method of psychoanalysis through a patient, a French artist of high accomplishment, whom the war had wrecked nervously, and who came to him for treatment. In the course of his treatment, Pfister obtained from his patient a series of drawings (reproduced in this book) of either a meaningless or a repulsive character. On analysis these drawings yielded much material for a "history" which referred the artist's misanthropy, cruelty, and abnormal outlook on life to inhibitions having their sources in experiences in childhood. Pfister found that the artist was not interested in making himself intellectually understood by means of these drawings, but that he was attempting to satisfy individual instincts, such as thirst for vengeance, sadistic and masochistic desires, the ambition to rule, the expression of wish fulfilments. He found further that the act of objectivation gave the artist relief from his emotional sufferings, and that he hoped to attract by its means a kindred soul who would understand and sympathize with him. Finally, the work was looked upon by the artist as an attempt to realize a universe in which he could maintain and assert himself with freedom.

It was natural that the subject should interest the psychoanalyst, for the products of expressionism, while they are seemingly "disparate" in the scientific as well as the Goyan sense, are the works of men highly gifted as artists, who have deliberately chosen this somewhat incoherent method of articulation. Here are either the symptoms of a disease or the revelations of a new orientation, and Pfister feels that both conclusions are warranted. Expressionism attempts to reproduce the essential meaning of things. The painter's art presents his psychic state. An artist is more or less a man of suffering, for no genius is without inhibitions. His reaction to the world of reality is affected by his suffering, which has thrown him back on himself to the degree that he is become an introvert, inducing in him a paranoid megalomania which compels him to devalue and even to violate nature in his representations. Repelled from the external world through bitter experiences, he magnifies himself to the power of a world creator. This immense self-conceit is not vanity, but a necessary means of escape from the collapse of the lonely personality denuded of all reality. He paints from an inner necessity to relieve himself from his soul's distress and to satisfy his instincts. Often he does not know what he is painting, for he is trying to fulfil desires which are seething in his unconscious, and also to relate himself to reality. Only those can understand him who possess the psychical constitution corresponding with that of the expression, and whose unconscious speaks the same language as the artist's unconscious.

If we ask what brought this "new art" into existence, Pfister replies that it is the natural precipitation of sufferings brought on by the injustice and selfishness of our materialistic civilization. The artist has realized the impossibility of going further in this direction, and, more prophetic than the statesman, is anticipating the final judgment on our civilization of Mammon. All art, declares Pfister, has its origin in the failure of reality to satisfy man's needs. It is the outcome of suffering. Wagner could not understand how a perfectly happy man could ever be an artist. Sufferings are the results of inhibitions preventing the life-impulse from realizing a conscious relation with reality. They throw the sufferer back on himself, producing the neuroses which afflict so many, and compelling the creation of other worlds in which relief from his sufferings may be found. The expressionist is thus trying to find ways by which he may overcome the poverty of his ordinary life. Unhappily, his ways are illusory because he has cut himself off from real life. His art suffers in consequence. He is in no relation to art, if he cannot give to his own sufferings the larger significance of universal suffering, and so long as he is unable to anticipate either perceptually or symbolically a universally valid method by which this suffering can be overcome. If his work is merely his "psychical discharge," he must be unintelligible. At present the expressionist has not come to grips with life; his egotism has withdrawn him from the world. When he joins issue with it he is an anarchist, as, when he forsakes it, he becomes demoralized. He must free himself first, or he will never be able to deliver others. However, there is a future for him. His breach with tradition, his powerful assertion of the validity of his inner compulsions, his daring demands for the satisfaction of his individual necessities will compel a fresh expression and bring about a new painting, a new sculpture, a new poetry which will deal with reality in a prophetic spirit and conquer it for man's enjoyment.

Pfister set out to give us the details of an interesting medical case; he finished by giving an exposition of art which is of far greater interest.

TEMPLE SCOTT

Thomas Hardy's Tristram

The Famous Tragedy of the Queen of Cornwall at Tintagel in Lyonesse. A New Version of an Old Story. Arranged as a Play for Mimmers. In One Act. Requiring no Theatre or Scenery. By Thomas Hardy. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

IT is altogether characteristic of Mr. Hardy that he should have settled upon the Tristram legend because it was a local one. The man whose mind for sixty years or more has searched the soil of Wessex as the roots of an ancient yew tree thread the ground had only to look a little further west to find the setting of an imperishable story. Mr. Hardy does not say how long it is since he first visited the rocky headlands of Tintagel, but judging by the dedication here, to "those with whom I formerly spent many hours at the scene of the tradition," it must be many years—perhaps as many as were required, on another portion of the English coast, to convince him that he wanted to treat the legend of Napoleon's invasion. The result in the latter case was "The Dynasts." "The Famous Tragedy" is by comparison a very slight poem, but it is distinguished by beauty and intensity, and the volume in which it now appears would be worth having if only for the two drawings by the author that are reproduced—one an "imaginary view of Tintagel Castle at the time of the tragedy," reconstructing from the ruins now there the bleak Saxon walls and towers rising above the bleak sea, and the other an "imaginary aspect of the Great Hall at the time of the tragedy," with a wide arch at the further end "through which the Atlantic is visible across an outer ward and over the ramparts of the stronghold."

Either by choice or from the exigencies of his form, Mr. Hardy has compressed his action within the walls of a single room and within the limits of less than an hour's time; he has selected a moment at the end of his story when it was possible, after reviewing the long past of Tristram and Iseult, to bring their lives suddenly to catastrophe. King Mark, here a vicious and treacherous cuckold, has prematurely returned from the hunt in the hope of surprising his queen with Tristram. He finds her alone, but it is disclosed that during his absence she voyaged to Brittany, was met at the shore by Iseult the White Handed with false news of Tristram's death, and only now has made her sorrowful way back to Cornwall:

"And the seas sloped like house roofs all the way."

While the King feasts in an adjoining hall, Tristram comes, disguised as an old minstrel, having sped from Brittany at the moment he heard that Iseult had been there. The lovers have hardly more than greeted each other when another sail is sighted on the sea and Iseult the White Handed, closely pursuing Tristram, arrives to plead for his return. At sight of the first Iseult she faints and is carried off. King Mark enters behind Tristram and stabs him; Iseult stabs Mark and runs to throw herself into the sea; Iseult the White Handed is left alone to mourn.

The story is thus reduced almost to its bones, but it is not bare. Behind these hoarse and halting verses there is true harmony, and beneath this wintry exterior there is passion. "The Famous Tragedy," like all of Hardy's poems, sticks in the mind; less fluent than Swinburne's version, or Arnold's, it is equally authentic, and its concentration is perfectly in the temper of its time.

MARK VAN DOREN

Zion's Best Seller

The New Testament. An American Translation. By Edgar J. Goodspeed. University of Chicago Press. $3.

The Riverside New Testament. Translated by William G. Ballantine. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

The Acts of the Apostles. Introduction and commentary by A. W. F. Blunt. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

THIS season there is almost a plethora of "popular yet scientific" studies of Jesus and translations of the Gospels. Perhaps we are experiencing another of those heavily press-agented religious revivals—this time, however, one manifesting itself not in spook-chasing or Larger Life living, but in more or less wholesome curiosity as to the life and teaching of that young Jew who was crucified on Golgotha. Or perhaps the appearance of these new studies and versions so close upon each other's heels is but a coincidence. Certainly this great demand the translators have discovered for a New Testament in modern language and format is not a new and unprecedented thing; Wyclif must have sensed it already several centuries ago. People have always cried for a presentation of the Holy Writ that might show it to be the incomparably beautiful, transcendently illumined, and inevitably commanding document that tradition has made it out to be.

Both Mr. Goodspeed and Mr. Ballantine have tried valiantly to answer that cry, and if they have failed, it is only to the degree that all men must fail when they essay the almost impossible. The greatness, the utterly peerless majesty, of the Scriptures has become with most of us too exaggerated a legend ever to be quite validated by reality. So it is highly doubtful whether these new versions, despite the contemporaneity of their language and the attractiveness of their bookmaking, will do much to stimulate the sluggish recourse of this perverse generation to the Gospels. To be sure, a rippling breeze of enthusiasm may sweep through the women's clubs, and many good souls who always looked on the New Testament as a gray old thing to be shunned as one shuns a blue-nosed bore, will now discover it to be an amazingly quick and moving document, occasionally dull, often repetitious, but most of the time as "compelling" as any contemporary novel. But one must be a sanguine soul indeed to look for more.

That, however, does not alter the quality of either Mr. Goodspeed's or Mr. Ballantine's efforts. Both have produced admirable translations that are certain to intrigue even if they will not overwhelm those who regard the New Testament as holy but unreadable. Of the two, probably Mr. Goodspeed's version will be the more popular, not merely because it has been far better advertised, but also because it is the more daring in its modernisms. In it the penny of the King James Version and the shilling of Mr. Ballantine's translation rise in value and become a whole dollar—which is rather like calling a spade a steamshovel. Galatians, 5:7, "Ye did run well" according to the Authorized version, is translated "You were running finely" in the Riverside, and "You were making such progress!" in the Chicago publication. In like order, the "Holy Ghost" becomes the "Holy Spirit," and finally the "holy Spirit." It is characteristic that Mr. Ballantine should relapse again and again into the pleasant "thee-thou" of the mellower translations, and that Mr. Goodspeed should very rigorously adhere to our modern "you." But both in like measure commit the egregious error of retranslating the Lord's Prayer, and with an awkwardness well-nigh unforgivable. Save for this, however, both translators show exemplary taste and intelligence in their renditions. If either of them should, under the auspices of the Society of Gideons, do for the Old Testament what he has already done for the New, it is possible that the ubiquitous hotel-room Bible might henceforth be used for more than a paper-weight.

Mr. Blunt's little volume on Acts is part of the already familiar Clarendon Bible, edited by the Bishops of Newcastle and Ripon; and its virtues and faults are very much those of the other volumes in the series. The editors are "conscious of a growing demand" for a new presentation of the Scriptures—not a new translation, but a new interpretation. Accordingly they present this series of studies in which the notes and comments are based on free critical investigation—with reservations. It is characteristic of most Christian scholars that these reservations become more pronounced when they deal with the New Testament, and the author of this study of Acts is no exception. He swallows the miracles almost without a grimace, assuring the reader that the author of Acts is a "serious historian who . . . used his sources with honesty and judgment," and is therefore presumed to be deserving of credence! People with a thirst for Scriptural understanding but without the stamina to take it "straight" will be amply pleased with Mr. Blunt's work. It is well and copiously illustrated, intelligible in its presentation, and excellently put together.

LEWIS BROWNE

The Book of Judith

The Sun Field. By Heywood Broun. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

HEWWOOD BROUN is too good a columnist to be a successful novelist: the column is his destined medium of expression, not merely a form in which he has done much work. In the column he functions as naturally as Paul Morphy functioned over the chess board; his novels are studied attempts. Without ever losing the virtues that make his column delightful, he fails to transform himself into a novelist.

Six days in the week it is Heywood Broun's business to express his opinions, to project his own personality: affirmations and dissent are his means of life and the breath of it. For him observation without comment is impossible. And the comment must always be edged or softened by humor. Life does not furnish him with material for literary creation so much as with subjects for argument. He has no time to climb above the conflict, he must forever be doing genial battle. He encounters new books, birth control, censorship, patriotism, girl scouts—and each encounter results in the formation of opinion. These opinions take shape quickly: they are subject to equally quick revision. So Heywood Broun comes to the novel with habits of mind that are not those of the true novelist. He is not concerned with creation for its own sake: character interests him only in so far as it offers him spokesmen or opponents, or butts for his playful humor; plot interests him only in so far as it furnishes situations for the illustration of his opinions and the exercise of his humor; description interests him scarcely at all but for its humorous possibilities; and dialogue, when it is not at the service of belief or doubt, serves too as the vehicle of fun. The traditional Four Elements of the novel are thus used by Broun in precisely the way in which we should expect a columnist to use them; and something less than a novel (in the best senses of that vague word) results.

But what does result is exceedingly entertaining; and having denied "The Sun Field" the title of novel, I am ready to state that I enjoyed it thoroughly. The enjoyment was similar to that furnished by Broun's best columns, with something added. For this additional something, one character is almost wholly responsible. Judith justifies Heywood Broun's second excursion into fiction: she is priceless.

Judith is the dauntlessly determined, intellectual, emancipated woman whose every reaction is in impeccable accord with the latest cant of the anti-canters; she is an intolerant champion of personal liberty, a self-expresser, and a Lucy Stoner. She was one of the earliest users of the phrase "inferiority complex," and she was one of the first to discover the knack of liking the wrong things for the right reasons. Beautiful and profane, she is brutal in the utterance of her convictions; and she was born to be a passionate victim of the latest hokum. A suffragist before the war, she joined the Y.W.C.A. during

PIONEERS IN SHIPPING

LIEBESGABEN (Relief Shipments)

STARVATION IS TERRIBLE

Your Order, be it ever so small, will give some relief

Make Up Your Own Combinations

in accordance with the special wishes and requirements of your relatives and friends abroad.

Our Warehouse in Hamburg Assures Quick Service

In Case of Loss, we Duplicate the Shipment at Once

Ask for our Price List G & CHR

All Orders and Shipments Delivered FREE HOUSE!

ONE OF MANY ASSORTMENTS

$20.00
OUR OLD HAPAG
$20.00

24 lbs. Flour	1 lb. Cocoa	5 lbs. Lard
10 lbs. Rice	1 pkg. Tea	5 lbs. Breakfast
10 lbs. Sugar	6 tins Con. Milk	Bacon
5 lbs. Farina	6 tins Evap. Milk	5 lbs. Cervelat Wurst
5 lbs. Dried Fruits	1 qt. Salad Oil	2 tins Corned Beef
5 lbs. Coffee	2 lbs. Crisco, 1 lb. tins	50 Bouillon Cubes

SELF-PACKED PACKAGES

are FORWARDED WEEKLY and at rates commensurate with efficient service.

American Merchants Shipping & Forwarding Co.

H. von Schuckmann C. E. W. Schelling

30 Years' Shipping Experience with Hamburg-American Line

OFFICES: 147 4th Ave., cor. 14th St., New York City

HAMBURG OFFICE—KLEINE ROSENSTRASSE 16

The Twilight of Democracy?

Several European countries have lately set up dictatorships: Germany, Italy, Russia, Spain.

Elsewhere this anti-liberal spirit shows itself in attempted curtailment of freedom of speech and the abrogation of full civil rights, if not by governments, then by minority groups.

The Manchester Guardian

WEEKLY

enables the thinking American to understand in its full significance the present wave of anti-democratic spirit passing over nations.

Its news columns give facts without fear or bias. Its special correspondence from foreign capitals is not only brilliant but also reliable. Its editorial comment is always fearless.

In more than sixty countries men of intelligence read THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY to keep their knowledge of the world in repair and are thereby enabled to form for themselves a balanced judgment on the course of present day affairs.

MAIL COUPON BELOW

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England, commencing with the current issue.

Name

Address

the scrimmage, and became a practicing pacifist the day following the armistice. After issuing a counter-blast to Wilson's Fourteen Points, she took up Sherwood Anderson. "She said that he was the only man in America who brought authentic passion into fiction." And—this being the situation on which the comedy of "The Sun Field" rests—she married Tiny Tyler, home-run king of the American League. In aesthetic moments she explained this action by saying that the line of his arm and shoulder when he threw to home was finer than any thing in Greek sculpture; while in less aesthetic mood she made it clear that, having failed to persuade him to seduce her, she married him for "lust." (Just the word Judith would use with gusto.)

Whatever her reasons, and her honesty seems patent, her marriage furnishes Broun with material for decidedly amusing comedy. Synopsis would be superfluous here, and it is even unnecessary to consider the character of Tiny, since he exists as the absolute antithesis of Judith; but it may be mentioned that the "big scene" is that in which Judith refuses to be respected or to be a good influence to any man, whereat Tyler screams hysterically: "Don't ride me any more. I'll do what I want. I will respect you. You're not like the rest. God damn you! I do respect you."

On the jacket of this book the publishers have murmured something about its being "a novel of modern marriage and some of its problems." It is scarcely that. Whatever generalizations regarding marriage it may contain, and there are many, the case presented is too obviously selected and framed with comic intent to serve as support for them. "The Sun Field" is the book of Judith. It has been considered a roman à clef; but in the case of the heroine, at least, it would be a waste of time to attempt identification: there are so many Judiths about, however much each one may think herself unique.

BEN RAY REDMAN

Books in Brief

Horatio's Story. By Gordon King. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Here is a smooth and tranquil novel, done with an easy and competent grasp of its materials, and suggesting that the author—when he gets hold of a story which will kindle his talent into a brighter flame—may do work of considerable value. As it stands, "Horatio's Story" has about it too much of the academic lumber which makes good scaffolding, but needs to be cleared away when the structure is complete. This is a metaphoric hint to the effect that the book is occasionally dull.

The Cheerful Giver. By Samuel McChord Crothers. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

Dr. Crothers still stands with reluctant feet where the Victorian and the modern meet, valiantly trying to inveigle the modern into Victorian reticences. The fact that he has not succeeded has not disheartened him; he continues to pour the oil of his urbanity upon the waves of an incomprehensible discontent. The things which chiefly delight him are indicated by the titles of certain of his most recent essays—"The Literary Tastes of My Great-Grandmother," "History for the Ageing," "The Leisureable Hours of John Wesley."

The Wallet of Kai Lung. By Ernest Bramah. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

The measure of one's delight in such a narrative as this is on the basis of one's fondness for humor which is deliberate, satire which is philosophic, and action which is aloof. There is a great deal of color in this story—and an equal apportionment of Oriental calm. If these elements coincide with one's temperament, Ernest Bramah will be quite to the taste; otherwise he is inclined to be insidiously soporific.

Tut, Tut! Mr. Tutt. By Arthur Train. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

Mr. Train, himself a practicing attorney in the Court of General Sessions and elsewhere, has invented as a sort of alter ego a quizzical old lawyer, Mr. Tutt, who is out to see justice done and who is convinced of the ultimate triumph of honesty and good intention over the crooked and greedy.

The Soul of the City. An Urban Anthology. Compiled by Garland Greever and Joseph M. Bachelor. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.75.

"When a man is tired of London," said Dr. Johnson, "he is tired of life." The compilers of this excellent anthology, fortified not only by Dr. Johnson but by the fact that everybody today is going to town to stay, have endeavored to collect the best verse in English which cities have inspired, in the hope of vindicating the unpastoral. The endeavor is significant as emphasizing the trend in contemporary literature away from country sentiment, but it is too bad that there is so much city sentiment here—so much Charles Hanson Towne, for instance—and so little of the wit which cities alone can generate. In the poetry of the age of Anne there was a mine of material from which to select—there was Gay's Trivia, the best of all poems on streets—but only Pope's City Mouse and Country Mouse is given. Yet no anthology is complete, and this one does what all good ones do: it stimulates the reader to complete it for himself.

Drama Christmas Rush

IN the week between Christmas Day and New Year's Day there were fourteen new offerings in the New York theaters. The audiences in the playhouses were not very large. Life was in the streets and shops. In truth the mimic world of the stage seemed a little forlorn as one came to it from the vivid crowds in the daylight. Why do the managers rush with these productions? They are probably not quite clear as to their reasons. Nothing in the theater is quite clear. The life there is intense, wavering, explosive.

It is evident that no one can see fourteen plays in the six evenings of a working week. I dropped the revival of Maeterlinck's "Bluebird." There remains nothing to say of that harmless work today. I dropped two musical shows, the one by Mr. George M. Cohan not without regret; I postponed seeing a play by Mr. Percy MacKaye at the Neighborhood Playhouse. My relations with the works of this immensely earnest writer have always been a source of discomfort to me. I have a deep conviction that I should at least respect them. I do—at a distance. Brought face to face with any of them a blankness comes over me, a vague and fearful astonishment that so much aspiration, knowledge, earnestness, nobility of intention can wrest from words no fire, magic, memorableness.

I turned to humbler things. Not to "Hurricane." It is a play by Mme Olga Petrova, starring Mme Petrova. That she is an emotional actress of striking ability I do not deny. But the plays she writes for herself are not plays; they are like her gowns—quite too terribly stunning. At the very end of this week came Bernard Shaw's "Saint Joan," which shall be fully discussed hereafter. In the meantime the worthiest offerings of these mad days seem to me to be two American comedies: Anne Morrison's "The Wild Westcotts" (Frazee Theater) and Leon Cunningham's "Neighbors" (Forty-eighth Street Theater).

Both of these comedies stop rather than end and are therefore imperfect in point of structure, which is the logic of art. But anyone who remembers the ending of, say, "Le Tartuffe" will not, on this account, quarrel very bitterly with either Miss Morrison or Mr. Cunningham. What both authors have done is to turn a keen, serious, searching eye upon the substance of American life and apply to it the high-spirited yet intellectually quite clear and honest criticism which sound comedy requires.

How rare this is only an habitual attendant of our theater can know. American comedy and American farce have hitherto in the great majority of cases avoided the function of comedy by removing both substance and treatment from the field of experience and nature into one of almost pure artifice. Miss Morrison's quarreling brothers and sisters, half-heartedly bullying father and helpless mother are immensely real, immensely concrete and representative at once, and she has given these people an idiom that falls with unmistakable veracity upon any American ear. She has written a very merry comedy in which especially Mr. Elliot Nugent and Miss Vivian Martin emphasize fine points finely and treat the broader strokes discreetly. She has also offered the attentive spectator the implied background of her comedy. What arouses our laughter and justly arouses it was acrid and painful in life. The house of the Westcotts was really a terrible one. Only, we view it in a mood of gay irony.

This method, which is the method of all good comedy except the intentionally quite artificial or polite, is admirably carried out by Mr. Cunningham. He really views these bickering small-town neighbors, these chromo-lithograph sentimentalists with the insight and severity of vision with which Sinclair Lewis views the people of Gopher Prairie and Zenith. We laugh with Mr. Cunningham at the Hickses and the Stones and the Rev. Mr. Tulliver. And in that community in laughter there is a community of vision, criticism, aim, and ideal which made the admirable Equity production of "Neighbors" one of the most agreeable as well as one of the most intelligent experiences of the entire season. Mr. Cunningham, in addition, having now added the authorship of "Neighbors" to that of "Hospitality" may be considered as an important member of that very small group of playwrights who are fighting for a genuinely native American drama against many and heavy odds.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents
FAY Bainter in
"THE OTHER ROSE"
with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 45th Street
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

BELMONT 48th St. East of Broadway
TARNISH Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30
"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."—Ludwig Lewisohn, THE NATION.
"Mr. Emery writes with a command of the English language, which is not given to any other native playwright, not even excepting Eugene O'Neill."—Haywood Brown, WORLD.

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!
DAVID BELASCO Presents
LIONEL BARRYMORE
with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Eves. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Theatre, 41st St., West of Broadway, Evenings 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

"Miss Vollmer's presentation of folk life is rich and authentic; she tells us what we are most eager to know—the inner truth of human lives."
Ludwig Lewisohn—THE NATION
THE SHAME WOMAN
An American Drama by LULA VOLLMER
Produced by THE INDEPENDENT THEATRE, Inc.
COMEDY THEATRE 41st St. E. of Bway. Matinees Thurs. and Sat. at 2:30. Evenings at 8:30

YIDDISH ART THEATRE 27th St. and Madison Ave.
MAURICE SWARTZ, Director
Now Playing
Friday evening, 8:30; Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30
Osip Dymow's new comedy of American life
"BREAD"

AMBASSADOR 49th, W. of Bway. Eves. 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
RICHARD BENNETT in
THE DANCERS
"I have not seen a better play than 'The Dancers' for a long while."
—JOHN BARRYMORE.

Opening Wed. Eve., Dec. 26
New American Comedy
By PERCY MACKAYE
FINE PRETTY WORLD
Every eve. (except Mon.) at 8:30.
Mat. Sat. 2:30
Orch., $1.50-$2. Bal., $1.
Phone Dry Dock 7516

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL

239 East 14th Street, New York

Course	Teacher	Day	P.M.	Period	Fee
1. Health and Life	Dr. B. Liber	Mon.	8:30	1/7 - 3/10	None
13. The Social Problem Today	Mr. Bruce Biven	Tues.	8:30	1/8 - 2/5	$1.50
14. The Evolution of Violin Music	Mr. D. Sapiro and Mr. Max'n Rose	Tues.	8:30	2/12-3/11	2.00
15. Social Psychology	Dr. Will Durant	Wed.	7:15	1/9 - 2/6	1.50
16. Russian Literature since 1900	Mr. John Varney	Thurs.	7:30	1/10-2/7	1.50
17. Practical Sociology	Mr. Jerome Davis	Thurs.	7:30	2/14-3/13	1.50
18. Studies in Literature and Art	Mr. J. C. Powys	Thurs.	8:30	1/10-2/8	1.50
19. Recent Advances in Medical Science	Dr. A. Stone	Thurs.	8:30	2/14-3/13	1.50
20. The Development of Civilization	Prof. Alex. Goldenweiser	Tues.	7:30	1/8 - 3/11	3.00
21. Classic Civilization	Mr. Spencer Miller, Jr.	Fri.	8:30	1/11-2/8	1.50
22. The Social Problem in Ancient Israel	Prof. L. B. Paton	Sun.	5:00	2/24-3/16	25c
12. Music and Literature, 1789-1923	Dr. Will Durant	Sun.	5:00	1/6 - 6/22	25c
6. Science and Philosophy, 1789-1923	Dr. Will Durant	Wed.	8:30	1/9 - 6/25	25c

Feb. 4, 8:30 p.m., Labor Temple Auditorium: Dr. Liber on "Fake Doctors." Admission 35c.

Jan. 28, 7 p. m., at the Aldine Club, 200 Fifth Avenue, Annual Dinner of Labor Temple School

Speakers: Prof. Morris R. Cohen, Dr. Percy Stickney Grant, Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Rev. Edmund B. Chaffee, Dr. Will Durant.

Tickets $2.00. Reservations should be mailed before Jan. 26 to 239 East 14th Street.

International Relations Section

Arizona Backs Obregon

THE reverberations of civil war and revolutionary uprisings in Mexico are almost always felt across the border, but too often they have taken the form of support to the forces of reaction. An instance of this has been the long incarceration in Texas of five Mexican revolutionaries mentioned in another column of this issue. It is interesting, therefore, to see that Governor Hunt, of Arizona, in the proclamation printed below, calls for an end to the traffic in arms across the border and at the same time announces his support of President Obregon and the progressive group now in control of the destinies of Mexico.

A PROCLAMATION

WHEREAS, The Republic of Mexico for nearly ten years was torn with civil strife, thousands of her citizens were killed, countless persons wounded, the women of the country suffered untold hardships, many thousands of children grew to maturity without an opportunity to obtain an education; and

WHEREAS, During the past few years, under the administration of President Obregon, Mexico has been on a peaceful basis, her Government has been recognized by the nations of the world, her business has revived, the country has begun to prosper and her citizens are enjoying the fruits of peace; and

WHEREAS, A candidate for the presidency of Mexico has again undertaken to resort to civil warfare in an effort to overthrow the present Government; and

WHEREAS, The people of Arizona, while maintaining a strict neutrality in the affairs of the Mexican Government, yet sympathize with the efforts of the Government to maintain peace in order that her people may live in safety; and

WHEREAS, There is reason to believe that arms, ammunition, and munitions of war are being purchased in Arizona for use in Mexico; and

WHEREAS, While our people have the legal and moral right to carry on commerce with whoever solicits it, yet under the existing circumstances I believe that the people of Arizona can best serve the people of Mexico, the people of the world, and the interests of our own State by refusing to traffic in munitions of war;

NOW, THEREFORE, I, GEORGE W. P. HUNT, Governor of Arizona, do urgently recommend that the business men and merchants of the State of Arizona decline to accept and fill orders for munitions of war and that they in particular decline to sell such munitions of war to aliens.

And I do further call upon the sheriffs of the various counties and the peace officers throughout the cities and towns of this State to rigorously enforce all existing laws with respect to the possession of arms and ammunition.

And I do further call upon the peace officers of Arizona to particularly observe the movements of the aliens throughout the State of Arizona, and that if they find any aliens who have entered the State of Arizona except in accordance with the immigration laws of the United States, they be immediately arrested and detained for investigation by the authorities of the United States immigration service.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Great Seal of the State of Arizona to be affixed.

Done at Phoenix, the capital, this 18th day of December, A.D., 1923.

(Great Seal)

Attest:

JAMES H. KERBY,

Secretary of State

GEORGE W. P. HUNT,
Governor of Arizona

France Dips into Polish Oil

AT the end of October the Paris Temps brought a special article on oil, announcing that a national oil office was about to be set up in Paris. That new department was to be "the pivot of our national oil policy." It was to keep watch over French interests and the chance of developing them in the various oil-producing countries, Poland and Rumania figuring prominently in the list.

About the same time the Kurier Polski published the text of an oil convention that had just been signed by France and Poland. The document, which we reproduce below, is unique of its kind. It is doubtful whether such a hard bargain has ever been driven between two independent states at peace with one another. It could only be compared to the abortive oil convention which Germany imposed upon Rumania, broken and helpless, together with the peace of Bucharest, in the spring of 1918.

The present arrangement speaks for itself. One need only point out some of the obvious developments to which it opens the way: (1) The privileges accorded to French capital will make it master of the Polish oil industry. No other foreign capital could compete with it, and Polish capital is non-existent. French capital already controls not much less than half of the Polish oil holdings, but it is clear that Polish concerns in which French capital is in a minority will hasten to allow it a major interest, in order to be brought under the gold-lined wings of the present convention. (2) Russian, Rumanian, etc., oil concerns will have to bear all the taxes in force in their respective countries; they will have to suffer restrictions on export, and they will have to sell internally at a controlled price, which as often as not means a net loss; they will have to suffer the official control of their rolling stock, which is almost general in Central and Eastern Europe; and almost everywhere they already have to pay their export duties in gold values. For all these reasons, and other things being equal, they will hardly be able to compete with the French-owned Polish oil in the markets of Europe. Unless demand is ample, they may as a consequence have to swallow some arrangement dictated from Paris. (3) As it depends on the good pleasure of the French Government whether this or that French oil concern will be included in the list of those benefiting by the convention, all the French oil holdings have practically been brought under official control. It is not unfair to say further that this gives the French Government practical control of the Polish oil industry. (4) By the various financial provisions of the convention the Polish Government has surrendered a very considerable direct source of revenue. It has also surrendered its main card for bargaining with the much-needed foreign capital and for securing it under the better terms of fair competition. It has also surrendered sovereign fiscal rights, as well as sovereign administrative rights. The Polish oil industry has become a state in the state—a French state in the Polish state. That will be so, says Article 9, as long as Poland needs the French alliance.

One more word concerning Rumania. Not long ago a member of the French Senate, M. Bérenger, undertook a semi-official journey through the countries of Southeastern Europe. His mission, it was stated, was to find out whether those countries deserved by the general security which they could offer the financial help which France was anxious to give them. It is now reported from Bucharest that he submitted to the Rumanian Government "the draft of an oil convention, containing probably preferential rights for French capital in the sense of the convention concluded by France with Poland" (Bucharest Argus). But the Rumanian authorities would not entertain such an arrangement. Nevertheless, a different sort of agreement has been negotiated and is about to be signed in Paris. A French combine, led by the French Government, is to advance to the Rumanian Government five hundred million francs, effective, while in return the Rumanian Government will abandon to the said combine for a number of ten or more years, according to the price, all the quantities of petrol and oil which it is entitled to receive from various Rumanian concerns. It is said that in the last two years the Rumanian Government has taken over only small quantities of such quotas due to it, and that in consequence it can dispose straightway over some 4,000 wagons.

Read in the light of the convention with Poland this arrangement discloses what a power French capital is about to become in the European oil market. As the French Government is taking an active share in these developments, their object can hardly be solely commercial. Is there any connection between them and the stand made by France at the Washington Conference for a large fleet of submarines? The text of the convention concluded by Poland with France as published in the Kurier Polski concerning the status of those Polish oil companies which work altogether or in the main with French capital is as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The provisions of this convention concern those companies and undertakings which have been recognized, by common agreement, by the Polish and French governments. The French Government will supply the Polish Government with a list of those French companies and undertakings which are also to enjoy the benefits of this agreement. Subsequent changes in that list shall not be made without a preliminary understanding between the two governments.

ART. 2. The companies and undertakings covered by this convention shall be free to export oil and oil derivatives. The Polish Government, however, reserves to itself the right to fix the quantities of oil and oil derivatives needed for internal consumption each year. In such a case eventual restrictions will apply equally to all companies and undertakings. Should the Polish Government find it necessary to fix maximal prices for the oil and oil derivatives destined to be consumed in the country, then the prices shall be fixed in such a manner as to secure as far as possible normal profits to oil producers and refiners. The quantities reserved for internal needs and not claimed shall be declared free for export.

ART. 3. Export taxes on oil and derivatives shall not exceed 40 per cent of the difference between the export price, loco Prohobycz, and the home price calculated on the average of the last three months. Export duties on oil and derivatives must in no case become an obstacle to the free development of the industry in Poland. Similarly no duties may be imposed which would limit normal profits. Export duties are payable in Polish currency.

ART. 4. Within three months from ratification of this convention the Polish Government will return to the companies and undertakings covered by this convention all the rolling stock belonging to them. The rolling stock brought by the companies, or built by them in Poland, will remain at their disposal. All that rolling stock may be employed by the companies at home or abroad. Arrangements concerning freights will be settled in a special convention.

ART. 5. The companies and undertakings covered by this convention will be free to carry out transactions in foreign currencies for the payment of dividends (shares, bonds, participations) and the legal writing off of capital, as well as for the payment of goods purchased abroad. They will not be required to make deposits in foreign exchanges for sales made abroad.

ART. 6. The companies and undertakings covered by this convention will enjoy with regard to taxes, duties, and subscriptions to eventual forced loans the same privileges as other branches of the great Polish industries; which does not exclude the right of the Polish Government to accord subventions or reductions to certain industries which cannot be run profitably. In order to attract French capital to cooperate in the Polish oil industry, and in view of the advantages accorded by the French Government to Poland in various conventions, the Polish Government will exempt in future the companies and undertakings covered by this convention from levies on capital or from eventual forced loans, to which reference was made in the first paragraph of this article.

ART. 7. The Polish Government will favor the construction and the usage of pipe lines for oil or petrol when this should be required by the companies and undertakings covered by this convention. The conditions of such concessions shall be determined by common agreement with the respective Polish department of state.

ART. 8. Should the Polish Government set up an oil council, the companies and undertakings covered by this convention shall be invited to participate in that council in proportion to their importance.

ART. 9. This convention will remain in force until the expiration of the Franco-Polish political convention of February 19, 1921. But this convention shall be revised every ten years, in order to take account of changed conditions in the oil industry. After the ratification of this convention the instruments of ratification shall be exchanged as soon as possible at Paris.

The Task Facing the Friends

IN our issue of December 12 we published a report of the reconstruction work of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in Russia. In order to present a picture of the different agencies of relief in that region we asked the American Friends Service Committee for a summary of their activities. The carefully drawn reply, printed below, gives a survey of their past work not only in Russia but elsewhere in Europe, and a description of the task of emergency relief facing the organization in Germany. The desperate conditions in that country make the statement of utmost immediate interest to everyone.

When the war came in 1914 it presented a challenge and a call to all true Friends—a challenge to keep their hearts free from the forces of hate which surged around them and a call to combat those forces of hate with a force more powerful still—the force of love. The American Friends Service Committee embodies the joint answer of Quakers in this country to that call. It was natural that the first work of the committee should be in France; for of all the countries where it was possible to go during the war years, the need there probably was greatest. At one time there were as many as 363 American workers in France.

With the armistice came the possibility of going into other countries—where the need had become greater than it was in France. Two of the first countries entered were Poland and Austria. There are still missions in these countries, but the character of the work has changed. It is no longer relief, but reconstruction work which is being done. The American Friends Service Committee is trying to help these people to solve some of the problems which the war and peace have left and with which they are too poor to cope unaided. In Poland it is helping those refugees who have no horses and are still living in wet dugouts to haul timber for their new homes. It is also starting a model orphanage and training school for the superintendents of children's homes; for one of the biggest problems in Poland today is that presented by the 300,000 orphan waifs. The biggest work in Austria is the starting of a three years' educational campaign against tuberculosis. This disease has spread rapidly among the weakened population.

In Russia, English and American Quakers fed as many as 403,500 people at one time in the famine year. The workers realized, as every one who considered the situation thoughtfully realized, that the need in Russia would not cease with the famine itself. It was evident that the Russian people—impoverished by wars external and internal and then weakened still further by the famine—would not be able to cope with the problems that famine leaves in its train. The mission has stayed to help them solve these problems.

As in Poland, one of the greatest problems is that of the orphans, this time numbering 5,000,000. The mission is helping the children's homes in its part of the famine area—a district twice the size of Indiana. Another problem is that of the horses, more than 75 per cent of which died or were used for food during the famine. The mission has established a revolving fund of $25,000 to buy Siberian horses. These horses are sold to the peasants at cost price, about $24. When they are unable to pay cash they are allowed to pay in services to the community. It has already sold 2,000 horses, but it is estimated that 100,000 are needed in the district.

A third problem is the spread of disease among the terribly weakened population. Dr. Elfie Graff, with the cooperation of the Russian medical authorities, has worked out an extensive medical program which includes the aiding of the best existing institutions which are crippled for lack of funds, the opening of fresh ones, and an extensive educational campaign. But up to the present time all other medical work has been swamped by the fight against malaria, which has affected over 70 per cent of the population and rendered many of the peasants incapable of harvesting their crops. The two clinics which had already been established in Buzuluk and Sorochinskoye have treated over 30,000 patients; and the mission is now working hard opening fresh centers in the remote villages where the sick have been unable to get any treatment at all. The program in Russia this year calls for $225,000 and will be the second largest task during the winter.

And that brings us naturally to another opportunity—equally great. For the biggest work this winter will be in Germany. Here the American Friends Service Committee is to administer the funds that General Allen's Committee will raise for the child feeding. We hope and believe that this sum will be sufficient to feed at least two million children; for already, according to medical examinations, far more than that number are in want and the need is growing daily. Two cables recently received from Quaker workers in Germany will help to form a picture of conditions:

"Berlin, November 7, 1923

"The past two weeks have brought the actual need to the surface in a way that one perhaps did not think possible. It has driven hundreds and probably thousands into the streets to beg. One sees that they did not come out until the pangs of hunger and the fear in the solitude of their four walls became unbearable. Help to get as much money and food over here as possible and to get whatever is available here as quickly as possible.

"GILBERT MACMASTERS, ("Head of the German Mission)."

"ESSEN, December 3, 1923

"Immediate dire need. Industrial understanding unattained. Half Rhineland without work. Gelsenkirchen, hundred ninety thousand population only two thousand working. Unemploy-

2000 years ago Jesus taught men how to live

The war, and the events of the post-war period have shown that men do not know how to live. Secret diplomacy, intrigue, lies, selfishness, hate, fear, have almost overthrown civilization and destroyed faith in God and man.

The Religious Society of Friends (Quakers)

during and since the war have been proclaiming Jesus' message of forgiveness, love, goodwill and brotherhood to French, Germans, Austrians, Poles, Russians, Serbians and Mexicans. By cash contributions and gifts in kind thousands of other people with similar principles have had a share in giving this message.

In order to make this message effective now

$10,000,000. is needed for the feeding of starving German children.

$250,000. is needed for reconstruction work in Russia.

$55,000. is needed for work in Poland, Austria and France.

Make checks payable to

CHARLES F. JENKINS, Treasurer

Address

The American Friends Service Committee
20 South Twelfth Street
Philadelphia, Pa.

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

Rachmaninoff composing at his Steinway

ALONE, in his study, Sergei Rachmaninoff, greatest of living Russian pianists, becomes Rachmaninoff, the composer. Here, in this quiet room, are born the brilliant effects which distinguish his musical creations. And here, just as it is amid the glamor of the concert stage, his constant inspiration and companion is the Steinway. . . . Thus is written another golden chapter of Steinway history. . . . Since Richard Wagner dreamed to immortality at his Steinway, each generation of musicians has held this one piano in highest esteem. The Steinway was beloved of Rubinstein and Berlioz. It is the piano with which Paderewski rose to greatness. It is the choice of Hofmann, Friedman, Levitzki, Borovsky and Cortot. You who love the music of the masters, would you not choose for your companion the piano of the masters? To play an instrument as perfect as that which Paderewski plays! To hear, in your home, the tone that is the inspiration of Rachmaninoff! . . . To bring you this happiness four generations of the Steinway family have striven. It is for this that you may buy a Steinway miniature grand or upright which embodies every point of Steinway excellence. It is in your home that the greatest purpose of Steinway manufacture is fulfilled.

There is a Steinway dealer in your community or near you through whom you may purchase a new Steinway piano with a cash deposit of 10%, and the balance will be extended over a period of two years. Used pianos accepted in partial exchange.

Prices: $875 and up; plus freight

STEINWAY & SONS, Steinway Hall, 109 East Fourteenth Street, New York City

ment increased Essen 280 per cent past month. Prices now above world market. Dole family three children buys one small loaf daily. Known cases starvation middle classes. Rush relief.

ALFRED LOWRY."

All things considered the German situation is worse than any we have faced. A highly organized people have been brought face to face with conditions that a more primitive people might accept with stoicism. Starvation is bringing a sensitized people to the verge of anarchy. If the crash comes, the deaths from starvation will be one of the minor matters. The fury of minds gone mad will be most terrible. Food and friendship can save the situation.

As stated above, the committee has done what it could to help the French people in their time of trouble. Now by this service the peoples of both countries know that it goes—not as a lover of France or of Germany, but as a lover of mankind. For it is not food alone that the people of America need to send to the people of Germany: it is God's message of love. A German minister who had just come from the fatherland in a recent sermon told how all over the country in these dark days the people are crying: "Wo ist Gott?" and the strongest faith is being shaken as millions face slow starvation, disease, and death amid the indifference and even the antipathy of the Christian nations. It was terrible to hear that cry as he voiced it for a despairing people. America can not—it must not—fail them now in the time of their greatest need. It must minister to their physical need; and in the measure in which it does this will it minister also to that greater spiritual need.

It is a wonderful work that we are called to do—the saving of a nation, body and soul. It can be done only if all Americans of good-will get behind the American Committee for Relief of German Children now under the leadership of General Henry T. Allen and support in financially. The need is terrible—a people, stricken down and desperate, call to us to rescue them from physical and moral death. Will we answer that call?

Contributors to This Issue

MA SOO is the representative in the United States of the Canton Government.

LOUIS FISCHER, who wrote the article on the Russian Communist Party in last week's issue of The Nation, is in this country on a short visit. He will return to Russia in a few weeks.

SCOTT NEARING is a lecturer on economic subjects and a member of the teaching staff of the Rand School.

LEWIS BROWNE was rabbi of Temple Israel in Waterbury, Connecticut, until last March. He was forced to resign on account of his support of a public meeting at which Carlo Tresca was prevented by the police from appearing. At present he is engaged in newspaper work.

The Nation's Poetry Contest closed on January 1. Manuscripts received after that date will not be considered for the prize, which will be announced in the

Midwinter Book Number
February 13

STERLING PIANOS

Player Pianos and Reproducing Pianos which embody the quality of tone and construction that make them the choice of musicians and connoisseurs.

Sterling Piano Corporation
The STERLING PIANO CO. GUTH & CO., Inc.
31-37 Court Street, Brooklyn

FOOD TO EUROPE

Practical food-package assortments, ready at our Hamburg warehouse for prompt delivery to friends, relations, or any hungry communities or institutions you designate; prices range from $5 to $20.

We recommend our Metas Special: 24½ lbs. wheat flour, 10 lbs. sugar, 5 lbs. lard, 10 lbs. rice, 1 lb. each coffee, cocoa, tea, 2 lbs. farina, 10 tins milk, ½ qt. olive oil. Delivered free house for $10. To countries other than Germany add 10 per cent. Cable charges only 75 cents. (Just pin a $10 check to this advertisement and write the name of the recipient on the margin.)

METAS

Price List mailed on request

147 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

Practically immediate relief of pain follows a dose of

Midol

It is equally efficacious for

HEADACHE
TOOTHACHE NEURALGIA

—and in addition to being absolutely safe to take —it has no undesirable
after effects.

In aluminum boxes
2 sizes. At all druggists

General Drug Co.
94 N. Moore Street, New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1924

No. 3054

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	47
EDITORIALS:
Prussianism in Our Army.....	49
The Great Bok Humbug	50
The Tax Muddle	51
Arming the World	51
The Sail-Carriers	52
THE SHAME OF THE CHURCHES. By Algernon S. Crapsey.....	53
BRITISH LABOR FACES POWER. By Harold J. Laski.....	54
THESE UNITED STATES—XLIV. WYOMING: A MAVERICK CITIZENRY. By Walter C. Hawes	56
JOHNSON CHASES COOLIDGE. By William Hard.....	59
THE AERIAL ATTACK ON THE ARCTIC. By D. M. LeBourdais.....	60
FELIPE CARRILLO. By Ernest Gruening.....	61
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	62
CORRESPONDENCE	63
BOOKS:
Knowledge Rehumanized. By G. Stanley Hall	64
The Irrelevant Sixth Act. By J. W. Krutch	65
Evolution. By Beverly W. Kunkel.....	66
Stephen Crane. By Mark Van Doren.....	66
Now I Can Tell You. By Lewis Gannett.....	67
Vox Populi. By Gerald Hewes Carson.....	67
Books in Brief	67
Tea and Art. By Herbert J. Seligmann.....	68
DRAMA:
Mountain Comedy. By Carl Van Doren.....	68
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Japanese Massacres	70
An Anarchist Indictment	71
As Relentless as Its Policy in the Ruhr	71

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY
MANAGING EDITOR

IRITA VAN DOREN
LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE
ROBERT HERRICK

JOHN A. HOBSON
H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS
CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 35, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

"SENATOR BORAH ACHIEVED SOMETHING of an oratorical triumph in the Senate today," says the New York World's Washington correspondent. But if the reporters counted correctly, his must have been an easy victory. Henry Cabot Lodge read 36,000 words, including charts, quotations, and letters, to the bored galleries of the Senate, and Borah's fiery retort must have been a welcome relief. Senator Lodge, to judge by the 7,500 words dutifully quoted in the New York Commercial, conclusively proved that people in Moscow were watching events in the Western hemisphere. He read a learned dissertation upon American imperialism, including reference to "the continued military occupation of Haiti and Santo Domingo, the muzzling of Nicaragua, Panama, and Colombia, the loans to numerous South American states, the increasing economic exploitation of these countries, and the rising revolt in the Philippines." Indeed, the Moscow literature which he read was so much more sensible than most of the Communist papers which circulate freely through the United States mails that he led us to hope that Moscow really would keep the American Communists in leading-strings. But he did not even whisper a word about that famous document hoisting the red flag on the White House flagpole with which Secretary Hughes opened the campaign. Possibly even the secretary has discovered that the document was a palpable fake.

THERE IS A WIDE DIFFERENCE between the kind of international control which has been exercised or attempted in behalf of the League of Nations and that set up by the agreement in regard to Tangier signed by France, Great Britain, and Spain (the latter accepting the arrangement only tentatively for the present). Action by the League of Nations has been international, but it has been sadly lacking in control—the actual forces and therefore the eventual decisions have been in other hands. In Tangier, on the other hand, there promises to be plenty of control, but it will be only faintly international. The administration of Tangier has been mainly in international—that is, European—hands since the Treaty of Algeiras in 1906, but after the expulsion of Germany's representatives in 1914 affairs drifted more and more into French control. Apparently they are going to remain there, for in the elaborate international government now set up the Administrator (probably the real authority) is to be French. Great Britain, however, has gained at least a restatement of the international idea and a continuation of the open door for trade. Morocco illustrates the difficulties in the way of anything approaching true international control in a world dominated by nationalist and imperialist influences. The interests in Morocco of France, Great Britain, and Spain are all frankly imperialistic. Great Britain wants no rival to Gibraltar, France is building an African empire, and Spain is ridiculously clinging to the remnants of a once great world domain. The only human interests in the entire situation—those of the natives of Morocco—are likely to be forgotten or denied in the scramble of outsiders for trade, position, and power.

IT IS LUCKY FOR THE BRITISH administration in India that 40 out of the 143 members in the All-India Legislative Assembly are appointed by the Government and that 20 more seats are filled by special electorates of Europeans, landowners, and chambers of commerce. It is lucky because the remaining seats, except for 30 assigned to the Mohammedan community, were nearly all filled by the Swaraj Party, which went into the recent election determined to win, and then to throttle into inactivity the Legislative Assembly. Its victory is particularly striking because one wing of the party continued non-cooperation, refusing to vote. The anti-Government bloc has won some 40 seats of its own and becomes the largest single party; it can count on a dozen Independents and doubtless many of the Mohammedans to back it on important issues. In every provincial assembly the Swarajists form the largest party except in Madras and the United Provinces. In Bengal, where almost half the voters supported the home-rule candidates, Lord Lytton asked Mr. Das, the leader of the Swaraj Party, to form a ministry. As the Government well knew, this would have meant the beginning of responsibility and the end of opposition; and Mr. Das declined the honor. In most of the states then, and in the assembly for the whole of India, the Swaraj Party will form a group capable of bringing the legislative activities of the country to a stop. How will the Government of India face this problem? To meet the demands of the people will mean a capitulation of power as complete as that which the British spilled blood and honor to prevent in Ireland. Did they learn a lesson there that will show them the way of grace and decency in India?

WHEN PRESIDENT MASARYK of Czecho-Slovakia visited Paris a few months ago the French capital feted him, its own press reported, as it had feted no one since the Russian Czar sealed his alliance with the French republic two decades ago. We feared it marked the beginning of another great military alliance, and the fear has been confirmed. France and Czecho-Slovakia are henceforth brothers-in-arms; Czecho-Slovakia enters the Franco-Polish bloc. Mitteleuropa, as we have said before, is no longer a dream; French finance and French munitions have realized, under the tricolor of France, the dream of the Pan-Germans. Yugoslavia and Rumania are hesitating before joining the bloc—Rumania, as the London Economist reveals, because France demanded, in return for a "loan" of a billion francs, an exclusive interest in the state oil lands and 1 per cent royalties on all private oil production. The Royal Dutch, the Anglo-Persian, and the Cowdray oil interests, all primarily British, formed an alliance, opposed such concessions, and, for the time at least, won the day. Of such is twentieth-century diplomacy.

THE FRENCH ELECTION that will tell the temper of the country comes in April, when a new chamber of deputies will be elected. The senatorial elections recently completed are almost meaningless. The French Senate is not elected directly by the people, but indirectly by mixed bodies of municipal and departmental councilors and other officials. The same men voted this time as last time; no change was to be expected, and almost no change occurred.

REPRESENTATIVE JOHNSON of Washington fathers a new bill, one provision of which at least is not even defensible as an attempt to limit numerically the alien flow into this country; it is admittedly an effort to change the racial character of that current. Mr. Johnson proposes to use as a basis for his new quota regulation not the census of 1910, as at present, but the enumeration of 1890. The latter date is about the beginning of what is called the "new immigration"—in general that from Southern and Eastern Europe. Previous to 1890 our immigration was predominantly from Northern Europe, and the use of the census of that year is expressly designed to restrict future immigrants virtually to the so-called "superior races" of Teutonic, Scandinavian, and Anglo-Saxon countries. For instance, the quota of Italy, now 42,057, would be cut to 3,912; that of Poland from 21,076 to 5,156; that of Russia from 21,613 to 1,992. The Johnson scheme is not only bad science and poor justice; it is definite discrimination against Roman Catholics and Jews. The measure should not be called the Johnson bill, but the Ku Klux Klan bill.

WILLIAM PICKENS, field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, knows the facts about Negro education in the United States. In a recent letter to the New York Herald Mr. Pickens told some of those facts. His striking statement brought forth several answers, among them a letter from a lieutenant in the army expressing interest in Mr. Pickens's views on the race problem, and adding politely: "You speak like a white man, but you will pardon me for not knowing whether you are or not. I would like to know if you are one." Obviously Mr. Pickens was guilty of a grave deception in his original statement; he failed to mention whether he was Negro or white. How is a poor, earnest, aspiring lieutenant to know what opinion to listen to and what to discard, especially a lieutenant who solemnly inquires "If you do not believe in white supremacy, why don't you?" Mr. Pickens has answered this letter. He has implied that if the lieutenant cannot tell whether or not a man who writes like a white man is a white man, possibly it may not matter much. He has suggested that if white supremacy must rest on seeing the color of a man's skin and not on examining the product of his mind, it is a rather fictional supremacy. He has laid the lieutenant low, by all reason and logic; but can the lieutenant be sure he has been laid low? His mind may tell him so, but Mr. Pickens, despitefully and most maliciously, again fails to mention whether or not he is a white man. So the lieutenant is doubtless left hopelessly puzzled and distraught and without a clue to tell him if Mr. Pickens's remarks are worth listening to.

WHAT IS A MAN of moderate means? Daniel F. Cohalan has resigned as a justice of the New York Supreme Court on the ground that the salary of $17,500 a year is not enough on which to bring up a large family. He suggests that the salary be raised to an amount which will permit men of "moderate means" to become or remain judges. We quite agree with this principle, but is Justice Cohalan the possessor of moderate means or of immoderate notions of what constitute moderate means? We have too many public officers already living on a scale that removes them from the problems and associations of the men with whose affairs they are intrusted. The average income of factory workers in New York City is less than $1,500 a year, about a twelfth of that which Justice Cohalan scorns as not suitable for a man of moderate means. It seems as if there must be something wrong either with Justice Cohalan's logic or with the income of factory workers. Ought it not to be possible for a man of moderate means to be a factory worker without undue hardship in bringing up a large family? Perhaps a reform of incomes would better begin with those of factory workers than with those of supreme-court justices. Possibly then we could dispense with some of our justices, even with the invaluable Daniel F. Cohalan. Indeed, we imagine that in almost any event it will be possible to dispense with the latter. A man who can't bring up even a large family on $17,500 a year lacks both the intelligence and the democracy needed on the bench.

ONE GREAT JOKE of the British elections seems to have been overlooked. The act which gave the vote to women was passed while the country was still in the grip of the war, and it disfranchised, for a period of five years after the official end of the war, all conscientious objectors who took up the "absolutist" position, i.e., who refused any form of alternative service. Three of them, though still disqualified from voting, have now been elected members of Parliament. Walter H. Ayles, chairman of the general committee of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, has been chosen for North Bristol, and J. H. Hudson for the equally important constituency of Huddersfield. But most amazing is the election of a young Welshman who, not long before the war, resigned a commission in the Territorials because he had become convinced that war was un-Christian. When the World War broke out he was one of the leading spirits in the formation of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and he served that society as one of its secretaries until the Military Service Act laid hold of him. Since he came out of jail he has spent most of his time in holding "fellowship" missions all over the country, much after the fashion of the Franciscan friars. At the recent general election his nomination as an independent pacifist candidate was at first scarcely taken seriously. But he has come out at the head of the poll. George M. Llewellyn Davies is now M.P. for the University of Wales.

LABOR VICTORIES IN ENGLAND multiply almost too fast for the overworked editor to record, but we cannot pass over in silence the Great Labor Triumph in Bath. Against the opposition of the rock-bound conservatism of educators and legislators, the Labor representatives on the Bath City Council stood stalwartly together as one man, forgetting factional strife and partisan dissension, and succeeded in eliminating from the new school hymnbook the following lines from an inadequately proletarian hymn:

The rich man in his castle,
The poor man at his gate,
God made them high or lowly
And ordered their estate.

"Christ," said one of the Labor members, "never meant children to sing such verses." Perhaps not; but children must sing, and obviously something more than destructive action is called for from the new rulers of the Empire. Why not a new proletarian hymnology, substituting, say, lines like these?

The rich man in his dungeon
Thinks sadly of his fate
While the poor man in high office
Divides up his estate.

WHEN MR. CYRUS H. K. CURTIS took over the New York Evening Post at the end of December he stated that he knew and respected "the great traditions of the Evening Post . . . and I wish to preserve and if possible strengthen them." It is already obvious, however, that, whatever he thought, he has not known how to understand or appreciate either the traditions or the intellectual distinction which formerly made this historic journal one of our most distinguished newspapers. In place of the old Evening Post Mr. Curtis has simply duplicated in New York the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, for which he is, by the way, charging five cents where the other papers ask but three. The New York "Evening Ledger" is welcome as a newspaper extraordinarily full of news—it has been increased in size to make room for the special Ledger cable service as well as that of the Associated Press. Mr. Curtis has also wisely kept the Saturday Literary Review so admirably edited by Henry S. Canby. The new editorial page is at present a travesty of the old. Nevertheless, the experiment is extremely interesting. If a five-cent newspaper can be made to pay in New York and if a great evening newspaper can be made to succeed after the manner of the New York Times we shall have gained something to offset a very great loss, which The Nation feels the more keenly because of its close association with the Evening Post from 1881 to 1918.

Prussianism in Our Army

IT was ex-President Eliot who, in beautifully turned phrases, set forth, among other reasons why our youth "went" to the war, that their purpose was to drive the arrogant, dictatorial spirit of militarism out of the world. We wonder what Mr. Eliot will say to the case of Captain Paxton Hibben, one of the 80,000 reserve army officers we have acquired since the war. Captain Hibben is under investigation by a board of inquiry, with a view to the revocation of his commission. For personal misconduct? For inefficiency or some disgrace reflecting upon his character? Not at all. The sole crime with which Captain Hibben is charged is that his opinions as to the recognition of Russia and his judgment of the leaders of the Soviet regime are contrary to those of the State Department. According to the New York Herald of January 3, Mr. Weeks, the Secretary of War, stated to the correspondents that the charges against Captain Hibben are "in the main that while serving on the Russian relief Hibben had expressed himself in terms friendly to the Soviet Government, as interpreted by the State Department." In other words, it is a crime of opinion of which Captain Hibben is accused, and what we are called upon to witness is an effort of the War Department to padlock the lips and control the minds of the 80,000 reserve officers who are pursuing their daily business avocations. Yet this was typical of the militarism which we set out to conquer—the tyrannizing of the military machine over the minds and souls of the men who did the goose-step, the suppression of their consciences, the refusal of a free man's right to his own beliefs. This recalls the foul depths of French militarism uncovered by the Dreyfus case.

Thus the Hibben inquiry becomes of enormous moment, far transcending the individuality of Captain Hibben. It is bad enough that after the war to end war we should have any corps of reserve officers at all, let alone 80,000 of them, many of whom appear to believe that their chief function is to serve as commissioned propagandists for the military service. But if the rule is to be laid down by John W. Weeks that these 80,000 Americans forfeit the first attributes of American citizenship when they accept their commissions; if thereby they agree to think only what the man who for the moment is Secretary of State or Secretary of War thinks, then the country ought to know it, and the officers, too, for then are we well on the road to militarism of the European variety.

The case cannot, of course, stop with the War Department if its inquisitors should decide that Captain Hibben is guilty of "holding beliefs favorable to enemies of the United States Government." There are certain things the public has got to find out. What enemies has the United States, when we are officially declared to be at peace with all the world, and what constitutes a belief favorable to these mysterious enemies? If there should be soviet governments established in Persia, Italy, or Greece would that make them enemies of the United States Government? Would the 80,000 reserve officers then have to think as Mr. Hughes and Mr. Weeks did about them? If so, the War Department should begin now to issue a weekly bulletin to the 80,000 giving them their thoughts for the week, so that no one could innocently transgress by thinking differently from Herr Feldmarschall Weeks or Herr Staatsminister Hughes.

The Great Bok Humbug

"BOK—Peace or Propaganda?"—this was the question we asked editorially in our issue of January 2. We were not to remain long in doubt. The award of the Bok prize has confirmed the fear that this might prove to be one of the most skilful advertising dodges since the days of Barnum, and one of the cleverest pieces of political propaganda in the history of the United States. Mr. Bok offered $100,000 for "the most practicable plan by which the United States may cooperate with other nations to achieve and to preserve world peace," and he intrusted the decision as to the "most practicable plan" to a jury of seven very distinguished and able men and women, whose integrity and disinterestedness are above question. It happens, however, that of the seven six were already committed to one plan, as members of the League of Nations Nonpartisan Association.

It is, then, hardly surprising that the jury awarded the prize to a plan which is simply a direct proposal to join that discredited and weakening League of Nations which the voters of this country so overwhelmingly repudiated when, in 1920, they elected Mr. Harding rather than Governor Cox. Every alternative proposal is coolly brushed aside. There is nothing new in the plan. It is the old, old story: Join the League. (Certain modest reservations, it is true, are suggested, but the trend of the argument minimizes them.) The anonymous author (can it be that he is that faithful advocate of the League, Professor Manley O. Hudson?) says that the League is in the field; therefore any other association of nations is impossible; ergo, we must accept the League. Disarmament, the outlawry of war, a democratized league—everything else is disregarded.

Fifty million Americans are to be asked to vote Yes or No on this proposal. It is beyond doubt better publicity than the League has ever yet received. But the propaganda goes even further than appears by this brief analysis. The plan itself is 2,000 words long; but on the ballots which will be used by the millions of the voters is a sugar-coated 133-word summary. With all respect to the jury, whose motives and whose sincerity we would not impugn, we must believe that they acted in a situation skilfully arranged for them and that they are not responsible for the disingenuous framing of the ballot. This summary places in the forefront the World Court proposal, although the author of the plan only incidentally mentions it. Probably nine-tenths of the fifty million who are to vote upon the plan will never read beyond the summary, and will conclude that joining the World Court is the salient feature of the author's plan.

The ballot misleads still further; it continues with these words: "Without becoming a member of the League of Nations as at present constituted the United States shall extend its present cooperation with the work of the League and participate in the work of the League as a body of mutual consent" under certain conditions. One would not think from this summary that the plan proposed membership in the League! Yet such is the fact. It points out that we could participate, without joining, in the humane and reconstructive agencies of the League; the conditions printed on the ballot, however, are those given in the text as conditions upon which the author thinks that the United States might join the League. It is difficult to avoid the impression that this is a deliberate attempt to induce an enormous body of Americans to vote in favor of the League without knowing it. For the present the World Court is featured; if the vote is favorable, it will be heralded as a victory for the Geneva League. It is a dishonest trick.

Even apart from the misleading character of the propaganda which surrounds the plan, there is little to recommend it. The Nation has long urged that the United States cooperate in those humane international activities which, begun long before the League was founded, are now grouped about it. By all means let us share in the tasks of suppressing the opium traffic, of ending the international white-slave trade, of promoting public health by international cooperation—but, good as these things are, it is ridiculous to exalt them above their measure. By all means let us help in any effort which really promotes the cause of judicial settlement of international disputes—but the record does not show that the League is advancing that cause. Most of the suggestions recommended in the plan for improving the League look in the right direction, but there is in them nothing to lift a miserable world out of its present war-ridden chaos. They provide for further development of international law, for opening the League to any self-governing state upon a two-thirds vote of the Assembly, for elimination of the provisions for the use of military and economic force, for safeguarding American hegemony in this hemisphere, and absolve us from League duties in enforcement of the Treaty of Versailles. These are sadly negative propositions.

Here is nothing to stir the pulses of the world, nothing new—merely a resuscitation of the tedious debate which has absorbed the Senate since May, 1919. Yet Mr. Bok calmly insists that the purpose of his award has been fulfilled: "to reflect in a practicable plan the dominating (italics ours) national sentiment as expressed by the large cross-section of the American public taking part in the award." Why, if he is so certain, take a vote at all?

It is a profound and bitter disappointment. There was a great idea in Mr. Bok's mind: to set the nation thinking about peace. It were a pity if he should merely revive the animosities of 1919. In those 22,165 plans there must have been something more inspiring, something more constructive and forward-looking. There is a world-need at this hour for a determined and complete outlawry of war, such as the late Senator Knox proposed and Senator Borah is advocating; there is a need for a new note. Simply to refuse burdens under the old Treaty of Versailles is not enough—that is not "cooperation." The old treaty must be scrapped and a new treaty written! Our hegemony in this hemisphere is no guaranty of world peace; and every international matter which called for courage and the will to grapple with offending members has left a stain upon the Geneva League. Possibly, when it admits all Powers upon equal terms—with Germany and Russia invited, as they ought to be, to sit upon its Council, and the hand of France and Britain removed from its throat—the League may develop into a conference which we might join; that is a matter for the future to decide. To join it today would be to put the seal of our indorsement upon a record of cowardice and failure. Is there not still a chance for some less predisposed committee to search those 22,165 plans for a program which looks forward, not back?

The Tax Muddle

WHEN it comes to the Secretary of the Treasury's proposals for the reduction of our taxes what is a poor liberal to do? If he believes in Senator Brookhart he will learn that Secretary Mellon's plan is "an efficient scheme for buncoing the public." If he is a follower of Senator Borah he learns from that excellent statesman that this country needs nothing so much in 1924 as a "crusade for tax reduction." The increase in taxation he calls "the most searching tragedy of American life. The anxiety, the discouragement, the broken plans which lie beneath this growing tax burden language is inadequate to tell." If our liberal seeker after truth goes further he will learn from Senator Hiram Johnson that never has there been "anything like the propaganda we now have on behalf of the Mellon plan." "But," he adds, "I would reduce the taxes of the people wherever it is possible to do so, and keep faith at the same time. I would be scrupulously just to men of large incomes and big business, but I recognize that men of great riches and big business have a happy faculty of looking out for themselves." Then, if the anxious liberal turns from this cryptic utterance he may learn from Stuart Chase in the Searchlight on Congress that Mr. Mellon is selling us a "gold brick" in his desire to help the poor little rich folks and poor, half-starved private business world. Finally, in the liberal and democratic New York World he will find eloquent sponsorship for the Mellon plan.

What then is the reader to think? Well, we believe he must first make up his mind what his attitude is toward payments for the war. If he does not believe in saddling our terrible debt burden upon the coming generations, he must take, in principle, a strong stand against any federal tax reduction. Mr. Mellon is able to show that with the aid of the British payments the nation's debt was reduced by $613,000,000 in 1923. We are not at all of the opinion that this in itself constitutes a valid reason for passing our tax burdens on to future generations. It may be that, as Senator Borah declares, in consequence of the era of waste and extravagance that came with the war, millions of people are struggling to keep the homes they have labored fifty years to acquire and maintain, and are all but losing them. But these people allowed their government to put them into a war they neither sought nor desired; there is a certain element of Greek justice in their paying a price for their folly and not being allowed to pass the debt on to their children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. If the people of England must pay the interest due us, our people should put their shoulders to the wheel to reduce the debt which the war hung around our necks.

"But would you not favor a lifting of the burden on those of small means?" Yes, if the main purpose can be served. "Do you believe," we hear another ask, "that Secretary Mellon is right in saying that if they cut the taxes in the higher brackets, we shall see a greater expansion of business and therefore in the long run get higher taxes than now, when capital cannot be had for new enterprises?" Well, we are not yet convinced that business is in such a parlous state. True, there has been a slackening along certain lines, but it is open to question whether that is due to the high taxes of the rich and the reported lack of adequate financial rewards for the launching of new enterprises, or to world-wide conditions. The press reports that 1923 was the greatest year ever known in the realty business; new building amounted to almost six billion dollars. Wherever one goes in New York one is astounded at the capital being poured into the "largest office buildings in the world," into endless mammoth hotels, into rows upon rows of magnificent apartment houses. Where does the money all come from, one wonders; certainly there is neither here nor in the automobile industry (where three new makes of cars are just appearing on the market), nor in Wall Street, so far as we can judge by advertisements, any lack of capital or of new offerings of investment securities. We cannot see that private business is in dire distress for lack of fresh accumulations.

Our immediate program, then, if we were the Government, would be the following: We should cut army and navy expenses to the bone, and apply the hundreds of millions thus saved directly to debt reduction. We should insist upon further savings in government administration—not at the expense of any social service—and would to that extent reduce the taxes of all proportionately. The payments of Great Britain, and those which France might make instead of lavishing hundreds of millions upon Polish and other militarisms, we should apply directly to the reduction of the war debts. We should join Secretary Mellon in insisting, day in and day out, upon the elimination of tax-exempt securities. We should not increase inheritance-taxes until the present unfair condition, under which an estate often pays death-doles three times on the same securities, is ended. Above all, there should be no special favors to the ultra-rich.

Arming the World?

IN defending his advocacy of the sale of rifles, ammunition, and bombing planes to the Mexican Government Mr. Hughes recalls that at the conclusion of the European War the Wilson Administration sold surplus army supplies to no less than six European governments, and that more recently the Republican Administration has sold munitions to Cuba, Panama, and Nicaragua. Cuba was armed under circumstances similar to those which dictated the sale to Mexico: an insurrection threatened, and Washington equipped the Cuban Government to prevent it. The sale to Mexico is made, an official statement declares, "because such action is in the interest of stability and orderly procedure." In other words, these sales at least, and possibly others, were not routine disposals of surplus supplies, not commercial transactions, but constituted definitely political interventions. The embargo on arms shipments to De la Huerta makes it clearer still that we are "taking sides" in the internal affairs of other nations.

Such intervention without reference to Congress seems to be becoming a policy of the executive branch of the government. Many of Kolchak's men, a part of the Polish army which invaded Russia in the summer of 1920, and the Estonian army, among others, were clothed in "surplus" American army uniforms. When the American army left Europe we sold enormous quantities of army supplies to France, and it is possible that a part of the recent French loans to the little Powers of Central Europe is being used to enable them to purchase from France the war supplies which we disposed of in 1919.

Both Mr. Wilson and Mr. Harding apparently regretted the somewhat precipitate course of the Government in scattering its surplus war material over the continent of Europe. Mr. Polk, Mr. White, and General Bliss, representing the United States of America, signed at Saint Germain-en-Laye, on September 10, 1919, a "Convention for the Control of the Trade in Arms and Ammunition," which began with the statement that:

... the long war now ended, in which most nations have successively become involved, has led to the accumulation in various parts of the world of considerable quantities of arms and munitions of war the dispersal of which would constitute a danger to peace and public order, and continued with a prohibition of the export of arms—with, to be sure, careful qualifications. None of the great Powers has ratified this convention, but its existence, even unratified, is a symptom. Mr. Harding's position has been recalled by Representative Fairchild, who proposes its consecration, as the "Harding Policy," as a part of the permanent policy of the United States. Mr. Harding wrote in April, 1923, to the Secretary of War:

... I hope it will be the policy of the War Department not only to make no sales of war equipment to any foreign Power, but that you will go further and make certain that public sales to our own citizens will be attended by proper guaranties that such supplies are not to be transferred to any foreign Power. I would gladly waive aside any financial advantage that might attend such sales to make sure that none of our surplus equipment is employed in encouraging warfare anywhere in the world.

Mr. Hughes maintains that the present sale does not violate this Harding doctrine because it is made not in the interest of war but of peace and order. We are inclined to agree with him that such is the probable immediate effect of the present sale; we believe that President Obregon represents the stabler, more forward-looking, and most hopeful part of Mexico. But we nevertheless regret Mr. Hughes's decision. Mr. Harding suggested a policy of no sales whatever to foreign Powers—not of no sales except when the Secretary of State might happen to think them desirable. It is a very dangerous thing to leave it to any Secretary of State—particularly to one with as much moral unction as Mr. Hughes—whether it be wise to ship arms to another Government or not. It is not for our Government to decide who is good and who is evil in the other parts of the world. To ship arms, in time of civil war, either to a government or to revolutionaries, is to participate in that civil war. It is to involve ourselves in the internal squabbles of other countries. The discussion in Congress should make it impossible hereafter for the executive branch of our government to commit the people to such participation in foreign civil wars.

We might well go further. Whether in time of peace or of war the sale of military supplies by one government to another, like the loan of military and naval missions, is a dangerous, provocative, and involving process. Congress might well put a flat prohibition upon such dealings. Just as our naval mission to Peru has rendered more difficult our role of peace-maker between Chile and Peru, so the Vogelgesang mission to Brazil has sharpened the hostility between Argentina and Brazil and increased the possibility of a South American war. Americans rightly complain of the French loans which are remilitarizing Central Europe; they should put an end to a policy of their own government which may militarize Latin America.

The Sail-Carriers

WE are accustomed to look back upon the era of the sailing ship as one of much romance but little speed. We complacently rate the sailing vessel as a lumbering tub—a tortoise when matched with a modern steamship. It would be more exact to regard the steamship as the tortoise and the sailing vessel as the hare. The steamship gets there first, but it does so because it travels in a straight line and keeps on going until it arrives. The sailing ship can, and at times does, outfoot the average steamship, but it travels by fits and starts, and sometimes by a curiously zigzag route. It is the regularity and manageability of the steamship, not its speed, which has crowded its more temperamental sister off the Seven Seas even in a Jazz Age.

The speed of steamships is vastly overrated by the general public; especially in America. We are always reading in the newspapers of the passages of the fleet transatlantic liners—of vessels that do twenty-five miles an hour and cross the ocean inside of five or six days. But these are only a handful of thoroughbreds, supported chiefly by American dollars and the demand for fast and luxurious travel between the United States and Europe. They are an inconsequential item in the total volume of ocean commerce. The average modern cargo steamship pokes along at ten miles an hour, and passenger vessels on most of the world's trade routes do only a few miles better. The fastest steamships in the world congregate in New York, but the passenger from that port for any destination except Northern Europe has no reason to complain if he finds himself aboard a ship that averages twelve miles an hour, and he is especially favored if his vessel does fifteen. Such speed is in no way beyond that of a good sailing ship in a smart breeze, while the famous clippers of bygone days used to touch eighteen miles an hour, a pace exceeded by only a handful even of our modern transatlantic racers.

The wonderful speed of the clipper hull, with its capacity to knife its way through the sea, was a distinctly American invention, brought forth chiefly by two causes: the discovery of gold in California and Australia and the development of the China tea trade. The gold discoveries called for the rapid transportation of thousands of passengers. E. Keble Chatterton, in a recent book on "The Mercantile Marine," remarks that in the year 1849 as many as 90,000 persons were landed from ships in the hamlet of San Francisco, while for several years subsequent to the Australian gold discoveries of 1851 there was a demand to transport some 400,000 passengers annually from England to this new El Dorado. Probably the most celebrated of all American clipper ships was the Black Ball Line's Dreadnought, with a record of 13 days, 8 hours between New York and Liverpool.

There is a flash packet—flash packet of fame;
She belongs to New York and the Dreadnought's her name;
Bound away to the westward where the wild waters flow,
She's a Liverpool packet—oh Lord, let her go!

When, in the year 1850, the Americans invaded Britain's own tea trade, the clipper Oriental rushing a cargo from Hongkong to London River in ninety-seven days, the English took the hint and began to build ships of similar design. In 1854 the White Star Line's Red Jacket sailed from New York to Liverpool in 13 days, 1 hour. Speed at sea is not a creation of the Twentieth Century.

The Shame of the Churches

By ALGERNON S. CRAPSEY

THE clergy of the various Protestant churches and more especially the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal church during the past few weeks have been acting in such wise as to grieve their friends and to amuse their enemies. If the clergy, High and Broad, are conspiring together to bring their church into contempt and to destroy its influence, they are displaying an efficiency in their efforts that might well excite the envy of the successful business man. It is difficult for any one of ordinary intelligence and common decency to retain a shred of respect for either party in this disgraceful quarrel.

When one hears the clergy shouting one to another, "I do believe" . . . "I do not believe in the Virgin Birth," one is not so much troubled by their orthodoxy or their heterodoxy as one is amazed at their bad manners. Matters which cultivated men and women take for granted or veil in decent phrase are unblushingly cried from the pulpit. I am sure if these reverend gentlemen could realize how their cries offend modest ears they would themselves blush for very shame. As they reveal themselves in this contention one deplores in the clergy not only their lack of reserve in the treatment of delicate subjects but more their seeming deficiency in intellectual discernment, their lack of spiritual insight, and their apparent ignorance of historical conclusions which for more than half a century have been the possession of every fairly educated man and woman.

It is plain that in these birth stories we are dealing not with prosaic history but with myth and legend. A myth is a story told to shepherds by shepherds as they watch their flocks by night. A legend is the same story in poetical form, reduced to writing and recited by a prophet in the temple. History is the same story delivered as a lecture by a professor in a classroom. Of these three forms the last is the least vital. As Shultz says in his "Old Testament Theology": "When we read the myths and legends of a people we have our fingers on the pulse and our ear on the heart of that people." The bishops may have been childish to take the birth stories literally, but the broad churchman is stupid not to take them at all. Through all the Christian ages the Song of the Angels has been the carol of the children, and the coming of the wise men the comfort of the weary and heavy-laden. In these birth stories is the germ thought of a world beyond the world, without which our world were very sad and desolate. But the instant we remove these stories from their home in mythology into the sphere of literal history we destroy their charm and make of them mere stories for the nursery. The very same story, in its essentials, is told of Augustus Caesar. It is said that one day his mother, Maia, went into a temple to pray and as she prayed a serpent glided into the temple and embraced her and she conceived and the child who was born of that conception in due time became the Emperor Augustus, the master of the world.

These myths were the natural product of the pious imagination of the worshipers of Augustus and the worshipers of Jesus. The Romans thought it impious to think of Augustus as the grandson of a Roman baker, nor could the Christian kneel in adoration before the son of a Galilean carpenter. The quarrel of the Highs and the Broads over the birth stories is a quarrel of the childish with the stupid. With the high churchman it is the outcome of a lack of intelligence; with the broad churchman a lack of feeling.

The deepest disgrace of this quarrel between the High Church, as represented by the bishop of New York, and the Broad Church, whose chief spokesman is the rector of the Church of St. Bartholomew, is that it is practically a quarrel about nothing. The bishop says Jesus is to him very God of very God; the rector says that Jesus is to him his divine Lord and Master. Such being the case, it would seem the sacred duty of the bishop to obey his God and of the rector to follow his divine Lord and Master. And if the bishop did obey his God and if the rector did follow his divine Lord and Master, would not these two meet in the midst of the stern moralities and severe spiritualities of the Sermon on the Mount, and meeting there must they not each fall down on his knees and cry, the bishop to his God, the rector to his Lord and Master: "Lord, have mercy on me, a sinner"?

From that high altitude would not the sinful futility of his cathedral building be manifest to the bishop? Would he not see that to get the wherewithal to build his cathedral he must be careful not to offend the landlords and the money-lords of the city. Looking down from Morning-side Heights he would see landlords exacting exorbitant rents for tenements unfit for human habitation; he would see pale, anemic women climbing darkened stairways to sleep in the fetid atmosphere of unventilated rooms; he would see weary workmen heavily slumbering in the same bed with wife and children; he would see the crowded tenements, the breeding place of sexual vice in its fouler forms of sodomy and incest.

And going to the Stock Exchange, the bishop would see the money-lords by the manipulations of the market robbing the innocent, impoverishing the widow and the orphan, and giving the tithe of these ungodly gains to the building and support of his cathedral.

It would then come home to the bishop as a student of history that in every age the building of temples and cathedrals has been the cardinal crime of the bishops and the priests. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries when the bishops were exhausting the labor of the people in the building of the cathedrals the people themselves were living in wattle huts without window or chimney, frightened by the dark and smothered by the smoke. It was the sale of indulgences for sin to raise the money to pay for the building of the greatest of all the cathedrals, the Basilica of St. Peter in Rome, that roused the wrath of Luther, causing him to hurl his anathema at this wickedness and create the great schism in the church.

One single night spent by the bishop of New York alone on the mount of the sermon would, if he has any intelligence, any heart, any soul, make him ashamed and afraid and his quarrel with the rector of St. Bartholomew's would be as nothing in comparison with his quarrel with his own soul.

But the rector of St. Bartholomew's is in a still more perilous condition. It was easy for the rector of St. Bartholomew's to defy the bishop; St. Bartholomew's is the richest single congregation in Christendom; it is the church of the American millionaire and billionaire, and the rector knew that the bishop fears the millionaire and the billionaire more than he fears his God; so the rector was not afraid of his bishop. But the rector was and is afraid of his own congregation; he would never dare defy the millionaires and billionaires as he defied his bishop. He would never dare to tell the millionaires and billionaires to their face that the mere possession of the millions and billions was evidence of their godlessness; if they had not loved their money more than they loved their God they would not have had their money. This rector would never dare to tell the women of his congregation that in living a life of wasteful idleness upon money which they had never earned they were more guilty than the wretched woman of the street who sells her body for her bread.

I know that vast sums of accumulated wealth are expended in these days for the betterment of the race. But the prime social question is not what a man does with his money but how did he get it. If like the Roman generals and the robber barons of the Middle Ages he gets it by the wasting of the land, the pillage of cities, the enslavement of the people it matters nothing if he builds a temple to Jupiter or a Christian cathedral. What the world demands today is not charity in the modern sense, but justice.

Liberal Christianity and orthodox Christianity are equally responsible for the world as it is. They equally stand sponsor for the capitalistic, militaristic system which now rules the world. They equally hate the pacifist-communist mode of life which Jesus preached and practiced and under the rule of which the Christian community carried on its work for the first four hundred years of its history and conquered the world. In those days of greatness there was a distinction between the church and the world; the world hated the church and the church defied the world. Today there is not the slightest distinction between the church and the world unless it be that the world is master and the church the slave.

The capitalist, militarist, political system has in the past ten years made the church particeps criminis in the slaughter, with unspeakable cruelties, of from fifteen to twenty million of the choicest men of this generation. And the capitalist, militarist system, having the church in bondage, goes on with its exploitation of the people as if these twenty million were all dead and done for. But they are not dead and done for. Such a crime must inevitably have a penalty. As Jesus wept over the city of Jerusalem, seeing in its present sin its future downfall, so the sensitive soul stands aghast at the awful plight of Western, so-called Christian civilization, foreseeing in its present evil its future disaster. And in view of this vision, the squabbling bishop and rector are as if they were two French nobles in the days of the Revolution, quarreling about their pedigrees as they were riding in the tumbrel to the guillotine.

British Labor Faces Power

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, December 17

THE results of the general election may, I think, be best summarized by saying that the Labor Party has won a great tactical victory, though it has not had a great strategical success. It has increased its representation in the House of Commons from 144 to 192, the United Liberals having 156 seats and the Tories 258. The defeat of the Government in the first days of next session (probably about January 18) is now certain; and on all constitutional precedent the King will then summon Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to form a ministry. The Labor Party has decided that the invitation must be accepted.

Those of us who have been accustomed to think of a Labor government some six or seven years from now are naturally a little overwhelmed at this prospect. Too much, however, must not be made of the situation. In a total poll of over fourteen million votes a redistribution of some 3 per cent has caused a loss of one hundred Tory seats. It is clear that the electorate is determined to have nothing to do with tariff reform; it is equally clear that (at present) it is emphatically opposed to the capital levy. The existence of three not unequal parties none of which can unite with any other to govern, but all of which can unite to defeat a government, has produced a situation in which the official opposition is bound to have the opportunity of power. No government so circumstanced will rule in terms of a mandate from the country; no government, therefore, will be able to attempt any heroic measures. British politics in the next period will be mainly distinguished by a fairly distinct foreign policy and an emphasis upon sound administration.

The Government has fallen by its own ineptitude. Bankrupt at home and abroad, it had nothing to offer except a quack remedy the mere elements of which it was not prepared to reveal. Mr. Baldwin is a most honorable man whose genius is clearly not of a political character; and his chief lieutenants are men who hold office mainly by virtue of their passionate hatred of the new social order. The defeat Mr. Baldwin has suffered is so decisive that the only strange thing about his position is his delay in resigning. He is, of course, quite entitled to be sentenced to death by Parliament; but it is difficult to see on what grounds he can ask Parliament (in the King's Speech) to continue him in office.

The Labor Party, I think, has no alternative save the acceptance of power. Psychologically, it is of the first importance to accustom the country to the idea of a Labor government; and to refuse responsibility at this critical juncture would be to emphasize its own sense of that unfitness of which it is so often accused. Practically, it will be able to train its leading members in the work of administration, and to accustom them to the complex atmosphere of the civil service. Positively, while it will not be able to enact any first-class measures it can, in a number of ways, lighten the burden of the disinherited. It will, of course, be mainly occupied in making a bid for future power; but the contribution it can make to that end is, I think, an important one.

In foreign affairs it can take definite steps toward the appeasement of Europe. Its first act will be the juridical recognition of Russia; and that will close an indefensible epoch in British foreign policy. It will work with all its strength for the revision of the Peace of Versailles, for the immediate admission of Germany to the League of Nations, for the ending of the Ruhr adventure, and the fixing of reparations at a reasonable figure. We hope greatly, despite the address of President Coolidge to Congress, that America will cooperate with England to that end. Nothing would so stimulate the progressive forces of Europe as the knowledge that America was assisting by its sympathy the first Labor government in English history.

There cannot be a spectacular domestic policy: the union of Liberals and Tories to defeat drastic measures will be proof against that. But we may hope for the abandonment of the fortified works at Singapore; for the restoration to full activity of the Fisher policy in education, together with the raising of the school-leaving age to sixteen; for the setting up of a full and scientific inquiry into the problem of the national debt; for the starting of such great public works as afforestation, roads, light-railways and canals, not merely to relieve the pressure of unemployment, but also to maximize our resources when the period of trade revival comes; for the extension of unemployment insurance; for a better organized administration of old-age and war pensions, together, one hopes, with a system of widows' pensions; and for increased grants to the universities. I list things that are largely non-controversial in character. The problems of agriculture and mines provide a basis for partisan conflict, and policy in relation to these will depend most largely upon opinion in the country.

A government built upon such a policy as this could, I think, hope for at least four to six months of life. No doubt the older parties will sooner or later combine to defeat it. But their own position is no better. Tariff reform having been beaten, the Tories are, at the moment, without any policy at all; and they will have enough labor in this Parliament to set their house in order, without attempting a further period of office. The Liberals hold the balance of power. But reunion only produced a gain of forty seats, on the classic liberal issue; and their program represents either agreement with Labor (as on foreign policy) or mitigated laissez faire at a time when the rapid growth of collectivism is certain. The most striking fact in contemporary Liberalism is the renewed power of Mr. Asquith. Mr. Lloyd George's supporters practically disappeared at the polls; and he is now very definitely relegated to the second place. No one wants him and no one trusts him; it is, indeed, not uncommon to discover that most people were amused rather than convinced by his tearing campaign through the country. The Liberals have, one must remember, many seats as a result of bargains with the Tories to "down" Labor; and this is, I think, the apogee of its power. It would, of course, take office if the King sent for it after the defeat of a Labor government; but that is a contingency surrounded with constitutional complexities which require separate discussion at another time.

The Labor government, when it is formed, will contain several men of the first eminence. I do not think there is anyone in the front of English politics today who is Mr. MacDonald's equal in knowledge of foreign affairs, in power of persuasiveness, in parliamentary influence. He has grown enormously with responsibility; and his hold on the affection of his followers is a remarkable one. Mr. Sidney Webb needs no introduction to your readers; but an intimate friend may be allowed to say that in practical politics he has probably the most suggestive mind, and certainly the most unique knowledge, in Europe. If, as one hopes, Lord Haldane joins the Cabinet, Mr. MacDonald will have the services of the greatest administrator this country has had since Cardwell. Men like J. R. Clynes, Arthur Henderson (the best organizer in any of the three parties today), J. H. Thomas, Arthur Greenwood, Frank Hodges are all quite naturally of Cabinet caliber, as are women like Margaret Bondfield and Susan Lawrence; and the wealth of ability bred in municipal and trade-union experience will make the task of finding under-secretaries of talent easier than Mr. Baldwin found. I venture the predictions, first, that some of Mr. MacDonald's colleagues will reveal unexpected sympathizers with Labor, and, second, that his management of the Court appointments will be an innovation of great constitutional importance. The one hope we all unite to express is that Mr. MacDonald, like Salisbury and Lord Rosebery, will be his own Foreign Secretary. No one else is so qualified for the post.

The Labor Party will take office next month in an attitude of soberness rather than of exhilaration. It is not optimistic about the future; in the present state of Europe no one has any right to be optimistic. It has come to power sooner than it expected, perhaps even sooner than it hoped. But it is the one party which, from the first, has preached a policy of appeasement in Europe. It is the one party without responsibility for the errors of the pre-war period. It is the one party which realizes the import of Macaulay's great phrase that to reform in order to preserve is the watchword of great events. It will, I believe, emerge from the ordeal of power with renewed credit; and its great leader will, I believe, take his place among those few statesmen who play their part in a manner worthy of the problems they confront.

Finally, I should like to draw attention to certain significant changes in the distribution of British opinion. It is fairly clear now that all the mining areas, industrial Wales and Scotland, and large areas of Lancashire and Yorkshire are permanently labor in complexion. The poorer districts of London which used to be the strongholds of Toryism are, like Paris and Berlin, swinging over definitely to Labor. The strength of the Tories is in the agricultural districts and in suburban constituencies where respectability is the keynote of life. Liberalism has its roots among the cotton towns of Lancashire and the country parts of Wales, both on the basis of historic tradition rather than present policy. It would, I think, greatly interest the American observer to compare the present position of labor with the prophecies made by President Lowell in his admirable book on English government nearly twenty years ago. It is, I think, impossible to avoid the conclusion that the struggle of the future is between Toryism and Socialism; between, that is, rights founded on property and property founded on function. I do not believe that Liberalism has a mediating role to play in this opposition. Like the Peelites of eighty years ago, the Liberals will, I think, sooner or later be absorbed. If parliamentary institutions are to survive this period of test that absorption cannot come too quickly.

These United States—XLIV*

WYOMING: A Maverick Citizenry

By WALTER C. HAWES

WHEN the roaring middle years of the nineteenth century were witnessing a mighty trekking to and fro of young and turbulent manhood in search of virgin lands or gold in these United States, one particular stretch of murderous desert in the western part of the territory of Dakota baffled the quest of the frontiersmen for anything worth development. For a full quarter of the century these torrents of humanity surged this way and that, to California, to Pike's Peak, to Nevada, to Montana, and all that while the district that was to be Wyoming was regarded only as a desolate place along the trails which men traversed for the sole purpose of reaching some place beyond. Twenty years of flood-tide emigration along the Oregon Trail left no residue save the soldiers in the military posts and the keepers of the road houses. Indeed had it not been for a break in the Rocky Mountains and a welling up of the plains which caught the eye of the searchers for easy passage to the Pacific Coast, there is no telling when the attention of men would have been turned this way.

It was this low place in the hills that brought to the district in the summer of 1867 the two creeping lines of steel which represented the westward progress of the first coast-to-coast railway. And keeping pace with the breaking plows of the contractors went the first towns of the district, the riotous "hells on wheels" that sprang up overnight and went as quickly, populated with the huge construction gangs and the motley horde which preyed upon them. At intervals behind these moving vanguard settlements sprang up the division-point towns, permanent but almost as rough and ready as their mushroom predecessors.

The violence that prevailed in those towns during the first year made it certain that if continuous rail traffic was to be assured, there must be some seat of government nearer than the capitol of Dakota Territory. And thus it was that Wyoming, child of the cross-continental trails, came into being as a unit of administration to serve the needs of the Union Pacific Railroad.

There being no other reason for the existence of the Territory, it was not unnatural that the railroad corporation regarded the new division of the United States much as it regarded the huge land grants to which the federal government had given its full title. By a shrewd manipulation of these land grants it secured legal possession of the immense coal deposits bordering its right-of-way which then seemed the only part of the Territory worth owning. For many decades it was common report that the Union Pacific was the power behind the throne in territorial politics, and results went to show that it had ways and means of exerting strong persuasion wherever its interests were vitally involved. Until the present year the assessments of Union Pacific properties in Wyoming were fractional as compared with the assessment of that corporation's properties in other States. In 1922 the line across the prairies of Nebraska was assessed at $133,155 per mile, while the same line in Wyoming, with long stretches of mountain construction and with tunnels and snowsheds costing millions, was assessed at $62,376.20 per mile. That same year a former division superintendent and known business ally of the Union Pacific running for governor on the single plank platform of economy and tax reduction was defeated by 723 votes. His defeat was followed by the appointment of a State board of equalization which ordered a sharp raise in the assessment of Union Pacific properties.

In the period immediately following construction no one was interested in disputing the suzerainty of the railroad. Viewed from the window of a railway coach the Territory seemed through most of its extent a land as desolate as the surface of an extinct planet. To the eye accustomed to the rational, water-molded topography of the East the land was beyond comprehension. A precipitately tilted ledge of rock would cut across the trail without reference to the rest of the landscape, and the route would skirt along its base to a V-shaped water-gap through which a bewildered river found its way. These rivers following circuitous routes through the bad lands eventually gave the State its value as one of the finest cattle ranges in the world. From the high central plateau seated like the cupola of a continent they radiate east, north, west, southwest like the spokes of a wheel, paying the State's tribute of waters to the Gulf of California and Puget Sound as well as to the Missouri and Mississippi on the east.

But it required someone other than a New York farmer's son to discover the land's value. Cattlemen of the Texas and Panhandle ranges driving their herds hundreds of miles north to a railroad outlet found that the seemingly scanty grasses had a strength unknown to forage of more rainy lands. They soon were trailing hundreds of thousands of cattle here in the early summer to fatten on the nutritious Northern grasses and be shipped to market in the fall. Not a fence intervened along their route, and under ordinary conditions the cattle were brought the whole way for not more than $1 per head.

It was not until the middle seventies that the dangers from hostile Indians were removed and headquarters ranches were established. The perils were still so great that they were reflected in interest rates as high as from 24 to 36 per cent required by the Texas and Cheyenne banks. The result was that large stock-selling companies were formed which enlisted capital in the Eastern States and in England and Scotland. As a consequence the range passed into foreign hands during the period of development.

Despite the ravings of the romanticists over the freedom and the larger manners of the days of the unfenced range the plains cattle-industry of those days was no pure democracy. All conditions made for the success of the large outfit. Under the provisions of the federal land laws legal title to the range was out of the question save in small amounts beneath notice in a pastoral country. Consequently the range was no-man's land, and anyone who could get money could flood it with cattle. An estimate of that day states that a herd of 5,000 cattle could be maintained there for $1 per head, a herd of 10,000 for 75 or 80 cents per head, and a herd of 25,000 for not much over 50 cents per head the year round. Large herds, running as high as 75,000 head, became the rule. When the Wyoming Live Stock Association was formed in 1879 it was reputed to be the largest organized body of stockmen in the world, comprising 400 members representing over half the States in the Union and several foreign countries, and possessing stock and equipment valued well up toward $100,000,000. The foreign-owned companies employed foremen who were often stockholders and managed as many as 150 men. Only part of this force was resident on the range the year round; and every spring there was an influx of riders. After the beef round-ups in the fall these transients would "hole up" in the towns with the stake they had earned, or in many cases they went to Eastern States, where they followed more prosaic occupations during the winter.

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1924, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

This was the Wyoming beloved of the romanticist—a community of roistering young bachelors without a stake in the land and with little aim other than to enjoy the spice of adventure that went with the cattle industry. Among them prevailed the open-handed camaraderie of the adventurer. Even among their employers, while the reserves of the bank of nature were more than equal to the demands there was no reason for tight-fistedness or thieving. Thus it was that for a decade or less there prevailed an atmosphere of open-handed generosity and honorable dealings.

It was inevitable that this seemingly idyllic period should be no more than an evanescent phase of the land's development; and sober consideration will reveal that its perpetuation was not desirable. The life of the cow-hand alternated between long periods of hard work, when he was the very moderately paid employee of a large outfit, and brief seasons of hard dissipation in the sordid little cow towns composed of a store or two and several saloons about a loading chute. The social institutions of the country were crude. Well into the twentieth century the barkeepers outnumbered the doctors, lawyers, and ministers of the State combined. There were few decent women back in the range country and many reasons for not bringing them there.

When the abler men aspired to homes and outfits of their own they came into conflict with the interests already in control of the range. The syndicates discouraged ownership on the part of their employees, unless they wished to buy stock in the companies. It was true that an employee with a brand of his own could steal without limit from his employer. It was accordingly a rule with many companies that the employee with his own brand was blacklisted.

But the large concerns were unable to compete with these new rivals who had grown up in their employ and were the real cattlemen on whom they had depended for the rough and ready work. For once the man on the ground doing the work of production held the advantage, for he knew the industry from every angle. The chief weakness of the syndicates lay in their inability to get undisputed control of any considerable acreage. The homestead law allowed each man a title to 160 acres of land, to be acquired by actual residence. For a foreign company this was a poser. Twenty average acres of range land were required to maintain one cow the year round. Consequently a homestead would carry eight cows. If the outfit owned 5,000 cattle, which was a small herd in the open-range days, it needed the equivalent of 625 homesteads to run them on. The large companies laid their case before Congress, asking for legislation permitting long-term leases of large tracts of arid land as a matter of range conservation. There were strong arguments in favor of such legislation. Notwithstanding the larger gross returns reported from later systems of mixed small ranching and farming, it seems probable that more clear money was taken from the country during the day of the large company than at any time since. For the changes since have involved much costly controversy and expensive education, however valuable they may be in the long run. The odium attaching to the exploitation of the public lands by foreign capital was emphasized with good effect by the opponents of leasing, however, and the lawmakers were unwilling, for political reasons if for no other, to lay themselves open to that charge.

Overstocking and disorganization ensued, and the severe winter of 1886-87 was sufficient to bring the old order to an abrupt end. From 50 to 60 per cent of the cattle were lost that season before summer opened. Such companies as did not immediately go out of business reduced their operations to bedrock, and in the ensuing decade the number of cattle in Wyoming fell from 900,000 to 300,000.

At the close of the disorganized period the return of better times found the hated "nester," the small rancher, in full control. For a period of ten years the men who had grown up with the country and who had been identified with its development more than any other class of men before or since were in possession. At the close of that decade there were reported to be 3,200 horse and cattle raisers in the State, with herds ranging from 100 to 1,000. But even with these smaller holdings, the legal title to sufficient range was out of reach. They managed as best they could with gentlemen's agreements; several ranchers would fence in a tract for a common pasture. But the time came when these men, in their turn, found themselves helpless before a new invasion.

The new heir to the range was the homesteader who proposed to take the 160 acres allowed by law and make his living on it by agriculture. For him it seemed the federal government had been waiting as the rightful owner who was to develop the arid lands along a policy which it could sanction—the policy which had been tested in the fertile rain belt.

In reality the movement was engineered by land boomers who took advantage of the land fever which resulted from the prosperous farming period which came with the opening of the twentieth century. The boomer saw and grasped his golden opportunity to exploit the cheap lands of the West. He took up the systems, so called, of dry-farming developed by experimenters and expanded them in a literature that reeked with the patter of "dust mulches" and "subsoil packing" warranted to retain in gravel beds every drop of moisture and hold it the year round payable on demand. He acquired title to cheap railway lands, or he offered to "locate" settlers on homesteads for fees ranging from $25 to $100.

The wage slave and the tenant farmer of the East leaped hungrily to the bait, and there ensued that crusade of the innocents that shattered its ranks in vain against the stubborn desert. Heeding not the warnings of the experienced ranchers, which they held to be inspired by their selfish interests, and armed with a dry-farming manual furnished gratis by the promoter as a buckler against disaster, these knights errant of the soil essayed their high emprise of making a bushel of wheat grow where nature had produced but a tuft of bunch-grass.

During a few years conditions favored them. World War prices enabled settlers on the better lands to make ends meet and even show a margin of profit. But the fitting symbol of the whole movement was the shack which the homesteader built for his home. All houses in the dry-farming districts were "shacks" in name and most of them were that in fact. Mere little paper-lined shells they were, to be blown away at the first puff of disaster. When disaster did strike the farming industry in 1920, it transpired that the dry-farming movement was also a shell of another type, loaded with dynamite. Eastern loan companies had over-financed the movement, advancing $8, $10, even $12 per acre on lands that now go begging for purchasers at any price. It is true that these loan companies had managed to get usurious rates of interest by the expedient of withholding a good sum from the principal as a "commission" for making the loan. But that availed them nothing when the owner of the land elected to call the transaction a sale and decamped with the money, leaving the company to reimburse itself as best it might from the lands which it had accepted as security. The companies now hold the nests but the birds are flown. When the collapse came the dry-farmers who had been holding on precariously during the best years scattered to the four winds. A few restricted localities were favored with a soil actually adapted to producing crops under arid conditions, and here a remnant held on. A county agent whose business takes him into a number of dry-farming communities estimates that in the neighborhood of 10 per cent of the farmers who came in the boom period are left. In one section where originally 125 farmers settled there are five left; in another there are two left out of twenty-four. The 90 per cent who let go bettered their condition, and are now for the most part in the oil fields and railway towns, earning good wages and living better than at any time in their experience.

But he who concludes from the above recital that there is nothing left to do but to inscribe R.I.P. over the departed glories of the land is very much mistaken. For as the dry-farming industry was just about to burst like the overblown bubble it was, and as the live-stock industry was entering a temporary eclipse, a new dynamic more potent than was ever known in rangeland before entered this arena of seemingly spent forces. Far below the grass roots once considered the State's sole wealth the adventuring drills of the wild-catters discovered the miracle of petroleum. As early as the nineties there had been a small production from the shallow sand of Salt Creek, but it was not until 1914 that the presence of the deeper and richer sands was determined.

The first result was a rush of the oil companies for holdings, and a battle of giants ensued, from which the Standard group emerged victor. By virtue of its position as the owner of the only pipe-lines out of the fields in the early development, the Standard was able to throttle competition to an unusual degree. Crude prices in the Wyoming field were hammered down to a fraction of the mid-continent prices. When the product of the latter fields was selling for $3.50 per barrel during the war, the higher grade Salt Creek product was selling for around $2 per barrel. When mid-continent prices slumped to about $1, Salt Creek crude was selling for barely more than half that amount. When the independent company was not crowded to the wall by these methods, the Standard bored from within until it secured control of the majority of the stock.

In September, 1921, a faction of the independent operators under the lead of attorney George Brimmer of Rawlins demanded a special session of the legislature to enact laws curbing the monopolistic tendencies of large companies, but nothing was done, and the hold of the Standard on the oil industry of the State is practically complete.

As the oil was discovered almost entirely on Federal or State lands, the companies hold these lands under lease, paying royalties to those governments. As the laws require that the bids be open to competition, the companies sometimes fail to make previous arrangements, and there is spirited bidding. Such was the case with the famous Section 16, located in the heart of Salt Creek and owned by the State. When the date came to release in 1923, there entered the lists a defeated candidate who ascribed his downfall in the election of the previous year to Standard machinations. As a consequence the Standard interests were forced to raise the royalty for the lease of Section 16 from 35 per cent to 65 per cent of the production.

But an oil monopoly has ways and means of recouping such losses. The royalties paid to the State are largely recovered by higher charges on gasoline within the State's borders. Since the beginning of the industry, Wyoming gasoline has sold cheaper at Missouri River points than within the State. At the present time the gasoline that is selling in towns neighboring the oil fields at 21 cents per gallon is selling in Colorado at 16 cents. Glaring as this practice is, there is no concerted move to check it.

The discovery of oil did more, however, than to enrich a large corporation. It served to turn the attention of the entire State inward for the first time. At last there is a universal center of interest—Salt Creek. About that oil field and the young city of Casper which has developed from it there has crowded a population of 50,000, the first industrial center of any consequence in the State. Previously it had been a State without cities, a ragged fringe of settlements around a central desert. Economically the State had been as thoroughly partitioned into spheres of influence as ever was Poland or darkest Africa.

Due to the development of Salt Creek there is now under construction the first railway line designed to serve the interior needs of the State—the road being built by the Haskell interests from Sheridan to Casper, and is eventually to connect with the Union Pacific at Rawlins. A few days ago a request was filed for permission to build another railway north from Casper to the Montana line. Eventually Salt Creek seems destined to become the hub of a system of railways radiating to every region of the State, which will bind together all sections about this rich central empire. Then this meaningless geographical rectangle, this oblong satire on rational map-making, may become at last a unified commonwealth, a State among States, instead of a mere tribute payer to a usurious sisterhood. And then may arise the organized will to resist the exploitation of resources by monopolies without regard to the rights of the citizens.

Yet is there any assurance of such outcome? Will the imprisoned genii of the earth which were released through the casings with the roaring gas and thundering crude when the wild-catter's bit pierced the wealthy lower sands of Salt Creek effect any real social and political development? Or will the State merely experience a change of corporate allegiance, and become known as a province of Standard Oil?

Johnson Chases Coolidge

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

HIRAM JOHNSON keeps on pursuing Calvin Coolidge to try to find all the incidents possible that will prove Mr. Coolidge to be what Mr. Johnson is sure he is. Most of the time it is more or less like trying to find and catch a corner on a billiard ball.

The smooth rollings of Mr. Coolidge about the political table are broken by few public personal acts and by still fewer public personal pronouncements. Never before in our times have we had less of the President and more of those impersonal substitutes for him known as "an official spokesman for the President" and known also—and still more elusively—as "White House circles."

In any Administration a judicious loquacity by "White House circles" enables the President to test the temper of the public without undue personal responsibility for views uttered and accordingly without undue personal disadvantage from reactions received. It happens that Calvin Coolidge is capable by temperament of operating this system much more effectively than any of his recent predecessors.

He singularly is devoid of any inward impulse toward frequent outward personal lecturings of his fellow-citizens. He is not tortured by any desire to inform his fellow-citizens that such and such ideas about this and that and the other topic are throbbingly entertained by Calvin Coolidge. He most sincerely is perfectly content to be melted into the anonymity, the modesty, and the security of "White House circles."

Moreover, under his influence, when "White House circles" stand to confront the newspaper correspondents, there are no unnecessary wakings of sleeping dogs to bark unnecessarily at rhetorical stuffed sticks. There are no denunciations of the farm bloc or of the progressive group. There are no exclamations of horror about bolsheviks or radicals or strikers. There are no slivers stuck under the finger-nails of Gifford Pinchot, Frank Lowden, William G. McAdoo, Pat Harrison, or any other critic or rival. Under Calvin Coolidge the institution called "White House circles" has become as serene as the building in which it is housed and as impersonal in its manner as in its title.

Meanwhile, however, this public official presidential impersonality is consistent with a totally ceaseless activity of individual interviews with political persons and of individual letters to them. Discarding travels, discarding banquets, discarding public appearances which would require long profitless eatings and waitings and talkings and train-catchings, the President sees more people who are really politically worth seeing and writes to more people who are really politically worth writing to than any other President of our times.

The White House today is a camera through which there goes an endless motion-picture film of the personages, large and small, of the Republican politics of the whole country. If any of these personages should happen not to come to Washington he does not thereby escape the presidential eye. The secretary of the State Committee of a Western State not long ago expressed to this writer his amazement over receiving two letters from Calvin Coolidge on two slight achievements of his in local politics. He was amazed that the President could have heard of these achievements. He was amazed that the President could have unbent to noting them. Calvin Coolidge noted them apparently automatically. He is in politics. He follows politics. He likes politics. Whatever time he has off from public affairs he gives to his daily walk and to politics.

Thus while as President he is impersonal beyond precedent, it also comes about that as a politician he has spread his personal influence from rim to rim of the Republican Party throughout the country. An exasperated Democratic Senator has described him as a political fog. He does not attack a landscape. He just simply gradually pervades it; and, in the course of doing so, while finally covering it with a clinging presence, he displays to the enemy an absolute minimum of visible motions on which to train their guns.

Equipped with guns of all sizes and ranges, Hiram Johnson patrols the outskirts of this fog, eagerly eying its obscurity for the proofs of his suspicions. He suspects—in sum—that at the heart of this fog there is a cold dark reactionary determination to skin the under-dog alive and to hand his pelt over to the already heavily haired top-dog in the comfortable kennels of Wall Street, La Salle Street, State Street, Lombard Street, and other streets of bonds and bondage, both American and foreign.

At the end of many months he is able to see the following stirrings in the underbrush:

1. Mr. Coolidge has indorsed the League World Court with the faint and mild Hughes reservations.

2. Mr. Coolidge has sent Americans to sit on reparations committees where certainly nobody except a confiding idealistic political moron can think that they are wanted because of any superiority of theirs to Europeans as arithmeticians or as students of European economic conditions.

3. Mr. Coolidge has asked Congress to go back on its record and on its promise regarding adjusted compensation to ex-soldiers of the Great War.

4. Mr. Coolidge has given his approval to Mr. Mellon's plan for reducing taxes in a manner which can be thought to be a great favor to the very rich.

All four of these stirrings give Mr. Johnson sincere pangs of anger and of apprehension. They constitute for him an outright complete revelation of Mr. Coolidge's true intention to act for the benefit of the great ones of the earth abroad and at home.

The objective merits of his views I postpone to a later article. Here I wish to speak of their sources in his character. If anybody thinks that Johnson invents his views in order to manufacture issues against an adversary, he surely has watched Johnson more with passion than with candor. Johnson could have used Mr. Harding's proposed ship subsidy as a spectacularly taking argument against him. He did not do so. Happening to be in favor of a ship subsidy, he took the obloquy which came from supporting it and he denied himself, perfectly honorably, the advantage which he easily could have gained by opposing a measure so manifestly unpopular and so obviously doomed to defeat.

Johnson's views come with absolute fidelity from impulses in him which are wholly of his own heart. He hates to see the strong plundering the weak. He does not always see it when it happens, because his economic sight is far from perfect. When he does see it, however, he is enraged and undeterrable. He thinks he sees it in the League of Nations and all its works, and he thinks he sees it in the Mellon taxation plan and all its accompaniments. Thinking he sees it, he moves. That's simple, but that's all.

The Aerial Attack on the Arctic

By D. M. LEBOURDAIS

In five months, say the enthusiastic commentators on the news dispatches of the day, the Zeppelin Company will have a regular service between Spain and South America; in five years such things will come, say those who occupy what is not far from the middle road; in fifty years, said Mr. Balfour the other day at Washington. But whenever that time comes there will be in England not only those who desire to book passage by air for New York but also others who have pressing affairs awaiting them in Tokio. Then will arise the choice of routes, and there is no doubt that in the summer season at least it will be thought an absurdity for those in a hurry to go from England to Japan by way of either New York or Montreal. They will fly over the north polar ocean.

THUS wrote Vilhjalmur Stefansson two years ago in his book "The Northward Course of Empire." To those of us who compose what I may call the "Stefansson school" the recently announced intention of the Navy Department to send an aerial expedition to the polar regions next summer comes as a natural and logical step in the long and arduous course of geographical discovery and in the evolution of routes and methods of world transport. The voyage of the Shenandoah would seem to have a threefold object: the discovery of possible new lands and at least the penetration of an area hitherto unexplored—the last great unknown portion of the globe; the increase of scientific information; and the demonstration of the feasibility of aerial navigation in the polar regions. The last is by far the most important, for if it be once established the others will follow as a natural consequence.

Just the other day, at Dayton, Ohio, the Aeronautical Society of America marked the twentieth anniversary of Orville and Wilbur Wright's historic flights at Kitty Hawk, N. C., on December 17, 1903—the first really controlled flights in a heavier-than-air machine. In the short space of two decades enough of the secrets of the air have been won so that few now doubt the permanence of aviation in the world's future economy. Whether or not the Shenandoah shall fly across the Arctic Ocean will probably in no way affect the evolution of aviation in so far as the mechanics of flying are concerned. But the success of that venture must undoubtedly have a far-reaching effect upon the degree of utility to which aircraft seem capable of attainment.

The great land masses of the earth are in the Northern hemisphere with their broadest dimensions nearest the Arctic. Thus the shortest routes between the Eastern and Western hemispheres are across that comparatively small ocean. The Arctic seems destined, therefore, to become the Mediterranean of the future. It is true that the most important centers of population lie at present in the more southerly portions of the continents; but pressure of population, increasing means of communication, the overcoming of prejudice, and the dispelling of ignorance regarding climate and living conditions must inevitably result in the eventual filling of the vast vacant lands of the North, especially in Canada and Siberia. And there are even at present a number of important points between which the shortest distances are across the Arctic. Thus Tokio is about 3,500 miles nearer London over the "top of the world" than around the globe east or west.

In addition to shorter distances, the Arctic route offers many other advantages for aerial navigation, particularly for dirigibles. We shall consider only summer flying at present, although some authorities believe that winter flying will be in certain respects even more feasible. In the first place then, especially in the beginning, the practically continuous daylight will be an advantage if for no other purpose than the moral effect. But there is a much more important reason. One of the difficulties encountered in flying gas-inflated craft is caused by the expansion and contraction of the gas due to the alternation of daylight and darkness. It is not a matter of fluctuations in the temperature of the air but rather because of the heat locally generated when the sun's rays strike the surface of the airship's envelope. In polar flights both temperature and sunlight would be more nearly constant factors than in any other part of the world. In summer a dirigible could leave England in the morning, and, by proper timing, arrive in Japan without having encountered any darkness en route.

While great strides have been made in aviation it cannot be said that that stage of comparative perfection has yet been reached when air flights, of whatever length, may be undertaken without the possibility of disaster—as was so lamentably demonstrated in the case of the unfortunate Dixmude. But this is a problem of aviation generally and need not necessarily be increased in the Arctic through difficulties inherent in the polar regions. Indeed some dangers will be measurably decreased, for the floating ice-fields will provide islands of refuge such as are not to be found in other oceans. A cake of ice may not be the most pleasant spot upon which to land, but it presents unquestionable advantages over open water.

But before the Shenandoah can attempt the Arctic flight, proper, it must travel about 8,000 miles; much of that distance across a sparsely settled country where flying conditions (from the standpoint of meteorological information) are almost as little known as in the polar regions. Should the Shenandoah, however, succeed in reaching Nome safely there seems little reason to doubt that it could quite as easily cross the Arctic Ocean—barring, of course, such accidents as might occur in New Jersey, France, or elsewhere.

Much of the advance which aviation has made, excepting for the great contribution of the Wright brothers, has been due to the desire to kill, to the love of destruction surviving in the human breast; and it is therefore all the more pleasing to realize that the Navy Department is apparently actuated in this instance by the desire to advance the cause of inter-hemispheric communication and to increase the general knowledge of the world in which we live. This is further to be commended in view of the fact that, should the Shenandoah succeed, the United States will probably benefit in a direct manner to a much less degree than many other countries, notably Japan, Russia, Great Britain, and Canada.

Felipe Carrillo

By ERNEST GRUENING

FELIPE CARRILLO, Constitutional Governor of Yucatan, is dead in his forty-seventh year.

Thirty years ago, as a mere boy, he began work on the Yucatan railroads. Then he went in business for himself, hauling machinery and supplies from the railway to the haciendas. It was on these plantations that he saw Maya peons work from three in the morning until eight at night; saw them whipped into unconsciousness; saw their young daughters the prey of a lustful overseer, of the hacendado or his sons on their occasional visits from riotous living abroad. He saw men of his race dying from beatings, overwork, and undernourishment in such numbers that Yaquis had to be imported to replace them. The anguish of his people burned into Carrillo's soul. He began to preach to them their rights under the federal constitution, which forbade slavery. He translated that document into Maya. For this he was imprisoned. He escaped. A price was put on his head. For years he led a hunted existence, escaping death a score of times by the narrowest margins. But he kept on—expounding the constitution.

Yucatan, isolated from the rest of Mexico by impassable jungles, is accessible only by sea. The powerful hacendados were able to maintain their feudalism through the Madero regime, and of course through the Huerta reaction. Only in 1915 were the bonds of slavery loosed. For three years the gigantic task of emancipation was carried on with Carrillo as its apostle. "Land and liberty" was the watchword. The federal law of 1915 embodied the fundamental aspiration of the Mexican revolution—land for those who are willing to work it—and especially provided that the communal village lands stolen under the Diaz regime by the hacendados to force the remaining free workers into bondage should be restored. Carranza's appointed governor called a convention which promulgated a new state constitution modeled, as were all the other state constitutions of the time, on the federal constitution of 1917, Mexico's Magna Carta. Meanwhile Carrillo was organizing the people into "leagues of resistance," each a combination of labor union, political club, educational center, and cooperative. A great workers' congress drew up a program of evolutionary emancipation. The restoration of lands was begun.

But the hacendados were not idle. They minded the loss of a few acres from their thousands far less than the loss of their slaves. Carranza's betrayal of his revolutionary pledges in 1918 gave them their opportunity. For weeks, with the aid of federal troops, there was an open season on the recently freed serfs—especially those who appeared prominent in the new "socialist" organizations. Hundreds were killed, their houses destroyed. Their leagues were broken up, their buildings burned, their slender funds confiscated. Carrillo barely escaped with his life. Obregon ended this reign of terror. Under the protection of a federally appointed governor Carrillo returned to resume his work. In 1921 he was elected governor on the Socialist ticket in one of the first thoroughly square elections that Mexico had known. The hacendados, forced for the first time in their lives to resort to democratic methods, complained that their candidate was not getting a fair hearing from the Indians. Carrillo at once hired a special train at his own expense, turned it over to his opponent, and issued a proclamation urging all to give his rival the fullest attention. Carrillo received 60,765 votes, the hacendados' candidate 4,048, a third contestant 521. The entire Socialist legislature of fifteen deputies was likewise elected.

With a vigor and enthusiasm unprecedented in Mexican history he began his work. He put a school in every hamlet, by law compelled every hacienda to supply schoolrooms for the children of its workers, the state furnishing the teachers. A great agricultural school in Merida trained two boys from every village in the state in modern methods of farming, these pupils to return home to spread their new-found knowledge. Every league of resistance became a night school for adults. A campaign against illiteracy was carried on with the fervor of a crusade.

The agrarian reforms were carried into effect. But whereas in other Mexican states production had been seriously impaired in the process, in Yucatan not a single henequen plant was touched. Where the land around villages rightfully belonging to the natives had been planted, other uncultivated land from the edges of the great haciendas was substituted. Not a single hacendado was ruined. He was now obliged, however, to offer his workers fair wages and an eight-hour day to compete with his former peons' self-employment on their own land. There was an adequate living for all—but the days of oriental splendor built on slavery were past.

In the capital, Merida, the score of great country landlords also controlled almost the entire city real estate. With a shortage of houses rents were boosted to incredible figures, and it was pay or get out. The legislature passed laws not unlike those of New York State making eviction impossible under three months' notice, limiting the rentals to 7 per cent of the assessed value. The landlords' rage was increased when their own tax valuations were accepted as the basis for figuring the rent. A new graded tax law which bore lightly on a single house occupied by its owner, increased slightly up to five houses but became sharply prohibitive above twenty. The score who owned over fifty houses apiece were obliged by this taxation to sell or transfer their surplus houses to others. Inheritance taxes, and graded taxes on land held out of use, further infuriated the small caste that ten years before had had power of life and death in Yucatan.

Sisal, the fiber of the henequen cactus from which binder twine for the American farmer is made, suffered drastic deflation in 1921. When the price of sisal hemp slumped from its peak of eighteen cents a pound to three, and Yucatan, a one-crop state, faced the ruin that befell Cuba with its sugar, Carrillo was equal to the emergency. The legislature empowered him to handle the entire state's product. From the federal government he borrowed sufficient money to buy in the overproduction of 800,000 bales in the United States used by speculators to depress the price. By limiting production and by the economies of cooperative storage and transportation Carrillo saved the situation. Steadily the price rose till it exceeded pre-war levels. But while the industry was saved the great-landowners and recent slaveholders profited only by escaping the ruin that would have been theirs without the state's intervention. The sisal industry was also the state's chief source of revenue. There was a good living for the hacendados—but no more. The surplus went in taxes for general education and roadbuilding.

Roads, the first modern highways that Yucatan had ever known, connected its towns and villages, and pierced the jungle to the great ruined stone cities of the ancient Mayas. Pride of race, the desire to reawaken in his long-oppressed countrymen the consciousness of their past glories stimulated Carrillo to do this. His gray eyes, his straight regular features, his tall erect frame bespoke his white ancestry. But his great flashing smile and white teeth, his passionate yet gentle kindliness—these revealed the race to which his heart beat true. "Felipe Carrillo, the Socialist governor, has done more for archaeology than all the governments I have seen down here put together," said Dr. Sylvanus Morley, the Carnegie Institute's resident archaeologist. And he was able largely through Governor Carrillo's efforts to conclude an arrangement with the Mexican Government by which these ruins, neglected and crumbling since the Spanish conquest, will now be excavated and restored.

Under Carrillo the filthy Yucatan penitentiary became a penological model. Stripes and numbers were abolished, mail was no longer censored, visitors were admitted daily, and a man's wife or sweetheart allowed to spend one whole day a week with him. Education was carried on within prison walls, and each inmate was made expert in a craft of his own choosing. In the courtyard the prisoners were at work building a swimming pool.

Yucatan's new divorce law was based on Felipe Carrillo's conviction, embodied in the civil code, that "marriage is a voluntary union based on love entered into for the purpose of founding a home" and therefore "to be dissolved when either contracting party desires it." This law brought a rush of Americans but less than a score of Yucatan couples took advantage of it in the nine months since its promulgation. Birth-control information was also freely available in Yucatan, and with the assistance of Mrs. Anne Kennedy, executive secretary of the American Birth Control League, two clinics—the first to be legally established in this hemisphere—were recently opened in Merida. It was Carrillo's plan to have scientific contraceptive information made available to every newly married couple.

Felipe Carrillo's death at the hands of his and Mexico's enemies was in part due to his own kindliness and to his trust in his fellow-beings. Even after the massacres of 1918 he had refused to countenance reprisals. He believed in peaceable and democratic evolution. He had been repeatedly counseled to arm his Mayas. When the treason of De la Huerta and the bribes of the hacendados brought about the revolt of the garrison in Merida, the Maya countrymen armed with machetes were prepared to rush in to his defense. But he was unwilling to countenance the slaughter that would have preceded their victory over the soldiers' rifles. Too late he consented to send one of his trusted friends to the United States to secure fire-arms. Meanwhile he slipped quietly out of Merida to take refuge among his Indians in the country believing that the reactionary coup would be short lived. Someone betrayed his whereabouts. A rebel column attempted to capture him and he barely escaped to the coast, where a sloop was waiting. A terrific "norther" of the kind that sweep over the Gulf drove his craft back onto the rocks. He was taken and with his three younger brothers brought back to Merida. For a week they were kept in jail, then cold-bloodedly murdered. According to custom the De la Huertistas will undoubtedly pretend that he was "trying to escape," or that he was "accidentally shot during an attempted rescue," or possibly will endeavor to blame some subordinate.

Thus perished the most enlightened, the most courageous, the most lovable man in Mexico. Her tragic history of blood and tears has offered no nobler, no sweeter figure as a sacrifice to human freedom.

In the Driftway

AS Mr. Howard Carter and his helpers have penetrated further and further within the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen and as the great doors of shrine after shrine have swung out to admit them still nearer to the sanctum sanctorum, the Drifter may as well confess to a steady sinking of the heart. Now that the sarcophagus, in all its polished, rose-colored splendor, is at last exposed to view his gloom is profound. He does not, of course, deny or wish to mitigate the archaeological value of these treasures of ebony and bronze and faience and alabaster, or their desirability as objects of art; but he was unequivocally relieved when King George issued a royal edict against the last desecration: prying modern eyes, however reverently proceeding in the names of science and beauty, shall not see the Pharaoh stripped to his dry, rattling skin; the mummy clothes are to be left intact; for this little dignity left to him, let Tut-ankh-Amen take what consolation he may.

* * * * *

THIS terrible curiosity, this yearning to uncover the bones of an epoch or a king, is not peculiar to our age of scientific investigation. When in 1790 an attempt was made to locate Milton's exact burial spot in St. Giles's Church, Cripplegate, and the coffin was finally exhumed, the investigators not only opened the inner casket but made off with various souvenirs—a few hairs and some of the teeth, even a thigh bone. This seems to everyone a revolting disturbance of the peace of the dead whether renowned or not; and the Drifter is not disposed to compare with it the patient and careful work of the present Egyptologists, done for the most unselfish motives. Both affairs, however, show the curious attitudes that even the best of men have toward their heroes. If the Drifter ever again presumes to advise a young man or woman as to his or her choice of a career he will urge most strongly against heroism. "Don't be a hero, my child," he will say, "there is little in such a career while it lasts and it is as fleeting as a bird before the wind. Take the case of Master Sergeant Samuel Woodfill, recently mustered out of the army after twenty-two years and five months of service. For an act of extraordinary heroism the sergeant was acclaimed by General Pershing and his grateful countrymen the greatest hero of the World War. Yet the only reward Sergeant Woodfill received, in addition to certain decorations and medals, was the highest non-commissioned rank in the army and retirement pay for life of $133 a month. Thus does a great nation repay its heroes!"

* * * * *

A MORE recent case of the decline in a hero's standing was caused by the hero himself. A young gentleman was so unfortunate as to lose both his legs by some accident or other; his convalescence was spent among survivors of the battle of Chateau-Thierry. It is quite possible that the warriors were unduly reminiscent; at any rate the young gentleman emerged from the hospital confident that he might as well have fought in the battle himself—and willing to accept the numerous favors which kind-hearted ladies were eager to shower on a wounded soldier. His bogus heroism has just been exposed and the ladies are feeling very sad at the duplicity of the human race; but how, one wonders, does Sergeant Woodfill feel, or Tut-ankh-Amen, or the second-greatest English poet? The answer, and it is not an unconsoling one, is that the two last-named great ones do not care a broken bone button; and that is the end of heroism, after all.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

[Letters to the Editor should ordinarily not exceed 500 words, and shorter communications are more likely to be printed. In any case the Editor reserves the right to abridge communications.]

The Spirit of Arthur Gleason

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A few weeks ago the French liberals sustained an irreparable loss through the death of M. Philippe Millet; now it is the American liberals who have to mourn the passing of one of the ablest and finest spirits in their ranks, Arthur Huntington Gleason.

Few men in their own personal experience have disclosed more completely the transformation of spirit brought by the war than Arthur Gleason. At the moment when the struggle broke he was in England. Despite his scanty means he obtained an automobile, transported it to Belgium, and in the confused hours of the first month rendered gallant service in the rescue of the wounded, risking his own life unhesitatingly and at least once nearly losing it, when captured by the Germans.

A little later, when the lines hardened, he was at work on the battlefield of Ypres bringing British wounded from the frozen Flanders fields, while his wife rendered similar service in the first-line trenches of the Belgians behind the Yser. For these services Mr. Gleason earned the right to wear the Mons Star, while Mrs. Gleason was decorated by the King of the Belgians personally.

In 1915 Mr. Gleason returned to America, and by his speeches and his writings contributed incalculably to awakening American minds to the meaning of the struggle. The late Colonel Roosevelt found in his testimony, already embodied in the famous Bryce report, the single eye-witness proof of much that had been asserted without supporting evidence.

But it was characteristic of Mr. Gleason, as of many other liberals, that, deeply as he shared with all his pro-Ally friends the belief that the defeat of Germany was essential to the realization of all democratic hopes, the very progress of the war and the disclosure of secret and selfish national purposes early caught his attention and aroused his apprehension.

When America entered the war he and his wife both gave all their time and their effort through Y.M.C.A. channels to serving the first American regiments to reach Europe. But even at this time there was already forming in Gleason's mind the resolve to contribute as he might to the realization of those hopes which, as a liberal, the war had roused for him.

With prophetic insight he turned to the British labor movement as holding out the best promise. In England, after the close of the struggle he met and talked with Ramsay MacDonald, Arthur Henderson, Smillie, Hobson, with precisely the men who are now rising to power and world prominence. He inspired their confidence, he shared their hopes; more than that, in at least three books he set forth, years in advance of the fact, a picture of the new political Britain which was to come and has now arrived.

Returned to America, he suffered as many of his faith for those ideas which in the post-war period were still judged with war-time passion. He, who had endured every conceivable danger, faced every kind of peril that war could bring—capture by the enemy, drowning when his ship was torpedoed—found himself assailed because he did not hesitate in peace to serve the same cause which had been his throughout the war.

In a sense he never recovered from the strain and privation of the war. He had given without thought of his strength, of his slender resources, and beyond all else of his spirit. In the America to which he returned after his British experiences he found it difficult to adjust himself, and that service which he had still to render was not infrequently impeded by stupid passion and unreasoning prejudice.

Yet he found his place. What he accomplished later is known to all who are familiar with such service as is disclosed in The Nation and the Survey. When death at last overtook him; when, more exactly, his last reservoir of strength had been exhausted, he was hard at work upon a new study of child labor, while a brief vacation which just preceded his death had been interrupted characteristically because he found at his hand work that he felt must be done and that he could do.

There is, perhaps, nothing harder to define than the term "liberal," yet I have never met in my life any man who combined within himself more of the qualities which seem to belong to those who profess that faith. He had a courage in the face of danger which was rare, and with great physical bravery he possessed equal gentleness. He fought the German because the German seemed to him to threaten the things in the world which he loved; but, fighting the German, his main activity was that of rescuing the wounded and caring for the suffering.

He was not, however, satisfied that the war should be won on the battlefield. It meant for him something spiritual even more than physical. Long before the victory came, his eyes had begun to turn toward the use which was to be made of the triumph. He gave his best to win the war, but he turned from battlefield victory with new energy to the preservation of those things which alone, for him, justified the suffering, the agony, the tragedy.

Only those who knew Arthur Gleason at all well could realize the remorselessness with which he sacrificed himself to the cause to which, quite without pretentious statement, he had dedicated himself. The last ten years of his life were spent in unbelievable wanderings; nothing of the ease, comfort, peace which all men seek at least a little was known to him because always there was one more task to be accomplished. In the end he gave his life just as unmistakably as if he had fallen on one of the many battlefields on which he had served.

Men gave him their confidence, children their affection; there was always about him something a little unworldly. Simple, modest, silent, yet he gave the impression of possessing a vision, a spiritual elevation, something of the mystic, and, when it was a question of wrong to be fought, a shade of the fanatic. And with the vision went a certain sadness, inevitable in one who understood so well and sympathized so deeply with those who suffered unjustly and unfairly.

American liberalism has had no finer expression than that which is furnished by the life and work of Arthur Gleason.

Washington, D. C., December 31

FRANK H. SIMONDS

Pennsylvania Committee for Amnesty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read your interesting article in The Nation of January 2, summarizing the campaign for amnesty. I am writing to call your attention to a special group which did valiant and indispensable work in this campaign and which Mr. DeSilver neglected to mention. This is the Pennsylvania Committee for Political Prisoners. Besides its cooperation in every branch of amnesty activity, this committee undertook the full financial responsibility for the campaign from October, 1922. Headquarters which had been opened in Washington during the winter of 1921-1922 had been virtually closed for many months owing to lack of funds, when the members of the Philadelphia committee agreed to raise what was needed to reopen headquarters with a staff of workers. The committee has never failed at any time to respond most generously when funds were needed. More than half of the money expended nationally on amnesty for the fourteen months preceding its accomplishment was contributed through the efforts of this committee, whose expenses were guaranteed during that whole period by Edmund C. Evans, chairman of the executive committee, together with Mrs. Evans and Miss Ellen Winsor.

Washington, D. C., December 29 GILSON GARDNER,
Chairman Joint Amnesty Committee

In Defense of Lying

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Did you ever see a franker defense of lying than the following editorial from this morning's Boston Herald:

The New York Nation is unduly severe in its obituary editorial on John R. Rathom of the Providence Journal, in declaring that "Muncheausen was a tyro by comparison; yet his stories went all over the country and are doubtless still believed by multitudes."

It is, of course, true, as most well-informed people now understand, that the Rathom disclosures, which made the Providence Journal famous during the war, were fiction, Rathom himself acknowledged their falsity or such a degree of exaggeration that it equaled falsity, under compulsion of the United States Government. . . . But Rathom did all this for the praiseworthy purpose of arousing his countrymen to a war fury. He took one of the practical ways of doing so. When pressed by the Department of Justice with the realities in the matter, he blandly asked if the Germans were not doing things similar to those which he had pictured. And, on getting an affirmative reply, he answered: "What was the harm then in giving the people an equivalent to the reality?" His idea was that fiction cognate to the facts would serve an entirely justifiable purpose.

This is all a part of the war game and will be as long as war lasts as a means of settling disputes. Intensity of hatred against an enemy in arms is one of the ways of arousing a people to their sternest endeavors, and so long as that aim is a necessary one there will be an inevitable credoning of means of reaching it. Mr. Rathom, an intrepid journalist of originality and force, merely "played the game."

Brookline, Mass., December 29

A. D.

A Fable

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Once upon a time a Secretary of State who was somewhat of a Prohibitionist and not unlike a comic picture of a Bolshevik raised a dreadful outcry in the Capitol—"That Soviet Russia was topsy-turvy, that men and women were walking with their feet uppermost, that unless prompt steps were taken the United States would be likewise, that things in general were on the high road to the devil, and that the red flag would soon be flying over the White House."

As the people only laughed at him he cried the louder and more vehemently; at last he began reproducing copies of an article from a sixteen-months-old Russian newspaper that looked to the average American like a sheet of jazz music notes.

Two good-natured senators, Norris and Borah, hearing the commotion, went up, took the Secretary of State by the haunches, and, softly inverting his position, set him down—on his feet. His mind was staggered not a little by this operation, and when it cleared he rubbed his eyes and cried: "So it was not Soviet Russia that was topsy-turvy then, but I that was standing on my head, broadcasting through my hat."

Brooklyn, N. Y., December 28 THOMAS F. HASTINGS

Books

Knowledge Rehumanized

The Humanizing of Knowledge. By James Harvey Robinson. George H. Doran Company. $1.50.

IN this little book the author of "Mind in the Making" tells us that whereas conformity to human wishes was once the standard of truth, modern science has given us a mass of dehumanized knowledge, that there is now an "organized opposition to the scientific view of man's place in the natural order"—ostensive cases of which are Bryanism and fundamentalism—that there is a widespread and instinctive hostility to the scientific attitude, that our educational methods often widen instead of close the great gap between science and life, and then he indicates the ways and methods by which knowledge can be rehumanized and democratized.

Nothing could be more timely, and the author emphasizes his thesis with a wealth of illustrations, a cogency of argument, and a style that is both convincing and stimulating. Many of his most thoughtful and intelligent readers will in their hearts pay him the supreme compliment of wishing that they could have seen and said what he does.

Yet, on a second careful reading (which this book will amply justify), many will wish the author had gone further. He might, e.g., have given us a valuable chapter on what has been done in his own field of history to simplify and bring home the lessons of the past since and including Wells, Van Loon's stories of Mankind and of the Bible, Reinach's masterly "Short History of Christianity," Hart's "We and Our History," Stawell and Marvin's "The Making of the Western Mind," Howard Pyle's "Book of the American Spirit," not excluding such highly imaginative interpretations of pre-history as Jensen's "The Long Journey," and he might have added a descriptive bibliography of other pedagogical masterpieces to guide those who would read, and to show just how far his own department has gone toward rehumanizing itself. Surely this is not too much to ask of one so competent, and surely, too, the story of the revolution of the ideals of what Droysen long ago formulated as historiography from Stubbs and Freeman down to the present, shows that history has gone farther along the way of the higher pedagogy on the road of humanization than any other department.

But the humanization of knowledge has its limits, and is often harder than the humanization of industry. It is nearly forty years since I, a layman in mathematics, began to try to understand N-dimensional space, and within the last four years I have spent laborious hours on at least a score of attempted explanations of Einstein, and all this with hardly a glimmer of satisfying insight to reward me. Its truth probably consists exactly in its inhuman and deanthropomorphic nature. Epistemologists tell us that all knowledge is a form of self-knowledge. Einstein must be an exception. It is evident that much knowledge must and more should remain esoteric and cannot be vulgarized. Moreover, there is a conception of knowledge without its substance that is dangerous, and there is much that must be accepted solely on authority, as I accept Einstein. Again, there is at the bottom of every society a kind of incipient moronarchy that resists wisdom, and tends in its presence to react to outgrown stages of culture by way of self-preservation; for nothing is so dangerous as big ideas in little minds, and most little minds instinctively know this danger, and resent big ideas in order to keep their poise and sanity. We cannot exclude anyone from our schools or forbid him to learn to read, and yet there are many who would be healthier in mind and body, happier, and probably more desirable citizens without schools or letters. Knowledge is power, but, if unassimilated, it may become a source of weakness.

The case of the crass spiritualists, fundamentalists, and evolution-phobiacs seems somewhat different. These are all deft in the use of defense-mechanisms. They are by no means morons, but well-meaning and, for the most part, intelligent people, who, perhaps, deep down below consciousness, feel that with all the other calls upon their intellects which modern civilization makes, they cannot stand the added strain that would be involved in a mental adjustment to science, the higher criticism, and biology, and so regress to an earlier, easier point of view which they seek to justify by whatever resources of rationalization they can command.

Ignorance is often the way of sanctification, and when we have a mental hygiene that can prescribe all the attitudes proper for each temperament and each degree of capacity, ignorance may, for some, become a perfectly legitimate prescription.

Every soul has a deep instinct regulative of the degree of sophistication best for it, and this instinct should not only be recognized and respected but developed, as some psychoanalysts are beginning to prescribe certain religions as best fitted for certain of their cases. Even Father Jasper and a successor of Dowie, who preached a pre-Copernican astronomy, may save certain souls; and statesmen, not one of whom will probably accept Wiggam's "New Decalogue of Science," will remain pre-Darwinian from the same deep instinct of preserving their sanity, which would be jeopardized by such revolutionary reconstructions as he urges them to undertake.

Mental tests which are now in their infancy will one day include answers to such questions as—what do you think of Eddyism, spiritualism, the higher criticism, fundamentalism, evolution of the human body and psyche, and answers to these questions will contribute to an intelligence quotient more broadly based and a by no means insignificant determinant of psychological age. But we must never forget the many analogies which analytic psychology is now finding between forcing ideas upon unwilling minds and the more readily acknowledged crime of impregnation by force.

The great merit of this book is that it is bristling with stimulating suggestions in many directions and raises far more questions than it answers.

G. STANLEY HALL

The Irrelevant Sixth Act

Weeds. By Edith Summers Kelley. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

WITHOUT being tremendously original in either style or feeling, Miss Kelley's story of the tobacco growers hidden away among the Kentucky hills is thoroughly sound, and leaves upon the reader a genuinely sober impression. It is written by one who is obviously saturated with the life she is describing, but in addition it has a certain largeness which gives weight beyond that belonging to the mere regional study. Miss Kelley knows her people—their simplicity, their kindness, and their profound sense of the futility of effort which results in what unsympathetic observers call their "shiftlessness"; she knows too what it means to be "close to the soil" when the soil is bad and the Mother Nature of the poets is a capricious and avaricious harriidan from whom bare sustenance can be wrung only by unremitting toil and who is likely at any moment to withdraw by drought, flood, or pestilence what she has so grudgingly allowed to be taken from her; both these things Miss Kelley sets forth in sound and methodical narrative, but at the same time she gives general significance to her work by making it clear that this people is interesting not chiefly because of the strangeness of their story but because it is only a slightly different version of the common story of humanity. The pity we feel for them is not the supercilious pity we have for an inferior race; their predicament is too much like ours for that, and they are too much like ourselves.

It is not merely that, as the author says, "No decadent court ridden with lust of power, greed, vice, and intrigue, and falling to pieces of its own rottenness, ever moved under a thicker atmosphere than that which brooded over the little shanty where these four fresh-checked young country people stood stripping tobacco," for there is a common element more important than that: in the Kentucky hills underfed youth may feel a little less intensely the hopeless rebelliousness which drives men to a vain struggle against the flatness of life, and people may pass less protestingly along the descent from the eagerness of youth to the acquiescence of age, but everywhere they pass, and the traps which nature sets in Kentucky present only easily recognizable variants of her universally triumphant technique. Hence the story which tells how Judy was disappointed by life is the story of all women.

Just as I, personally, should care little for her story if it were merely local, so also should I care little for it if the heroine were really, as the publishers describe her, "a woman born among these surroundings but as alien to them as Burns was to his Calvinistic neighbors." It is true that novelists who describe primitive people have in general a curiously perverse habit of insisting that their central character is "different" and of defeating their purpose of interpreting simple life by endowing farm hands with genius or presenting us with servant girls (vide Miss Hurst) who have a taste for imagist verse; but it is one of the best proofs of the soundness of Miss Kelley's method that she does nothing of the sort. She does give Judy just enough more health and energy than the common run of her kind to make it evident that her defeat was worth concerning oneself about. But it is the facts, first, that the story of her people is essentially the story of all people, and, second, that Judy can stand for her kind, which give to the book its largeness and make it not merely pathetic and quaint but genuinely tragic.

Miss Kelley's theme—the gradual dissipation of the glamor of youth, love, and life, and the gradual coming on of the light of common day—is one which seems to have a particular impressiveness for people of today and one also which the novel alone can adequately express. A play must come to a definite conclusion, but the essence of the tragedy of life is that life does not. When a hero is stabbed in the back and the stage is strewn with bodies, things have at least come to an end and we are cleanly done with them, but in life we must live on through the interminable irrelevance of a sixth act, and the most painful part is the anti-climax which must be endured. Sooner or later all must share the blank disappointment of Lear's "Is this the promised end?" but few are fortunate enough to have death close at hand. Perhaps because of the possibilities of the novel form, perhaps for some other reason, the essence of tragedy has come to be in the conception of something which goes on instead of in something which stops, and at least this idea is more actual, because nothing is more characteristic of life than its neglect of the dramatic principles and its refusal to cease when it has no longer any significance. Judy, when life has lost its savor, meditates:

She would go on for her allotted time bearing and nursing babies and rearing them as best she could. And when her time of childbearing was over she would go back to the field, like other women, and set tobacco and worm and top tobacco, shuck corn and plant potatoes. Already people were beginning to call her Aunt Judy. Some day she would be too old to work in the field and would sit all day in the kitchen in the winter and on the porch in summer shelling beans or stripping corn from the cob. She would be "grandmammy" then.

The idea here expressed might be found in dozens of contemporary novels, but it expresses perfectly our idea of the essence of tragedy and is as fundamental to us as the idea of the "fall of princes" was to the Middle Ages.

"Weeds" does not owe its distinction to its very successful presentation of the peculiarities of an odd people, but to its presentation in an unfamiliar aspect of a general truth.

J. W. KRUTCH

Evolution

The Unity of Science. By Dr. Johan Hjort. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Emergent Evolution. By C. Lloyd Morgan. Henry Holt and Company. $3.25.

The Coming of Man. By John M. Tyler. Marshall Jones Company. $2.

Evolution and Religion. By Henry Fairfield Osborn. Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.

IN spite of Mr. Bryan and the fundamentalists, the theory of evolution continues to satisfy the scientific mind. In fact, Johan Hjort in his little book on "The Unity of Science" does not find it necessary to discuss the subject at all with a view to establishing it. More specifically he is concerned with the problem of unifying the physical and the biological sciences. There has in fact been an increasing tendency, since the theory of evolution has made itself felt, toward the belief that the great distinction between dead and living things is due merely to the imperfection of our knowledge and not to any difference in principle between the things themselves. The great complexity of structure exhibited by living things in contrast to non-living matter is to be attributed solely to the fact that in the development of the sciences, historically, organic structure was studied carefully years before the structure of the molecule was contemplated at all and that complexity of phenomena and structure is dependent upon the closeness with which the subjects are investigated.

Both the physical and biological sciences, by the nature of the human mind, are unable to dissociate form and function. It is only by this combination of the two conceptions that we have a starting-point for investigation. The physicist requires a system which acts, the biologist demands an organization which functions. "Things are to us only what science teaches us they are, so that science must always be the Alpha and Omega of philosophy."

Lloyd Morgan in his Gifford Lectures for 1922 on "Emergent Evolution" stresses the "incoming of the new" such as the advent of life, of mind, and of reflective thought which finds its perfection in Deity. Indeed, he confesses that he can form no adequate conception of God "in isolation from the world, apart from the emergent quality of Deity." Emergent evolution, of course, demands that the process of evolution is not simply the regrouping of preexisting events and characters and nothing more. It assumes that new qualities are more than the resultants of those which have existed before. A simple illustration of the phenomenon of emergency is to be seen in the incoming of new qualities in chemical compounds which did not exist in any of the separate elements making up the compound and which could not be predicted from the fullest possible knowledge of them. Morgan holds that in the evolution of living matter from inorganic new and unpredictable qualities arose that justify the distinction made between the physical and biological sciences and remove the living organism from the realm of the mechanical. At the same time, however, that the author protests against the mechanistic interpretation of life, he is opposed to invoking an extra-natural force or vitalism just as he is opposed to invoking a crystalism to interpret the phenomena of crystals. From the point of view of emergent evolution, nature must be as a whole referred back to a ground plan of ultimate basal events beyond which the philosopher seems to be unable to go, namely, to the idea of space-time. From this conception, involving only extent and duration, "emerged" matter with a whole new set of relations which the physicist and chemist are trying to establish. This was followed by the emergence of life with still other relations which are not to be referred simply to mechanics and chemistry. Consciousness was the next emergent, followed finally by reflective mind. It must be admitted that the lectures are extremely difficult to follow and that the ideas of the lecturer are frequently obscure. He maintains the position that "in the acknowledgment of God an ultimate philosophical explanation, supplementary to scientific interpretation, is to be found."

John M. Tyler of Amherst has written a very simple and readable account of the evolution of the human race in which the evolution of mind and morality and religious belief receives rather more attention than is usual in books of this kind. Every stage ushers in something new, according to Mr. Tyler, in which philosophy he is in agreement with Lloyd Morgan, but each higher power in the course of evolution "begins its career as servant of the lower; then evolution becomes revolution, and the yoke of the lower is thrown off." Mr. Tyler holds that mankind is just entering upon the dynasty of personality which is secure and permanent, in spite of what he makes painfully clear in a later chapter, that in the course of organic evolution dominance has been incompatible with progress. Throughout the geological ages the dominant group has always given way to some other form apparently weaker and less fit but with capacities which in turn have made that form dominant for a time. "The fittest is always the parent, never the child of the dominant."

Little need be said regarding Osborn's "Science and Religion." Unlike Mr. Bryan there are probably no readers of The Nation who need to be shown that for the evolutionist "God is not removed from the universe but the wonder, the mystery, and the marvelous order which we call Natural Law is greatly increased."

BEVERLY W. KUNKEL

Stephen Crane

Stephen Crane; A Study in American Letters. By Thomas Beer. With an Introduction by Joseph Conrad. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MR. BEER has told the story of Stephen Crane not as if it were a romance, which it certainly was not, but as if it were a realistic novel. A good deal of romancing has been done about this strange and honest genius who blazed across the sky from 1895 to 1900. The truth which Mr. Beer now tells, like the truth which Crane as an artist always insisted upon the right to tell, is more fascinating than most fiction. If the book is indeed a novel, and it reads like one from the first page to the last, it is the sort which Crane might have written about himself had he had the inclination and had he known as much about himself as his biographer does.

Mr. Beer's identification with his subject extends even to details of language and manner. Hardly a paragraph lacks the peculiar nervous organization which Crane's intensity and irony gave to all his work. Mr. Beer is sardonic as Crane was sardonic, and his observation is deadly. There is a new fact in every sentence; all is apt, and all is valuable. Crane once defined an artist as "nothing but a powerful memory that can move itself at will through certain experiences sideways"—that is to say, Crane was a modernist in that he liked the slanting touch. He was an imagist before imagism existed. He said a bad egg had a "snarling smell." The whistling of the American soldiers in Cuba was "a jumble of Chinese lanterns in a fog." Some notes from Debussy were "windows in a train at night going over the edge of a plain." Mr. Beer writes in the same key, for he remarks that Crane's brain had a "tearing intensity," that "his opinions squirted out in shocking jets," and that criticism in America has always resembled "a wavering lady in a dark crinoline, prudently girdled with chaste iron."

What is more important, he composes his data into a narrative almost as vivid as "The Red Badge of Courage," "The Open Boat," or "The Blue Hotel." With a novelist's skill he swiftly assembles all the knowable details of Crane's imaginative life and makes them tell. He reconstructs the ironical talk about the Civil War which any sensitive American child might have heard in the seventies and eighties. He mentions merely in passing that Crane at thirteen saw a white girl stabbed by her Negro lover and at eighteen was given a copy of Tolstoi's "Sevastopol"; that later he haunted the Bowery in New York, wrote too well to be a success as a newspaperman, heard Howells read Emily Dickinson's poems, looked into Zola's "Le Débâcle" and thought it crude, dismissed all of Mark Twain's books except "Life on the Mississippi," "loved babies, horses, oceans, or anything that offered an enigmatic surface to his thought," and felt the snobbery of Henry James to be "horrible! damnable!" With an artist's zeal he conducts researches into Crane's instinctive dislikes—for Tennyson, Stevenson, St. Paul, Frances Willard, Mrs. Humphry Ward, Frank R. Stockton, Frances Hodgson Burnett, Lillian Russell, Hall Caine, Barrie, Kipling, and the poetry of Oscar Wilde. This is a commendable record for a comparatively untutored American youth of the eighties and nineties, and it is well worth preserving.

Mr. Beer's narrative, once more like "The Red Badge of Courage," contains dozens of episodes which stand distinct and brilliant in the memory—the affair with Miss Trent, for instance, and the publication of "Maggie"—and it pauses now and then to hit off a minor character with amazing accuracy—Richard Watson Gilder, Howells, James, Richard Harding Davis, or Harold Frederic. The result in the end is a biography of the first order, as fresh and convincing as anything that has been done in its class for years. Crane himself must live henceforth as one of America's least forgettable literary heroes—a story-writer and poet who fought with singularly clear purpose against an indifferent generation and emerged a genius whom no one now can have the stupidity to deny.

MARK VAN DOREN

Now I Can Tell You

Adventures in Journalism. By Philip Gibbs. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

PHILIP GIBBS is a magnificent journalist. He is a fascinating story-teller, with a pictorial vision, and an extraordinary sensitiveness to the wants of his audience. Each passing moment thrills him, and he has the power of communicating his thrill with a sentimental melancholy which heightens its effect. These autobiographical sketches reveal the man and his gift, sometimes with unconscious cruelty.

"'You know,' he [the mayor of Bournemouth] told me in a moment of candor, 'I always treat journalists as though they were gentlemen.' For some time I disliked all mayors because of that."

That naive snobbery smiles condescendingly at one from page after page. Fat Jews distress Sir Philip Gibbs; he sickens at the "squalor" of modern stories of love and murder such as he would admire if they were medieval; his patronizing enthusiasm at his discovery of human qualities in the lower classes is immense. He devotes pages to an account of Jean Jaurès, laboring under the impression that he was a trade-union leader, and never troubles to realize that the New Economic Policy in Russia had been in effect for months before he discovered it when he "covered" the famine in the autumn of 1921.

The war was the great emotional experience of his life. It is the refrain to every paragraph. One cannot help feeling that Sir Philip Gibbs rather enjoyed riding in his own car up and down along the front and telling the British people what they were allowed to know of its glory and its horror. He has no regrets at the manner of his reporting. "We identified ourselves absolutely with the armies in the field. . . . There was no need for censorship of our dispatches. We were our own censors." "Day by day the English-speaking world was brought close in spiritual touch with their fighting-men, and knew the best, if not the worst, of what was happening in the field of war. . . . I verily believe that without our chronicles the spirit of the nation would not have maintained its greatness of endeavor and sacrifice." And, he might have added, would not have howled for a Carthaginian peace and have brought ruin on Europe. But he did not add it; he does not see it even today, after he has written "Now It Can Be Told."

No, these Now-We-Can-Tell-You men do not care a whit for truth. If there came another war Philip Gibbs would again think to himself, "Now it is for me to decide what fragments of the truth the world should hear. God has appointed me to select and sift, to be my own censor, and to tell the dolts at home enough to make them continue courageously slaughtering each other." And he would do it brilliantly.

It is precisely Philip Gibbs's faults which make him so magnificent a journalist.

LEWIS GANNETT

Vox Populi

As I Like It. By William Lyon Phelps. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

FOR many years William Lyon Phelps has been the chief exponent in this country of the principle of loving-kindness in literary criticism. American criticism has seldom been betrayed by its amiability. So it has been Mr. Phelps's distinction ever to have ready "the social smile, the sympathetic tear."

In "As I Like It"—a collection in book form of Mr. Phelps's monthly pronouncements upon books, plays, and Things in General in Scribner's Magazine—he draws his own literary portrait by way of apologia. "I am enthusiastic about good things," he says. "And I dislike controversy because it usually leads no-whither." As for "the majority of recent novels"—"I have no wish to advertise rubbish by attacking it."

Now whether or no one likes a program of enthusiasm about good things, and of silence on the rest, joined with high ethical standards regarding the advertising of current literature, Mr. Phelps has developed a great public which does like it, and which has unquestionably been conducted toward self-knowledge, serenity, and the higher literacy by this mixture of altruism and criticism. A natural fellow-feeling for humankind, and an acquired versatility in taste and experience have given Mr. Phelps such jocund qualities of personality as have won for him the greatest extra-mural influence enjoyed by any American academician. Perhaps he has sat upon more than his share of chalk eggs. But, like William Howard Taft, he is always a good loser. As he likes it, we like it. His is the firmly established judgment on A. S. M. Hutchinson, the best short story of 1922, the younger generation, the greatest living American, William T. Tilden, 2d, and cats. His is the gentle art which makes literature the handmaiden of anecdote; his the mellow guidance to good things of the mind which graces the new book jackets from month to month, from year to year, telling a story forever old, yet ever new. "Securus judicat orbis terrarum."

GERALD HEWES CARSON

Books in Brief

Letters from W. H. Hudson, 1901-1922. Edited and with an Introduction by Edward Garnett. E. P. Dutton and Company. $7.

Most of these interesting and characteristic letters to Mr. Garnett are about books which Hudson had been reading, either at the instigation of his correspondent or of his own free will. Those who know him only as a naturalist will be surprised by the width of his reading, though doubtless not by its depth. His opinions here, frankly and often caustically expressed, compose a kind of running commentary on the literature contemporary with his last twenty years, and as such have value even outside of the fact that they are associated with him. It is to be hoped that other volumes of Hudson correspondence come to light—particularly some that are earlier and less literary—but the great writer was latterly a very secretive man, and Mr. Garnett says he called in many letters before he died and destroyed them.

Bursting Bonds. Enlarged edition of "The Heir of Slaves."

By William Pickens. The Jordan and More Press.

A black man in America lives a vastly more exciting life than a white man. To read Mr. Pickens's story of his life is to experience some of the semi-evil thrills which accompany stories of polar explorations and adventures at sea. The story of his ride in a Pullman from St. Louis to Little Rock is a minor American saga; the story of his determined progress from an Arkansas share-farm to prize orator and Phi Beta Kappa man at Yale is another.

Mississippi Valley Beginnings: An Outline of the Early History of the Earlier West. By Henry E. Chambers. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.50.

Mr. Henry E. Chambers has attempted to correlate the monographic literature on the history of the Great Valley that the reader may be enabled to follow in its broader aspects the forces, favorable and antagonistic, which have formed this new civilization. This is a perfectly legitimate motive for writing a book and the result might be a brilliant contribution to American history. Mr. Chambers was evidently not the man to undertake the work. His knowledge of the monographic literature is very limited and he clings too tenaciously to time-honored traditions. The trained historian, even with a limited knowledge of western history, will find nothing valuable for him in the volume, nor is it possible to imagine what use a lay reader will discover in a perusal of the author's numerous errors of omission and commission.

Tea and Art

THE tea smelled delicious. As one lady in the jam remarked, the sandwiches looked very pretty. Mr. Frank Crowninshield, the genial editor of Vanity Fair, held the floor. He was borne about like a graceful autumn leaf, now here, now there, on the soft red carpet. The thing really had got out of control. The half a dozen liveried men-in-waiting were borne under too. There were ladies sitting in a row behind the long table in the hall, holding tea cups and eating. There were ladies trying to get to the table. Other ladies were arriving every minute, were being discharged by the elevator—this was the fourth floor—and some of the ladies were coming out of the long red-carpeted rooms. All moved toward the long white table. No one seemed willing to leave it.

But Mr. Crowninshield did his best, even as the crowd grew. Mr. Crowninshield had charmingly let it be understood that this was to be quite an exclusive—"shindig" was the word he used—only 1,500 invitations—but as there was no one to take up the cards, any number of people might have tried to come, up to 3,000. Of course the rooms couldn't have held that many people all at once. But there was every reason why a multitude should want to come. For there was the possibility of seeing, even of brushing elbows with the committee, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, Mr. Clarence H. Mackay, Mrs. John H. Hammond, Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin—but there, it isn't necessary to mention all the names. Mr. Heywood Brown was on the committee too.

There were times when you looked for Mr. Crowninshield and he was invisible. One lady wore a tall black hat, it looked like a section of stovepipe, or something from the Russian—or might it have been Swedish?—ballet. She could easily have been in the way. You never could have seen Mr. Crowninshield if he had been behind her. Some ladies wore bright orange plumes, leopard-skin coats, brilliant smiles, and brilliant white teeth. The rooms were simply jammed, with everybody either standing about talking or moving slowly into doorways that clogged up with streams of people coming from opposite directions. You would have thought no more people could possibly get inside, but the elevator continued to bring more.

It was mainly to see Mr. Joseph Pennell that the crowd had come. Mr. Pennell is the man who can make etchings while he lectures, or lecture while he etches, I forget which, and the things sell for—I forget how much. Most of the people who had come there must have come to see Mr. Pennell. He is a distinguished-looking person, tall and stooping, and he has a queer little twisty beard, one twist to a side. There was a white plaster head of Mr. Pennell there. It was on a pedestal, high enough, so that if no particularly interesting Paris creation got in the way, it could be seen from the floor. Someone brushed up against one of the pedestals—you could hardly help it there was such a jam—and a head fell off, but was immediately picked up and put back. Luckily it was of bronze and not the plaster head of Mr. Pennell.

Only a few people failed to enter into the spirit of the occasion. Some of them went about with that strained look that comes of trying to understand a painting you don't like. One man remarked that that thing would give him nightmares. And he laughed a perfectly horrid laugh. I didn't notice which thing he was talking about, for he was facing me and I was standing with my back to two paintings of Mr. George Luks. Mr. Pennell can only lecture and etch, or vice versa, whereas Mr. Luks can paint a portrait while lecturing. The catalogue announced: "Saturday evening, January fifth, Mr. George Luks will paint a portrait before his audience, and will talk about portrait painting." It's easy if, like Mr. George Luks, you know how. But Mr. Pennell was not left out of the running altogether. "Saturday evening, January twenty-sixth, Mr. Mahonri Young will model a portrait of Mr. Joseph Pennell from life, and will talk about sculpture."

It was a moot question, though, whether Mr. Pennell was there. The shindig—to use Mr. Crowninshield's apt word—lasted for three full hours, from 3 to 6—and Mr. Pennell might have slipped in and out without being noticed. So, many of the 1,500 invited guests must have been deeply disappointed at not having even a little glimpse of him. Mr. Pennell, it should be said, is secretary of the New Society of Artists and the tea was given at the Anderson Galleries on their varnishing day, to open their Fifth Exhibition. There were numbers of paintings—184 items including the sculpture—item number 184 being a portrait bust of Joseph Pennell by Mahonri Young. However, no one could be expected to look at paintings during such an interesting affair. Some few people did try to, but they failed to get the spirit of the thing.

HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

Drama Mountain Comedy

HOW far taste in the theater has moved from the school of Denman Thompson toward a more civilized and sophisticated art appears in two comedies just produced in New York which deal, both of them, with communities which it would have been almost impossible a generation ago to represent on the American stage without making them the playground for rustic sentimentalism or backwoods melodrama. Percy MacKaye's "This Fine-Pretty World" (Neighborhood Playhouse) has, it is true, its touches of sentimentalism, and Hatcher Hughes's "Hell-Bent for Heaven" (Klaw Theater) its touches of melodrama: but neither has the air of exploiting its material or of condescending to it. Mr. MacKaye has worked with his Kentucky mountaineers in something of the manner, obviously, which Synge employed with his Aran islanders. He went among them in search of the folk-elements which he feels are being driven out of most parts of the United States by the leveling march of the machine. What he found carried him back not merely to a certain primitive mode of life; it carried him back also to a certain poetic, because direct and individual, habit of viewing life. The action of his play is content to be as naive as an Irish comedy: a baby is carried off in a sack by a man who thinks he has a pig; to get rid of his wife a husband plots with the neighborhood ne'er-do-well to defame her in a "noration" to which he invites the public; there is a trial scene in which a convenient coffin is used as a witness-box. But this naive action wholly lacks that look of vulgar quaintness which it might have had if Mr. MacKaye had merely gone pot-hunting for eccentricities to amuse Broadway. Before he wrote a line he had made himself as much as possible a native of these mountains, and he writes as from within the confidence of their people, in a language of quite extraordinary richness and variety.

If Mr. MacKaye is primarily a poet, taking a poet's liberty with his material and enlarging it with all the gifts at his command, Mr. Hughes is a satirist, bringing to bear upon his theme a shrewd and humane intelligence. Rufe Pryor is a highland fanatic, a Baptist Tartufe, a fundamentalist Iago. Too cowardly to fight, too indolent to work, too effeminate not to be forever hiding behind sympathetic petticoats, he is, his chief victim says, a "trouble-breeder." He nags at lovers till they are in danger of being separated; he nags at friends till they are in danger of reviving an old feud. And yet, though the audiences have taken him for a hypocrite, he is plainly intended by the author to be a man convinced by a grotesque theology of the essential rightness of his behavior. A runt, as the original title of the play indeed called him, Rufe has been crazed by his impudent familiarity with Jehovah and has come to feel that whatever he does is of some divine authority. God has gone to his head. No wonder that with his certitude he should have the persistence, along with his oily craft, which enables him to worm his way into the lives of his household. The wonder is rather that the others, themselves accustomed to the same superstitions in less venomous forms, should have been able to throw the poison off. It takes all the patriarchal wisdom of David and all the generous patience of Sid, just back from the war with a comically small baggage of nonsense, to save Rufe's associates from catastrophe. Mr. Hughes has succeeded in telling a story thoroughly suited to the popular stage and yet in making its intellectual implications unmistakable.

Both "This Fine-Pretty World" and "Hell-Bent fer Heaven" suffer a little from presentation. With the first this is due in considerable measure to the language, which swathes the action, already slow, in so many strange, though beautiful, poetic idioms and daring metaphors that the attention is frequently stretched beyond the point of comfort in the effort to savor all that is being said. With the second play, the difficulty probably lies rather in the structure than in the language. Out of some not quite accountable fear that the audience would resent seeing so religious a man as Rufe severely treated, the original ending has been tempered to the lamb, and a too edifying speech has been put into the mouth of the hitherto unregenerate old David. There is no real excuse for this, any more on the ground of popular appeal than on the ground of art. What audience in the world ever minded seeing poetic justice asserted in a denouement? In this case the effect would be greatly heightened if, once Rufe had been caught at his tricks, he had been left to shift for himself with his "old-time religion" to help him out against the rising river while his more secular companions relied upon their more secular crafts to escape. Elsewhere the action still drags at times, but this is a defect which a few cuts or perhaps a few performances should cure.

The acting in "This Fine-Pretty World" is competent but not extraordinary; Miss Joanna Roos, as Goldie Shoop, manages to introduce some of the romping of a soubrette into her role. In "Hell-Bent fer Heaven" Glenn Anders as Andy overacts, especially in the drunken scenes; George Abbott as Sid plays a not too complicated part with beguiling naturalness; Augustin Duncan, who has staged the piece, is a masterly David.

CARL VAN DOREN

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents

FAY Bainter in "THE OTHER ROSE"

with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 45th Street
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

BELMONT

48th St. East of Broadway

TARNISH

Evs. 8:30 Mats.
Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."
Ludwig Lewisohn, THE NATION.
"Mr. Emery writes with a command of the English language which is not given to any other native playwright, not even excepting Eugene O'Neill."—Heywood Brown, WORLD.

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!

DAVID BELASCO Presents

LIONEL BARRYMORE

with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Evs. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Theatre, 41st St., West of Broadway, Evenings 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00

WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac

"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.

SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

YIDDISH ART THEATRE

27th St. and
Madison Ave.

MAURICE SWARTZ, Director

Now Playing

Friday evening 8:30; Saturday and Sunday 2:30 and 8:30
Osip Dymow's new comedy of American life

"BREAD"

AMBASSADOR 49th, W. of Bway.

Evs. 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30

RICHARD BENNETT in

THE DANCERS

"I have not seen a better play than 'The Dancers' for a long while."
—JOHN BARRYMORE.

THIS FINE-PRETTY WORLD
A NEW AMERICAN COMEDY
By PERCY MACKAYE
Every eve. (except Mon.) at 8:30.
Mat. Sat. 2:30.
Orch. $1.50-$2. Bal. $1.
Phone Dry Dock 7516

G. ARNOLD SHAW PRESENTS THREE LECTURE STARS IN THRILLING DEBATE AT

Carnegie Hall, New York, Friday eve., Jan. 18, at 8 o'clock
"THAT THE HOPE OF CIVILIZATION DEPENDS UPON THE CONTINUED GROWTH OF LABOR PARTIES
THROUGHOUT THE WORLD"

Affirmative: ADELE SCHREIBER, M.P., Labor Member of the REICHS-TAG.

Negative: HELEN FRASER, Liberal Candidate, 1922 and 1923 Elections for Seat in British PARLIAMENT.

Introduced by JOHN COWPER POWYS, M.A., Chairman.
"Who disagrees with both Debaters."

Tickets on Sale at Box Office.

Prices, $.50, $.75, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50.
Boxes Seating Eight—$16.00 and $20.00.

G. Arnold Shaw Lecture Bureau, 5733 Grand Central Terminal, N. Y.
Telephones, Vanderbilt 3038 and 4847.

International Relations Section

The Japanese Massacres

THE stories of heroism and self-sacrifice which followed the news of the Japanese earthquake in September were gradually superseded by more sinister tales, long delayed on account of a rigid censorship, of massacre and rioting. Not only armed bands of vigilantes but police and soldiers as well are reported to have joined in an orgy of murder directed against Koreans in particular, but also against Chinese and radicals of various nationalities, including Japanese. Short accounts of this period of slaughter appeared in the press of the United States as soon as the facts could be made known, but a detailed account has now come to hand from the columns of the North China Herald (Shanghai) of October 20 and November 3 in the form of letters from the paper's special correspondent at Tokio and Yokohama. We print below extracts which will give an idea of the extent and causes of the slaughter:

THE SOCIALIST MURDERS

Tokio, October 10

Earthquake stories are being temporarily relegated to the background and all available space and attention is being concentrated on the military court martial* which is trying Captain Masahiko Amakasu, of the Tokio gendarmerie, for the murder of Sakae Ohsugi, one of Japan's best-known Socialists; of his wife Noe Ito; and of their seven-year-old nephew. The deed was carried out with apparently such cold-blooded cruelty that millions are following the appalling drama as the case develops. Captain Amakasu has confessed to the murder of Mr. and Mrs. Ohsugi. At the first hearing, he also stated that he did away with the innocent nephew of the Socialist couple. It was afterwards discovered, however, that one of the gendarmerie captain's subordinates, named Kamoshida, a private, took a leaf out of his superior officer's book and strangled the child, Soichi Tachibana, to death with his bare hands.

Soichi Tachibana was the son of Mr. Ohsugi's sister. He was born at Portland, Oregon, and was duly registered there as an American citizen. . . . Intense indignation exists among the Japanese for the slaughter, in secret, of the woman and boy, and whatever kudos the Tokio troops might have gained for their good and efficient behavior after the quake is likely to be lost through the action of Captain Amakasu and his subordinates.

News of the fact that the murdered lad was an American citizen was communicated by the lad's mother to John R. Caldwell, secretary of the United States Embassy in Tokio. It is understood here that Cyrus E. Woods, American ambassador to Tokio, on being assured that there is no doubt about the unfortunate boy being an American citizen, will take up the matter further through diplomatic channels.

Soon after the earthquake of September 1 the police of Tokio and other cities entered upon a general round-up of Anarchists, Socialists, and people holding similar views—not to mention Koreans and Chinese—all of whom were held to be dangerous to the country, though how, it is hard to imagine. Several were thrown into jails in such localities as the fires did not reach; some are reported to have been murdered or executed; others, when told that they were being sought for, promptly surrendered, hoping that thus their lives would be more secure and that blame for further mishaps would not be laid at their doors. Among those whom the police failed to locate were Mr. and Mrs. Ohsugi, despite a search by police and gendarmes that lasted for several days. On the evening of September 16, however, a police spy reported that the two Socialists, with their nephew, had been seen in a suburb of Tokio. Captain Amakasu, accompanied by two gendarmes, went to the spot and took the trio into custody. . . .

About 8:30 p. m. the same evening Ohsugi was separated from the rest and taken into another room on the pretext of being examined. While Sergeant Major Mori, who was along with Captain Amakasu, went through the farce of examining the man, Captain Amakasu, according to his own confession in court, entered the room through another door behind Ohsugi, grasped the latter's throat with his right hand from behind, and pulled him to the floor by putting his leg against the broad of his back. Ohsugi fell face downwards. Putting his right foot against the man's back, the gendarmerie captain squeezed the life out of the victim he had trapped and had attacked from behind. The agony of the unfortunate man lasted about ten minutes, according to depositions made at the court martial. He did not utter a scream or a moan, much less call for aid or ask for mercy.

All this time Sergeant Major Mori, whose role in the murder tragedy has been to pretend to cross-examine Ohsugi, witnessed the murder calmly.

Then came Mrs. Ohsugi's turn. . . .

Captain Amakasu . . . declared that he jumped on her, seized her by the throat, dragged her down to the floor, and strangled her in a manner similar to the way her husband was killed. The death agony of Mrs. Ohsugi lasted more than ten minutes, and that she made a desperate struggle for life seems clear from the fact that Captain Amakasu still bears on his wrists marks of the struggle.

Sergeant Major Mori was again present throughout this second revolting murder, calmly watching proceedings as though the villain and the heroine of a movie film were rehearsing.

In the meantime, another gruesome murder was being committed in another room of the gendarmerie headquarters, a private named Kamoshida trying his hand at murder and choking the life out of the innocent, seven-year-old nephew of the Ohsugis. . . . Kamoshida, whose manly arms crushed the life out of the seven-year-old boy, claims that what he did was for the greater glory of Japan. . . .

When it is borne in mind that the murders were committed on September 16, more than a fortnight after the quake, and that at this time Tokio was fairly normal so far as police supervision and order were concerned, there seems to be hardly any justification for the secret assassinations, and certainly none at all for the cold-blooded and brutally barbaric manner in which they were conceived and carried out.

THE SLAUGHTER OF THE KOREANS

Tokio, October 20

Hitherto it was not permissible to publish anything in reference to the massacre of Koreans which formed such an ugly and cruel aftermath of the big earthquake of September 1. Many of these deplorable incidents were common knowledge, and then the authorities established an iron censorship so strict that not even the smallest particle of news relative to these occurrences could be known to the Japanese people at large; the only result, so far as your correspondent has been aware, was to cause exaggerated tales of the murders. . . .

For more than twelve days I wandered throughout various parts of Tokio remaining for intervals of varying length at different places in the city. I saw several of these so-called vigilance committees. In most cases they were mobs pure and simple, but lacking even the devil-may-care spirit of the usual

* On December 8 the murderer was sentenced to ten years in prison, and on December 16 the ashes of the murdered Socialist were stolen from the urn containing them just before the hour set for the funeral services. Intense excitement was aroused in Socialist and labor circles. On December 27 a young Communist shot at and barely missed killing the Prince Regent Hirohito.

mob. In fact, they seemed possessed more of fear that treacherous Koreans and Japanese Socialists would pounce on them and make short work of them. It was a case of "Kill or be killed," and this accounts for the brutal and ferocious manner in which these vigilance committees attacked unarmed people and massacred them mercilessly. . . .

By evening of the same day [the first day of the earthquake] no Korean's life, unless he was in a military barracks or in a police station where the guardians of the law were numerically strong enough to repulse mobs of the vigilance committees, was worth a cent. . . .

A friend of mine in Honmoku, Yokohama . . . told me that on Sunday, September 2, as he was seated in his improvised home, he heard piercing shrieks of "Hitogoroshi!" (murder). He went to the spot from where the screams came and saw six Koreans, tied hand and foot, who were calling on all the gods to witness that they had done nothing and groveled in the dust begging that their lives be spared. They were forced to bow their heads and a man with a sword came along and beheaded them. The sword was none too sharp and the gruesome operation took more than one blow. The crowd calmly looked on, while some ceremoniously declared: "Thus may the enemies of Japan perish!" . . .

Another batch of Koreans, being taken by the police in automobiles, were attacked by the same mob and were killed. The mob then turned its fury on the police shouting, "Kill the police who befriended the Koreans who destroyed Tokio." The police just barely managed to escape, thanks to the arrival of a batch of cavalry who dispersed the vigilance committee. . . .

At Kumagae, near Tokio, forty-two Koreans were done to death after a scuffle between the local vigilance committee and the police for the possession of the unfortunate Koreans. . . .

The tales of atrocities done by the Koreans are now known to have been barefaced falsehoods. Even the police admit this and declare that, in general, the Koreans behaved very well during the disaster and were conspicuously peaceful and orderly. . . .

Many a Chinese also fell victim to the lawlessness and ferocity of these vigilance committees. . . . Even foreigners have been taken for Koreans. . . .

Had the Koreans any part or share in making quake-stricken Tokio more unsafe? Many a foreigner answers in the affirmative, but qualifies his statement by declaring that these were very few. That there are Koreans of criminal proclivities and of radical tendencies, no one denies. There are these everywhere. But the wholesale massacre of Koreans at sight simply because they were Koreans can never be justified. The Koreans soon knew that, innocent or guilty, once they fell into the hands of the Japanese, they were doomed and this fact might have made some of them so reckless that they acted lawlessly and used violence. In no case was a Korean given a chance to explain himself. They were killed as one would crush or knock a rat on the head.

THE WAR AGAINST THE RADICALS

Yokohama, October 15

Cruel and cold-blooded massacres by so-called vigilance committees, composed of members of young men's associations, ex-soldiers and reservists, are being daily exposed. The censorship, which still forbids newspapers in Japan and her colonies to take notice of, or give utterance to the disgraceful disorders that have been witnessed by people here, still prevails, and what brutalities are being brought to light are merely due to the fact that these crimes have been so cruel that the judicial authorities have been forced to take notice of them and to have the accused tried in court.

In the Saitama prefecture, ninety-seven students and twenty-three workers were butchered by villains belonging to these so-called vigilance committees in the very grounds of the police station. Members of the vigilance committee there, it is said, suddenly grew excited as the result of rumors that the workers and the Socialists were responsible for the burning of Tokio and Yokohama, rushed into the railway station, and took twenty-three passengers, mostly laborers and peddlers, from an incoming train. These men were marched off to the police station. . . .

Soon after, five motor-trucks, carrying ninety-seven students, male and female, passed that way, the leading truck bearing a white banner on which was written Saitama Prefectural Police Department. Three policemen accompanied the lorries. The vigilantes attempted to prevent the trucks from passing by placing obstacles in the way. . . . The party of students in the trucks were pursued to the police station and were all butchered there. The twenty-three workers and peddlers who had also taken refuge at the police station were done to death by the members of the vigilance committee.

Another one of the outstanding crimes committed by the vigilantes is the massacre of fifty-four refugees who had already, for some mysterious reason, been handcuffed by the police who were conducting them to some place of safety. . . .

The fifty-four refugees, accompanied by the twelve policemen who were to guard them and to conduct them into some place of safety, came along. The vigilantes saw them at a distance, gave one terrible whoop, and did all of the handcuffed refugees to death. . . .

At the police station in Kemerdo, Tokio, another orgy of murder was indulged in, this time by police and soldiers, who confess to the killings and declare that they were perfectly justified under the circumstances in so doing. . . . Some 1,300-odd alleged radicals and desperadoes were taken into custody soon after the earthquake. Fourteen of this number were locked up in a small room, and, about midnight, according to one of those imprisoned in another part of the police station, who was fortunate enough to escape the fury of police, troops, and mobs of vigilantes, "I heard terrible screams. Looking out of the window, I saw a man fall and steely white blades flashing in the darkness." All these fourteen were murdered, and their bodies removed under cover of night and burned—which rather takes away a good deal of the alleged justification in killing the men, since attempts were made to cover up the crime. . . .

News of these murders has been suppressed for over a month. . . . It is open to grave doubt whether these murders will ever be investigated, especially in view of the fact that a movement has been started aiming at the condonation of the murders already committed, which are defended by the apologists for murder committed secretly by those who should have been the guardians of the law, as having been prompted by patriotism in desiring to rid the state of alleged lawless characters, though why gross brutality and deep secrecy should have been resorted to when such people were already in the hands of the police is difficult to see. It is gratifying to note that the press of Japan has treated murder not as a fine art but as murder, though whether the Fourth Estate can correct the wooden-headedness of police and military here is open to grave doubt.

An Anarchist Indictment

A DOCUMENT has come to hand, written in Esperanto and signed by the "Anarchists of Tokio," charging the Japanese Government with responsibility for the arrests and murders of its opponents following the earthquake and fire. A part of their statement, freely translated, follows: DEAR COMRADES:

We hasten to inform you about a malicious plot on the part of the Japanese Government.

On September 1 a violent earthquake shook Tokio and fire broke out in many places. The Government accordingly availed itself of the opportunity to arrest several "rebel Koreans," Anarchists, syndicalists, and labor-leaguers, and to spread among the masses seeking refuge the usual propaganda against the Koreans, as bomb throwers, incendiaries, well-poisoners, or food-poisoners. The effect of this action was to arouse the citizens, so that rowdies were enlisted for service, vigilance committees were organized, and in the streets crowds of militia and ex-service men were soon mobilized for the arrest of the Koreans. . . . The Government gave official sanction to those committees for the carrying of arms such as swords, pistols, and bamboo lances . . . and during the three days following many thousands of Koreans were slaughtered without inquiry. People were arrested on mere suspicion, and some Japanese were murdered as well, simply because they spoke a different dialect or were stammerers.

Since September 3 martial law has been proclaimed in Tokio and the country round . . . and the massacre of the Koreans still continues. Only a few hundred of them are kept in prison in the garden of the mausoleum of the late emperor and in Narashino near Tokio, to act as witnesses and later to be punished by the Government. . . . They all agree to the cruel truth of the extermination of the revolutionists. The chief political party is working secretly to spread the belief that the Anarchists and the Socialists are looters and incendiaries as well as the Koreans, and to caution people in their dealings with them. . . .

The arrest and massacre of Anarchists and laborites began suddenly on September 3 in Oshima Street when K. Hirasana, secretary of the laborite "Jhunkodo Kumiai," and nine other syndicalists were murdered in the police chamber by cavalrymen. . . . The bodies were burned secretly together with many Koreans, and the responsibility for the act rests with the police as well as with the militarists, and our comrades shouted while being put to death, "Long live the labor cause!" Several hundreds of Anarchists, syndicalists, and Socialists have been imprisoned, and while in chains have been threatened by gendarmes and soldiers with their bayonets, and those of our comrades who are not in chains are closely watched in their cells by policemen, spies, and gendarmes.

On September 16 the renowned Anarchist, Sakae Ohsugi, editor of the Anarchist monthly Rodo Undo (Labor Movement), was cruelly hanged by the leaders of the gendarmes; his wife, Noe Ito, and his nephew, Munekazu Tachibana, were brutally murdered by the corporal of gendarmes. The whole world should know the truth of this business, for this seven-year-old child was born in Portland, Oregon, and for this reason had a right of American citizenship. Amakasu, the commander of the military guard, has been arrested, and the commander of the gendarmes has been questioned about the matter, but no account of the whole affair has yet been published. . . . Amakasu stated that his action was that of a sincere patriot, but we believe this to be a stupid lie. . . . If the action were due to Amakasu's patriotism, moreover, there would be nothing to conceal, and thus we are led to the inference that if the gendarmes are accomplices in the matter it is due to a systematic plot of the Japanese Government. Otherwise the discovery of the conspiracy would have fallen on the police and the gendarmes, or on the Home or War Departments. . . .

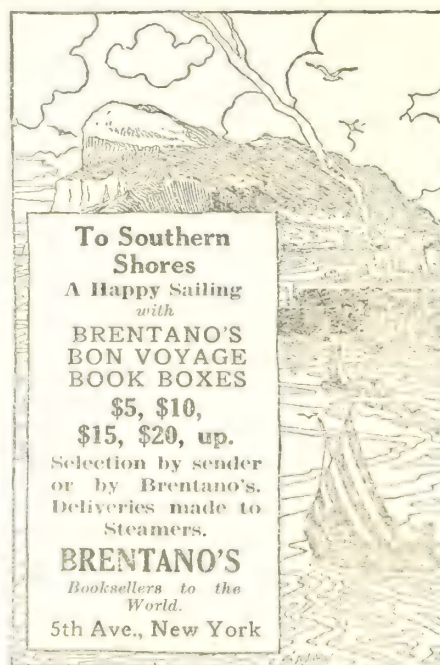

The affair of the murder of ten syndicalists has not been allowed to be published, and while Amakasu's affair is open for publication the papers are not anxious to print it. Only from the replies of the public solicitor can information about it be gathered. On October 1 some of the prisoners were released, but spies are watching their houses, seeking an occasion to get them out of the way. Thus they are in constant danger of being butchered.

Their martyrdom calls for sympathy from comrades in all parts of the world who realize that the Japanese Government is the enemy of all mankind and that we, the struggling Anarchists, are the lifelong sufferers from the tyrannical oppression of this bloodthirsty enemy.

October 10

ANARCHISTS OF TOKIO

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

To Southern Shores
A Happy Sailing
with
BRENTANO'S BON VOYAGE BOOK BOXES
$5, $10, $15, $20, up.
Selection by sender or by Brentano's. Deliveries made to Steamers.
BRENTANO'S
Booksellers to the World.
5th Ave., New York

PIONEERS IN SHIPPING
LIEBESGABEN (Relief Shipments)
STARVATION IS TERRIBLE
Your Order, be it ever so small, will give some relief

Make Up Your Own Combinations
in accordance with the special wishes and requirements of your relatives and friends abroad.

Our Warehouse in Hamburg Assures Quick Service
In Case of Loss, we Duplicate the Shipment at Once
Ask for our Price List G
All Orders and Shipments Delivered FREE HOUSE!

$10.00	M	B	F	$10.00
MUTTER'S BESTER FREUND
24½ lbs. Wheat Flour			10 lbs. Best Premier Farina
5 " Best Lard			1 " Cocoa
5 " Premier Roasted Coffee			10 " Granulated Sugar
1 " Ceylon Perri Walla Tea			5 tins Condensed Milk
10 " North Carolina Rice			5 " Premier Evaporated Milk

SELF-PACKED PACKAGES
are FORWARDED WEEKLY and at rates commensurate with efficient service.

American Merchants Shipping & Forwarding Co.
H. von Schuckmann C. E. W. Schelling
30 Years' Shipping Experience with Hamburg-American Line
OFFICES: 147 4th Ave., cor. 14th St., New York City
HAMBURG OFFICE—KLEINE ROSENSTRASSE 16

WILLIAM McFEE'S

An Engineer's Note Book

Essays on Life and Letters

$1.00, postage extra

For sale at all bookstores or by mail from

ROBERT A. HICKS

Publisher

Four Christopher Street

Greenwich Village

New York

Just Published

HOW DO YOU KNOW?A Handbook of Evidence and Inference
By ELLEN HAYES

228 pp. and index. $2.00 postpaid.

Order from Prof. E. HAYES, Wellesley, Mass.

FOR SALE: A wonderful collection of volumes of the best contemporary Poetry. No book dealers need inquire. There are one hundred volumes. For information, address Abraham Fink, 343 West 16th St., New York City.

GERMAN BOOKS NEW and OLD

Large Representative Stock at

BEYER'S BOOKSHOP207 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK
Opp. Terminal, UpstairsTHE RUSSIAN INN22 West 37th St., nr. 5th Ave., New York
Table d'Hôte Luncheon and DinnerAlso A la Carte. Open till 1 A. M.
Musical by the Russian Inn TrioThe Russian Nook, 151 W. 38th St., N. Y.nr. Broadway
50c and 65c Luncheon. Dinner $1.00 also a la CarteEntertainment, Evenings 11 till 1 A. M.
Open Sundays 4 P. M.STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

"BELL SYSTEM"

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIESOne Policy, One System, Universal Service and all directed toward Better ServiceInternational Book and Art Shop, 3 Christopher Street
New York City

We have the largest and choicest selection of

PRINTS BOOKS

in the city. Etchings, lithographs, water-colors, drawings, original and reproduction, framed and unframed. Prices, the lowest in the city.

Also a large stock of on art, current fiction, drama, poetry, etc.,—new and second-hand.

MUSSOLINI as Revealed in His Political Speeches
(November, 1914—August, 1923)Translated by Barone Bernardo Quaranta di San Severino
Published by E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY. Price, $3.50He took the world to her Twenty-five years ago a boy left a little country town to find his fortune. He found it.

Two years ago, when radio was still a novelty, he took a receiving set back to the old home and set it up in his mother's room. That evening the world spoke to her.

She could not follow her boy away from home. But the best that the world has to give—in music, in lectures, in sermons—he took back to her.

The modern vacuum tube, used in radio transmission and reception and in so many other fields, is a product of the Research Laboratories of the General Electric Company. These Laboratories are constantly working to develop and broaden the service of radio.

GENERAL ELECTRICThe Fifth Avenue Banquet Rooms

In connection with The Fifth Avenue Restaurant

GROUND FLOOR—FIFTH AVENUE BLDG.—200 FIFTH AVENUE

THEODORE KEMM, Proprietor

SPECIAL EVENING FUNCTIONS, GROUP DINNERS, ETC.

REASONABLE RATES

WM. SOHN, Banquet Mgr.

The Deportations Delirium of 1920

By Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor of the U. S. from 1913 to 1921. A vivid recital of events in which the author took part, and a startling exposure of Attorney General Palmer's lawless assaults on the right of free speech. Cloth, 350 pages, $1.50 postpaid; book catalog free.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

As Relentless as Its Policy in the Ruhr

FURTHER comment on the oil policy of France described in documents published in last week's issue of the International Relations Section is made by the Manchester Guardian Commercial of November 29:

The French oil game is moving more quickly. Recently a new syndicate was formed with a capital of 1,080,000 francs, under the auspices of the Government, to unite the oil activities of various industrial, commercial, and banking interests of French nationality. This concern—the Syndicat Français d'Etudes Pétrolifères—will prepare the terms of concessions granted by the Government, of which the French interest in the Turkish Petroleum Company will form the nucleus, will consider the purchase of refineries in Europe and the purchase of foreign oil supplies or concessions, and will finally lead up to the formation of a Union Nationale des Pétroles to carry out the chosen program. The fact is that this program has been holding up the exploitation of the oil fields of Mesopotamia. The Turkish Petroleum Company could not be reconstituted until the French Government had completed its oil arrangements, and it could not, of course, operate until reconstituted.

The formation of this Syndicat Français d'Etudes Pétrolifères may explain the reported deal between a French group and the Rumanian Government, by which in return for a loan of 800,000,000 francs the Rumanian Government is to deliver to the French all the oil products it is entitled to receive from Rumanian oil companies over the next ten to twelve years.

It will be interesting to see whether the French Government intends to live up to the spirit of the San Remo agreement, which provided for partnership between French and British in Rumanian oil ventures as well as in Mesopotamia. Or has it become as suspicious of British oil intentions as it has of the oil moves of Hugo Stinnes? Having regard to its oil treaty with Poland, its new petroleum law, by which importers must hold three months' oil stocks and mix French alcohol with foreign petrol, in addition to these latest developments, the French Government's oil policy is apparently being pursued as relentlessly as its policy in the Ruhr.

Contributors to This Issue

ALGERNON S. CRAPSEY, who has called himself, in a letter to The Nation, published on February 21, 1923, "the last of the heretics," was tried and dismissed from the Episcopal church on a charge of heresy.

HAROLD J. LASKI is professor at the London School of Economics.

WALTER C. HAWES is a newspaper man, until lately editor of the Rock River Review, who has lived in Wyoming for many years and has made a close study of the social and historical institutions of the State.

D. M. LEBOURDAIS, former editor of the Canadian Nation, is a writer and close associate of the explorer Vilhjalmur Stefansson.

ERNEST GRUENING, formerly of the staff of The Nation, recently spent over six months in Mexico, where he became a close friend of the Governor of Yucatan.

The Nation will publish within the next few weeks an article on the situation in the Near East as it affects the United States:

RATIFY THE LAUSANNE TREATY

BY EDWARD MEAD EARLE

STERLING & GOETZ

Pianos, Player Pianos and Reproducing Pianos which embody the quality of tone and construction that makes them the choice of musicians and connoisseurs.

Musical Instruments

Sterling Piano Corporation
The STERLING PIANO CO. GOETZ & CO., Inc.
81-87 Court Street, Brooklyn

Dr. Watson will explain the aims and methods of the Behaviorists. The lecture will be illustrated by motion pictures of his experiments with babies.

LECTURE—SAT., JAN. 19th—ADMISSION 50c

BEHAVIOR PSYCHOLOGY

by JOHN B. WATSON, A.M., Ph.D.

At the NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH—465 W. 23rd St., N. Y.
Under the Auspices of The Students' Co-operative Association.

Manuscripts by more than 1,100 authors are being considered in The Nation's annual poetry contest, which closed January first. The award of $100 will be announced and the winning poem will be printed in the Mid-Winter Book Number of The Nation, dated February 13th.

PLEXO "TOILET LANOLINE"

—the year-round
skin treatment

This wonderful emollient is used with great success by noted skin specialists for pimples, blotches, facial eruptions, roughness, abrasions and chapped lips and hands. It protects the delicate skin surfaces against trying weather conditions and by supplying nourishment to the facial nerves and skin cells, effaces wrinkles and restores the bloom of youthful health. "Toilet Lanoline" is especially recommended for sun and burn and for relief of pain after exposure to cold. A delicate scented preparation for use by SMALL CHILDREN.

PREPARED BY

PLEXO PREPARATIONS, Inc.
NEW YORK

Sole Agents and Distributors

General Drug Co., N. Y., 94 N. Moore Street

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1924

No. 3055

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	75
EDITORIALS:
The Presidency by Default?.....	78
War Mongers	79
The Palatinate	79
Legalizing Fraud	80
THE LIBERAL AND THE JEW. By Charles Thomas Hallinan.....	81
THE MARK STANDS STILL. By Alice Hohenemser-Salb.....	82
BASIL LANNEAU GILDERSLEEVE. By Felix Morley.....	83
THE PURITAN PROVIDENCE. By W. W. Fenn.....	84
RATIFY THE TURKISH TREATY. By Edward Mead Earle.....	86
NICHOLAS LONGWORTH. By William Hard.....	88
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	89
CORRESPONDENCE	89
POEMS. By Genevieve Taggard.....	91
BOOKS:
Crucify Him, Crucify Him! By John Haynes Holmes.....	91
An Appeal to Posterity. By Herbert W. Horwill.....	92
Mistaken Vocations. By Alice Beal Parsons.....	92
For a Franco-German Alliance. By Roy Temple Scott.....	93
Laureate of Critics. By Gerald Hewes Carson.....	93
Two Wits. By J. W. Krutch.....	94
Books in Brief	91
Professor Cisek's Children. By Francesca M. Wilson.....	95
DRAMA:
The Great Legend. By Ludwig Lewisohn.....	96
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Fascism in Finland. By John H. Wuorinen.....	98
The Germ of a Baltic Alliance	99
Mothers and Babies in Russia.....	100
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER	LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY	IRITA VAN DOREN
MANAGING EDITOR	LITERARY EDITOR
ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
ANATOLE FRANCE	JOHN A. HOBSON
ROBERT HERRICK	H. L. MENCKEN
	NORMAN THOMAS
	CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE PRESIDENT OF A SOUTHERN COLLEGE, evidently bent on creating a newspaper sensation, tells us that "the world has never known the turning loose of such an army of hard-drinking, cigarette-puffing, licentious Amazons as walk our streets and invade our campuses today." As a remedy—he comes from a lynching State—he "would like to wring the necks of some of them." He is certain, too, that the "uneducated girl is apt to be the safest, the sweetest, and the most serene." The headmaster of Lawrenceville School, Dr. M. A. Abbott, has also been heard from, but in a different vein. He addressed a letter to the parents of his 500 boys at the beginning of the recent vacation begging the parents to use their influence to keep the boys from drink during the holidays. It is a touchingly earnest and straightforward appeal which Dr. Abbott makes. He, too, is alarmed at the drinking among young girls, as well as among the boys under his guidance. The responsibility he places upon the parents and the other grown-ups the boys and girls meet in vacation time. It is still, he says, considered smart to violate the liquor laws and to drink freely in defiance of the law. This condition is intolerable. Either there must be a reaction in favor of law enforcement or a repeal of the prohibition amendment. There are signs that it may be the former, among them a most encouraging meeting in the Town Hall in New York in which certain social elements not usually on the side of the Constitution—except when they deem it menaced by Reds—pledged themselves to stand by prohibition.

SOMETHING IS STIRRING in France. Poincaré has lost his passion; Herriot has regained his courage. Poincaré did not always sit through an attack upon his occupation of the Ruhr without injecting vigorous interruptions. Yet when Edouard Herriot, leader of the so-called Radical Socialists in the Chamber, drew up a profit-and-loss account of the Ruhr, and pointed out that the balance was a red-ink minus sum, Poincaré sat silent. And when Herriot insisted that France could not endure isolation—that she must recognize Soviet Russia and collaborate with England and America, Poincaré nodded affirmation. The drop in the value of the franc almost to four cents has doubtless sent a shudder through the bones of French financiers and of the politicians who stand close to them. The presence in Paris of the American experts co-operating in the Reparation Commission's inquiry into German finances may have given a mild impetus to sanity. The sudden swing of Yugoslavia away from the Little Entente, following the announcement of the new Franco-Czech alliance, probably helped too. And of course the imminence of the general election forces every politician to look for something new with which to inveigle the voter.

"HELL AND MARIA" DAWES'S opening speech before the Reparation Commission had dashes of his salty American common sense. "Realizing that the house is afire," he said, the American members "propose to find some water to put it out without the further use of mathematics involving the fourth dimension." Another phrase of his should have sunk deep into the minds of his French hearers:

As the world has seen the economic life of Germany ebbing away the credit of all the European Allies has felt a preliminary shock, because the world realizes that if the German people lose their capacity for work Germany loses her capacity to pay those reparations which are so great an element in European solvency.

If those words mean anything they are a condemnation of French policy in the Ruhr. But we recall so many fine speeches by Americans just landing in Europe, who lost their bearings and their vision upon prolonged exposure to the intricacies of European statecraft, that we must wait to see how General Dawes and his associates fare.

THE NEW YORK EVENING POST, now become a major organ of reaction, demands that the progressive Republicans who voted to defeat Senator Cummins and place a Democrat at the head of the Interstate Commerce Committee be expelled from the Republican Party. Their act, it appears, is treachery not merely to their party but also to the two-party system of government. Indeed, it heads straight to the present situation in England, where a minority Labor Government is taking the reins. For our part we rejoice that a senatorial precedent has been broken. The Senator who happens to be senior in point of service is not necessarily the best chairman. We are delighted, too, that Senator La Follette, who received an ovation from friends and foes alike on his return after his recent illness, was thus able to show the power that he wields as the head of the so-called "radical bloc." This demonstration probably had something to do with the decision of the regulars that, after all, it might be possible to compromise on the Mellon tax proposals and to meet in some degree the wishes of the progressives. As for the actual results of Senator Smith's election, we doubt if it will much improve the chance for vigorous railroad legislation, although amendment of the Esch-Cummins bill is needed for more reasons than one.

DESPITE our opposition to a soldiers' bonus, we find it hard to stomach some of the propaganda against it. President Harding and Secretary Mellon opposed the bonus in 1921 not on principle but on financial grounds. In a letter to Senator Frelinghuysen Mr. Mellon said the bonus would defeat the Government's plans for retrenchment and "would entail additional taxation; he recommended that "action be deferred." Many newspapers, afraid to oppose the bonus on its own account, fell in with that line of reasoning. Now that the government's accounts show a handsome surplus, Mr. Mellon and the section of the press that followed him have forgotten that the bonus was only to be "deferred" and have discovered a united and insistent demand among income-tax payers that their burdens be reduced. Newspapers that defended the recent ship-subsidy bill or the Fordney tariff nevertheless speak righteously of "bonus raiders," and chronicle out of all proportion to its importance the slight opposition to the scheme within the American Legion. In the circumstances, ex-service men may be pardoned for concluding that Mr. Mellon and the press are interested primarily not in them or the small taxpayer but in the reduction of the surtaxes upon the wealthy.

CONFRONTED with these facts many persons of small means are disposed to say: "Oh, give the soldiers their bonus. The big fellows have already had their slice; why not let the poor man have something?" This is about as vicious a principle as can be introduced into government. The Nation is not obliged, in order to oppose the bonus, to eat what it said two years ago. It opposed the bonus on principle then, and it is against it for the same reason now. We regard as fallacious both of the arguments most commonly used in behalf of the bonus: that mobilized men suffered serious financial loss through their service; that those who remained at home profited enormously. Our soldiers and sailors were young men, largely from twenty to twenty-five. Few had made places for themselves in industry, and none who had dependents was obliged to go. The Government paid for all their necessities and many luxuries and then gave them a minimum of $30 a month. How many of them, we wonder, had that much over and above all necessary expenses in the civilian life which they left? The assumption that all stay-at-homes were profiteers is likewise absurd. What little increased income most persons received was more than swallowed up by the spectacular rise in the cost of living.

WHEN WILLIAM ROCKEFELLER died he left an estate of $67,649,660. Of this, $43,643,055 was in tax-exempt securities. When Jacob H. Schiff died he left an estate of $34,426,282. Of this, $17,594,240 was in tax-exempt securities. In 1916, 1,296 individuals paid taxes on net incomes above $300,000; in 1921, despite the extraordinary number of war-made millionaires, only 246—the others had put their money into tax-exempt securities and escaped the high taxation. Here is the howling abuse of the tax situation. Of course Secretary Mellon is right when he says that high income taxes drive money into "tax-exempts"—but the remedy is not to reduce the rates, but to stop the scandal of tax exemption for the millionaires. Elsewhere in this issue Mr. John A. Lapp argues that since exemption of State and municipal bonds from taxation makes it easier to obtain money for schools, roads, and municipally owned enterprises, the exemption should be continued. Public ownership must stand on its own feet; we believe that it can compete with private ownership even without the artificial handicap given it by tax exemption.

WHEN EDWARD P. FARLEY assumed the chairmanship of the Shipping Board he knew that the solution of the government's shipping problem was a commercial and not a political one, and he recommended to President Coolidge as far back as last November that the operation of the government's mercantile fleet be withdrawn from the Shipping Board and placed under one able steamship man with absolute control. In submitting this suggestion he undermined his own position, and when his interim appointment as chairman of the Shipping Board came up for confirmation he was rejected on a mere technicality. He is no longer in office, but he has sown seed on good ground, for the President has communicated to the Shipping Board his desire to have the operation of the government's merchant fleet placed under the Emergency Fleet Corporation with one man at the helm, the board to be retained merely as a regulatory body. Senator Jones left with the Shipping Board a drastic resolution the adoption of which would have accomplished this end, but the Shipping Board members refused to relinquish their powers. They have agreed to hand over to the Emergency Fleet Corporation the actual work of operating ships, but all authority as to formulating policies, making changes in trade routes, and disposing of ships is still vested in the Shipping Board. Sooner or later a real change must come.

MR. HENRY W. DRISCOLL of Washington, D. C., is an attorney-at-law with a heart of gold. Let Mr. Driscoll speak for himself:

Dear Mr. Blank: . . . The Act of June 15, 1917, 40 Stat. 182, 188, . . . provides for pay for enlisted men in training for commission, as follows: "pay at $100 per month for enlisted men in training for officers of the Reserve Corps." If, as I am informed, you were a candidate for commission . . . you appear entitled for the period of your training for officer to pay at $100 per month, less the pay of your grade which was received for such period.

If agreeable to you I shall be pleased to prosecute your claim for the difference of pay . . . which I am now able to recover. . . . You will note that the attorney fee is 10 per cent of the amount recovered and is entirely contingent upon success, you to pay me nothing unless recovery is made. . . .

Ten per cent seems little enough to pay for such expert attention. But, as a matter of fact, any ex-service man entitled to it may, at the expense of a two-cent stamp, write the details of his service to the War Department and, after the proper papers have been executed, he will in due time receive his money.

THE ARRIVAL in this country of a commission of ten members from the Porto Rican Legislature, accompanied by the Governor of the island, Horace M. Towner, calls attention to the need of taking action to decide what the ultimate status of this heritage of the Spanish-American War shall be. Unlike the Philippines, there is no considerable demand for independence in Porto Rico, the attempt to work up enthusiasm on that issue a couple of years ago having failed to produce lasting effects. Though it will not ask for independence, the present commission wants a greater measure of home rule, including an elected governor, and it hopes to get some declaration in regard to the eventual form of government in the island—whether it may look for statehood or what. While Porto Ricans are in the United States, the Department of Labor has just dispatched a commission of Negroes to study conditions in the Virgin Islands, where the old economic life has so much collapsed that the natives are close to actual starvation.

NOT CONTENT with the nugget turned up by the Bok prize jury, the Women's Peace Union has invited all unsatisfied contestants in the late competition to submit their plans to the Union for a new consideration by a new jury, "made up of people known to have widely different points of view." No prize is offered except the promise of a careful reading; the committee will select the three most valuable plans and give them as wide publicity as possible. We approve the purpose of the Women's Peace Union as completely as we admire its courage in inviting the deluge that will descend upon it, and we hope it will be able to find suitable persons to serve on the committee of award. This is a duty that cries to be done, for undoubtedly valuable suggestions lie buried in the 22,164 rejected manuscripts.

THE KANSAS MOTION PICTURE BOARD of Censorship should not undertake to censor the conduct of actors or actresses who appear in motion pictures, says Governor J. R. Davis. "It does not appear to me that it would help, or even that we have it in our power," he explains in a letter to a member of the board. This is a note of clear common sense amidst the clamor to suppress all films featuring either of two actresses concerned in a shooting. The public ought to realize that this demand to bar persons from the screen because of their manners or morals is a new philosophy as revolutionary as it is vicious. The Nation doubts the wisdom of any kind of censorship, but where it exists its only legitimate judgment is upon the acts and ideas portrayed on the screen; with the acts and ideas of the participants in any other circumstances it has no possible concern. If we begin to rule out works of art as a protest against the lives of artists, we shall not stop until we have burned half of the classics in our libraries, banished some of the world's most precious music, and painted out many of the masterpieces in our picture galleries.

IN THE HILLS OF HAITI little dark-skinned children are still frightened into good behavior by the warning: Smedley Butler will get you if you don't watch out! And in darkest Philadelphia the same slogan is doubtless gaining popularity. For Smedley Butler, Director of Public Safety, dressed in a special uniform designed for a military hero in civil office, is "bumping 'em off" in the city of Quakers even as he has done in the republics of the Caribbean. First he bumped off the unions long established in the Philadelphia police and fire departments; next he bumped off subordinates whom he suspected of slack behavior, even suspending two men believed to be off duty on their night off—which happened to be an occasion on which he was making rounds himself. Finally he is directing, with the utmost literalness, the bumping off of criminals and other suspicious characters in Philadelphia's tenderloin. In his first address to the police force he urged the freer use of pistols. "I don't believe there is a single bandit notch on a policeman's gun in this city," he said. "Go out and get some." It is probable that in a swashbuckling administration of this sort some negligent and corrupt officers will be eliminated as well as some able and honest ones; and that some crooks will be shot along with the bystanders. But in general we respect the people of Philadelphia enough to believe that marine tactics will succeed there no better than they did in Haiti. We are weary already of the noisy braying of Smedley Butler; but we take pleasure in imagining that down in Haiti there are men and women who rock with mirth when they hear of the things that are happening to Philadelphia.

EDITH ABBOTT'S appointment by the University of Chicago as dean of its Graduate School of Social Service Administration is singularly appropriate. An inheritor of the old abolitionist tradition and personally familiar, through fourteen years' residence in the settlement houses of this country and London, with the problems she seeks to solve, Miss Abbott brings devotion and enthusiasm to her task. Her academic work at the universities of Chicago and London has been enriched by seventeen years' experience as university instructor and as member of social agencies and boards dealing with the immigrant, the Negro, the juvenile, the unemployed, and the woman in industry. Her contributions to the Atlantic Monthly, The Nation, and other magazines, by their thorough scholarship, have earned for her the title, first applied to Florence Nightingale, of the "passionate statistician."

GEORGE CRAM COOK, news of whose death in Greece has just reached his friends here, was the founder and director of the Provincetown Theater; a brave enthusiast, whose experimental eagerness helped break new paths for the American theater and drama. He was a playwright and novelist; but, beyond these things, he was extraordinarily a person, exerting an incalculable personal force and influence. That influence is itself not easy to describe, except as a civilizing influence, or perhaps a Utopian influence; he made people ashamed of surrender to an ignoble world, he made them try to do the beautiful and impossible things of which they dreamed—and that attempt, which is often enough ridiculous, is the best the world has yet been able to offer in the way of civilization anywhere. It was the Greeks of the Periclean age who went at it most eagerly and naively, perhaps; and in spirit George Cram Cook was a Greek of the Periclean age, strayed somehow out of his place and time into our more timid age; and after bruising himself for a working lifetime against realities which he was too eager to reshape, he strayed back again to what must have seemed his own country. He will be buried, as he wished, at Delphi.

The Presidency by Default?

WHAT greater contrast could there be than that between the state of politics in Great Britain and America? There new forces, new men, animated by a new spirit in government, taking office on behalf of all the people instead of a privileged few; here the doldrums—the ship of state adrift in a political Sargossa Sea. Before us rises the vision of a presidential campaign of unsurpassed dulness, devoid of all semblance of progress and reform, led on either side by men who represent static forces where they do not actually strive for reaction. We are called upon to cheer for lower taxes and, if they are achieved, we shall be asked to hail President Coolidge as the benefactor of America. The rest is to be merely a battle between ins and outs. Upon no principles and no real issues can the two controlling parties divide, for they are alike as two peas and they are subject to control by the same influences. Both worship the god of things as they are; both have no other desire than to keep the business man rich and contented. Millions upon millions of Americans are suffering gross injustice. Where among the regulars in the two parties is there one to be found to admit the fact and to apply himself unceasingly and whole-heartedly to remedying it?

Well, there are, of course, voices to be heard, but for the present they are all but alone in a wilderness of party regularity, political stagnation, and partition of the spoils. There are real progressives, but not even among these is a platform upon which all of them may stand. The compelling power of a single vital or moral issue is lacking. These dissenters are largely the product of economic conditions which might conceivably be remedied within the twelvemonth. If there is any one tie that binds them, it is the plight of the farmer. We have not as yet made more than a beginning toward building here a party of social progress such as is now coming into power in England. That is no overnight achievement; nor is it an electoral fluke. Ramsay MacDonald did not forget the pioneers at his great London meeting: "Ah, if the scores of people who are no longer with us had only been blessed to live until this night how warm would have been their greeting!" The Keir Hardies and many others laid the cornerstones; the Fabian group, the Sidney Webbs, a host of others have built upon the foundations. No similar party can come into being in America, failing one compelling issue, or a great and unselfish leader, until a similar toil of years is fulfilled. We are not yet ready. There are promising groups; there are real signs of political insurrection, but there is little evidence of a getting together for the coming campaign.

So the Presidency, the "greatest office in the world," is today going practically by default. In the Democratic Party no one save Mr. McAdoo and Mr. Underwood is stirring. The nomination may go to the former simply because no other able man cares to seek it. Or it may go to a new and inexperienced man like Senator Copeland of New York, because of his geographical location and the fact that he has aroused no antagonisms. Nowhere is there a man who by the originality of his ideas, by the character and quality of his program, or by the force of his personality compels the party to turn to him as it did to Grover Cleveland in 1884. A foreigner beholding this situation might readily infer that the Presidency was no longer a prize worth having. He would be amazed, indeed, if he should learn that a party which cast nine million Democratic votes in 1920, the year of its worst defeat, is so destitute of presidential timber that a dozen Senators and bosses some months ago begged a progressive Republican to come over to their fold. "We have searched the party from top to bottom in vain," they said. "If you will come over to us you shall lead."

On the Republican side, the Presidency is obviously drifting steadily into the hands of President Coolidge, merely because of his incumbency of the White House. Merely, and not merely. When presiding officer of the Senate he was personally so unpopular that even a renomination as Vice-President was deemed impossible. Today he is playing the shrewdest kind of politics. His refusal to make speeches delights the business man; his advocacy of lower taxes makes him seem a gift of the gods; his unwillingness to raise unpleasant issues is making him the idol of those who are for things as they are. Only Senator Johnson is challenging his "leadership" and he is not today a serious menace to the President. Nothing in sight can stop the drift to the man who controls the presidential machinery and with it the tremendous and seductive power of political appointments—unless in those States in which there are presidential primaries Mr. Coolidge should run badly. Even this danger may be avoided by eliminating favorite sons, as Senator Watson has just been got out of the road in Indiana, and by not entering the President in primaries where he obviously has little chance of doing well. Thus a man whom no one would have suggested for the presidency six months ago may have it for the seeking. There is no one of great force to combat him; no one looks about for a commanding intellect to lead the Republican Party; no one asks for some man who has shown real statesmanship and power, else there would be much talk of Senator Borah and of Senator La Follette.

A third party? The Socialists are split and negligible; the farmer-labor groups weak. Yet there is and must be a demand for a candidate for whom one could vote without bowing the knee to party bosses, without confessing the merest serfdom to parties destitute of moral issues, moral purpose, and moral fiber. There exists a widespread desire for relief, and there is one man who can make a real beginning. That is Senator La Follette. He has the choice of retiring to his farm and letting the election go hang, or of raising the banner of revolt. Let him become the leader of the farmer-labor uprising in the Northwest and the Coolidge candidacy is jeopardized on the instant. Minnesota wants him, Wisconsin is his, and so are probably North and South Dakota; in Nebraska, Montana, Washington, and even Iowa are hosts that will rise to him. It is a wonderful chance for public service, and the last great one that may come to Senator La Follette, now rapidly approaching three score and ten. He voices the thoughts of multitudes, the masses of righteously discontented. We find it hard to believe that he will sulk in his tent, or even that he will wait until the Republican nomination to take his stand. To his present party he owes nothing; to hundreds of thousands his candidacy, however unlikely to carry the country, will bring hope, courage, a heartening indescribable. These are times when to contest for defeat is the highest duty of the unselfish patriot.

War Mongers

IF President Coolidge is sincere in his promise to carry forward the Harding policies, how can he square our naval missions in South America with the purposes of the Disarmament Conference? What use to join with the great Powers of Europe in reducing naval armament and at the same time allow war mongers to visit the republics to the south of us to agitate for larger flotillas and other means of international destruction? Is the sight of war-ruined Europe so happy a spectacle that the people of the United States want to plunge another continent into the abyss?

We have commented several times on the mischievous effects of our naval mission to Brazil and the jealousy and ill-will that it is stirring up in Argentina. Our naval mission to Peru seems to be straining itself just as hard to get the republics of the West Coast to arm and fly at each other's throats. We are indebted to Dora Mayer de Zulen, a subscriber in Callao, Peru, for an account of how our official representatives have been constituting themselves drummers and touts for the munitions-makers. Rear Admiral Woodward, the head of our naval mission to Peru, chose Navy Day to place a wreath on the monument of Miguel Grau, who commanded the warship Huáscar in the Peruvian-Chilean War of 1879. El Comercio of Lima reports Admiral Woodward as saying upon this occasion:

Last Tuesday I received a cablegram from the Navy Department of the government of my country, ordering me to celebrate this occasion by putting a wreath of flowers at the foot of the statue of the greatest of Peru's naval heroes, and I, with the greatest pleasure personally as well as in my character of head of the North American naval mission, render this small but sincere homage to the immortal memory of Rear Admiral Miguel Grau.

On this occasion let us take from the pages of history some of the bitter lessons which may be learned from the sad facts of 1879, when Peru—owing to its lack of preparedness for events—was obliged by its enemy to accept its peace conditions, simply because the Peruvian budget had provided but a small navy, incapable, therefore, of rivaling that of the enemy.

The power of a nation and its naval power go parallel; a weak navy is but a preparation for defeat, for a defeat which means humiliation and disaster. National weakness has caused more wars than national strength.

The efficiency of the navy and the army must not be thought of only when war is at the door. Years are needed to make these services ready for the call of the nation, and it is the statesman's duty to uphold preparedness to the extent of his possibilities and in a degree and in a way adapted to support the country's policy, for it is the statesman's exclusive responsibility to know how far the national interests require to be protected, and only he, and nobody else, is concerned with watching the growth of a military power adequate to probable emergencies. The navy is in the first instance the instrument of the statesman and secondly the weapon of the warrior.

The loss of battles, either by sea or by land, may have happened in the debates of Parliament, or in the councils of government, or in the private offices of the navy and army departments, long before the battlefield.

Admiral Woodward detailed the peculiar lines of defense which topographical conditions obliged Peru to follow and then concluded:

With its present naval forces Peru has no dominion over the sea. The Peruvian Congress must sooner or later provide an adequate navy. Otherwise Peru will remain an artificial paradise exposed to unexpected panics, and what is worse, to a war at an inconvenient hour and to inevitable defeat. History is replete with examples of defeats in war owing to unpreparedness. Let us hope Peru will not add another chapter to the rest, which future generations would read with tears in their eyes. On the contrary, may Peru, while there is yet time, apply the lessons acquired at the naval battle of Angamos and write a new page for history on which will be inscribed in imperishable characters, for the observance of future generations, these words: Prepare to the utmost for the execution of your national policy, for the defense of your country, and for the honor of your flag.

It seems almost incredible that we should not merely allow, but apparently instruct, a naval officer to utter bumptious and war-breeding advice of this sort in Peru when at the same time President Coolidge is trying to adjust the historic quarrel over Tacna and Arica. This offering peace with the right hand and war with the left must produce an odd and far from favorable impression in South America.

The predecessor of Admiral Woodward at the head of the naval mission in Peru visited Bolivia, and there he exhibited an imposing film showing the splendors of our navy to a people which through defeat in a needless war was deprived of its coastland, and is continually seeking an outlet to the sea, at the cost either of Chile or of Peru.

If President Coolidge has any regard whatever for the peace policies of Mr. Harding, he will call these strutting bantams home and put them to work.

The Palatinate

A MAN named Heintz, who called himself President of the Free Republic of the Palatinate, and five of his associates were cold-bloodedly shot and killed while drinking wine in the leading hotel of Speyer on the evening of January 9. Their assassins, presumably anti-Separatist Germans, escaped. It was murder, and it will be well if a thoroughgoing investigation of the murders can be made. But it will be impossible to understand these murders without understanding the whole murderous history of the so-called Free Republic of the Palatinate.

That "Free Republic" was described by the Manchester Guardian ten days before the assassinations as "the most shameful chapter in the whole history of France's post-war dealings with Germany." "It would be hard," the Guardian added, "to find a parallel in the treatment of one civilized Power by another in time of peace." France has set up and maintained in that neglected province a government of thieves and blackguards, and until a few hot-headed young men called attention to it by putting six other men to death nobody in the outside world paid any attention to the crime.

We do not know the record of Herr Heintz, but the records of many of his comrades who have been set up as ministers and officials by the French soldiers who support the Separatists have been published in the German press. We have never seen them contradicted. The gentleman put in charge of the postal, telegraph, and telephone lines in the Palatinate under the Separatist regime, for instance, had served two terms in prison, once for attempting to cash a forged money-order, and once for stealing sausages. The Palatinate was not burdened with quite as fine a lot of cut-throats and miscellaneous villains as was Bonn during its brief Separatist regime, but it had a hard enough time. Bonn's churches were put in charge of a bordell-keeper with 22 convictions behind him; its "commissioner of public safety" was a shoemaker who had served four terms in prison, once for manslaughter; a dozen more Separatist officials had jail records, and one champion held a record of 23 times convicted.

Such are the men who lead the Separatist movement which M. Poincaré would have us believe a spontaneous uprising of an oppressed people. The Nation has, in its issues of November 28 and December 19, printed some of the documents which reveal the inspiration and aid which the French have given this Separatist movement from the first. It has been theirs from the beginning, so much so that the Paris papers actually printed an account of the Separatist seizure of Schifferstadt three days before it occurred—reporting the prepared schedule rather than events as they occurred. Nor were the six men killed at Speyer the first to fall victims to the adventure. In a dozen towns men lost their lives when the Separatists entered. Had the natives of the Palatinate been permitted to fight, there might have been a few more deaths but there would be no Separatists in the Palatinate today. The armed aid of the French put them in power and maintains them there today. The story of Neustadt is typical: French Moroccans occupied the town hall at 3 A. M. on November 5; later in the morning they proclaimed a state of siege and forbade the people to circulate in the streets between 6 P. M. and 7 A. M.; the next morning at 5 the Separatist troops arrived in French army trains, and the Moroccans turned over the town hall and the town to them.

The first act of the new "free government" was to establish a censorship. Newspapers were forbidden to appear unless their editors recognized the authority of the new regime, and submitted their matter to a preliminary censorship. Mayors were ordered, pistol in hand, to sign statements of loyalty to the new government, and some who did not have disappeared, the French and the Separatists only know where. Protests to the interallied officials were of course unavailing. Every federal and Bavarian official has been removed from office. It is a stark reign of terror.

That is the background of the murders at Speyer. It is a story of cynical brutality which ten years ago would have aroused the horror of the world. We have become calloused. These things are hardly news in Europe today. Our newspapers have been so drugged with propaganda that they have not bothered to learn and report the facts, and America learns of this sickening story only when men turn, like the old Russian nihilists, to murder and assassination as the only method of advertising their wrongs.

If things go as they have been going the French will utilize these assassinations as an excuse for further brutalities, camouflaged as "sanctions." The Interallied Rhineland High Commission has already, with the British representative honorably dissenting, registered decrees of the Separatist Government in a manner which constitutes virtual recognition. The French now propose that this same biased body should investigate the killings. Investigation is well enough, but it must be an open, searching, honest investigation. An investigation which sought only to discover the immediate authors of the crime without searching into the motives which led them to it would be worse than nothing.

Legalizing Fraud

THE decision of the Federal Court in the Chemical Foundation suit is amazing. The sale by the Alien Property Custodian of 5,700 patents, worth, it is estimated, about $40,000,000, for about $275,000, or $50 each, was on its face fraudulent. It constitutes in fact if not in law as clear an example of appropriation of private property as recent American history records. These patents were seized in one great lump by the outgoing Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Garvan, and his advisory committee, and under the "authority" of Mr. Polk, acting as delegate of President Wilson, were sold by and to Mr. Garvan and his advisory committee, now called the Chemical Foundation, for the paltry sum above mentioned, which the court had to admit was confiscatory. Sellers and buyers are identical persons.

The government moved to set aside the "sale" on the grounds that a trustee cannot sell to himself, and that the consideration was inadequate. Why the fraud charge was dropped is hard to say—the law is more strict in its definitions than the layman, and perhaps the able counsel of the government, Colonel Anderson, felt it unnecessary to press it to upset the "sale." The court in its decision defends the "sale," on the ground that the custodian as an "owner" could dispose of the property for any sum he saw fit, and that the President's acts cannot be judicially reviewed. That it amounted to a confiscation of private property, in violation of American tradition, treaty obligation, express promise, and, we believe, law, seemed to bother the judge little. Doubtless Judge Morris believes himself an arch-defender of the institution of private property; doubtless he would be shocked if in some midnight meditation it should dawn on him that by maintaining this confiscation of private property he was more effectively combating that institution in the United States than are all the Communists in Moscow.

This seizure and "sale," it must not be forgotten, was undertaken in 1919 and 1920, after the armistice, when all hostilities were to have ceased; it was a case of sheer spoliation, to benefit powerful private interests. By practically giving this property away to private chemical interests in the United States, the perpetrators of the deal were despoiling the United States as well as the owners, for the United States had an interest in obtaining an adequate consideration for the sequestered property, since it could have been used, under our treaty, to pay obligations of the German Government to the United States. The real owners of the property can, if ever, recover only from Germany, to which the New York Times unctuously relegates them, the tiny sum with which Germany is credited. They cannot get back the real value, $40,000,000.

The United States, therefore, as well as the true owners, have been despoiled. All this is done in the name of patriotism. It was done under the administration and alleged direct authority of the great leader who announced that we would "conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and fair play we profess to be fighting for." Is it any wonder, when high officials of the government are willing to sell out the national honor in this fashion, that younger men of this generation are beginning to lose faith in political government?

The Liberal and the Jew

By CHARLES THOMAS HALLINAN

FOR more than a century, now, there has been a tacit liaison between the liberal and the Jew. The liberal has said, in substance, to the Jew in Western Europe: "We will break down the walls of the Ghetto for you, we will emancipate you, we will give you a vote and make you, as an individual, part of the modern state; and in return for this, you with your strong passion for social justice will support our party and our point of view through thick and thin." This agreement the Jew has kept with extraordinary fidelity. In England, in France, and in Germany he has been for a hundred years the solid core of the liberal, the radical, and the national liberal parties—to say nothing of the various socialist parties as they have emerged. Even Disraeli, though Tory in politics and a professed Christian, never really went back on this tacit agreement, as his extension of the franchise in England and his stout protests against Victorian industrialism bear witness. No, a survey of the political and social history of the nineteenth century shows that the Jew has kept his side of the agreement with remarkable fidelity.

But let us be honest with ourselves. Throughout the century the liberal has tended more and more to evade his pledge. With a quite unconscious arrogance the friendly non-Jew has tended to demand more and more from the Jew, as though the bargain could never be complete. He has said to the Jew: "Now that you are free from the restrictions and the terrorism of the Ghetto, you must put aside as rapidly as you can your queer Ghetto ways, your absurd and inconvenient taboos, your un-Western legalistic religion. You must give up your Sabbath—even though it be with a wrench—and accept our Sunday as your day of rest. If you can manage it, you'd better 'reform' your synagogue even though it is the most ancient of all living institutions; or better still, perhaps you can manage to forsake the synagogue and drift into one of the numerous minor groups in which we peculiarly abound, like Christian Science or the Ethical Culture movement. In short, my dear Jew, progress consists wholly in your adaptation to us and not at all in our adaptation to you."

Isn't this, broadly speaking, a fairly accurate picture? Don't we all assume that the Jew as Jew is an historical anomaly, his religion an absurd tribal affair, his great racial inheritance a mere matter of hooked noses? And don't we demand of him that he shall be as like us as he can, sharing our patriotism, our view of the state, our moral standards, our neo-Christian values? And when he does his best—almost too cheerfully—to rid himself of his remarkable past and to "assimilate" himself to us, what does he find? As several contributors to The Nation have pointed out, the thoroughly assimilated, Westernized Jew finds chiefly fresh points of conflict, fresh anti-Semitic absurdities. True, nobody in Dearborn, Michigan, charges him with practicing the "blood ritual"—the sacrifice of a Christian child on his altar—but they have twenty silly myths to take the place of that old exploded superstition. And when the Jew, indignant, bewildered, hurt, turns to us—his "liberal" friends—what does he find, commonly? Embarrassment, diffidence, excuses, or a repetition of our belief that the "Jew is a Jew in the synagogue but an American everywhere else." Having got him into the position where he has compromised his Jewishness in every way he can, we leave him, practically speaking, in the lurch.

It is a profoundly immoral situation and we "liberals"—save the mark!—we friendly non-Jews, are chiefly to blame. The Jew qua Jew had a magnificent case; and it is we (and not the anti-Semites) who have burked it. We persuaded him that "assimilation" was the solution of his long conflict with the Christian nations; and we were wrong. What we should have done was to have fought for a place for him in Western society unassimilated; we should have said (what is only the truth) that the pattern of modern life would be richer because of the Jew, and that his right to be Jewish and colorful and different was just as sacred a right as any other. We would have been true liberals, then, instead of pseudo-liberals. And even then we should have been doing nothing very remarkable—the Turkish Empire achieved as much hundreds of years ago!

In Europe the young Jewish intellectuals are very fond of making a distinction between anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism. The former they describe as the basis of the persecutions in the Early Church and the Middle Ages; the latter is the modern phenomenon. I confess I was vaguely impressed with this when I first ran across it, but my efforts to make it mean something proved fruitless. I was all the more interested, therefore, to notice that Mr. Horace M. Kallen in his article on The Roots of Anti-Semitism in The Nation for February 23, 1923, boldly sweeps aside this distinction without a difference and says frankly that the twain are one, that the responsibility for anti-Semitism lies "in the Christian religion itself, in the status which Christianity assigns the Jews, and the burden it sets and binds upon them." That is plain speaking and I honor him for it. "In the Christian system, the Jews are assigned a central and dramatic status. They are the villains of the Drama of Salvation. The gospel in which they so figure . . . became a part of the cultural inheritance of all the races of Europe, imparted equally to peer and to peasant. . . . Anti-Semitism is an organic part of it." At last, men and brethren, we are on the right track!

At bottom anti-Semitism is a religious problem, the beginnings of which can be traced in the Greek Catholic and the Roman Catholic churches. Martin Luther came along and decided to solve it by the simple expedient of converting the Jews. When the Jews refused to be converted and even dared to criticize Luther's translations from the Hebrew, the reformer was furious. "The Jews with their exegesis are like swine that break into the Scripture," he wrote. "They are quite at liberty to prefer, as indeed they do, the law of Moses to the Papa! Decretals and their mad articles, but they have no right to prefer it to the pure Evangel. Sooner than this let us have a struggle to the death!" The struggle ensued and left its mark on Protestant Germany to this very day through the influence of Luther's "Von den Jüden und iren Lügen" (1542) and his "Vom Schem Hamphoras" (1543). And so the tide, stayed for a moment, swept on through Protestantism, flaring up in America with the arrival of "fundamentalism." We liberals, determined to see in the contemporary Jew nothing but a voter, are today totally unprepared.

It is no answer to say that the Jew began it. One may cheerfully admit that he began it. He began it by being thoroughly indifferent to Christ and thoroughly contemptuous of the Apostolic Church. There, especially in the Early Church, is where the friction started. But Renan (who was not especially friendly to the Jews) is fair-minded enough to say that one could hardly blame the orthodox Hebrews of Jerusalem, learned in the Talmud, for being critical of the Hellenized Jews who flocked around the twelve Apostles and became, to an overwhelming extent, the early Christian church. The Hellenized Jew, says Renan, knew little or no Hebrew and not any too much law; he was ignorant, and distinctly credulous. The "Satires" of Horace show clearly how the Roman world poked fun at the Hellenized Jew; he was—Renan makes you feel—the Babbitt of the Mediterranean basin, the born "joiner" of new movements, the hasty snatcher-up of the latest ideas. Of the first seven Deacons of the Early Church, six we know were Hellenized Jews. Perhaps they were not of this type, but to the sober Hebrew conservatives of Jerusalem who took their religion seriously because they had suffered for it, to those proud Talmudic-trained Jews, the Hellenists must have seemed exasperatingly superficial, cheerfully willing to jeopardize for the latest sensation all that had been so painfully won.

And thus, as we know, began the long pull-and-haul between the two forces—the Hebrew Rabbis and Sopherim sternly protecting the synagogues from the new "heresy" and the energetic "heretics," the go-getters of their day, traveling incessantly and working their way into the Mediterranean world. The Rabbis won and—except for the fringe of Hellenized Jews—kept their people in the ancient faith and the ancient ways. And today the New England summer hotels score a magnificent revenge by barring their long front porches and their rocking chairs to Jews! It must be, altogether, one of the longest single streams of mischief in the world!

But of course many Christians are getting bravely over it. Indeed, we have gone a long ways when a Christian scholar like Professor R. Travers Herford of Manchester College, Oxford, can stand up sturdily for the Pharisee—that most maligned of New Testament figures—as he does in that remarkable little book of his entitled "Pharisaism."* Professor Herford has some forty years of Hebrew research behind him—research that has forced him to revise for himself practically all the prevailing Christian notions of the Pharisee. In this book he sets down without prejudice the case for Judaism as it appeared to the Jew during the first century. He does not wholly accept the case, but he states it fairly, and you discover with surprise that it is a perfectly decent, dignified, human, and arguable case; and your anti-Semitism, if you have any, simply peters out. Something of this sort, surely, is the line of attack we should have taken—we liberals—fifty or even a hundred years ago. The right of a Jew to remain a Jew—that's where we should have nailed our Christian colors to the mast!

As for the Jewish literature on the subject, I am strongly tempted to press upon readers of The Nation those fine "Selected Essays of Ahad Ha-Am," translated by Leon Simon and published by the Jewish Publication Society of America in 1912. These essays, which have appeared in various Hebrew journals throughout Europe, form a restatement of the case by a Jewish thinker who has deliberately turned his back upon the "assimilation" remedy and proposes to explore the possibilities of a sort of Jewish "back to the Jew" movement. These essays say, in substance: We can make our best contribution to the modern world by being Jews, developing our national consciousness instead of suppressing it. And he proceeds to attack, one by one, the various problems posed by that position.

Broadly speaking, these two men suggest for us liberals the way out of our dilemma. We must realize that anti-Semitism has a religious content and boldly grapple with it; where conventional church history has done less than justice to the Jew, justice must be done. The Jew's unaggressive religion is his business, not ours, but anti-Judaism is our business. It is our business to see that religious bigotry is stamped out and that great democratic masses are educated out of errors as old as Christendom. If we make room for Judaism among the religions of the modern world, we shall discover—overnight, as it were—that we have fulfilled our pledge and made room for the Jew. And then we'll suddenly realize with a shock that he is not a pushing person with a hooked nose but a fine, serious, sensitive fellow with a rich and interesting tradition, a strong passion for justice, and a stubborn history of which any Irishman, if I may say so, would be proud!

The Mark Stands Still

By ALICE HOHENEMSER-SALB

Berlin, December 15

GERMANY is at the present moment like a patient with a fatal disease who has received a strong dose of morphia; reveling in a comparative freedom from pain, he once more can realize what it means to be healthy.

Some weeks ago things seemed absolutely desperate, and it is still true that 50 per cent of all wage-earners are either out of employment or working short time; many are under notice to leave in a week or two and others have been warned that in March further dismissals may follow.

The economic conditions and the home and foreign policies which cause them are unaltered. But a new atmosphere has been created by bringing the mark to a standstill. Some anonymous officials (our government changes too often for us to have time to learn their names) decreed that a billion paper marks should constitute a gold mark, and four marks and twenty pfennigs a dollar. We have had similar decrees before; the new feature is that it really came about and has been maintained for some weeks. Not only is the mark in Germany obedient but even abroad the bank rate after a few convulsive swings of the pendulum seems inclined to recognize home authority. Indeed, the poor despised paper mark is at a premium.

The reason of this is that the days of the paper mark are numbered; it is not to be printed any more, although it is to serve as currency to the last. That of course enhances its value. In the meantime the new valorized rent mark which is to succeed it is gradually trickling down to the general public through the channels of the state and town officials who are paid in this currency. We also have valorized emergency marks issued by various communities which are to disappear as soon as the rent mark has permeated the whole system. But where is the government going to get the money to pay doles to half the wage-earning population without the conveniences of the paper mill? Only a steady, reliable flow of very high taxes can accomplish this, and if nobody is earning anything the chief source of taxes is stopped up.

* Published in New York by G. P. Putnam's Sons, and in London by Williams & Norgate, 1912.

However, the effect on daily life is at present magic. Spending money is no longer a gamble. We miss the thrills of capturing an article five minutes before it goes up in price. We no longer rush about all day to find out what the dollar is at; time enough to glance at the evening paper to assure ourselves that, of course, nothing has changed. No need to stand in front of the gas or electric works for hours to pay our bills in advance so as to avoid post-payments through depreciation. Neither are we obliged to line up at the post office every time we are forced to write a letter; we are able to buy a dozen stamps at a time, for they have gold value and can be used next week with as much right as today. You let your money lie quietly in your purse until you choose to spend it without any fear of its burning a hole there. Indeed it may even be to your advantage to wait a little; for since there is no fear of depreciation the shops cannot demand the so-called risk premium. There are price-tickets in the windows again; not those alarming rows of naughts, but neat little gold marks and pfennigs. That alone is soothing. You are much more willing to pay a few pfennigs for your safety shaving blade than if they call it so many milliards. But apart from the name you can buy a pound of meat today for one mark instead of five, fish for fifty pfennigs instead of three marks. It is inspiring to see a coat marked up sixty marks instead of fifty dollars, albeit the one sum may be as little forthcoming as the other. The shops don't bully you into paying foreign money or even valorized marks, but spy into your purse for any stray billions.

You also feel yourself once more an important unit in the economical system when the shopkeepers plaster their windows with injunctions to eat fish—nourishing and cheap—or call your attention to the fact that sugar is cheaper, instead of leaving you standing like paupers outside their closed shutters. You cannot remember your grocer smiling at you in that familiar way since 1914!

All this does not mean that people are buying freely; money is very scarce and there is the hope that prices may yield even more. It is of course tempting when the peasant who assured you his potato crop was a failure and his hens had all been poisoned brings his wares to your door, and a pork chop with the cabbage on Sunday is morally uplifting.

To be sure there are new scares on the horizon. For instance, house rent has taken a leap and is to reach pre-war rates in a month or two. How it is going to do this with wages systematically decreasing and when most people have only just enough to buy second-rate foodstuffs it is difficult to understand. But on the whole the tension has slackened. Human nature is wonderfully elastic, and so one talks hopefully of the coming American food loan and of the promising results of the English elections. Many prophesy that we have at last reached the bottom of the hill and that 1924 will bring the long-wished-for ascent.

Unless, however, the patient can undergo a more radical treatment which will not only soften the effects but remove the cause of the disease, it is to be feared that the last state of the man will be worse than the first.

Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve

By FELIX MORLEY

Baltimore, December 13

IT was a link with the past of America, as well as with that of Greece and Rome, which was snapped when Dr. Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve died in Baltimore last week. Those who attended the funeral services held here on Saturday speak of the relative absence of youth among the many who gathered to pay their final tribute. They were elderly people for the most part, those mourners who stepped from the church to group together and exchange a few quiet words of reminiscence in the pale January sunlight. And that was not quite as it should have been, for if ever man of 92 carried the spirit of youth unquenched it was Professor Gildersleeve.

That one human mind should have spanned the gap, and kept its keen alertness intact, between the present and the days when Edgar Allan Poe was living in Richmond seems incredible. Yet such was the achievement of Dr. Gildersleeve, probably the last man to have known Poe personally. In the pleasant atmosphere of the Virginia capital during the late forties the stripling classicist was drawn, logically enough, to the poet's circle by the fact that both were contributors to the Southern Literary Messenger. After the passage of three-quarters of a century he would still recall for his friends the famous account of the writing of "The Raven" as he heard Poe give it in old Richmond a dozen years before the outbreak of the Civil War.

In that interim were planted the seeds of mental growth which death alone could check. From Princeton, where he took his A.B. degree the very year of Poe's death, young Gildersleeve crossed to Germany, receiving at the feet of "a quiet old Privy Councillor"—August Boeckh—the inspiration which made "a passionate classicist out of an amateurish student of literature." It might have been from that great master of Hellenic studies that he discovered the secret of "growing old, but learning all the while," as Boeckh said of himself when past fourscore. A few years ago he wrote to an old friend that he was considering changing his motto to the words of Oedipus: "Now, knowing nothing, I've arrived where I've arrived."

The cynicism of his later life, ever genial even when most biting, stood Dr. Gildersleeve in good stead in the days when the world went mad. His own experiences in Germany during the years which followed the collapse of the Frankfort Assembly taught him to distinguish between a people and a system. In a lifetime which saw the German Empire created, rise to triumph, and then crash to ruin, he kept his faith in the virtues of the people whom he knew.

From a Germany not yet federalized Dr. Gildersleeve returned to that part of the United States which was shortly to endeavor to break down federalization. Five years after he assumed the chair of Greek at the University of Virginia the Civil War broke out. A life-long believer in State's rights, a life-long opponent of coercion, the young professor joined the army of the Confederacy, receiving in the Shenandoah Valley campaign a wound which left him lame until the end. Soldiering was not quite the stultifying affair in those days that it has become since the advent of mechanized warfare. During the winter, when fighting slackened, the scholar was furloughed back to the university. And there at his desk Dr. Gildersleeve exemplified the creed of the Old South of which he has written so charmingly by filling the intervals between campaigns with the instruction of Southern youths in classic lore.

Among the stately buildings of the University of Virginia, close to where his grave now lies, Dr. Gildersleeve remained for a decade after the Civil War. It was here that he developed his twofold talent of a teacher able to bring the flavor of Attic life to the dullest of moderns, and of a classical grammarian whose technical work has won him world-wide fame. The tribute on which all his students of these days lay stress is Dr. Gildersleeve's rare ability to stimulate the more mediocre undergraduates without restricting his own native talent for original research. He was a great teacher as well as a great scholar.

Yet it must have been a relief when President Gilman chose him as the first professor to be appointed at Johns Hopkins when it opened in 1876. Here, under the old traditions of Hopkins as an institution primarily destined for research, Dr. Gildersleeve was freed from those details of instructorship which stifle the fire and crush the originality of most of our academicians. Despite his talent as a teacher those dullards which democracy sends up for a veneer of education were always a source of vexation to Professor Gildersleeve at Virginia. One of his "old boys" there has compared his classroom struggles with this type to "Socrates set to trundling a baby carriage." His own view of the scholar-teacher's problem he set out in the lectures republished as "Hellas and Hesperia," when he wrote of the Greek grammarian Diotimus:

Diotimus, poor grammarian!
If my heart hath pitied e'er a one,
It is he,
Who, an almost centenarian,
Perched upon a "peak in Darien,"
Teaches little Jack and Mary Ann
A B C.

At Johns Hopkins the theory that those universities which set their great men free will reap a rich reward was amply justified by Professor Gildersleeve. It was here that his "Historical Syntax of Classical Greek," that famous grammar based not on tradition but on the most painstaking examination of all that is extant of Greek literature, was begun and prosecuted. It was here that he founded and edited the American Journal of Philology, with its scintillating medley of editorial comment known as Brief Mention. It was here that he collected his "Essays and Studies" and brought out his books on "Justin Martyr" and the "Odes of Pindar." Here he trained his graduate students to an appreciation of the classics as a living, vital force which, in the hands of those who have known his inspiration, has done and may still do much to stem the tide of reaction against spiritual assets brought by a material age.

Although he was a nature far more rare in this country than in Europe, his influence has been a powerful solvent of native provincialism. In spite of what he called the "national reproach" that "we do not distinguish bigness from greatness," Dr. Gildersleeve saw in this country which he loved whole-heartedly a spirit still embryonic, yet akin to that which made "the glory that was Greece." But whether that spirit is growing or dwindling with the passing years is not yet certain.

The Puritan Providence

By W. W. FENN

THE prime characteristic of Puritan religion was a habit of seeing in all arresting occurrences, and theoretically in all events whatsoever, an operation of the will of God. To contemporary Arminianizing churchmen this seemed silly, not to say grotesque, and even positively irreverent. Was it not the height of folly and conceit to suppose that the high and mighty God interested himself in the paltry details of individual lives? Was it not a degradation to represent Him as busied with trifling concerns? Religion was appropriate to the church with its dignified ceremonies of stately and ornate worship conducted by properly constituted officials, and the churchman would have said to the God of the Puritan, in Emerson's phrase: Have done with this touching and clawing. So the religious attitude of the Puritan aroused ridicule and scorn among his more conventionally, but often not less truly, religious contemporaries.

The scorn was intensified by the excesses to which the Puritan went in the application of his principle. In 1665 John Spencer, B.D., Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, published a noteworthy book entitled "A Discourse Concerning Prodigies" in which with copious erudition and exceptional good sense he set forth "the vanity of presages." Between the lines of the book one reads the ways of Spencer's contemporaries, and becomes aware of the extent to which all remarkable happenings, comets, earthquakes, eclipses, and the like were regarded as omens of national disaster. In an accompanying sermon the author reveals also the prevalent habit of considering minor occurrences of unusual character, dreams, etc., as portents of individual calamity. "Surely the Lord will do nothing, but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets"—reveals it often by signs which all men see but which His prophets alone can interpret.

Belief in signs and omens is ancient and widespread, forming an important part of what we describe as early superstition. The Puritan, however, intensified the early feeling, making it more thoughtful and authoritative. There were those who defended portents by natural explanations. Take, for example, the following paragraph from John Spencer:

Comets are not to be owned the effective signs of any evils ensuing; for thus it is vulgarly concluded they are: and upon this presumption, that they are a kind of hot and sulphurous exhalations set on fire, which (as it were the fever of Nature) prey upon the humidum, the moisture of it, and so suddenly dry and exhaust it: whence ensue great droughts, dearths, famines, pestilences: And by intending the heat of the air, they are thought to incline to Feavers, to promote choler in Princes and Nations, and so to lay that fuel in men which will soon break forth into the flames of public wars and confusions!

That is amusing to us, but the Puritans, like Queen Victoria for a different reason, would have said grimly, "We are not amused," for resort to second causes and natural explanations was odious in their eyes. In their own phrase, such awe-inspiring events were God's "warning guns" shot off before His "aiming gun." Comets foretold evil because God sent them for that purpose. Their Calvinism taught them this, and behind their Calvinism, here as everywhere, stood the Bible. Had not Jesus told His disciples that signs on the earth and in the sky would be the heralds of His Coming? Had He not taught them to believe in God, who numbers the hairs of a man's head and marks the fall of a sparrow? So the Puritan strengthened and sanctioned the popular attitude of mind by the words of Scripture and the theology of John Calvin.

This way of thinking was brought to these shores by both Puritan and Pilgrim. They found everywhere signs of God's favor or displeasure, sent by Him to warn or encourage His people. Here for instance is a passage from Cotton Mather's Diary:

August 14, 1716. This Day a singular Thing befel me. My God, Help me to understand the Meaning of it! I was prevailed withal, to do a Thing, which I very rarely do: (not once in Years). I rode abroad with some Gentlemen and Gentlewomen, to take the country Air, and to divert ourselves, at a famous Fish-Pond. In the Canoe, on the Pond, my Foot slipt, and I fell overboard into the Pond. Had the Vessel been a little further from the Shore, I must have been drown'd. But I soon recovered the Shore, and going speedily into a warm Bed, I received no sensible Harm. I returned well in the Evening: sollicitous to make all the reflections of Piety on my Disaster, and on my Deliverance. But not yett able to penetrate into the whole Meaning of the Occurrence. Am I quickly to go under the Earth, as I have been under the Water? My Consort had her Mind, all the former part of the day and all the day before, full of uneasy impressions, on her Mind, that this little journey would have Mischief attending of it.

There is a capital picture of the Puritan mind. Mrs. Mather had presentiments of trouble, and her husband was concerned to discover the "whole meaning" of the occurrence which fulfilled them. We should be inclined to say that a solicitous wife might very well be anxious when her somewhat top-heavy husband proposed so great a change in his habitually sedentary and studious life as to go a-pleasuring, and that so far as Cotton Mather was concerned the whole meaning of the event simply was that it was dangerous for a man of his age, and build, and learned lubberliness to go out in a little boat on Spy Pond at all, and that thereafter he might better fish from the shore or learn to sit particularly quiet in the canoe, else he might expect another ducking. But that was not the Mather, or the Puritan, way of looking at life. God would teach him a much more important lesson: this was a presage of something of deeper moment, perhaps his death, soon to befall.

The Diary of Cotton Mather, and the writings of the Puritans in general, abound in this sort of thing. These men and women were for seeing God's hand in everything. Since His eye was ever upon them and there was nothing which they could conceal, they learned to do, or think, nothing which they would wish to hide. Simple folk are wont to take for true whatever idea happens to turn up in their minds just because they find it there; the Puritan did the same but justified his practice by the theory that the idea was of divine origin. It was an easy step from a resolution to do God's will to a conviction that one's own will was God's, and so to put back of individual purpose an almighty decree. And this habit was of practical value, for it is difficult to see how the first settlers could have maintained themselves in this howling wilderness (as they loved to call it), beset by savage foes, who were loyal subjects of Satan, save by an indomitable faith that they were God's people, brought here by His will, guided by His counsel, protected and sustained by His hand. If misfortune befell them, it was a chastisement from the Lord intended for their good. Could a less thoroughgoing faith than this have carried them through the early days of trial?

By reliance upon this faith it was confirmed, and transmitted to posterity. In New England there are still good country folk who are no less keen for signs and omens than their ancestors were. Years ago, an aged Vermont woman told me that once in the spring a full-blown fruit tree in a neighbor's garden was blighted overnight, although no other tree in the vicinity was damaged. "I couldn't understand the meaning of it," she said, "until next fall when all the children of the family died one after another: then I understood." She was entirely sincere about it; the pious soul actually believed that the blighting of the fruit blossoms was designed to foretell the deaths that were to occur in the household. It is not so long ago that one could find similar beliefs universally held on the New England country-side. The shroud-like guttering of a candle, mysterious noises heard in the stillness of night, a sound as of cats scurrying over the floor of a room in which no cats were—these were "forerunners" of death, divine messengers sent to prepare men and women for coming sorrow, for death, and for the Judgment Day.

Probably no reader of The Nation would confess to any such gross superstitions, although it may be doubted whether in all cases mental enlightenment has yet affected the spinal column. The goose-flesh rises even while we laugh. But there is a fashion nowadays to make over old ideas, rehabilitate former superstitions, interpret old formulas, and say proudly: See, this wholly reasonable thing is exactly what our forebears meant, although they did not quite know it, and so we believe just as they did. It is a perverse practice which is responsible for a large amount of the theological fog which obscures and chills the religious thought of today, but since there are many who like this sort of thing, let us give them the sort of thing they like, and suggest an interpretation into modern terms of the central belief and faith of the Puritan. We no longer speak of the absolute sovereignty of God, but we believe unhesitatingly in the absolute sovereignty of law—and that is the same idea only in different words. We do not connect comets with national disaster, or the blasting of a blossoming tree with the subsequent death of buds of the family, yet it would not be surprising if some one, reading Spencer's imputed natural explanation, had murmured that there might be something in it after all, and that comets and calamity might be connected in the causal context of events. We do not accept the particular connections which the Puritans made, but that there are connections is the central article of our scientific creed, and it remains only to identify the scientific laws of nature with the regular habits of an immanent God, and, behold, we are standing precisely where the fathers stood. It is not uncommon, nowadays, to be gravely told that modern science is old-time Calvinism: in other terms: for divine decrees, we now have scientific determinism; for election and reprobation, germinal selection which gives rise to an amiable or an odious product quite apart from the will of parents or offspring; for original sin, the solidarity of mankind simultaneously and successively. It is all highly entertaining as an exhibition of theological hocus-pocus, but if we had so interpreted our ancestors to themselves in their lifetime they would have made it hot for us here—and hereafter.

Ratify the Turkish Treaty!

By EDWARD MEAD EARLE

RATIFICATION by the Senate of the Turco-American Treaty of amity and commerce signed last August at Lausanne should be achieved with the least possible delay. The resumption of normal relations with Turkey would be a potent impetus to economic rehabilitation and political stabilization in the Near East. It would go far toward assuring peace to an area of the world which has been cursed with almost uninterrupted internecine and international war for almost fifteen years—from the Young Turk Revolution of 1908 to the Mudania Armistice of 1922.

The Peace of Lausanne—of which the Turco-American Treaty must be considered an integral part—is not, to be sure, the kind of peace which the Western world would like to see imposed upon Turkey. Unlike the peace of Sèvres, it is a negotiated, not a dictated, peace. In this respect it marks a salutary departure from that type of diplomatic procedure which poisoned the treaties drawn up at Paris. The Sèvres settlement was signed under duress by a puppet government at Constantinople, but was rejected by almost every other articulate voice in Turkey. The Lausanne peace was negotiated freely by a Nationalist government and was ratified by a National Assembly which is more nearly democratic than any previous parliament in Turkish history and which enjoys the confidence and respect of the Anatolian peasantry. At Sèvres terms were exacted of Turkey which were impossible of fulfilment. At Lausanne the Nationalists signed up no blank checks and made no pledges which they cannot keep. The Sèvres Treaty violated promises, outraged legitimate national aspirations, defied economic laws, and satisfied no one except the imperialists who drafted it. The Peace of Lausanne is an honest effort to reconcile Turkish sovereignty with the peculiar geographical, ethnographical, religious, and economic problems of the Near East as a whole.

There will be many Americans, of course, to whom formal recognition of the New Turkey will be humiliating. But we cannot, if we would, escape the consequence of our own inconsistencies and our own follies in the Near East since 1918. President Wilson shares with Mr. Lloyd George the responsibility for the foolhardy Greek occupation of Smyrna, which fanned Turkish nationalism into a hot flame and which, to quote the Harbord report, "cheapened every Christian life in Turkey." By withdrawing from participation in the negotiation of peace terms for Turkey we permitted the predatory ambitions of Greece and the Allies to run riot in the Near East, at a cost of life and treasure which is yet to be computed. Although we have always professed great interest in the welfare of the Christian minorities in Turkey, the Senate, perhaps quite correctly under the circumstances, refused to accept a mandate for Armenia. Although our State Department has been engaged for four years in a diplomatic controversy with Great Britain over Mesopotamian oil resources, we moved not a finger to break the Greco-Turkish death-grapple in Anatolia. If the Turks achieved a victory over Allied and American diplomacy at Lausanne, it was partly because they had a case which merited more respect. The Lausanne peace is a severe blow to Western imperialism in the Near East and as such should be welcomed by liberals everywhere.

The American, as well as the Allied, treaty with Turkey recognizes the abolition of the Capitulations, which had come to be considered sacrosanct by Westerners. It is by no means certain, however, that the former capitulatory regime was justified on the grounds of either expediency or right. Certainly the narrowly defined jurisdiction of the Ottoman Government over foreigners—and over certain Ottoman nationals under foreign "protection"—was one of the principal causes of Turkish administrative confusion and judicial incompetence. The exemption of foreigners from taxation and the veto of foreign governments over increases in Ottoman customs duties assisted in the perpetual pauperization of the Turkish Treasury and placed the Sublime Porte at the mercy of European diplomatists and European financiers. Although the Moslem faith abjures the use of intoxicating liquors, and although American missionaries and their supporters at home are firm believers in prohibition, the liquor traffic was openly carried on in Turkey by native and European Christians under the protection of the Capitulations and of the Christian Powers. The foremost American authority on the juridical status of foreigners in Turkey has said that "foreigners were so completely exempt from the jurisdiction of the Turkish police that they came, in effect, to be regarded as subject to no law. Consciously or unconsciously foreigners not infrequently indicated an utter disregard and contempt for many of the police regulations. The Turkish authorities often found themselves quite helpless under the most trying and exasperating circumstances. The most notorious instance of this helplessness was the impotence of the police in dealing with the hotels, cafes, gambling houses, saloons, dance-halls, and other pleasure resorts which were owned by foreigners and flourished insolently in defiance of Moslem sensibilities. The so-called European quarters in Pera and Galata degenerated into districts so degraded as to constitute a shameful commentary on European civilization."

When the Turco-American Treaty was signed on August 6 last, the existence of an independent and sovereign Turkey was a fait accompli. On September 10, 1914, the Sultan had abrogated the Capitulations as "an intolerable obstacle to all progress in the empire." The National Pact of the Kemalists declared that the Turks "consider the possession of complete independence and liberty as the sine qua non of their national existence" and that, consequently, they "oppose all juridical or financial restrictions of any nature which would arrest their national development." In spite of the bullying of Lord Curzon and the cajolery of M. Barrère, Ismet Pasha stood firm at Lausanne, and the Allies were obliged to acknowledge "the complete abolition of the Capitulations in every respect." Failure on the part of the American representatives at Lausanne to recognize the facts as they were, rather than as some Americans thought they ought to be, would have made any negotiations with the Turks out of the question.

In order to improve upon its judicial system—which has been notoriously inefficient and corrupt—the Turkish Government informed the Allies and the United States at Lausanne that it proposed to take into its employ for a period of at least five years, as Turkish officials, "a number of European legal counselors whom it will select from a list prepared by the Permanent Court of International Justice from among jurists nationals of countries which did not take part in the war of 1914 to 1918." It is pure speculation to say whether these foreign counselors will accomplish any immediate reforms in the Turkish judicial system. It may be that racial and religious prejudices will be too powerful to be overcome. If so, Armenians under the new regime will obtain in Turkish courts the same even-handed justice which Negroes are accustomed to receive in Georgia, and foreigners in Turkey will be dealt with in the same spirit of judicial impartiality which Japanese have experienced in California.

The abrogation of the Capitulations takes away from American schools and colleges in Turkey the legal immunities which they formerly enjoyed. It does not, however, mean that their work will have to be discontinued or even impaired. The Turkish Government, in a formal communication to the State Department and in informal assurances to the institutions themselves, has declared its intention of observing a liberal and benevolent policy toward American educational enterprises in Turkey. Robert College began its sixty-first year last September with an enrolment of four hundred and fifty students, more than one hundred of whom were Turks. One of the Turkish students is a brother of Ismet Pasha, Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Constantinople Woman's College has a registration of three hundred and thirty, of whom about one-sixth are Turks. These two colleges have played, and promise to continue to play, so prominent a part in the moral and intellectual leadership of the Near East that it would be a tragedy to jeopardize their work. No amount of military force could secure for them the preeminent position which they now enjoy as a result of the good-will of the Turkish authorities. Rejection of the Turkish treaty—particularly if it be rejected because of partisan politics or religious bigotry—would be certain to affect adversely the prestige which America has long enjoyed in the Near East. It is a full realization of these facts which has led Dr. James L. Barton, secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Dr. Caleb Gates, president of Robert College, and Dr. Mary Mills Patrick, president of the Constantinople Woman's College, to state publicly that they favor ratification of the Turco-American Treaty of Lausanne.

Protection of minorities was a thorny question at Lausanne. As between Greeks and Turks a solution was attempted by a compulsory exchange of populations, which is now going on partly under the supervision of the League of Nations. This perilous experiment was not undertaken at the instigation of the Turks, as has been so freely charged by the uninformed press, but as the result of a fervent plea by Dr. F. Nansen, who considers it the only permanent solution of the problem. As regards all other Christian minorities the Allied treaty with the Turks contains certain specific guaranties for all nationals of Turkey "without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race, or religion": equality before the law and full protection of life, liberty, and property; equal civil and political rights; permission to maintain, establish, and control religious, philanthropic, and social institutions; freedom of religion and unrestricted use of the vernacular; freedom of social customs, including family law and personal status. It will be freely charged, of course, that these promises are not worth the paper they are written on—other such promises, albeit not so far-reaching, have been made before. In this connection it is well to quote certain sections of Article 44 of the treaty with the Allies:

Turkey agrees that . . . these provisions constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guaranty of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the Council of the League of Nations. . . . Any member of the Council of the League shall have the right to bring to the attention of the Council any infraction or danger of infraction of any of these obligations, and the Council may thereupon take such action and give such directions as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances. Turkey further agrees that any difference of opinion as to questions of law or of fact arising out of these articles . . . shall be held to be a dispute of international character under Article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. The Turkish Government hereby consents that any such dispute shall, if the other party thereto demands, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The decision of the Permanent Court shall be final and shall have the same force and effect as an award under Article 13 of the Covenant.

That the Turco-American Treaty does not include these minorities provisions may be attributed to three principal reasons: First, rightly or wrongly, no such pledges have ever been incorporated in treaty form between the United States and Turkey and certainly do not constitute part of a treaty of amity and commerce; second, the guaranties are under the supervision of the League of Nations, the very existence of which is not conceded by the present Administration; third, they would be considered by Senate "irreconcilables" and others as foreign entanglements too monstrous to be even contemplated. Those who talk of our failure in this treaty to fulfil our obligations to Armenia forget that we cannot reach agreement in the United States upon even the most elementary sort of international co-operation, such as the Permanent Court of International Justice. They also forget that in 1920 the Senate flatly rejected the proposal for an Armenian mandate, at a time when we were asked to assume guardianship for territory under the complete military subjection of the Allies. Short of a successful armed invasion of the Anatolian peninsula there is now no way we can achieve what we then refused to consider. Ratification of the Turco-American Treaty, however, would enable our official representatives at Angora to exercise their influence on behalf of moderation and justice.

Sweeping assertions have been made that the treaty with Turkey is "humiliating and purposeless" and "surrenders every American right in Turkey." Nothing could be further from the truth. The Turkish Government is meeting in a most friendly spirit outstanding pecuniary claims of American citizens. Americans in Turkey—whether engaged on business, on philanthropy, or on pleasure—are guaranteed "most favored nation" treatment. American merchant ships, war vessels, and aircraft are permitted unrestricted passage through the now demilitarized Straits, in time of war no less than in time of peace. In other words, Americans will have in Turkey the same rights as nationals of the Allied Powers. We are not asked to accept less, and we have no justification for asking more.

It is frequently stated that we can have no confidence in the good faith of the Turks in observing their international engagements. In a world in which treaty obligations are more freely undertaken than performed, one must admit the possibility that violations of the letter and spirit of the Lausanne peace may occur. However, the Turks desire American friendship and have done their best to retain it under conditions more trying than the present. From the time of our entry into the Great War until the armistice, American lives and property were wholly at the mercy of the Turks. But American lives were protected, American property was kept inviolate, and American schools and colleges outside the war zone continued their work unmolested.

Ratification of this treaty would no more condone past acts of violence on the part of the Turks than assistance to Greek refugees condoned the diabolical conduct of the Greek army in Anatolia. It merely gives Americans the opportunity, with the good-will of the Turks, to play a part in the economic and social reconstruction of a war-ridden Near East. The Turks are conducting an honest experiment in government to which every American tradition is pledged. They are attempting to reform their social customs in accordance with the spirit of Western progress. Their success will depend in large measure upon the extent to which they will enjoy the sympathy and encouragement of the outside world. The Young Turk revolution was debauched not so much because of the venality of certain of its leaders as because of the imperialism of Christian nations. It would be tragic indeed if a new attempt to regenerate Asia Minor should run similarly amuck because of tribal loyalties and war psychology on the part of Americans.

What is asked for the Turks should be demanded for every other Near Eastern people. The Greek people, worn out as a result of an ill-advised military venture, taxed to the breaking-point, victimized by a meaningless series of political revolutions, likewise need our support and our generous financial assistance. An objective analysis of the situation in the Near East must lead to the conclusion that it is the result of two epidemic diseases: exaggerated political and cultural nationalism on the part of the Balkan and Anatolian peoples, and the unregulated economic and strategic rivalries of the great Powers. When shall we learn to attack the causes, rather than the effects, of these plagues?

Nicholas Longworth

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

HARDLY anybody seems ever to want to write anything really serious and deep about Nicholas Longworth. The resulting gap in American political literature is one which I will now endeavor to fill up.

Nicholas Longworth, now floor leader of the Republican Party in the House of Representatives of the United States of America, is presumably loved by the common people. His district is full of them, and they have sent him to the House of Representatives for ten terms. Only nine members of the House now excel and exceed Mr. Longworth in length of service, or—to put it another way—in continuity of favor with their districts. Eight of these nine are conservatives. What this proves about the common people is not the subject of this article.

Mr. Longworth voted for all the "farm bloc" bills in the last session of Congress while the "farm bloc" was supposed by all good banks and chambers of commerce east of the Mississippi—and by many of them west of it—to be engaged in undermining and collapsing the republic.

Longworth voted for the bonus—and voted for it over President Harding's veto—while all the great forces of what is technically known as "organized wealth" were visiting upon the bonus their sternest disapproval. Mr. Longworth in nineteen hundred and seventeen, in the course of the passage of the revenue bill of that year, endeavored earnestly to insert into the bill a provision for putting heavier taxes on the unearned incomes of the lolling rich than on the earned incomes of the toiling poor. Mr. Longworth in nineteen hundred and nineteen was a large leader in the "insurgency" which prevented the "Old Guard" in the House of Representatives from electing Mr. James R. Mann of Illinois to be Speaker. Mr. Longworth today, as floor leader of the Republican Party in the House, has had to choose between making concessions, on the one hand, to the Republican "progressives" and, on the other, to the Democrats, who, most of them, are much more conservative than the Republican "progressives." Mr. Longworth has chosen to make concessions to the Republican "progressives" and has received Mr. John M. Nelson, the militant leader of the House "progressive group," into the House governing class, which is called the Rules Committee.

Mr. Longworth is a conservative who in order to save some of conservatism would never hesitate to abandon some of it. He is not a "last ditch" or "die hard" or "rule or ruin" conservative. He is too sophisticated to think that any of the matters now in Congress are life-and-death matters in the history of the republic. He knows very well that they are not. He knows also that certain so-called "progressive" measures are demanded not merely by the argument that a certain number of tubs must be thrown to the pursuing "progressive" whale, which might otherwise climb on board the ship of state, but also by their own merits as sound measures. He favors, for instance, a drastic increasing of inheritance taxes.

He further is able at will to be extremely profound in his speeches. A recent speech of his in favor of stopping the issuing of tax-exempt securities is so profound that he has been observed to seem oppressed while reading it over again himself. It is full of statistics and it is deep—very deep.

We come now, however, to Mr. Longworth's faults. His chief fault is that no matter how deep he becomes he cannot become solemn. There is in him a total void at the spot where the American statesman keeps usually that priceless possession of his: a talent for a solemnity which would make the British House of Commons flee to the tea terrace.

To do serious things in a light manner: that is more British than American. Lord Curzon would have no great reputation for solemnity over here. In London Mr. Longworth would have no great reputation for frivolity. Here there are many of his fellow-statesmen who for many years thought they had comprehended Mr. Longworth when they said: "He is amusing."

His next fault is that he was born of a distinguished family, and born rich, and lives accordingly, and likes it, and has too much humor—which is almost the same thing as saying too much sincerity—to pretend that he does not like it or that he is living otherwise. He accordingly, besides bearing the burden of being accused of being amusing, bears the even heavier burden of being accused of being an aristocrat.

He is also an artist. He knows music, pursues music, performs music; and he does it with the zeal and with the skill of an adept—or addict.

His playing of the violin is a streak of civilization across a scene of committee hearings, reported bills, debates on the politics of them, dinner parties on the politics of them, and more committee hearings and more reported bills.

A wit, an aristocrat, an artist.

Yet he has a faculty somehow for getting called "Nick"; and also, somehow, when Mr. Mondell, Republican floor leader in the last session of the House of Representatives, retired from the House to run for the Senate, people began of their own motion to go toward "Nick" to ask him to be Mr. Mondell's successor. Mr. Longworth himself was motionless about it. He conducted no campaign for himself for the floor leadership. He went on making jokes at serious moments and wearing spats.

In the matter of the spats he was saved by Robert Marion La Follette. Several Representatives who were laboring most diligently to accumulate votes among their fellow-Representatives for Mr. Longworth for floor leader came to him one day and said:

"You won't mind if we talk to you on a serious subject?"

"I'd like you to," said Mr. Longworth.

"It's this," said they. "We find there is a great deal of criticism of you about your clothes and particularly about those spats. Now we want to ask you: Wouldn't you be willing to give up wearing spats? It would help us a lot."

"Well," said Longworth, "will you first do something for me?"

"Certainly," said they.

"It's this," said Longworth. "Go over to the Senate and see Mr. La Follette."

"And say what?"

"Oh, anything. Just go over and have a talk with him."

They went. In fifteen minutes they were back.

"It's all right," they said. "He was making a speech and we just took one look at him. You're saved."

"I thought so," said Longworth. "May I continue to wear my spats?"

"You may," said his friends and went out to publish their discovery. Robert M. La Follette wears spats too.

As floor leader, Mr. Longworth already is, and probably increasingly will be, a negotiator of compromises both as to parliamentary methods and as to legislative acts. His enemies will say that he has no convictions. His friends will say that he has no fanaticisms. The inward truth will be that he has an Horatian humor. He has levity and sanity. He has a sense of the laughable mingling of contradictory principles in life as lived and a sense of the deadly ridiculousness of extremes. If he thinks the extremist clamors of the progressive faction ridiculous, he thinks the extremist alarms of his own conservative faction ridiculous likewise. He is amusing and amused; and he will be an amused conservative "moderate."

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has a serious-minded young niece who is always attempting to interest him in profound and weighty issues. Whenever she receives a blank requesting the names of ten people who might be interested in the reform of the calendar, Esperanto, or the woes of the Wahabis, she fills it in with the Drifter's name at the top. He thus appears upon countless high-minded mailing-lists, and accordingly the Bok boosters seem passionately eager to have his vote upon their plan to save the world. The postman staggers in daily with a new pile of Bok ballots—a partial list, allowing for the frailties of human recollection, includes the Chamber of Commerce, the City Club, the Civic Club, the Civil Service Association, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Foreign Policy Association, the Friends of Irish Freedom, the League of Nations Nonpartisan Association, the League for Industrial Democracy, the League for Political Education, the Scandinavian-American Foundation, the Select Committee of alumni of his high school, the Select Committee of alumni of his college, the Select Committee of alumni of his graduate school, and he has forgotten what else. Only the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee and the Key Man Movement organized by the New York Commercial have left Bok's billets-doux severely alone.

* * * * *

THUS far the Drifter has not been able to bring himself to read the plan, any more than he can read the literature of the noble organizations distributing it. He can decide, however, without reading it: he is always for the under dog. When the voting is almost complete he will ask Mr. Bok for the latest count, sit up all night signing ballots, and send in by the last mail enough votes to swing the verdict of the American people into a thunderous Yes or No, as the case may be—whichever it was not on the night before.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

William Channing Gannett

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I feel sure that you will be glad to grant me a little space in your valued paper to pay tribute to a great and good man, dead on December 15 last, who must have been known and revered by many of your readers. I refer to the late Dr. William C. Gannett, of Rochester, New York. Born in Boston in 1840, a son of the distinguished Ezra Stiles Gannett, baptized by William Ellery Channing with his own name, graduated from Harvard College and the Harvard Divinity School, Mr. Gannett spent his life in the service of five Unitarian churches—at Milwaukee (Wis.), East Lexington (Mass.), St. Paul (Minn.), Hinsdale (Ill.), and Rochester (N. Y.). During all of this long period he was one of the outstanding leaders of his communion, beloved as a friend, honored as a teacher, revered as a saint and prophet. Nor were his activity and influence limited to his church; on the contrary, throughout all his career he was a dominant and adored figure in the community at large.

Reared in the tonic atmosphere of New England transcendentalism, when Emerson was meditating in Concord, Parker thundering in the pulpit of the Boston Music Hall, and Garrison crusading at the head of the Abolition movement, Gannett early acquired the habits of clear thought, honest speech, and dauntless courage which marked him all his years. In the furious controversy which rent the Unitarian body in the eighties of the last century and which swung that church at last to the extreme left of theological radicalism, Dr. Gannett was in the van fighting fearlessly for those large liberties of thought which are now the chief glory of religious liberalism everywhere. No man was more uncompromising than he, yet no man more sympathetic in his understanding of his opponents or more gracious in his treatment of them. He was all tenderness for men, whatever their opinions or perversities. Love was as much the atmosphere of his heart as fragrance the atmosphere of flowers.

At bottom, after all, this man was more the mystic than the prophet, though his service as a leader of thought and life can never be forgotten. But it was in the deep places of the spirit that he dwelt most easily and gladly. It was here that he wrote his immortal sermons which have reached their hundreds of thousands of readers—"Blessed Be Drudgery," "Wrestling and Blessing," and others. It was here that his heart broke out in the songs which rank him among the unforgettable hymn-writers of America. It was here that he fostered friendships which yoked him with a score of precious souls as David was yoked with Jonathan. It was here, finally, in these mystic places, that he grew to the serene stature of sainthood. Dr. Gannett was one of the pure in heart who see God. "I never knew a man so unspotted from the world," said Dr. Samuel M. Crothers at his funeral.

In recent addresses President Meiklejohn has been discussing the moot question of Democracy and Excellence—are they compatible? Dr. Gannett's life cries to heaven like the call of silver trumpets that America produces and may ever produce intellectual and spiritual excellence of the most exalted type. While such men come, we may, like Paul on the road to Rome, "Thank God and take courage."

New York, January 8

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

There Is No Reason or Justice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The members of the Chinese Seamen's Union have learned with no little astonishment and dismay that nearly 100 American workingmen are in prison on account of the California criminal syndicalist law and that the only evidence presented against them was membership in the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World. We of the Chinese Seamen's Union have always looked upon the United States as a free and desirable country, and we are very sorry to hear it alleged that our fellow-workingmen in the United States are being subjected to such persecutions—unparalleled even in the history of China.

If there is reason or justice in this state of affairs please let us know, so that we can present the case to our members. Unless a reply is received from you in a reasonable length of time the members of the Chinese Seamen's Union will understand that American workingmen are the subjects of a brutal and unjust persecution, and it is certain that our members will then demand that some economic action be taken which will bring your attention, and also the attention of all American capitalists, to the fact that the working class of the world will no longer permit without protest the persecution and imprisonment of workingmen anywhere.

Canton, December 1

CHAK HON KEE,

Secretary for the Chinese Seamen's Union

For Tax-Exempt Securities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of December 19, in commenting upon President Coolidge's message, you say that the President "deserves praise for his recommendation in favor of a constitutional amendment to end tax-exempt securities." Surely, you have not weighed this subject carefully, nor thought through the problem, or you would not make that statement.

What does the proposal for a constitutional amendment mean, and why the hot haste to enact it? It means only an attempt of public-utility interests to curb municipal ownership. It is directed solely at state and municipal bonds, since federal bonds could be taxed without a constitutional amendment. It means the granting of power to the nation to tax the States and their municipalities—a complete breakdown of the dual system of government. It means an enhancing of the value of the thirty billions of bonds outstanding, since they could not be taxed without impairing the obligations of contracts. It means that money for schools, roads, streets, municipal improvements, and general welfare will be secured with greater difficulty. It would seriously handicap both state and nation in times of national peril in securing the financial aid necessary—all this in order that a handicap may be placed upon public ownership.

In proof of this, observe only the principal forces that have been behind this amendment from the beginning, namely, the national associations of gas, electric light, electric railway, and similar organizations. The principal propaganda has come from these sources and can be found in public-utility journals.

Chicago, December 19

JOHN A. LAPP,

Director Department of Social Action,
National Catholic Welfare Council

No Real Amnesty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Almost without exception those writing on the subject of amnesty for political prisoners leave the reader with the impression that since the remainder of those convicted under the espionage act have been released the fight so far as they are concerned is ended. Not so. Amnesty means a general grant of pardon for offenses against the government and restores civil and political rights; mere release from prison, whether by parole, commutation of sentence, or expiration of sentence, does not. The person so released is a felon still and is considered morally unfit to exercise the civil and political rights which go with American citizenship.

Also it should be remembered that the espionage act has not been repealed. There will have been no real vindication of American honor until civil and political rights are restored and the espionage act has been repealed.

Seattle, Washington, December 31

EMIL HERMAN

Contributors to This Issue

CHARLES THOMAS HALLINAN, former director of the American Union Against Militarism, is living in England.

ALICE HOHENEMSER-SALB is an Englishwoman who has lived in Berlin for many years.

FELIX MORLEY is on the staff of the Baltimore Evening Sun.

W. W. FENN was long dean of the Harvard Divinity School.

EDWARD MEAD EARLE is assistant professor of history in Columbia University and the author of "Turkey, the Great Powers, and the Bagdad Railway."

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES is minister of the Community Church in New York.

Poems

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

Imminent Doom

This frail and fragrant morning
Is streaming on toward noon;
Listen to my warning!
There will be buzzing soon.
Soon we shall be shaken
Like flowers and gold grass
And all our pollen taken
By a bee with bowels of brass.

Hard Girl

I never loved you, never any man;
I run too fast to long be overtaken.
But I will wave to you, and you, unshaken
Will turn and watch the brown road where I ran.
Will you be sorry, will you feel forsaken?
A little grief is good for any man.

Books

Crucify Him, Crucify Him!

Young India (1919-1922). By Mahatma Gandhi. With a brief sketch of the Non-Cooperation Movement. By Babu Rejendra Prasad. B. W. Huebsch. $4.

MAHATMA GANDHI is coming into his own! I remember, when I prepared an address upon this man in 1920, I could find nothing about him outside a few stray newspaper clippings and a brief but sympathetic account of his life in an article in the Hibbert Journal (1917) by Gilbert Murray. Later I secured some books and pamphlets from India, and managed to lay my hands upon the exceedingly rare pamphlet "M. K. Gandhi, An Indian Patriot in South Africa," by Joseph J. Doke. Now at last material is beginning to appear here in America. Haridas T. Muzumdar, a fellow-countryman, has published in Chicago a brief biography, "Gandhi the Apostle." In the Century is appearing a series of biographical papers by Romain Rolland, soon to be printed in book form. Gandhi's own book, "Hind Swaraj," is now in press. And here are the writings of the Mahatma in his paper, Young India, during the great period from 1919 to 1922.

If I believed in the idea of reincarnation, I would regard Mahatma Gandhi in all reverence as Jesus Christ returned to earth. If I believed in the doctrine of the Second Coming, I would say that this event had already transpired in India. In saying this I do not refer to the influence of the Nazarene upon the Indian, which he has himself made plain. Rather do I have in mind the whole spirit of Gandhi and the marvelous pattern of his life. This Mahatma's soul is the Christ's soul. Its inward simplicity and purity, its mystic hold upon eternal verities, its strange combination of humility and exaltation, its profound understanding and infinite compassion, its vast capacity for sacrifice, its inflexible purpose of idealism, its love of men and its consciousness of God—all these reproduce Jesus. Equally remarkable, as an historical parallel, is the non-resistant philosophy upon which Gandhi builds his movement for the emancipation of India and the restoration of its native culture. Worked out in terms of economic and political organization unknown to Jesus, it is at heart the same ideal applied to the same problem of spiritual redemption. Even the setting of Gandhi's life, and its drama to date—a public ministry of three years directed to the multitudes and against the native rulers of his people and an alien empire, presenting spiritual principles of love and sacrifice as the foundations of a new social order, ending in arrest, trial, and, not crucifixion to be sure, but long imprisonment—these suggest a transference of the New Testament story to our day. And this book, "Young India," bulky as it is, seems a gospel of this modern Christ!

The closing pages, as in each of the four Gospels, present the story of the arrest, trial, and condemnation of the non-resistant leader of his people. This is preceded, as in the Gospels, by anticipations of the event ("If I am arrested—"). The arrest is briefly described. Then comes the trial before the English judge—the questioning, the plea of guilty, Gandhi's unforgettable "Statement" to the court, the judge's highly creditable reply, the sentence, the closing scene of farewell. There is nothing in history to compare with this except the death of Jesus, unless it be the death of Socrates or that of John Brown. The account, as printed in this volume, is destined, I believe, to take its permanent place in the world's literature of heroic martyrdom.

In the thousand and more pages leading up to this sublime climax are gathered "all the articles, numbering hundreds," printed by Gandhi in Young India during his active leadership of the Non-Cooperation Movement. The separate items, including not merely articles, but interviews, conversations, letters, editorials, chance notes, and "observations by the way," run the whole gamut of discussion from the most exalted moral and religious principles to comparatively trivial matters of individual conduct and party tactics. Some few, written by others than Gandhi himself, are included because of their direct bearing upon certain aspects of the Mahatma's career or thought. Others are introduced or accompanied by a short narrative in explanation of the time and circumstance of a particular utterance. Many contain important biographical data. All combine, as living documents printed just as they were written in the heat of conflict, to give an unrivaled picture of Gandhi in his greatest years—his program and its application to a myriad particular instances; his purpose and the faith by which it lives; above all, his august spirit. He moves in these pages as vividly as Jesus in the Gospels—and as sublimely.

"Young India," in spite of its bulk and its modern documentary aspect, would have still more strongly suggested the New Testament parallel upon which I am insisting had it not been for the editor's arrangement of material logically instead of chronologically, by topics as in an encyclopedia instead of by sequence of events as in a history or biography. The chapters thus appear "sorted and grouped under ten sections," entitled Towards Non-Cooperation, The Principles of Non-Cooperation, The Non-Cooperation Campaign, Towards Civil Disobedience, Miscellaneous, etc. This scheme has the advantage of making the book a kind of textbook, admirably adapted to the uses of those who want to know the ideas and practices involved in Gandhi's great revolt. But this advantage is won at the cost of missing the march of events, and thus the sweep of the most thrilling and momentous movement of modern times. I found myself rebelling at this attempt of another mind to classify under general topics and with precise headings what had never been classified by Gandhi himself but, on the contrary, had been put forth as the moment determined and as this crisis or that developed. Gandhi, after all, is not a philosopher, not primarily a thinker, but a statesman, a reformer, a popular leader, a seer and prophet, that strange combination of man of action and man of vision which appears, as in Jesus, in only the rarest souls of history. We should see him and hear his words as he himself moved from day to day, and from event to event. To arrange material, as the editor has done in "Young India," is too much like what the theologians have done to the words of Jesus to be satisfactory.

What the reader will probably miss in this volume is a certain eloquence which he has been led to expect from the stories which have come from India of Gandhi's vast influence over his countrymen. There is little here of the conciseness of the great master of popular speech, the Nazarene—little of his matchless poetry, his brilliant irony, his vivid power of parable and phrase. It must be remembered, of course, that the contents of the books are essays or letters, and not addresses. But even so is it obvious that Gandhi's eloquence is that of personality and not of speech. But what a personality! What freedom from prejudice, pride, malice, vindictiveness, self-seeking! What mastery of tolerance, patience, magnanimity, the universal love of men! What inward discipline to purity, what outward consecration to sacrifice! What vision of the spirit, and what trust in spiritual forces to endure and conquer all! Is it any wonder that this man has won the allegiance of his people, and is now little by little catching the imagination of the world? In all things fundamental to the soul, he is incomparably the greatest of living men. In his organization of a vast social movement in terms of non-violent coercion or non-resistant love, his life marks a new epoch in the annals of the race. In purpose, method, and ideal he reveals to our time, as Jesus revealed to his, the way of life. Yet England today, like Rome yesterday, sees nothing to do with such a man but to destroy him!

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

An Appeal to Posterity

The World Crisis: 1915. By Winston S. Churchill. Charles Scribner's Sons. $6.50.

IT is hard for anyone who detests Mr. Churchill's militarism to approach with the requisite detachment his story of his achievements as a war minister. If you feel that the spirit that exults in the exploits of war is a spirit not of light but of darkness, how can you regard with any sympathy a career whose proudest glory is derived from its claim to preeminent mastery of the art of human slaughter? Yet if the man himself is to be fairly judged, any such prejudice (in the literal sense of the word) must be set aside. As long as there are wars there must be war ministers.

Mr. Churchill's earlier volume gave us his interpretation of the military events of 1914, with special reference to his own work at the Admiralty. In this record of 1915 the most prominent place is naturally occupied by the account of the attempt to force the Dardanelles. The failure of that enterprise brought upon its principal sponsor an obloquy which will not soon or easily be dispelled. It dogged him even in his recent electoral campaign at Leicester. He admits himself that he "cannot expect to alter the fixed and prevailing opinions of this generation" on the subject, and is content that his apologia shall survive as "one of the factors upon which the judgment of our children will be founded."

To those who have not read this book it will doubtless seem an absurd exaggeration to compare it to Thucydides's story of the Syracusan expedition. Yet that is the precedent that again and again it inevitably recalls. Happily for the comfort of the reader, Mr. Churchill's style is more lucid, if less distinguished, than that of Thucydides, but its subject and its literary quality make this record equally certain to be ranked as an enduring possession. One is haunted throughout by the same impression of some mysterious and inexplicable doom that brought the curse of futility upon the most gallant and self-sacrificing efforts. Was there ever such a succession of tragic blunders bringing to naught one project after another when within an ace of success?

While incidentally there are involved in the story technicalities on which only a military or naval expert has a right to express an opinion, the main features of the Dardanelles policy are within the comprehension of any intelligent man. And the verdict of nine readers out of ten must be that Mr. Churchill's self-vindication is complete. In particular, he scatters to the four winds the popular notion that his plans were the mere brilliant inspirations of a clever amateur meddling with problems for which the competent professional would have sought a different solution. He shows conclusively that there was not one of them that failed to receive the highest expert indorsement. Nor, again, was he attempting to carry out individual policies against the judgment of the head of the Government. Every action of his in opening and pressing the operations at the Dardanelles was taken with the Prime Minister's full knowledge, approval, and support. What Mr. Churchill is fairly entitled to say is that if those persons, civilians and professionals alike, upon whose cooperation the success of the expedition depended had shown a tithe of his insight, his foresight, and his tenacity the event would have been far otherwise. Pungent as are some of his criticisms of other actors in the drama, the wonder is that he shows so little bitterness in his comments upon the men for whose weaknesses and stupidities an ill-informed public opinion has made him the scapegoat.

One cannot help wishing, indeed, that Mr. Churchill had pursued peace as diligently and wholeheartedly as he has sought victory in war. He reveals here powers that would have been of the highest value in solving the problems of reconstruction. He can envisage a complicated situation as a whole without losing himself among details; he realizes the wisdom of submitting to an immediate loss as the price of a larger future gain; he has a fertile imagination which never lures him to forget the limitations imposed upon it by practical considerations; and he is alert to devise and encourage novel and unconventional expedients to take the place of traditional methods that have proved inadequate to a new emergency. This latter quality is illustrated by the story of his quick discernment of the possibilities of the "tank" in land fighting and his persistence in testing and developing this heterodox invention in the teeth of disapproval in the highest military quarters. Here, if anywhere, he might justly have been accused of interfering in matters outside his own province, but, just as a treasonable rebellion becomes a glorious revolution when it succeeds, so heterodoxy brings no pains or penalties upon the heretic when a few months suffice to transform it into orthodoxy.

But it must not be supposed that the interest or value of this volume is limited to the record of those events in which the author himself is a prominent figure. We get here, for instance, a graphic description of the Dogger Bank action, an admirable summary of the Balkan question, and many illuminating reflections on various topics, such as an acute discrimination between the functions of a military and a naval commander-in-chief. It is edifying to discover that Mr. Churchill agrees today with the despised pacifist that the war settled nothing. "The most complete victory ever gained in arms," he confesses, "has failed to solve the European problem or remove the dangers which produced the war."

HERBERT W. HORWILL

Mistaken Vocations

Silk. By Samuel Merwin. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

The Memoirs of Li Hung Chang. By W. F. Mannix, with an Introduction by Ralph D. Paine. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

TO make some degree of sober fact as entertaining as fiction and to make fiction as plausible as truth—these were the contradictory aims of Samuel Merwin in "Silk," his historical novel of the Han Dynasty, and of William F. Mannix in "The Memoirs of Li Hung Chang," now reissued by the publisher with a biographical note by Ralph Paine explaining the famous forgery.

The Mannix scoop imposed for years on newspaper editors, publishers, public, and sinologues, and it is interesting to see that the men best informed about Chinese life were the most unwilling to admit that any mere imagination, unaided by voluminous inside information, could have produced the book.

Arthur H. Smith, for instance, whose volumes on Chinese life and characteristics are said to be unsurpassed for their intimate knowledge of the Chinese people, wrote, when the authenticity of the work had been wholly disproved:

But perusing it with great care I did not find anything of importance which might not have been true, and there is an air of verisimilitude to the whole thing which makes it next to impossible that it should have been altogether a forgery.

So much for the success of Mr. Mannix's imaginative recreation of the Chinese statesman. Yet the notorious "Memoirs" do not make nearly as entertaining or significant reading as the tale of the mental quirks of the American adventurer who wrote them while serving a year's sentence for petty forgery in a jail in Honolulu. "It would have been much easier and more profitable for him to have gone straight," according to Mr. Paine, but the "talents of a novelist were perversely wasted in elaborate endeavors to impose upon the credulity of those with whom he came in contact."

For intellectuals less fantastic than that of Mr. Mannix it is a simple thing to recognize the straight course in such matters as signing other peoples' names to checks or inventing detailed and circumstantial memoirs of a statesman who had played an important international role only a few years before. The matter of going straight as a novelist is more complicated. But Mr. Merwin is not afraid of complications. His melodramatic, almost wholly plausible plot is full of them, handled with a zest which we would hardly expect from a man who has at various times been reported to be on the point of forsaking his livelihood for literature.

There is no doubt as to his talent for the latter. But the rewards offered literary talent for forswearing its true vocation and concocting drugged confections are so great as to warrant the fear that soon only the utterly untalented may hope to pass through the needle's eye into the literary kingdom. Certainly many of our most conscientious adventurers into truth and personality could learn much from Mr. Merwin's painstaking projection of a perfectly futile tale about quite obviously unreal personages. It is idle to waste lamentations over the misdirection of talent, but if the skill he has put into lending verisimilitude to a distorted, impossible tale had been applied to discovering for us man as he is, it might have produced something of value. And had Mannix painted a self-portrait in memoirs of his own, we should certainly have had an interesting autobiography.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

For a Franco-German Alliance

Deutschland, Frankreich, England. Von Maximilian Harden. Berlin: Erich Reiss Verlag.

THE last pages of Maximilian Harden's new book were written after the formation of the Stresemann cabinet. His message has not varied since 1915. Just why it changed so abruptly that year we are not able to explain. There may be warrant for certain uncharitable explanations which have now and then been current. Maximilian Harden never was a saint, and he always had an uncommonly shrewd eye for the main chance. It is this very shrewdness of his that inclines us to give him an attentive hearing. The fact that he discovered by the time the Great War was a year old that Germany could not possibly win lends a certain weight to his reiterated assurances that Germany cannot possibly carry out the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. His monotonous abuse of every German leader of modern times—except Bismarck and Freiherr von Stein—is not refreshing reading, and no doubt is prompted in many instances by personal grudge; but it is reassuring to note, when he leaves German soil, how he instantly ceases foaming at the mouth and grows decent and convincing. He does not love Great Britain, because Great Britain seems to him to have sought to rule the continent of Europe like a British colony; but any broad-minded British statesman might read the constructive part of his new book without rancor and with profit. As for the rest of Europe, he is as nearly objective as a European Jew could well be; and there seems no adequate reason for smelling a trick in his constantly repeated friendly advances to France.

It is perfectly true that France, Belgium, and Germany form a geographical and industrial unit, and that their separation and mutual hatred and suspicion have always been an obstacle to the progress and prosperity of them all. It is clear that on the success of some sort of concert in Western Europe depends the immediate fate of the whole European continent. And it is unquestionable that the Ruhr occupation has stirred up bad blood which will delay such concert. Almost steadily since Bismarck pointed the young master of invective to certain weak places in the Hohenzollern armor Harden has played the role of bitter opposition which he is still maintaining against Ebert, Cuno, Stresemann, and the rest; but if he can couple the part with one of international peace-making, may we not forget his bellicose rhetoric of the insane late months of 1914?

It is a loss to letters that Harden has been forced to abandon his trenchant weekly, Die Zukunft. He is one of the most stimulating writers of twentieth-century Germany. Only the most versatile linguist and philologist, however, who was also a versatile student of world affairs, could read with full appreciation this polyglot and many-sided latest volume of his. It would be hard to love Harden; but look you, Master Dick Steele, even to understand what he is talking about most of the time would be a liberal education.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE

Laureate of Critics

Dramatis Personae. By Arthur Symons. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS is the most important minor poet now writing literary criticism. Poetically a contemporary of Oscar Wilde, Dowson, and all the crew of little gardeners of the nineties who cultivated green carnations, he was a typical figure in the English end-of-the-century revolt against the nonconformist conscience and its efforts toward regimentation in aesthetic matters.

So Mr. Symons became a winsome minstrel, singing of artificial shreds, tattered passions, and the patches of music-hall romance. He wandered much in foreign fields, and found a nesting-place among the French symbolists.

"There is no necessary difference in artistic value," he wrote, "between a good poem about a flower in the hedge and a good poem about the scent in a sachet." And art: "Art begins when a man wishes to immortalize the most vivid moment he has ever lived." To that end Mr. Symons still, in "Dramatis Personae," is "avid of impressions and sensations." There it is—a diluted and sensuous Paterism! epitomizing the curiosity, the preciousness, the perversity of the naughty decadents.

This new volume of criticism is produced by a man fifty-eight years old. Advancing years and a democratic literature have cooled his ardor. Mr. Symons is forgetting that he once sang of "the chance romances of the streets," and the random Juliets who shared with him, poetically, "the ecstasy of love's unrest." As the memory of these tinsel passions lapses, his criticism experiences a corresponding improvement.

"Criticism," as Symons now practices it, "when it is not mere talk about literature, concerns itself with the first principles of human nature and with fundamental ideas." So he sets himself this task, "that he should find out for us more than we can find out for ourselves: trace what in us is a whim or leaning to its remote home or center of gravity, and explain why we are affected in this way or that way by this or that writer."

Obviously, Mr. Symons is an interpreter and impressionist, and his subject matter is limited, conversely to that of many of our distinguished American commentators, by what he finds congenial to himself. Like Huneker, he has played at steeple-jacking among the seven arts. Like George Moore, he has aspired to take his color from "all that is delicately depraved, all that is beautifully, curiously poisonous, in modern art."

Hence the astonishing diversification of "Dramatis Personae," which ranges thus in its contents: The Decadent Movement in Literature, Edgar Saltus, On Hamlet and Hamlets, Conrad, On English and French Fiction, The Rossettis, Emil Verhaeren, Leonardo da Vinci, Impressionistic Writing; and touches in addition upon the English romantic poets, upon critical theory, and the memories and recollections, artistic, Parisian, and literary, which the author retains of the more spacious days of his youth.

Mr. Symons's style is subtle and undulating. He burdens it with elaborate involutions of thought and "multiplied distinctions." Yet it remains picturesque and colorful by virtue of his device of concreteness and his special faculty for figured language.

GERALD HEWES CARSON

Two Wits

Yet Again. By Max Beerbohm. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Antic Hay. By Aldous Huxley. George H. Doran Company. $2.

MR. ALDOUS HUXLEY is in his own way as dandiacal as Mr. Max Beerbohm and each can be what used to be called in the latter's early days "too inexpressibly utter," but nearly a whole generation and all the works of Freud lie between them, so that they belong to different ages. If the one is classic, the other belongs quite definitely to our age of confusion.

When Max, faultlessly attired in body and mind, stepped upon the stage of the nineties he made all other exquisites feel gauche and thus he ended an epoch. Outdoing all others in gentlemanly uselessness, he finished off aestheticism with a chuckle, for though the philistine roar of Gilbert might be dismissed, Beerbohm's was the gentle, destructive laughter which comes from within, and it could not be denied. He showed how one could attain the perfection of literary savoir faire, the acme of aristocratic nonchalance, and the final skill in treating trivial things seriously without being a fool, and from that moment aestheticism as a serious doctrine was dead. The way was open for Shaw and Wells, but dandyism relapsed into its place as a minor art.

Then, as the age which called him forth receded into the background, Max himself persisted and became not merely one of the whole nursery of enfants terribles which enlivened the nineties, but a national institution. At the same time a slight change came over his work. The modish outrageousness of "Works" and "More" gave place to the quieter tone of "Yet Again," which followed them, but which is now published in America for the first time, and losing the attributes which marked him as definitely fin de siècle, he became for all time. In a way he became tamer, but he always retained a certain daringness of fancy which set him apart from the ordinary run of familiar essayists whom in many respects he resembled. Definitely he is outmoded, but to be outmoded, as he said in his famous phrase, is to be a classic if one has written well. Whenever the curtains part and he steps forth, modestly but confidently, his admirers give voice to the key-word "incomparable"—and they are right.

Now the first principle of dandyism is the limitation of interests, for nothing beyond the circle of gentlemanly interests may be said in the dandiacal sense to "exist." Max would have been as ashamed to be seen reading a book of science or of sociology as to be caught with a chromo on the walls of his study, but times change, and while blue china has gone out the laboratory and the psychopathic ward have come in. The contemporary exquisite is likely to have by his bedside not "Manon Lescaut" or Petronius, but the "Psychopathia Sexualis" and to pride himself not on apt quotation from Horace but upon the quick detection of a compensating mechanism or a trace of the Oedipus complex. In a word the dandyism of science has come and of this new dandyism Huxley is the most striking exponent, for in a whole series of works he has given it exquisitely witty expression. The citation of the classics as a justification of improprieties is a vieux jeu, but a biological textbook can be as perverse as Petronius. For Max the comforting assurance that Ovid praised rouge, for the new dandies the pleasant sense of irresponsibility which comes from the reflection, for example, that incest is only laudable filial affection prolonged beyond its natural time. The limits of bourgeoisie respectability may be transcended either by way of culture or of science, and a wit belongs to the nineteenth century or the present according as he choose one route or the other.

Max's sense of humor (a very different thing from his wit) and the fund of sober practicality which his manner only conceals saved him from taking aestheticism too seriously, but from the beginning Huxley was not quite sure whether the blows given by science and psychology to man's sense of his own dignity were a huge joke or a serious business. The very persistence with which his wit played upon the identity of love and lust proved that the idea wounded his sensibility, and the spectacle of science replacing the spiritual nature of man with hormones and other secretions had for him a horrible fascination. Apostrophizing in a clever poem the sperm cell which became himself, celebrating the simian limitations of man, and addressing God, who must be in his heaven because he is surely not visible on earth, he sang

While happier mortals take to drink,
A dolorous dipsomaniac
Fuddled with grief I sit and think Looking upon the bile when it is black without quite knowing whether he was in earnest or not. But in "Antic Hay," quite the most bitter book which he has written, he begins definitely to take his disillusion seriously. It commences as frank burlesque and remains to the end a chaotic vaudeville with many characters and little plot, but though it is full of wit many of its scenes are as intentionally repulsive as Baudelaire or Huysmans. The dandyism of science like the dandyism of the nineties may lead, if one likes, to genuine disillusion, and this book raises the question whether or not the author is not leading himself toward a serious pessimism, for the adventures of the hero among the debauches of London are not always funny and his expression of a world philosophy based upon the moral iconoclasm of biology and psychology is not always a joke. The answer to the question lies with the future, but meanwhile "Antic Hay" remains an arresting production, vastly amusing and not a little terrible by turns.

J. W. KRUTCH

Books in Brief

The Best British Short Stories of 1923. Edited by Edward J. O'Brien and John Cournos. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

31 Stories. Edited by Ernest Rhys and C. A. Dawson Scott. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

Despite the high degree of technical excellence to which American writers have brought the short story, they still lag behind their British competitors in the finer nuances of characterization and motivation. No matter how slight the plot, the Englishmen who have focused their talents upon this form of writing seem to have an artistic grasp of these elements of form which lends an undeniable beauty to their work. Examples drawn from the work of Stacy Aumonier, Katherine Mansfield, A. E. Coppard, Sheila Kaye-Smith, and Ethel Colburn Mayne are noteworthy in this respect. There are, in addition, excellent contributions from such outstanding figures as Galsworthy, Wells, Bennett, and Maugham. Mary Webb's "Blessed are the Meek" appears in both volumes. "21 Stories" covers a span of more than two decades, while the other book brings together the finest product of the last year. Both are rich in material and highly representative.

Masquerade. By Ben Ray Redman. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.50.

Rather laborious exercises in irony by a young writer who so far is a better critic than poet. The most successful pieces here are sonnets analyzing with commendable clarity and finality the inner constitutions of various types of pretender in contemporary intellectual society. But clarity alone does not make poetry, and finality is essentially a virtue of prose. Mr. Redman's perceptions at the present stage are more interesting than his art.

Parsons' Pleasure. By Christopher Morley. George H. Doran Company. $1.75.

Clever rhymes by a genial man who is very fond of life, especially in New York, and particularly on Vesey Street, across from St. Paul's churchyard. Cider, books, tobacco, dogs, Shakespeare, R. L. S., and the Woolworth Building come in for blithe and witty treatment, and sometimes for soberer praise. Mr. Morley is an exceedingly able poet of the lighter sort, but incidentally he should not write so many poems about poetry—about the functions of song, the pains and the pleasures of rhyming, the place of his art in modern life, and so on. That is the certain mark of a minor poet, and Mr. Morley might be more than that.

The Human Side of Fabre. By Percy F. Bicknell. The Century Company. $2.50.

When Maeterlinck called Henri Fabre "the insect's Homer" he revealed more of his own character than of his subject's. "The insect's Ibsen" would be more appropriate, but nature writers seem to be the chosen victims of sentimentalists and the present book carries on the tradition of prettifying Fabre. It is chiefly a collection of anecdotes clipped from Fabre's own works and is therefore inevitably interesting, but one will look in vain either for any real analysis of the great naturalist's character or for any critique of his scientific work.

Gilbert K. Chesterton. By Patrick Braybrooke. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

Patrick Braybrooke's presentation of Chesterton is superficial, but it will never be popular. He remarks upon his qualifications for the task in a Note; "not only is he a kinsman of Mr. Chesterton, but also has spent much time in his company." Pleasant as these circumstances may have been for Mr. Braybrooke, they have been detrimental to him in his function as critic and expositor. The volume breathes a very fine enthusiasm for the poet-journalist-essayist-medievalist; but when Mr. Braybrooke writes: "Chesterton pays enormous attention to the Middle Ages," or when he begins a chapter: "If there is fault to be found in Chesterton's masterly study of Charles Dickens—" he opens to vigorous challenge both his style and perspicacity.

The Best of Hazlitt. Compiled by P. P. Howe. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Mr. P. P. Howe, biographer and interpreter of William Hazlitt to our generation, follows established procedure in finding the best of Hazlitt in his miscellaneous work, rather than in the historically significant essays on Elizabethan drama, which bid fair to remain permanently in a state of celebrated obscurity. The present volume includes, of course, such old friends as My First Acquaintance with Poets, Characteristics, and On the Pleasure of Painting, with a few pieces of lesser renown which Mr. Howe thinks deserve more general recognition. The volume is to be recommended freely to the reader who wants some Hazlitt—but not too much.

Professor Cizek's Children

THE works of Professor Cizek's child pupils which are now being shown at the Brooklyn Museum have sailed into America under the title of the Viennese Children's Art Exhibition. There is perhaps no other title suitable, and yet what a misnomer this is! Anyone who goes to these children with his senses awake and his mind and heart open knows that he has not just gone to one of a hundred exhibitions of art; he has entered a new world. He has come into a place where the invisible, inarticulate fancies and beliefs of children have, as if by magic, become visible and articulate.

Professor Cizek's idea needs little explanation. The works of his children speak for themselves—speak more musically, more convincingly, and more clearly than anyone can speak for them, not excluding the professor himself.

There are two sorts of teachers—the one cramps the powers that are in children, the other releases them: he strikes the rock and there flow from it living waters. Cizek is the second sort, though all he claims for himself is the modest role of gardener. He cherishes the plants that are given into his charge—waters and tends them. They grow "from their own roots," as he puts it, and he is surrounded with a garden full of real, not artificial flowers. He gives his pupils no technical instruction of any kind, and allows them no copies or models. He gives them only all the materials they need and tells them to make things, not out of their heads, as our expression is, but out of their hearts. Twice a week, on Saturdays and Sundays, in their own and the professor's free time, his children flock to him, gather round him as round a modern Pied Piper. He pipes to them and they sing—the songs that are now on the walls of the Brooklyn Museum. The curious thing is that they scarcely know that he is piping—they feel that they do everything themselves. Their professor makes them think so—he makes them believe in themselves. He sees something in their childish scribbings—daubs that the ordinary grown-up would tell them to rub out and make more prettily and carefully. "What," he cries indignantly to an art-master scornful of Gertrud Brausewetter's first effort, a procession of rigid figures, moving on things like table-legs, "you see nothing in this picture? But look at the strength of these figures. They are as monumental as the Sphinx, as powerful as the bas-reliefs of ancient Egypt. How characterized they are and what rhythm there is in spite of their stiffness!"

"No one but a little child could have done it," is the professor's most enthusiastic praise. This he can only say of the real primitives—of things like Karl Streim's Red Castle, Fritz Pracht's Tea Party, Irene Mallina's prehistoric Child and her House (all now on exhibition). His children as they grow into their teens often become self-conscious, sophisticated, influenced by other people's ideas and art movements. The professor's passionate endeavor is to keep them themselves to the end—to build upon their heritage and save their originality. With some he succeeds—with a healthy, strong, open-air nature like Maeda Primavesi's, for instance. Her Peasants' Wedding, done at fifteen, is as spontaneous, as primitive, as uninfluenced as the work of the children of eight and nine. Helena Klaunzner is another who is always true to her heritage. She comes from the Tyrol, and she brings the strength of her mountain ancestry into all her paintings, woodcuts, and potteries and is as courageous and original at fourteen as she was at eight. Visitors to the exhibition will find many others like these and will be able to compare their work with that of the girls and boys in the transition stage between childhood and maturity, a stage when so many inevitably lose their creative force. They do beautiful things in this stage, and something of the light of childhood still plays over them "but a grown-up," as the professor sadly observes, "might have done almost as well."

FRANCESCA M. WILSON

A FIRST HOW-DO-YOU-DO TO STAFF AND KEYBOARD

Music, Lyrics and Illustrations

By DOROTHY GAYNOR BLAKE

Price, 60 cents postpaid

There are always new ways of presenting old material; and the author of this delightful work has found an appealing dress in which to set forth the rudiments of piano study. It drives home in an amusing manner old and very necessary bits of information.

OLIVER DITSON CO., 178-179 Tremont St., Boston 10

Chas. H. Ditson & Co., 8-10-12 East 34th Street, New York

Order of your local dealer

THE children's page has been run at intervals for some time in THE NATION. The interested response to it from our readers has been such as to encourage us to believe that it is accomplishing its purpose—the stimulation of the idea that children's books should be circulated the year round.

STORIES from the EARLY WORLD

By R. M. Fleming

The brave stories of high deeds that have thrilled the people of twenty-four nations from the earliest times, brilliantly retold for children. Illustrated. $2.50

THOMAS SELTZER

5 West 50th Street New York

Children's Books

Louis Untermeyer's THIS SINGING WORLD

A delightful anthology of children's verse collected from the finest lyrics, ballads, and nonsense verse of the last 75 years.

Illustrated by Florence Ivins. $3.00

"This Singing World" follows Mr. Untermeyer's successful collections of modern British and American poetry.

Harcourt, Brace and Company

383 Madison Ave.

New York

The Adventures of MAYA the BEE

By Waldemar Bonsels

Hugh Walpole — "This is one of the classics of modern literature for children." Illustrated in full colors. $3.00

Handsome booklet by Hugh Walpole sent free on request

THOMAS SELTZER

5 West 50th Street New York

Drama The Great Legend

FROM prophecy Bernard Shaw has turned to history, and from speculation to fact. His history and his facts, as anyone can see, are an extraordinary blending of actuality and interpretation, of historic detail and of historic detail turned inside out. No human inquisitors can ever have functioned as magnificently and as wholly in conformity with their strange and terrible part in the drama of mankind as this inquisitor of Shaw's who conducts the trial of Joan of Arc. But this inquisitor who is so profoundly a man yet so greatly symbol and vision, at once himself and his moment in the history of thought, slave and conqueror of eternity—this inquisitor is, perhaps, as good a key as any other with which to unlock the secret of this apologue which Bernard Shaw has chosen to call a "chronicle play" and which, like most first-rate apologues, may be attended to by children and childlike men for the story and its stir and interest and pathos alone.

What Shaw has actually done is to give another embodiment to the great and central legend by which mankind lives. The legend is told in the Gospels; the legend is told in Ibsen's "An Enemy of the People"; it is told in certain chapters of "Also sprach Zarathustra." The change from epoch to epoch and from ethos to ethos, the change which we must in a quite humble and yet far from simple sense regard as somehow a change for the better or, at least, higher, is brought about through the instrumentality of personalities who see through sham and cant and all spiritual unreality, who, loyal under some divine or cosmic compulsion to their vision alone, defy the powers and principalities of earth and go undeviatingly upon their appointed path to the stake or the cross. They may be called saviors; they may be called saints. It is the note of their sainthood to be revolutionaries, to have a new vision and to die for it.

One would have said, had the question been brought up, that Joan of Arc was not the most appropriate of historic figures through whom to retell the great legend once more. Shaw's actual play convinces one of the contrary. He represents Joan as, in effect, a leader of the people against the power of the feudal lords, therefore as an enemy of the fictitious Western empire of church and state, therefore as a forerunner of nationalism and Protestantism. In this interpretation he goes so amusingly far as to have Joan actually remark upon that change in military technique which, by rendering armor and fortifications useless, did as a matter of fact overthrow the barons and enthrone the military state. Joan, like the inquisitor, knows too much. But it is precisely this too much of knowledge which, brought home to the imagination and the heart with touches not far short of sublimity, differentiates Shaw's "Saint Joan" at once and permanently from all the other plays and books on this more subject and makes it so secure a spiritual possession. The historian may and doubtless will quarrel with the play; the thinker will not. And in literature that is the judgment which counts.

I am not trying to represent "Saint Joan" as a perfect work. Perfection is not a note of our literature. And the more one studies the perfection of the Latins the less one is inclined to quarrel with this. It may be, as has been remarked, that the blue pencil is needed. But when it comes to an obviously first-rate work by a first-rate thinker and artist, I am always a little staggered by the ease with which such advice is offered. A little critical humility is not out of place here. I am not even displeased by the character of the chaplain de Stogumber. For though he is the mark of all of Shaw's habitual gibes against the English, he finally flames into a vision and breaks into a repentance which are no less than his hypocrisy and his stubbornness among the qualities of his race. Nor am I, for one, disposed to quarrel with the Epilogue which emphasizes for the unthinking that intellectual groundwork of the action and the characters without which the play would be merely a "chronicle play," without which the tense and exalting trial scene would shrink into the dust of mere history instead of rising into the eternal trial and condemnation of the eternal free and revolutionary spirit before the judgment bar of false order, of mere righteousness, of naked power.

If I say of the production by the Theater Guild that it is worthy of the play, that it leaves the play undiminished in eloquence, significance, beauty, I have said all that is needed. Miss Winifred Lenihan's Joan is adequate. And to be adequate here is to wrestle with greatness undefeated. That is much. She is both saint and woman, both blade and flame; she has both freshness and exaltation, lift and warmth. It should in fairness be remembered that her task is an impossible one from its very nature, since life does not offer the experience of being woman and symbol, peasant and saint, vision and seer. Performances of great brilliance and persuasiveness were given by Joseph Macaulay as the inquisitor, a creature all brain and steel and velvet, by Ian Maclaren as the Bishop of Beauvais, by Philip Leigh as the extraordinarily humanized Dauphin, by Albert Bruning, Maurice Colbourne, A. H. Van Buren, and by Henry Travers as de Stogumber. I must finally stress the admirable directing of Mr. Philip Moeller, which combined at every moment the union of imaginative insight with intellectual clarity which this play, above most others, required for its right interpretation.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!

David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents

FAY BAINTER in "THE OTHER ROSE"

with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast

MOROSCO THEATRE West 45th Street Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

BELMONT

48 St. E. of B'way
Evs. 8:30. Mats.
Thur. & Sat. 2:30

tarnish

4th
Month

"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."—Ludwig Lewisohn, THE NATION.

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!

DAVID BELASCO Presents

LIONEL BARRYMORE

with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"

BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Evs. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Theat., 41st St., W. of Broadway, Evs., 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00

WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac

"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.

SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

Every Eve. (except Mon.)
Matinee on Saturday.

"This
Fine-Pretty World
IS PERCY MACKAYE'S best work."

—The Outlook.

"Gave me unalloyed delight. The play has the feel of authenticity and the smell of the soil."—GLENN FRANK, Editor of The Century.

Orchestra $1.50. Balcony $1. Telephone Dry Dock 7516.

"One play
in a thousand"

Alexander Woolcott
in the Herald

Outward Bound

with a Distinguished Cast
at the

RITZ THEATRE
West 48 St. Evs. 8:30.
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

PRINCESS THEATRE
39th Street
east of Broadway. Evnings, 8:45. Matinees
Thurs. and Sat., 2:45.

SUN UP

By LULA VOLLMER

With
LUCILLE LA VERNE

YIDDISH ART THEATRE

Last 5 performances

27th St. and
Madison Ave.

By popular request

MAURICE SWARTZ in

SABBATI ZEVI

Friday 8:30

Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30

BROADHURST Theatre, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:30

RICHARD BENNETT in
THE DANCERS

"I have not seen a better play than 'The Dancers' for a long while."
—JOHN BARRYMORE.

Jan. 28, 7 p. m., at the Aldine Club, 200 Fifth Ave.

Annual Dinner of Labor Temple School

Speakers: Prof. Morris R. Cohen, Dr. Percy Stickney Grant, Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Rev. Edmund B. Chaffee, Dr. Will Durant.

Tickets $2.00. Reservations should be mailed before Jan. 26 to 239 East 14th Street.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD will speak on

THE MENACE TO PEACE IN EUROPE

at the West Side Unitarian Church, 110th St., East of B'way.
Tuesday, January 22, 1924, at 8:15 P. M.

Under the auspices of the West Side Branch of the Women's Peace Society
Margaret Loring Thomas, Chairman Meta Lilienthal, Secretary

ADMISSION FREE

International Relations Section

Fascism in Finland

By JOHN H. WUORINEN

DURING the past three months certain events have taken place in Finland which show the trend of radicalism in that country. On August 3, 1923, a number of Communists were suddenly arrested in Helsingfors, and simultaneously other arrests were made throughout the country. The police commenced their work early in the morning. By evening the entire Communist group in the Diet, consisting of twenty-seven members, had been arrested; the executive council of the party and the editorial staffs of all the Communist publications had met with a similar fate—the papers were suppressed, their printing establishments were closed, and the archives of the party were seized. The arrests continued during the days following, and by the middle of August nearly 180 persons had been seized, of whom 115 were released after a few days' detention, while the remainder were sent to jail to await trial. The persons released were not thereby freed from further surveillance. They were subject to detention and further examination at the Government's pleasure.

On August 5 the Government issued an official communiqué in justification of its action. In order to understand this proclamation a few words must be said about the general situation in the country following the civil war of 1918. The recovery of the radical parties after that struggle was remarkably rapid. Having been completely defeated on the field of battle, radicalism was decidedly discredited, but the liquidation of the post-war problems resulted in conditions which stimulated radicalism to get on its feet again. While communism was definitely taboo, the treatment accorded such groups as the Finnish Social Democratic Party was rather liberal in that they escaped persecution and their property—considerable amounts of real estate, printing establishments, archives, etc.—was returned to them.

However, this liberal treatment in its consequences did not turn out to be an unmixed blessing. Many former Communists or holders of extremist views sought refuge in the ranks of the party, and consequently definite differences of opinion soon developed within the party over the means to be employed to achieve the party program. This internal split became alarmingly evident when the party assembled for its annual convention in 1919. The former united front was gone. The party was divided into three groups, the extremists—avowed Communists and supporters of direct action—on the one hand and the faction of the right on the other, the latter subscribing to a belief in parliamentary methods and denouncing the extremist tendencies of the left. The remainder of the party consisted of centrists. Their sympathies apparently were with the left, but feeling that the time was not ripe for the application of the direct-action principles they threw their lot in with the right wing, whose less radical notions thus emerged victorious from the struggle. However, the apparent party unity thus gained was soon disrupted by subsequent events.

The communiqué of August 5, 1923, completes the brief review of the development of radicalism that has been given. In substance the story is as follows. In May, 1920, some extremist members of the Finnish Social Democratic Party assembled in Helsingfors and founded the Finnish Socialist Party. The newly formed organization owed its existence to the discontent of its founders with the activities and program of the party they had left. The program of the new party was of a kind which, if carried out, would have resulted in the overthrow of the existing government and institutions in Finland. The party also decided to ally itself with the Third International. A few weeks later the persons responsible for the new organization were arrested, and on April 20, 1921, the supreme court rendered a decision stating in substance that the founding of the party constituted a preliminary step toward treason. The leading executives and a number of other supporters of the party were sentenced to varying terms of hard labor.

The dissolution of this group did not prevent the reappearance of the Finnish Socialist Party in a new guise. As early as June, 1920, a number of its former supporters met in Helsingfors and reorganized one of the existing radical parties under the name of the Party of the Finnish Socialist Workers. The program put forth was identical with that which had been condemned by official action a few weeks earlier. Recent investigations have disclosed that this party is only a Finnish branch of the Russian Communist Party and is indirectly controlled and financed by it. Referring to the Communist members of the Diet who had been arrested, the recent government communiqué affirms their guilt on the ground that "these men . . . in . . . a meeting held on September 1, 1922, . . . adopted 'rules' according to which they pledged themselves to support (in the Diet) actively only the decisions and measures of the executive council of the party."

These activities of the Finnish police—supported by the Department of Justice—have precipitated a problem in connection with the Diet; the composition of that body has been radically changed by the arrest of twenty-seven of its 200 members. It might be mentioned in passing that the party which had thus been deprived of its representation had (on May 1, 1923) an official membership slightly in excess of 23,000, but in the last elections more than 127,000 votes were cast for its candidates. Thus the Communist group in the Diet represented a fairly substantial part of the electorate. The fall session of the Diet commenced on October 17. As the date approached, agitation was rife among the radical groups for new elections in order to enable the electorate to pass judgment on the situation which had been created by the arrest of the members. These demands were persistently denied on the ground that there was no need for new elections, that the "rump" Diet would be entirely competent to attend to matters that might come before it, and that the assertions that the constitutional rights of the arrested members of the Diet had been grossly violated were without foundation.

The Diet assembled on October 17. Demands for its dissolution having been futile, the opponents of the rump Diet contended that the labors of the Diet be limited to passing last year's budget, so as to enable the Government to continue to function. This done, they insisted that the Diet should adjourn and new elections should be held. However, the radical bloc in the Diet had been seriously depleted by the absence of the Communist members and consequently these efforts came to naught. Therefore, the Socialist group and other members who were out of sympathy with the Government resorted to obstructionist methods, abstaining from participation in the work of the Diet and thus causing considerable annoyance to those who were anxious to expedite business. Further, they repeatedly pointed out that the absence of the Communist group rendered the Diet unfit to perform its functions. It is an interesting fact that this point was used as an argument by the conservatives as well as by the radicals. When a bill pertaining to collective bargaining was being considered, its conservative opponents called attention to the incompetency of the present Diet to deal with the proposed enactments; it was pointed out that the Diet had lost a number of its members representing about one-third of the working classes and consequently its present sittings were violations of the democratic principles upon which parliamentary government is based!

The reaction of the press to the situation has in the main been determined by party creed and political allegiance. With one or two minor exceptions the action of the Government was welcomed with expressions of relief and satisfaction not only by the conservative but also by the progressive press. The liberal papers at first limited themselves to timid comments on the general situation or refrained from making any statements whatever, but during the past couple of months they have begun to assert themselves in a way which leaves no doubt as to their stand in the matter. The extremist Socialists have branded the whole affair as an expression of northern Fascism which puts to shame Mussolini's achievements, while the extreme conservatives consider the step as an act of liberation second in importance only to the victory of 1918. The few exponents of a calmer, more objective point of view deplore the persecution and arrest of the Communists as being hasty and precipitate.

In the meantime preparations were made for the trial of those suspects who had been detained in prisons after the preliminary examinations. By the middle of October the sifting of evidence had proceeded sufficiently far to enable the prosecuting authorities to decide upon November 8 as the date of opening of the trial. The cases were grouped together and no opportunity was given to present each case on its individual merits. At the time when the date of the trial was made public the prosecuting attorney was quoted as stating that complaints would probably not be made against all of those awaiting trial; that thus far only about thirty complaints had been made by him.

The trial is on at the time of writing. It is likely that it will be a prolonged one (the court, located in Abo, is to meet on four days only in each week, the sittings to continue until the cases are disposed of). The case of the Government will rest entirely upon the quality rather than the quantity of incriminating evidence in its possession. That the evidence is not of the most satisfactory kind is indicated by the fact that a great number of those originally apprehended have been released after preliminary investigation.

The Germ of a Baltic Alliance

SOME form of alliance is obviously inevitable for the little nations which have sprung up in what were formerly the Baltic provinces of Russia. Various Polish statesmen have sought to bring Lithuania, Latvia, and Esthonia into an alliance, and for a time it seemed possible to include Finland in the group. The Swedish minority there, however, successfully opposed this project. Lithuanian resentment of Poland's cavalier attitude in the Vilna dispute naturally prevented a Polish-Lithuanian rapprochement. For a time, at the Genoa Conference of 1922, Poland, Esthonia, Latvia, and Soviet Russia worked together by common agreement. Discords, however, soon arose, and the most promising step yet taken toward federation was the series of accords signed at Reval, Esthonia, on October 31. These accords, limited at first to Esthonia and Latvia, may be more fertile than previous attempts at federation on a larger scale. We take the following summary of them from the Gazette de Prague (Czecho-Slovakia) for December 1:

The conference between Esthonia and Latvia was opened in Reval on October 25, 1923. The agenda included the solution of the boundary question, the question of mutual debts, the discussion of a commercial treaty, and sundry questions of a general nature.

The work of the conference was conducted by the following commissions:

1. Commission of boundaries.
2. Commission of debts.
3. Commission for the conclusion of a commercial treaty.

Regarding the settlement of the frontiers it was agreed that both parties accept the so-called Talent frontier. The difficult point was the forests. It was agreed that the frontier line would under all circumstances be decided by the nationality of the owner of such and such a part of the forest. Latvia thus gave to Esthonia about 5,575 acres and received in return about 25,000. Thus Latvia received more territory than she gave. As compensation she accorded concessions in the region of Laura, which she owned. On the other hand Latvia claimed the isle of Runö, also claimed by Esthonia. The question was settled by a compromise. Latvia received certain concessions, she has the right to erect a radio-telegraphic station and to build a light-house there.

The commission of debts adopted a declaration by which Latvia recognized the moral and material help which Esthonia had given her. As this assistance cannot be estimated in money, Latvia agrees to contribute 30 million Esthonian marks to the fund for the relief of wounded Esthonians and of the families of the soldiers killed in the struggle for the freedom of Latvia.

Esthonia will have the right to take part in the settlement of the partition of the old province of Livonia, both as concerns private and corporate persons. This settlement applies to the good of the Lutheran and orthodox churches which were formerly administered from Riga.

The commission to draw up a treaty of commerce drew two drafts. One is a provisional treaty for a customs union; the other is an agreement to unify the harbor taxes of the two countries. The first of these is the most important. It shows how the two countries intend to establish their commercial relations. Here, probably, are the greatest obstacles, because unification of the customs would interfere to a certain extent with the rights of the parliaments of the two countries. The proposed measure would mark a remarkable progress in the rapprochement of the two nations.

The most important achievement of the Reval conference was undoubtedly the conclusion of a political treaty by which the two contracting parties agree to assist each other in case they are attacked without provocation by a foreign state. Altogether six conventions were signed and four notes exchanged. The text of these conventions was signed at Reval on October 31, 1923.

The defensive alliance between Latvia and Esthonia was established on the following basis: (1) The two contracting states agree to practice a pacifist policy and to facilitate commercial relations, especially with the neighboring states; (2) Latvia and Esthonia will adjust their policies and give each other mutual assistance in diplomatic and political matters; (3) they will give each other mutual assistance in case of unprovoked attack; (4) the form of military assistance will be fixed in a special convention; (5) in case of war Latvia and Esthonia will not undertake separate peace negotiations, nor will they sign separate peace treaties; (6) Latvia and Esthonia will exchange the texts of all treaties which they have signed and neither will enter new alliances with other countries without the agreement of the other contracting party; (7) the convention is valid for ten years; (8) the convention will be registered with the League of Nations; (9) the treaty will be ratified by the parliaments and the exchange of the ratification documents will take place at Riga.

The Latvian press has received this convention rather coldly. It maintains that Latvia has consented to great sacrifices in order to create a federation of Baltic countries. It seems probable that the Latvian Government will have difficulty in persuading Parliament to accept this convention, despite the advantage of concluding such a treaty which will mean doubling, even tripling, the political, economic, and military power not only of Esthonia but also of Latvia.

If the treaty is ratified, it will represent a solid basis for a federation of the Baltic countries. It is certain that Lithuania would join such an alliance. The pending conflict with Poland continues, however, to be an obstacle to this federation.

Mothers and Babies in Russia

THE following discussion of welfare measures undertaken in behalf of mothers and babies in Soviet Russia is translated from the Moscow Pravda:

Before the October revolution the number of bureaus for the welfare of mother and child in Russia were so few that they could not be taken into account so far as a planned-out system was concerned. The Czar's government was not interested, and did not consider it necessary to conduct such work on a national scale. . . .

The situation greatly changed after the October revolution.

The Soviet Government recognized motherhood as a social function. . . . The work of taking care of mothers and infants has been carried on during the past six years. Important legislative work, the organization of special establishments, sanitary-educational work, and the work of broadcasting instructions on all questions of the welfare of mother and infant has been carried out.

The following laws regarding the welfare of the mother and child are in force, at present:

1. The woman is not allowed to do night-work, to work under unhealthy industrial conditions, or to do work involving the lifting of heavy weights.

2. Women workers receive two months' leave before confinement and two months after. They receive their regular salary during this time, and their positions are held for them.

3. The insurance bureau (in Soviet Russia social insurance of the entire working population is obligatory) issues relief to the mother amounting to her monthly salary.

4. During the nursing period (nine months) the mother gets special relief from the insurance bureau amounting to one-quarter of her monthly salary. . . .

People in Western Europe who are working on the mother-and-child-welfare problem have long advocated the necessity of such laws, but in many countries of Western Europe such measures do not exist at all or exist with many limitations.

We in Soviet Russia are fully aware of the fact that these decrees cost the Government a great deal, but the decrease of child mortality and the consequent increase of a healthy population make these expenditures necessary and obligatory upon the republic.

Our Government has also passed a decree which declares that abortions are no longer subject to punishment. Punishment does not prevent the woman from undergoing them, but forces hundreds of women to apply to ignorant midwives and other persons for help. As a result they become ill and often remain injured for the rest of their lives. As a matter of fact, 30 per cent of our patients in the gynecological hospitals were women whose illness was due to improperly performed abortions. Because of this condition the decree declaring abortions unpunishable was passed; doctors perform them in hospitals, and the number of after-abortion sicknesses have greatly decreased; moreover, it has become possible to obtain information as to the number of abortions made and to start a campaign against the practice.

In order to improve the sanitary conditions of the population we are at present working out two more decrees: first, people who get married must present medical certificates, and, second, infecting another with syphilis is subject to punishment.

We also wish to point out that according to our marriage laws there are no "illegitimate" children in Soviet Russia and that our entire legislation is so directed as to provide for the welfare of the child. To protect the interests of the child (in case the father refuses to support it) the mother, whether the marriage was registered or not, can force the father, through the courts, to recognize the rights of the child.

The following establishments are organized in Russia for the welfare of mother and child:

1. Bureaus of consultation for pregnant women, the aim of which is to teach the woman to take proper care of herself during pregnancy. Here the doctor watches the health of the pregnant woman, sends her to a dispensary in case of sickness, sees that she is placed in a lying-in-home, and also acquaints the population with sex hygiene.

2. For working women, employees, and also for those out of work there are organized homes for the mother and child. Here the woman spends the four months of leave to which she is entitled according to the law (two months before confinement and two months after) in sanitary surroundings under a doctor's care. Here she obtains complete rest before confinement, and after confinement is taught how best to take care of her baby.

3. The woman is given excellent care during confinement, but the number of beds and professional help are insufficient, especially in the villages.

4. The consulting stations, where the mothers get professional advice on nursing and care of their babies, are also the stations from which the infants' health is taken care of. . . . From these stations working nurses visit the babies at home, thus uniting still closer the public-health workers with the worker's family.

5. The day nurseries are institutions for the care of workers' children during the hours when the mother is employed. They enable the woman to take her place in the business world without injury to her child. The nurseries are also one of the powerful means of struggle against children's mortality in those families where the mother works, for in these institutions the children get proper food and care.

There are nurseries where the children of the workers of that particular factory play and are fed, then the district nurseries for the children of that particular district, and summer nurseries which are organized in the villages during the period of field work when the mothers must be in the field.

6. Infants' asylums where only orphans and foundlings are taken care of. As far as possible we try to supply these children with mothers' milk.

All these organizations for the welfare of mothers and infants give their services free of charge; that is, without cost to the mother who receives the service.

The extremely difficult economic situation in Soviet Russia does not allow us to develop the work as widely as we would desire; but, though slowly, we proceed. Below are quoted the figures showing our attainments in this field. Before the October revolution there were altogether thirty-four organizations for mother and child welfare. Now we have 1,600 organizations for the welfare of mothers and infants, 658 nurseries, 440 homes for mother and child, 171 consulting stations for infants, and 40 consulting stations for pregnant women.

We consider sanitary-educational work in the matter of mother-and-child welfare of the utmost importance. Besides lectures and talks on this theme held in the consulting stations and at meetings, small special exhibitions on the subject are sent out to the different cities, and in Moscow there is a large central exhibition museum to propagate the necessity of proper care for mother and child. Well-known professors, doctors, and artists took part in the organization of this unique exhibition. Special magazines, books, and pamphlets are printed on the subject and distributed by the hundreds of thousands.

Great attention is paid to the matter of developing an experienced personnel for these institutions. In eight cities special courses have been organized where nurses are taught the care of infants. This preparatory course is finished in two and a half years. In Moscow, at the Central Scientific Institute for the welfare of mother and child, central courses for 200 people and also courses for midwives have been organized. Besides, 100 doctors specialize there every year in the work of attending to mothers and children. The Department of Mother and Child Welfare at the People's Commissariat of Health has charge of this work.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1924

No. 3056

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.....	101
EDITORIALS:
Our Own Peace Program.....	104
Two Years of Poincaré.....	105
Sanity Creeps Back.....	105
Why Boys Leave Home.....	106
MR. FALL'S $100,000. By William Hard.....	107
A NEW FRANCO-GERMAN WAR. By C. B. Thomson.....	109
THE NEXT WAR. Cartoon by Art Young.....	111
THE YOUNG MEN GO DOWN. By Harry Hervey.....	112
WARNING TO A BLASÉ LADY. By Herbert S. Gorman.....	114
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	114
CORRESPONDENCE.....	115
BOOKS:
Greek Fundamentalism. By H. L. Mencken.....	117
Theseus Balks. By Alice Beal Parsons.....	117
"Sport with Human Follies, Not with Crimes." By Samuel C. Chew.....	119
The Old and the New. By Dorothy Brewster.....	119
A Fairy Romance. By Harriet Sabra Wright.....	120
Books in Brief.....	120
DRAMA:
"The Miracle." By Mark Van Doren.....	121
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Italian Labor on the Rocks. By Paul Blanshard.....	123
The Janina Murders.....	125

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY

IRITA VAN DOREN

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE

JOHN A. HOBSON

NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK

H. L. MENCKEN

CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

SENATOR CARAWAY has branded ex-Secretary Fall as a corruptionist, declaring in his speech in the Senate on January 16 that Mr. Fall "betrayed the high trust imposed in him and, for a corrupt consideration, sold the very means by which our national existence is to be protected." Mr. Fall denies it, but he makes no offer to appear in Washington and explain to the Senate and the public the mystery of the $100,000 cash which he admits receiving from somewhere and of the checks for $100,000 which he received from Edward B. McLean, of the Washington Post and the Cincinnati Enquirer, checks which, Mr. McLean says, were torn up and never used. As Mr. Hard points out, in the admirable summary of the situation which we print elsewhere, this is the first time that a man of cabinet position has been charged with malfeasance in office since the Belknap scandal in the administration of Grant. Everybody knew that the appointment of Mr. Fall to the Cabinet was an offense against public morals because of his attitude toward the preservation of the natural resources of America and because of his attitude toward Mexico. But these charges go far beyond that; they constitute a grave smirch upon our national honor. President Coolidge must realize that he cannot remain unmoved in face of the charge, made by Senator Caraway from his seat in the Senate, that Senator Fall and Mr. Sinclair and others would be indicted if it were not for the fact that they are shielded and protected by the Attorney General of the United States whose own impeachment was sought last year.

WILLIAM HARD'S INSISTENCE that the fundamental question in this unsavory mess is a question of public policy rather than of private morality is right. The nation has been robbed and is being robbed, whether Secretary Fall is honest or corrupt. Abandonment of the policy of conservation established under President Roosevelt is the underlying crime. Yet human nature is so constituted, as newspaper-makers learn, that the public will roar at individual sins and let a rotten system continue its putrefaction unnoticed. We have been living in an era in which business has wallowed in the trough. There has been a deal of talk of the "international bankers," but the revelations thus far disclosed, in this inquiry and in the investigation of the Veterans Bureau, disclose 100-per-cent American contractors, oil speculators, exploiters of every sort getting whatever they wanted in Washington, making money at the expense of the public with the knowledge and approval of trusted public officials. If the uproar over Secretary Fall's private dealings awakens the public to the underlying rottenness it will serve a useful part. But the inquiry must not be permitted to concentrate upon an ex-secretary. Secretary Denby collaborated with Mr. Fall in bartering away the nation's oil, and he is still a member of President Coolidge's Cabinet.

LENIN DIED almost precisely at the hour when the House of Commons was voting the "no confidence" in Mr. Baldwin which meant the advent of England's first Labor Government. Seven years ago Lenin was unknown to the world, whose great men seemed to be Lloyd George, Joffre, Wilson, and Hindenburg; and Ramsay MacDonald was a despised pacifist out of a job. In those few years Lenin forced his way to recognition, first as a nuisance, then as a menace, and finally as the most powerful statesman in Europe. The other mighty men have fallen; Lenin, although long too ill to direct his country's policy, dies the world's senior prime minister and the idol of his people. It is too early fully to judge his effect upon the century; but it is probably safe to say that no man has yet moved it more profoundly. Communism as he conceived it has not yet had a real trial, but its powerful dramatization of the class struggle has given new force to the labor movement everywhere and played a part in the silent revolution which has brought labor to power in England. Ramsay MacDonald, bitter as is his opposition to Lenin's theory of dictatorship, owes much to Lenin.

GENERAL ALLEN'S DRIVE for ten million dollars for the starving German children is on. Fair play and justice demand that America rise to the appeal of the American Committee for the Relief of German Children (19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City) as it has nobly responded to others on behalf of Germany, Austria, Russia, Japan, and China. On a later page we print other desperate appeals which have reached us from individuals and organizations in Europe. If there was any doubt as to the necessity of this demand for help it has been removed by the reports made upon their return from Germany by Dr. Haven Emerson and Professor Ernest Patterson of the University of Pennsylvania. They report appalling conditions which are bound to grow worse; the effect of tuberculosis, scrofula, rickets is such that an increasing toll will be paid as the years pass. A year and a half ago the late Dr. Rathenau declared that 40 per cent of the children of Berlin were without underclothes, and added: "We are fishing suicides out of the rivers and canals every day, and we have never yet found a body that had underwear upon it." Today, Dr. Emerson reports, three-quarters of the working-class children in some places are in need of succor. To state such a case is, we are satisfied, to insure the success of the drive. The war is over; the time is past when men can pray for the destruction of the little children of Germany.

STEP BY STEP our Government is involving us in the civil war in Mexico. We sell arms to one faction and refuse to sell to the other; we will not let the rebels blockade Tampico; we permit the Obregonistas to move their troops across United States territory. We are, in effect, making ourselves responsible for the maintenance in power of the present Mexican Government. A more dangerous policy could hardly be invented. Even actual intervention, followed by withdrawal of troops, might be less dangerous than this policy of assuming responsibility. It is the policy which we attempted to follow, with such disastrous results, in Russia; the policy which Mr. Hughes is working toward in China; the policy which has put our marines in control of Nicaragua, Haiti, Santo Domingo.

WHILE LABOR is fingering the reins of power in England and the Swarajists are marching their obstructive majorities into the councils in India Egypt is facing an equally interesting parliamentary situation. With no rioting or disturbance the Zaghlul party swept the country at the recent elections securing an overwhelming majority over all the other parties combined. This means a government committed to the elimination of British dominance; it means the triumph of the recognized leader of the Egyptian nationalist movement. All the leaders of the opposition including the present premier failed of reelection. The formal ending of the British protectorate in 1922 resulted in no lessening of British control; if England is to redeem her many promises of full independence to Egypt it will be through the determined self-help of the Egyptians and not through the grace and honor of England.

IF THE STOCK of the bolshevist government were listed on the exchanges it would be rising rapidly enough to make Mr. Hughes gnash his teeth. Here is Ramsay MacDonald declaring that "the pompous policy of standing aloof from Russia will be ended" just as soon as he enters office. Here is a dispatch from Italy declaring that Mussolini has gone so far as to give the name of his proposed ambassador to Moscow and that he has received in return the name of Lenin's choice for the court of Rome. Any day now we may hear that these two countries have entered into full diplomatic relations. Where will that leave Mr. Hughes and President Coolidge? Are they going to continue to believe that the American republic is so gravely in danger of being overturned by foreign propaganda that they cannot countenance a Russian ambassador at the capital? The country is, we believe, ready for recognition. The chief stumbling-blocks today are, if our information is correct, Mr. Coolidge's difficulty in getting around some of Mr. Hughes's stupid public statements and the opposition of Mr. Gompers and the conservative labor leaders.

WE SINCERELY TRUST that the committee which is going to investigate conditions in the Philippines will lose no time in calling before it General Leonard Wood and his sons, Lieutenant Osborne Wood and Leonard Wood, Jr. The government of the Philippines will not suffer by summoning the first two to Washington, for it is common knowledge outside of official circles that General Wood has lost his grip upon the situation in Manila. At least the natives there believe that he aids them by the impotency of his rule. But what is really needed is a little bit more light upon how the get-rich-quick son of the general made his pile. There are market experts who have checked up the lieutenant's statements and declare that they can figure out no way in which he could make half the sum he is said to be worth. Even the New York Times declares that there are discrepancies in his statements. He should certainly be given an opportunity to explain, in justice to himself and his father, just how he was able to play the market without previous experience, without means to start with, in one of the most remote cities of the East from which cables to New York take usually about fourteen hours.

BANK CIRCULARS telling how the bankers think the world is faring are among the most revealing literature dumped by the postman on the editor's desk. Just how devoted big business men are to the democratic traditions of America, for instance, is hinted in these amazing reflections from the bulletin of the largest and almost the most powerful bank on this continent, the National City Bank of New York:

The most outstanding development in Europe of the past year or two has been the revulsion from democracy as seen in the setting aside of representative governments and the concentration of authority . . . in individuals. In Austria Dr. Zimmermann, named by the League of Nations, is in control under the terms of a foreign loan. Mussolini heads the government in Italy. . . . In Spain General Primo de Rivera . . . suggested to the prime minister and Parliament that the space they occupied was more desirable than their company. . . . Bulgaria . . . Greece . . . Hungary . . . Germany . . . Democracy had run itself into the ground and in sheer desperation the public welcomed any authority that promised to be strong enough and patriotic enough to give good government. After all, the most important service of government is that of maintaining order and protecting industry and private business. If democracies will learn this lesson they will be greatly benefited by the experience.

When business men talk of "establishing democratic government" in Mexico, Haiti, or China, they mean just such business dictatorships, and nothing more.

MUSIC "THAT AROUSED THE PASSIONS" would be censored by a bill proposed in Colorado, according to Judge Ben Lindsey; and the high-paid executive of a reform organization, shocked by the sight of young boys gazing at the lingerie in a department-store window, wanted to "see to it that the windows were properly dressed." One might suspect Judge Lindsey of inventing his amusing reformer if it were not that Massachusetts is providing an almost equally ludicrous drama of censorship. Boston recently saw a film—a film with a moral—in which appeared an illegitimate child. It happens that by an eccentricity of Bay State law the Boston city authorities censor on week-days, but the State has that power on Sundays. And the State board proceeded to rule that the child must be made legitimate. Accordingly the captions were revised; on week days the child is still illegitimate, but on Sundays there can be no illegitimacy in Massachusetts, and the new captions carefully rewrite the story and marry the child's parents! Then, on the following week-days, the child resumed its illegitimate status. This, of course, is censorship carried to absurdity; Judge Lindsey also dwells on its fundamental fallacy. Censorship, he says, cannot take all responsibility for what youth shall see, read, hear, or think; our part is to devote "more time and effort in homes, schools, and churches to equip them with the knowledge necessary to grapple with and conquer evil wherever it is encountered on the path of life."

MR. LAWRENCE MARTIN, correspondent of the United Press, went to call on the American Cheka the other day and found him in his office. The interview is described in these words:

Daugherty was asked to explain these points about the Government's foreign policy:

1. Whether the "abundant evidence" which he said in a formal statement the Department had of Communist activities in the United States directed from Moscow warranted criminal prosecution;
2. If so, why the Department does not prosecute;
3. Why, if this evidence is not sufficient to warrant prosecutions of Communists alleged to be plotting overthrow of the American Government, it is considered sufficient to warrant the State Department withholding recognition from Russia.

Daugherty started by saying that "The Attorney General has said all he is going to say about this matter. Too much attention is being paid already to these flabby-minded weaklings who are trying to tear down our house."

"Do you support these agitators?" Daugherty asked. "Are you one of these weak-minded people who talk about free speech every time some one tries to curb these agitators?"

He said that the Government does not jail the agitators because then a "lot of silly people" would start parades and free-speech demonstrations.

Then Daugherty was asked whether this Government is afraid of these "flabby-minded weaklings" whom Secretary of State Hughes regards as dangerous enough to warrant withholding of Russian recognition.

"If you ask that question seriously you are a nut, like the rest of those that ask it," replied Daugherty. "To the extent that you think like they do, you are a nut. That is the official Department of Justice opinion of you. You are a nut." Thereupon he terminated the interview thus: "That's all. I'm busy."

A BAREFOOT YOUNG MAN was arrested in Passaic, New Jersey, on New Year's Eve, three minutes after he began an address in the street. The man had in his pocket an official permit for street speaking; the charge was "indecent exposure." Next morning the judge released Bill Simpson and he trudged back to his shanty in Wallington, still with feet bare, to continue the job for which he gave up the ministry when the church condoned war—the job of building houses for poor people. He accepts no pay and has few possessions, subsisting on what is shared with him by the people he serves—Pole, Negro, Italian, American. His stand, he says, is taken neither as a protest nor to set an example. He asks no one to follow his action. He wonders "what is the use of our talking about Jesus when He said very plainly that so long as we left one human being hungry or thirsty or cold or unfriended or in prison, even so we left Him?" "... Where is the goodness of giving out of what we do not need, of giving (whether it be ten cents or ten millions) which still leaves us hundreds of dollars for ourselves, and our tables and wardrobes full? Only that giving has beauty that makes us equal with the man to whom we give." Not many men are as relentlessly logical in their application of the creed they profess.

Then all of a doggone sudden

A peak riz over the sun

And I swear on me soul, 'twas the Arctic Pole.

Then what do you think I done?

THE HERO of Wallace Irwin's song immediately "done what a wight in a similar plight with a similar pole would do"; he headed straight south and left the top of the world to the people to whom it properly belonged—walrus and polar bears. But to Secretary Denby, arch-imperialist, no native rights are sacred. The Shenandoah is to start for the Pole and when it arrives, he says, it is to annex that desirable bit of real estate to these great United States. Perhaps it will even leave a few marines to make sure that American rights are respected and that none of the native inhabitants of the country lie around eating icicles when they should be building military roads and executive mansions. Senator Dill has made the best suggestion yet for the proper administration of this new territorial acquisition. He would call it Coolidgeland and instal Secretary Fall as Governor General to keep an eye on the oil-wells which may be discovered under the ice.

L EMMETT HOLT possessed to a remarkable degree the quality of remaining intellectually young. His passing at almost seventy was not that of one who had finished and laid aside his work, but rather that of a man in the prime of his accomplishment. Recognized as the dean among specialists in the diseases of childhood, he had as practitioner, teacher, investigator, and author attained to every honor which his profession affords. Thousands now living owe to his skill as a doctor their existence or their health; twenty classes of graduates of the College of Physicians and Surgeons remember as a thing apart the marvelous clarity of his clinics and his lectures. For almost forty years he had been making pediatrics a science. His textbook on the diseases of infancy and childhood, revised and re-revised, has remained through three decades the standard textbook in English on this subject, while his little book for the guidance of mothers has deservedly been a "best seller" in the truest sense of the word. To the broader aspects of child health Dr. Holt was equally alive; no set formula confined his activities. Whatever might advance the health of children in the world found in him a ready sponsor; his contributions to the work of the Child Health Organization and to its successor, the American Child Health Association, cannot be measured. His colleagues of his own generation and the younger men who found his mind, rich in experience, ever abreast of their most advanced thinking will miss a precious and inspiring influence.

Our Own Peace Program

WE must confess that we were not among the 22,165 contestants for the Bok peace prize; we were too modest, and in addition had an underlying "hunch" that we were not sufficiently enamored of the League of Nations. But, now that the contest is over and an extra office boy is busily engaged in opening the rejected plans which come to us seeking a way to the public, a perusal of some of them has convinced us that perhaps after all it is our duty to recall to our readers the various steps which we have advocated as moving toward the elimination of war. We are the more encouraged to do so because a further pondering of the Bok peace-prize plan increases our belief that there is little in that plan which makes for peace. To our mind the objective is the OUTLAWRY OF WAR.

War is today legalized and sanctioned; our whole structure of international law is built around it; most of its code deals with what can or cannot be done in time of war by belligerents or neutrals. To retain the system of war we have created a senseless, medieval distinction between disputes among nations by dividing them into justiciable and non-justiciable. The latter are supposed in some way so to affect the "honor" of nations that they can be ended only by blood-letting, even as in dueling days a man's life might be lost because some other fellow thumbed his nose at him and so tarnished his "honor." What is needed today is to make the resort to war in any case an international crime. This does away with non-justiciable disputes and also the right of self-defense when attacked. The attacker becomes a violator of law; the attacked is in no worse position than was Greece when Italy occupied Corfu; or China when invaded by Japan as in Shantung; or Haiti or Santo Domingo when we violated their respective sovereignties. The appeal then lies, clearly and definitely, to the conscience of the world and also to a WORLD COURT WITH COMPULSORY JURISDICTION.

Should the true world court be that just established under the League of Nations or that of the Hague? It could be built on either; the important thing is that it shall have universal compulsory jurisdiction without which the existing courts are helpless to interfere in any dispute if one of the contestants declines that intervention.

Together with a genuine world court and the outlawry of war should come COMPLETE DISARMAMENT.

No nation should be permitted to organize a force on military lines. Domestic law and order should be maintained by bodies organized and drilled as police and not as soldiers—a vital difference. The elimination of the professional military or naval man from the world, trained and paid as he is to plan, plot, and prepare wars and to dwell incessantly upon the next war and its danger and desirability, would be one of the longest steps toward world peace. Hand and hand with this should go the restriction of all manufacture of weapons to governments (as pledged for England by Lloyd George during the World War), so that no one should have the opportunity or the temptation to make private profits out of the sale or manufacture of war vessels or war materials. The desire for those profits has been the reason for many war-scares, and even wars. The next step is, naturally, a to which would be referred such questions (many of them now handled by the League of Nations) as the traffic in white slaves, opium, obscene literature, postal matters, international labor negotiations, maritime issues, etc., which were previously treated in special international conferences. This must be a parliament of all the nations of the world, not, like the League, an assembly dominated by the victorious Powers which the neutrals and the "pariah" nations are invited to join only when they are weak and "behave." Gradually by a normal and orderly growth such an annual or biennial convocation would come to deal with the equitable distribution of the world's supply of raw materials and similar questions of vital moment to the whole world which are now subject only to the laws of the jungle written and executed by the powerful countries of the globe. These now attain their will by theft, by conquest, by violence, by chicanery camouflaged as "peaceful penetration," "protecting nationals investing abroad," "spheres of influence," "mandates," "concessions to benefit the concessionnaire but also to uplift the natives," "aiding to self-government those not yet capable of self-government."

PARLIAMENT OF NATIONS

Are these

PRACTICAL STEPS?

Eminently so. The proposal for the outlawry of war has received the support of some of the most eminent jurists in the country, including Senator Borah, who has again introduced his bill committing the United States to this policy. The development of the World Court into one with compulsory jurisdiction was prevented by the League of Nations which eliminated the compulsory clauses. A campaign of education must be undertaken here. None of these proposals can be carried without careful planning and long-continued effort under sincere leadership. No scheme for eliminating war can be devised to be put into effect overnight. Any such proposal must encounter the greed of an acquisitive society ruled by private profit and the greed of nations intrenched in territory filched from others.

So far as the United States is concerned the acceptance of any such program means the turning over of a new leaf in its policy as to the Western Hemisphere, the abandonment of the present conception of the Monroe Doctrine under which we assume the morally indefensible position of telling the weaker nations to the south of us how they shall live and how they shall be governed, and of exploiting them financially precisely as England and France and Germany exploit, or exploited, their colonial territories. By forcing our will upon other nations we have produced in Haiti and Santo Domingo, and are in Mexico a contributory cause of, conditions which approximate a war status.

What is needed among all the nations is a genuine will to peace; in other words, a readiness to devote as much time, thought, and money to the elimination of war from the world as is now expended by the great nations in imposing their wills on others, in maintaining armaments, and in preparing for that next war which more and more experts, as well as the moralists and humanitarians, believe will involve the destruction of what is left of our existing civilization.

Two Years of Poincaré

THE days of Poincaré as prime minister are numbered. He has lost his old confidence in parliamentary debate; the Paris press, so long his faithful heeler, is barking jackal-like at him; and the political intrigues which always precede the fall of a ministry are under way. Barthou, or Loucheur, or Herriot may succeed him, but there can be little change in policy. Whoever governs France today must govern with the same Chamber of Deputies as made and maintained Poincaré, the chamber elected in 1919 when wartime passions still ruled France; and that chamber will permit no sharp reversal of French policy.

Poincaré's fall may nevertheless mean much to Europe. For, however slight the immediate change of policy, and even though he maneuver the parliamentary situation so that his defeat appear to pivot upon some lesser domestic issue, France and the world will know that he fell because his Ruhr policy was a failure. The recognition of that fact may have a marked effect upon the outcome of the elections for a new chamber in March or April, and in those elections is a great hope for Europe.

In a remarkable dispatch from Paris Mr. Ferdinand Tuohy of the New York World sums up the many causes for dissatisfaction:

The Separatist movement he fostered has been denounced; the franc has depreciated 86 per cent since he came into power; the cost of living has gone up; the Allied Commission of Control in Germany no longer exists except in name; the Ruhr maneuvers have served no end; no reparations seem likely to come in during the year; the Experts' Committee, which the premier at first fought so stubbornly, is functioning and will unquestionably have a vital effect; Ramsay MacDonald is about to link up with Russia, which Poincaré has been implored to do for months past; the United States has been alienated by ignoring the debt issue; French prestige in the Near East has lapsed to what it was in 1914, when Liman von Sanders ruled in Turkey; Italy and Spain have joined hands across France and the sea, necessitating extra naval expenditure; France, as a direct result of Poincaré's policy, must submit to crushing taxes; war victims and inhabitants of the devastated areas have to go begging for millions which have been allotted to them.

Even M. Poincaré's ministers have let him down: M. Raiberti, Minister of Marine, who let the Dixmude go up in spite of warning twelve hours before a tempest; de Lasteyrie, the Finance Minister, whose remedy for the financial chaos had to do principally with conditions for the sale of matches; Chéron, who has sent up the cost of living by boosting agricultural districts; Maunoury, who failed to take precautions against floods in Paris.

Everybody jumps upon a beaten dog, and M. Poincaré will be blamed for much that is not his fault. But the primary fact remains: the Ruhr policy was his, and the Ruhr policy is a failure. The Nation has long pointed out that it has cost France far more than it has brought her; that even M. Poincaré now admits—he puts his faith in the future, and justifies himself by the unconvincing plea that France might have been worse off still if he had not sent the army marching into the Ruhr. The fall of the franc marks the recognition in the international money markets of the failure of his program. If by drastic economies and sudden increases in tax rates he can check the fall of the franc, he may hold on until the election; but it is unlikely. When the cost of living is rising men are not ingratiated by wage cuts. M.

Poincaré lost the Chamber a few weeks ago when he attempted to oppose an increase of pay for the police and other civil officials—there were even riots by the police on the streets of Paris. He gave way then, but the increase is cut off by this new desperate resort to "economies," and he is accordingly becoming very unpopular with an important and hitherto loyal group.

Something more than personal unpopularity for M. Poincaré, however, is needed. More even is needed than recognition of the failure of his Ruhr policy as a means of collecting reparations. So far as French opinion goes he will fall because he was unsuccessful, not because he was wrong. Liberal and reactionary are joining hands in opposition to him. M. Tardieu will vote against him because he has not been severe enough with Germany. M. Herriot, who today leads the liberal attack upon Poincaré, abstained from voting rather than vote against the Government when Poincaré invaded the Ruhr; he took pains to make it clear that he too would favor military invasion if he believed it would help win reparations. Sometime, out of that France which set the pace for Europe in the democratic political revolution which is not yet completed, there must rise a leader who will see beyond the petty fears and avarices which beset present-day statesmen. He will plead for a genuine policy of reconciliation which, looking forward, not ever backward at the war, will seek the common interest of the two great peoples who have made the history of Western Europe—France and Germany.

Sanity Creeps Back

FAINT intimations of freedom appear here and there in the land. The federal political prisoners have been freed. German speakers and German artists are allowed to appear in the former strongholds of hate. German babies are fed by American dollars. And President Butler is out for freedom of speech.

All of this is encouraging. We have grown so accustomed to the intellectual thuggery of war and post-war days that level-headed tolerance strikes us as almost shocking. So, when we read President Butler's reply to the protests of the Italian evangelical ministers against the appointment of Signor Papini as a lecturer at Columbia, we are stirred to astonishment. "There is no more unhappy tendency in our contemporary American life," writes Dr. Butler, "than that to persecute those individuals and those doctrines with which we may not ourselves happen to agree." These are fine words and we have no doubt that Dr. Butler means them. With all his reactionary tendencies the president of Columbia is a philosopher and a man of balance. He dislikes excesses; he disapproves of scenes. Left to himself, away from wars or political conventions, he is likely to behave with liberality and decency, and so he is doubtless expressing his own honest judgment when he says in the same letter: "This spirit of persecution is far more un-American than anything which Signor Papini or any other distinguished European man of letters could possibly say or write about us."

None the less this letter, even in the words we have quoted, carries with it some qualifications. President Butler would not under any circumstances suppress the words of a "distinguished European man of letters." And the fact that Signor Papini is a passionate Fascist as well as a vitriolic critic of America is not to be allowed to disbar him. All of which is quite, quite right, and we agree with President Butler. But what if Signor Papini were not a distinguished man of letters or a scholar? Suppose he did not know his letters at all, and suppose instead of being a Fascist he were a Socialist and as a visitor to our shores poured out the vials of his bitterness against our American institutions. Would President Butler, we wonder, favor a warm-hearted hospitality toward such a man? Would he say, as he has said of Signor Papini that if he "has written unkind or censorious things of our modern life or of any of our national leaders, surely there can be no better way to bring him to a better understanding of us and of them than by giving him every opportunity to move about among us on that plane of intellectual freedom and moral equality which belongs to every honest-minded human being"? Would President Butler say that about a leading Italian radical—or even about a leading American radical? Well, we have never heard him do it, but perhaps we shall yet. Perhaps, one of these days, we shall hear him pleading for justice and an honest trial for Sacco and Vanzetti, or for fair treatment of Carlo Tresca, or even for an end of the humiliating and idiotic attacks on Captain Paxton Hibben who has committed lese majeste against the State Department by daring to sympathize with Soviet Russia.

We are not wholly ironical in these suggestions. We honestly believe that Nicholas Murray Butler is an outstanding representative of a fairly large class in America which is fundamentally willing to reason. The war made reason almost synonymous with treason; but now the war is over, or at least its waves have receded from our shores. And reason has flowed back. American conservatives may be less willing than their British prototypes to respect the right of every man to his own brand of folly or wisdom; but they have something of the same heritage of tolerance. It breaks down under stress; revolution or war or any acute emotional strain will demolish it and supplant it with passion or panic. But this fact does not mean that tolerance is an unreal thing or a mere pretense. It merely means that decent attitudes and impulses are products of civilization and cannot flourish widely or in most persons in an atmosphere of madness and danger and destruction. And while our President Butlers may never come all the way through to a position of fairness; while they may always find it easier to tolerate dissent if it is coupled with respectability and distinction; while they may utter fine sentiments in regard to a Signor Papini that they would hate to see applied all around the lot—still we may be thankful for even a hint of returning sanity. It is conceivable that finally not only noted Fascists but obscure radicals—and thus the whole life of the country—may benefit by it.

Fear is manifestly subsiding in America. The return of confidence and tolerance is to be detected in other colleges than Columbia. Vassar has by specific statute granted to teachers complete freedom of instruction, research, and outside activity; the federal and State laws are to be the only limits. Wellesley has included a representative of the faculty as a regular member of the board of trustees, though for some reason this representative may not himself or herself be a faculty member. Thus minor changes of attitude and method creep into our colleges as they creep into our public life, until presently we may hope to find ordinary people acting like free men and women and not like either watchdogs or thieves in the night.

Why Boys Leave Home

CORNING, N. Y., January 17.—Protesting against the interruption of what they hoped was to be a tour of the world with San Francisco as the first stop Paul Gorman, fourteen years old, and Maurice Sullivan, twelve, of Sayre, Pa., were taken from an Erie freight train here yesterday and today were returned to their homes.

FEW items in the newspapers can give us more pleasure than ones like the above. They are immeasurably more important than the dull columns with "spread heads" in regard to the arrangements for the Democratic national convention or the mock warfare of the fleet off the Isthmus of Panama. We rate items like that from Corning, New York, as of equal importance with accounts of how the daughter of a wealthy banker has eloped with the family chauffeur or the son of a multimillionaire has married the pantrymaid. They are the significant news of our country and our age because they show that human nature is still at work in the same old way in spite of all the restrictions and conventions with which we try to wall it up. As long as twelve-year-old boys run away from home to start around the world, nobody need worry about the deterioration of the younger generation or the future of the United States.

We wish, of course, that Paul and Maurice had got a little further than Corning, New York, before they were collared and sent back to their parents to be threatened with a spanking and embraced with tears. We wish they might have got as far at least as Chicago, and have become very hungry and very tired before they were picked up asleep on a railway-station bench by a kind policeman. For it speaks well of human nature that policemen who pick up adventuring boys always seem to be good fellows who delight in buying them hot soup out of their own pocket money.

Fortunately boys—even after they are supposedly mature men—have been running away from home ever since homes began. It is the only thing that makes either them or the homes tolerable. And America, in particular, is a nation of runaways. First they ran away from Europe and settled the Atlantic seaboard. Not satisfied with that, another generation ran away to the Mississippi Valley or the Golden Gate. Now they are running away to Alaska, South America, or the Orient—or doubling on their tracks back to Europe.

Doubtless both Paul and Maurice will live to take longer voyages than that to Corning, but none will be more important or so well remembered. Paul may grow up to be a small merchant in his native town; he may build a house with three verandahs, and a cupola on top; he may become a deacon in the church and the father of a comfortable-sized family; and once in so often he may go off to the convention of his lodge in Philadelphia or Buffalo. But that "tour of the world" will not be forgotten. Maurice may become a broker in New York City, with an apartment on Riverside Drive and his own bootlegger. Some year when business is neither too good nor too bad he may let his wife persuade him to take a six months' trip around the world on a luxurious steamship. But nothing that he may see will be up to that trip that was nipped at Corning.

Boys leave home because they are always more eager to explore what beckons to them from the window than to sit by the fire. When they cease to do so we will have become an insufferably dull people, and the world will have grown too stale to explore or be explored.

Mr. Fall's $100,000

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE inquiry at Washington into the leasing of federal naval oil reserves to private individuals has taken a turn most distressing from the standpoint of personalities and also most unfortunate from the standpoint of public impersonal interest. The true evil, if any, in the present naval oil reserve situation appears in the following facts:

1. In dealing with the federal naval oil reserves the Navy Department and the Interior Department have embarked upon a policy not authorized by Congress either in principle or in detail.

2. In pursuance of this new policy the Navy Department and the Interior Department have abandoned the Roosevelt idea of the conservation of naval oil in the ground and have gone over to the idea of the current commercial use of it along with a limited storage of it in tanks at naval stations.

These two facts are the outstanding crucial facts in the situation from the standpoint of the interest of the nation.

Yet these two facts, having been voluminously presented in hearings before a senatorial subcommittee, awakened few echoes of interested response from the public until to them there were added some further facts regarding Mr. Fall's personal affairs.

The peril (proved or persuasively asserted) to the future of the nation passed almost unregarded. Immense alarm arose when it was discovered that six heifers and one bull and one stallion had been received by Mr. Fall from Mr. Harry F. Sinclair in circumstances which conveyed a doubt as to whether Mr. Fall had paid for them adequately.

Along with these disclosures about the heifers and the bull and the stallion there came additionally disclosures about a ranch and two Cadillac cars and a hydro-electric plant costing $45,000 for pumping water on lands belonging to Mr. Fall and four additional bulls costing $3,000.

The great national question of the moment came into being. Where did Mr. Fall get the money for the four bulls? Where did Mr. Fall get the $100,000 which he at one time said he got from Mr. Edward B. McLean in cash but which it now in fact appears he got from him in checks which he did not use and which therefore could not have produced the $100,000 in cash which Mr. Fall admits he had before he bought the bulls and the hydro-electric plant and the other things?

Still more intense interest arose when Archie Roosevelt appeared and testified. Two things stood out in his testimony: In the first place, that the general situation of the Sinclair oil organization made Archie Roosevelt feel that it was no place for him. His resignation, considering the fact that he is a young man of no other financial prospects whatsoever, was manifestly demanded only by his own conscience. In the second place, the testimony developed that $25,000 in Liberty bonds and $70,000 in Sinclair oil stock had been given to Colonel Zeveny, after whom Mr. Sinclair named the well-known race-horse. Colonel Zeveny is known to be engaged in conducting negotiations with public officials. Mr. Sinclair's secretary, although he contradicted Archie Roosevelt's testimony that he had said he held $68,000 in canceled checks from Mr. Sinclair to Secretary Fall's foreman, admitted these payments but could recall no reason for them. The testimony further showed that Mr. Sinclair had left the country in a very, very great hurry. These facts are all important, but they do not yet constitute legally proved guilt, and they divert attention from the fundamental fact that Mr. Fall's policy, whether the spontaneous product of his own conscience or bought and paid for, constituted plundering of the public domain and destruction of the national defense.

I will now relate the inward story of the way in which a really public question which had only superficially stirred the public was made into a personal private question which has stirred it to its depths. There was in Washington a man occupying a high position in the service of a nation-wide newspaper organization. He happened to know a reporter on a certain newspaper in the West. This reporter had been assigned by his newspaper to go down into New Mexico and to study Mr. Fall's personal affairs at the time preceding and at the time following the contracts which Mr. Fall gave to Mr. Sinclair and to Mr. Doheny for what is so gracefully called "the development" of Naval Oil Reserve Number Three in Wyoming and of Naval Oil Reserve Number One in California.

Now it happened that the newspaper by which this reporter was employed had attacked Mr. Fall severely for these contracts. It also happened, however, that this newspaper suddenly ceased to attack Mr. Fall and thereupon failed to print the reporter's report.

The report was in existence. It lay in the reporter's desk. The distinguished newspaper dignitary in Washington happened to know the reporter and happened to know what his desk contained. He thereupon went to Senator Walsh of Montana, the most active member of the senatorial subcommittee investigating the matter of naval oil reserves; and he suggested that the reporter with the unpublished report should be asked to come to Washington. He was asked. He preferred to be subpoenaed. He was subpoenaed. He came. He gave to Senator Walsh the names of the persons whom in New Mexico he had interviewed. He thereupon was excused. He did not appear in public before the subcommittee. He went away out of town back to his desk, which contained the report never published by his newspaper. Senator Walsh, having thus learned the names of various informed persons in New Mexico, sent for them.

It thereupon was shown that Mr. Fall's financial situation, in the period preceding his accession to the post of Secretary of the Interior and in the period accompanying and following his grant of leases of naval oil-reserve land to Mr. Sinclair and to Mr. Doheny, could be illustrated by the following incidents:

For some years before Mr. Fall became Secretary of the Interior he had not been able to pay the taxes on lands of his in New Mexico. Suddenly, after having become Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fall was able to buy a ranch at a cost of $91,500 and some other land at a cost of $33,000, and the two famous or infamous Cadillac cars at a cost of $8,000, and the bulls at a cost of $3,000. He was also able to construct his hydro-electric plant at a cost of $45,000. He also was able to pay up his back taxes to the amount of $8,000. He finally was able to pay Mr. Sinclair $1,100 for the six heifers and the bull which Mr. Sinclair had sent him from Mr. Sinclair's farm in New Jersey. Mr. Fall did not pay Mr. Sinclair for the stallion. The stallion, it appears, was a present from Mr. Sinclair to Mr. Fall's ranch foreman. Mr. Sinclair paid the transportation charges on the stallion and also on the heifers and the bull. These charges amounted to $1,105.20.

The whole transaction accordingly, since it cost Mr. Sinclair $1,105.20, and since Mr. Fall paid him only $1,100, represented to Mr. Sinclair a net loss of $5.20. In other words, it cost him $5.20 to make a present of the stallion and to sell the heifers and the bull.

This $5.20 has developed into having an important bearing on the future naval oil policy of the United States. It is seen—or it is supposed to be seen—that if the relations between Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Fall are of this nature, why, then, we perhaps ought to have some sort of change from the present policy pursued by the Navy Department and the Interior Department in reference to oil.

At this point in the exposition of this drama it became naturally incumbent on Mr. Fall to explain his sudden affluence. He thereupon committed the act which has transformed him into the most spectacularly suspected cabinet minister in this country since Secretary of War Belknap came to impeachment in the presidency of Ulysses S. Grant.

Mr. Fall asserted in a letter to Senator Walsh's subcommittee that he had received as a loan from Mr. Edward B. McLean the sum of $100,000 in cash.

Thereupon there immediately arose in Washington a sort of epidemic of persons who wanted to know how it was that Mr. McLean could lend $100,000 in cash to Mr. Fall when at that very moment they had judgments against Mr. McLean which he was not able to pay.

Advised and admonished by their natural and also perfectly legalized feelings, Senator Walsh proceeded to Palm Beach in Florida and there found Mr. McLean and more or less compulsively besought him to testify, not indeed as to his capacity to lend $100,000 in cash but as to his actual performance or non-performance of the lending. Mr. McLean, confronted by the quiet and modest but persistent and undiscourageable presence of Senator Walsh, said that the $100,000 had been in the form of checks and that Mr. Fall subsequently had returned these checks to him uncashed. It therefore became totally clear that Mr. Fall's $100,000 in bills could not have come from Mr. McLean.

Washington now pants upon the question: Where could they have come from?

Meanwhile, if one were not a reporter but a novelist, one might put Mr. Fall's mysterious $100,000 second and Mr. Fall's concept of the nation's future first.

Mr. Fall, before he was a Secretary of the Interior, was a United States Senator. As a Senator, he perfectly frankly made it plain to all his fellow Senators, including Warren Gamaliel Harding of Ohio, that he did not for one moment believe in the policy of public domain conservation. He believed in passing the public domain over into "development" and into the hands of private enterprise and of privately enterprising persons. His friendships were among such persons. He liked their ideas and he liked their manners and customs and temperaments, and he went along with them, argumentatively and personally, all through his career as a Senator and all through the time therefore when Senator Harding was forming his judgment of Senator Fall.

Mr. Harding, having formed this judgment of him, and having become President, made him Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Fall did precisely what his record as a Senator predicted that he would do. He did precisely what his record, as crowned and sanctified by his appointment as Secretary of the Interior, might almost be said to have justified him in doing. He persuaded the Navy Department to put its public domain into the general public domain pool under the control of the Interior Department and he then proceeded to let it out, in vast acreages, in Naval Oil Reserve Number Three and in Naval Oil Reserve Number One to Mr. Sinclair and to Mr. Doheny on terms rapidly facilitating "the development" of oil and on terms not too onerous or too restrictive upon Mr. Sinclair's and Mr. Doheny's activities and profits.

For a novelist then the problem of mind and heart and soul would take the following far from legalistic guise:

Did Mr. Fall in the contracts which he let to Mr. Sinclair and to Mr. Doheny have the state of mind which a conservationist like Mr. Gifford Pinchot would have had if he had been the governmental signer of them? Did he have a pang of conscience? Then, in case he got his mysterious $100,000 from any person who benefited by either of those contracts, he did wrong.

But did he have any pang of conscience? Did he, in the letting of those contracts, simply follow out his long-declared and conscientiously disclosed senatorial theories regarding the public domain? Were his contracts with Mr. Sinclair and with Mr. Doheny both consistent with his record and congruous with his sense of right? Then, in case he borrowed money from a friend who happened to be also a developer and practitioner of oil, he may have felt himself not bribed at all but only befriended.

The truly clear thing that emerges from the whole situation is not the interesting guilt—or the interesting degree of guilt—of Mr. Fall. It is the fatally uninteresting blow given to conservation policy and constitutional precedent.

Translating that abstract language into concrete details, one may mention certain appallingly uninteresting statistics about Naval Oil Reserve Number One. Here were two hundred and fifty million barrels of oil in the ground. They were congressionally intrusted to the Navy for future use in naval national defense. They are now—from time to time—to be pumped out of the reserve by Mr. Doheny. Mr. Doheny will pay in royalties to the Federal Government a certain proportion of his pumpings. This proportion will perhaps amount to one-fifth of the total. It will amount, according to Senator Walsh's calculations, to approximately fifty million barrels. Two-thirds of this fifty million, without any authorization at all from Congress, will be paid back to Mr. Doheny to compensate him for building certain wharves and channels and storage tanks. In those tanks there will be placed all that remains of the oil from Naval Oil Reserve Number One. This remainder, out of the original two hundred and fifty million barrels, will be approximately sixteen million five hundred thousand barrels.

Executive usurpation in taking oil congressionally granted for conservation and using it for buying tanks and channels and wharves! Executive usurpation in changing a whole policy of conservation into a whole new policy of current use and sale! Those are the momentous national defense issues to which Mr. Fall's personal little treasure trove of $100,000 has lent a fleeting national curiosity.

A New Franco-German War

By C. B. THOMSON

[Brigadier General Thomson, who was attached to the Supreme War Council during the Great War, has recently been acting as correspondent for the London Sunday Observer in Germany and the Balkans. According to cable dispatches he is expected to be appointed Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs in the new Labor Cabinet.]

Berlin, December 25

BERLIN is enjoying a spell of fine cold weather, the kind of weather one associates with Christmas, or at any rate with Christmas cards. A light carpet of snow makes the streets look bright and transforms the Tiergarten into a fairyland. The branches of the trees are strangely still; yet, though snow-draped, the delicate tracery of their higher boughs stands out distinct and lustrous on the background of an opalescent sky. Below, black tree trunks border snowy vistas leading to white and silent spaces; here one forgets the nearness of the city where dwells so much despair. For Berlin is a city of despair, in spite of the sunshine and attempts at Christmas jollity, in spite of the flaunted luxury of profiteers, and even in spite of the renten mark.

This last expedient, for it is nothing more, has succeeded beyond the most sanguine expectations. Renten marks are at once banknotes and consols; the present issue of something over a thousand millions is the first instalment of a sum equivalent to 4 per cent of the total value of all private property in Germany (state property, such as the railways and some mines, is excluded). All holders of renten marks are shareholders in this national security, which, though as such it may be worthless, being unrealizable, serves as a bond of union. Renten marks are not legal tender; on this account they are being left alone by international speculators and are less liable to violent fluctuation. This arrangement has obvious advantages, but it suffers from the disadvantage that there is no conduit connecting Germany's new currency with the world.

Nevertheless, the new currency has been well received by the German public; it is the principal medium for internal transactions and so far has been stable; in a way, it has restored Germany's self-respect and on that account alone has served a useful purpose. Although prices rose on its first introduction, they have fallen since; the present high cost of certain manufactured articles is due to other causes such as the price of coal. But unless the banks take up future issues of renten marks on a large scale the latter will depreciate. Again, if the Government does not practice strict economy and make revenue balance with expenditure, if, in other words, the supply of currency is not equal to demand and the percentage of the security has to be raised from 4 to 8 or even 12 per cent, renten marks will in their turn become discredited. How to effect economies is the problem. The salaries of civil servants cannot be reduced, many are drawing less than $26 a month; while if government subsidies for the unemployed are discontinued a serious situation will arise.

At best, therefore, the renten mark is a temporary device designed to enable Germany to tide over the next few months by living on her own fat, or rather on the fat of that portion of the community which is the least vocal and has the smallest power of making its grievances heard. For a permanent restoration of German finances, foreign capital is needed to quicken German enterprise. At present, though well equipped with factories and workshops, German industry has no ready money; the big industrialists put all their war and post-war profits into new construction, partly to avoid taxation and partly from a miscalculation as to the future of German trade.

In 1920 and 1921 trade prospects in Germany were relatively rosy; but calculations on the basis of those years have been upset. The occupation of the Ruhr and the general international situation are rapidly ruining German industry. Although wages are low—a first-class workman earns about 24 marks for a forty-eight-hour week, or about $6—the cost of manufacture has risen; articles which a few months back were sold for a quarter of the British price are now more expensive in Berlin than they are in London. As a consequence Germany's export trade is diminishing and will soon reach the vanishing-point. No longer can Germany procure with them the raw material needed for her industry. A period of stagnation has set in whose consequences are too horrible to contemplate. Unemployment is increasing by leaps and bounds. The latest figures show five million unemployed or short-time workers.

When asked if they see any way out of the present deadlock, most Germans are profoundly pessimistic. All of them realize that no remedy can be found while the French remain in the Ruhr. It is for them the same thing as a military occupation of Lancashire would be for England. But how to get the French army out of the Ruhr is another matter. One leading industrial magnate took the view that for a sufficiently large sum of money the French would quit, his theory being that France was bankrupt and had to have hard cash. But since Germany's total foreign investments cannot exceed 200 million sterling, it is difficult to see where the money is to come from. Neither Great Britain nor America will find it; they are the creditors of France who has not yet begun to pay the interest on her debts; and to bribe her now to desist from an evil act would incite other victorious states to follow her example. It is none the less necessary, however, for France's late allies to consider where French policy is leading them.

If Germany is left to the tender mercies of the French Government two results will follow. The first will be a complete and unconditional capitulation by the German people. Already the industrial magnates in the Ruhr have capitulated and for all practical purposes are no longer German citizens. The workers in the Ruhr and a great part of the Rhineland have become the drudges of France through their betrayal by men like Stinnes, who are commonly described as captains of industry, but whose vision and patriotism are as circumscribed as those of any other flunkey. When this process has been extended to the whole of Germany, not only will France's political triumph be complete and her imperialist designs encouraged, she will also be the predominant economic force in Europe, and for a time throughout the world. She will be in a position to underbid both Britain and the United States in world markets, because she will have at her disposal sweated German labor. If British or American industrialists really believe that they can get a finger in this pie—and rumor has it that some of them do entertain this fond belief—the only comment to be made is that though these gentry may be hard faced they do not know the French. For the moment the working classes throughout Germany are beaten to their knees; the specter of want haunts their homes; they are exhausted both morally and physically; millions of city dwellers have lost their nerve through insufficient nourishment. Two or three years must pass before the national character can assert itself; today, one bomb dropped in Berlin would cause a panic.

The next result of the world's passive acquiescence in France's career of conquest will be a Franco-German war. Most competent judges of the situation believe that this war must come, that it is only a question of time. There is a movement among the youth of Germany, as natural and spontaneous as it would be among the English-speaking peoples, to resist oppression and to prefer any alternative to the prospect which lies before them. A people with nothing to lose by desperate action is always dangerous.

The next war will differ from the last in one respect whose importance cannot be overrated—the first encounters will take place on German soil. Eastern Germany is far from France and does not feel the full weight of the invasion. Preparations can and will be made, however slowly, and Germany may find new allies if not friends. Soviet Russia is ruled by able and ambitious men who have no cause to love the French and who aim at making the Red Army second to none in efficiency and equipment. They will readily perceive that by enlisting the technical skill and training of the Germans, who are adepts in these matters, they can achieve their purpose in a much shorter time. And the Germans, if forced by circumstances, though reluctantly, will accept Russia's help.

Should Germany with the help of Russia win the next war, neither Great Britain nor America, nor both together, would be heeded when the victors dictated terms of peace. What Germany won then she would keep, including coal mines and fields of iron ore, not to mention Channel ports. The English-speaking peoples would then pay the penalty for letting France abuse the Allied victory and flout inconvenient clauses in a treaty signed by a Prime Minister of England and a President of the United States.

Is there a way of averting this sequence of disasters? Would a conference restrain the French? Can counsel prevail where judgment is warped by prejudice and passions are inflamed by fear and greed?

In considering the answers to these questions it should be remembered that French procedure in the Ruhr and all over Europe is part of a systematic plan whose details have been thought out in advance, and which combines military, economic, and financial action with consummate skill. The men who have conceived this plan are ardently patriotic Frenchmen but not good Europeans; they base their calculations on the fact that France is self-supporting and an agricultural rather than an industrial state. When they talk of security they mean hegemony. To them glory and conquest are of more importance than any markets. They want money and believe they can obtain it at the point of the bayonet. Though trade is to them a secondary consideration, they do not forget it, but think it will follow the flag. And in all this ugly business France's late allies have played into her hands. Ever since the armistice she has ridden roughshod over Europe; on no single occasion has any government or statesman dared to call a halt.

As a consequence, ambitious French generals and statesmen have come to believe there are no limits to their liberty of action; their appetite has increased with eating, and they are inclined to gamble on a continuance of our vacillation. Indeed, it may be said that in a sense the French Government is bluffing. For France, notwithstanding her African soldiers, is not in a position to make a serious war. It would be risky to mobilize French peasants to fight on German soil, or to make French "rentiers" pay when they expected an indemnity.

Perhaps the answer to the questions put above is that the French Government will go on bullying a disarmed and helpless Germany as long as the world lets her, and until the German people can save themselves; but that the moment they are resolutely tackled and made to face the facts, the French people will force their Government to be more circumspect. If, for example, that Government were informed once more that the occupation of the Ruhr was illegal and a violation of the Treaty of Versailles; and if it were also warned, publicly, that persistence in the occupation would involve repudiation by the other signatories of those clauses which concern the disarmament of Germany—then, even the hottest-headed chauvinist might pause. It is an odd and paradoxical situation, but it comes to this—that the arrival of some shiploads of munitions in German ports may be the first and indispensable preliminary to negotiations, whose final aim would be the prevention of a Franco-German war.

In point of fact the war did not cease with the armistice; it is raging now in another form which is just as destructive. The highest and most urgent task of neutral European and American statesmen is to intervene before it will be too late; to do so is a sacred duty. To remain passive spectators of this suicidal struggle would be a crime. But the task is not an easy one, and to accomplish it the Powers must speak with a single voice. Firmness is needed as well as a desire for peace. The French Government should be made to understand that, in the last resort, force can be met with force.

Two claims, seemingly conflicting, have to be satisfied: On the one hand France must have security, but not security based on armies and all the paraphernalia of modern war. On the other hand, all Germans must have the right to live as free citizens of a united Germany within frontiers determined by their race and speech; but at the same time, German industry must submit to certain limiting conditions. Since the armistice German industrialists have been able, and largely through the inflation of the mark, to free themselves from mortgages, extend their works, and evade taxation to a considerable extent. They are thus in an unduly favorable position for competition in world markets once they can get a start. If, through the efforts of other states, German industry is freed from the trammels put on it by French vengeance, common equity demands that the industries of those nations should have an equally good start. Lastly, all the Powers in concert should decide what Germany can produce in the way of indemnities, over and above the 55 milliards of gold marks which she has already paid.

Drawing by Art Young

The Next War

The Young Men Go Down

By HARRY HERVEY

WHEN I first saw him he looked like a pigmy in a giant's cup of stone, a lone figure standing near the rock pyramids that flanked the approach to the monastery. Behind him, the Lamasery—the Hermitage of the Buried Monks it is called—trembled in the afternoon glare. The very air of the valley seemed asleep, and dragon-flies, drowsiest of insects, hovered over the gauzy dust that wavered up from the road.

He met us at the gate—a magenta-robed, long-haired youth of the Nying-ma Order. A few words in Tibetan passed between him and my Lama guide. Obviously the latter was explaining that I was with the Expedition . . . that I wished to see the cells of the immured monks. . . .

He led the way to the gumpa or temple, and we dismounted in the courtyard. There, my eyes still aching from the sting of the sunlight, I studied him.

He was less than twenty-two, but his eyes gave him a mature, almost ancient expression—dark, somber eyes that challenged my memory. His features were dusky gold, with a suggestion of the Mongol in the salient cheekbones and thin mouth. No full-blooded Tibetan: his eyes were as melancholy, as haunting as those of the youths who live in the frosty twilight of the Lake Baikal region.

I wondered where I had seen him before; somewhere, I was certain. At the Mission quarters in Chang-lo? I doubted that. It seemed, instead, that long ago my brain had snapped a negative of those eyes (gloom and deep forests) and now their reappearance developed the picture.

From the dazzling sunshine I followed him into the temple, leaving my Lama and the Gurkha escort with the horses. The chapel smelled of incense and butter-lamps; a cool, cavernous place where burnished treasures smoldered in the gloom; altar ornaments and holy vessels of bronze; ancient Tibetan chain-armor and copper weapons embossed with silver and turquoise and coral. . . .

I was conducted into a courtyard in the rear. There the glare, reflected from the flawless aquamarine sky, was almost blinding, and a lone peach-tree shivered in the heat-waves. The young Lama gestured toward several large and crudely fashioned windows in the walls. Each was closed with a slab of stone; their very blankness was awesome.

"There . . . ?" I murmured, somewhat shocked.

He nodded.

"In darkness?" I pursued.

"Some have lights to read by," he answered slowly, with a clear enunciation that surprised me. "Their lamps are filled each day when water and tsamba-flour are given them."

His words conjured grim pictures: an atrophied finger tracing a passage in the Kanjur or Buddhist bible—a throat wrinkled like a mummy's—or a recluse in utter darkness digging at the riddle of Life and Death. . . . There was, suddenly, irony in the living beauty of the peach-tree.

"It is a life of prayer and meditation," explained the young monk, "entered into by those who wish to acquire merit or do penance. There are three periods: the first is six months, the second three years and ninety days, and the last—life. They"—with a wave toward the stone slabs—"are very holy men."

Upon a suspicion I asked: "You . . . ?"

A nod.

"But . . . " Again words refused to form.

Something like a smile stirred deep in his somber eyes, as though he sensed my horror of immurement and was amused that one should react against this holy practice.

"I enter the first period in four days," he informed me, acquiescence, even anticipation in his tone. And he added proudly: "I am from the North. We Mongolian Buriats are descended from Arahans, and our duty toward Spirit transcends allegiance to mere Flesh."

A word, an inflexion, a glance, something; and flint struck tinder, the spark flashed.

"In Darjeeling!" I pronounced triumphantly, for the memory unrolled like a scroll.

He nodded, no surprise in his face.

"Yes . . . Darjeeling." A faint smile, a reminiscent smile. "That was before . . . before I solved the riddle," he said absently. Then the smile vanished. "The Abbot is ill, but I am permitted to entertain guests. You will have tea?" . . .

We sat on cushions in a great, dim room where the horrors of the Buddhist Sheol were frescoed upon the walls and camel-gray mountains were visible through the one window. Chan Tsering (for he had told me that was his name) poured the tea—a sickening gruel mixed with butter—while two acolytes, maroon-clad, served, their sandals click-clacking on the stone floor.

"I met you in the old Lama's house," I mused, looking over my shoulder so to speak, and across a mental vista, into a little room where skull-masks and prayer-wheels and other Lamaistic emblems filled dusty corners, and a door opened toward icy, mauve-flanked Kinchinjanga. "You remember? You were going to teach me Russian," I reminded, smiling. "Where did you go? I came back the next day."

He did not respond to my smile.

"We left unexpectedly that night, Taglat and I," he answered solemnly. "Taglat was the Swami who was with me. He said we were going to Ceylon and from there to Russia."

"But you didn't?"

He shook his head. "I unlocked a riddle." And after a moment he repeated "A riddle"—gazing abstractedly at a cardinal-red curtain from behind which came the rattle of prayer-wheels and a monotonous intonation.

"I can remember that I felt this riddle as a boy," he continued thoughtfully, "up there where the tall pines grow out of the snow, near Verkhni Udinsk; even in the monastery at Urga . . . A riddle about men."

"You will understand"—he spoke directly to me now—"that I was very young when the Abbot sent me to Troitse-Casavsk to learn Russian and English, yes, very young, indeed—but not too young to see the thing, to wonder. I used to sit in the window of the school and watch the Siberian soldiers pass, with sunlight, gray winter sunlight, licking like white tongues on their bayonets. There were others, too, pale men from cities whose names confused me; Chinese merchants from Mai-mai-ch'eng, and Khalkas and Chakkars from my own country; young and old. But the old did not interest me; no; I watched the young men; watched them pass, watched them go—going where?—and felt . . . How shall I say?"

He made a queer little gesture. "Picture a turquoise," he said; "picture, in its very heart, a flaw. You have seen a blemish in one of those stones and wished it were not there, yes? Then you understand how I felt when I watched the young men pass in Troitze-Casavsk.

"Women passed, too. And there were some . . . some with lips blood-red and cheeks white with rice-powder . . . but none so lovely as the Golden One; none. And, too, the Abbot had warned me against them."

A shadow had settled in his eyes. Apparently he did not see me, but, instead, gazed beyond at a person invisible. It was this ghost that he addressed.

From behind the cardinal-red curtain came a fragment of prayer: "'Om mani padme hum!' O, Thou Flower in the Lotus, hail!"

The invocation seemed to recall Chan Tsering to the fact of my presence, and, as one suddenly aroused from sleep, he looked at me and smiled apologetically.

"I forgot. You will pardon? But, you understand, you cause me to remember—particularly, the Golden One . . ."

"The Golden One," I repeated. "A woman?"

Again retrospection clouded his eyes, overcasting them with melancholy wisdom.

"It is my dharma that I tell you of," he said softly, dreaming as he spoke; "the dharma of one who sought the Way of Knowledge. I spoke of the Arahans. . . . An Arahant is one who has reached the state of Nibbana or perfect coolness after the fever of the flesh. To attain this state one passes through the Nirayas or Periods of Woe. In my instance, the beginning of this upward journey—which, like all soul pilgrimages, goes downward first—was when I set out for the Holy City of Lhasa. I was nineteen, then, and it was my first long journey. As a boy, I had seen the great caravans go south toward Tsang and Kham, had dreamed of the day when I, too, would travel to the Dwelling Place of the Auspicious One. But my dreams could not approach the reality, the exquisite reality, of those desert nights. . . . Campfires and the smell of camels . . . cold white nights in the snows of Kokonor, in the icy mists that hang between mountains mighty as the Red God of Thunder . . . nights when the air was clear and caravans of stars marched with us. The memory is sweet as musk!"

"The day after we reached Lhasa, the Abbot took me into the Potala, that is, into the palace of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Through a thousand halls we went, up a thousand stairs, and into the very audience hall of the Auspicious One. He said a mantra over tea and we drank. Then he told me that I had been sent to school in Troitze-Casavsk to prepare for the time when I would travel into the country of the Russians. That time had come. The British planned to send great armies into Tibet, to destroy its towns and its people, he said. However, the king of the Russians was friendly and had dispatched emissaries to Lhasa. Now he, the Auspicious One, would return the honor. Taglat and I, with another monk called Ghomang Lobsang, were going down into India to the Bodhi-druma at Gaya, and from there to Ceylon, and thence on a ship to some Russian port. . . . When the Auspicious One had concluded the audience, he pronounced the blessing of the Three Konchog, and we went back through the thousand halls and down the thousand stairs.

"A few days later we left Lhasa, Taglat, Ghomang Lobsang, and I; traveled across the Ammo Chu, past Chumbi; went down into the world. And there . . . there I met the Golden One."

In the following pause he sipped his tea; a perfunctory act. There were no sounds in the nearby cloister now; no sounds outside; a silken silence.

"In Darjeeling," he resumed, "I saw her for the first time. I was standing in the bazaar, staring at the white men who passed, when she came down the roadway, with the soft cling-clong of anklets and the dust rising in little golden clouds about her feet. Her eyes . . . her eyes were brown and soft as a night moth's wings, her skin pale yet dusky under the throat. And as she moved, the spangles on her head-scarf shivered like the stars on a winter night. She smiled—yes, at me—and passed. And I followed . . . to watch the sun light fires in her golden hair.

"She went to an inn where there were several other women, all dressed as she. Jugglers were there, too; and musicians; and a great crowd watching. A man was playing on a lute, another beating a drum. She danced. And as she danced, cobras rippled and swayed about her feet like black flames. And when they struck, when they hissed their hate-calls, she only laughed and danced the faster. And I stayed . . . stayed until she ceased, until I saw her coming toward me, smiling, for me to place a coin on her forehead. . . .

"The next night we went down from the mountains and to the Mahabodhi Temple in Buddh-Gaya, where the Sacred Bo-tree whispers of the wisdom that Prince Gautama learned under its branches. And—although I tried to think of the goddess Palden-Ihano instead—I thought always of the dancing-nautch of Darjeeling as she came toward me, smiling . . ."

"We traveled through many towns and at last came to the City of Seven Pagodas. A strange city . . . great waves beat like a drum on the beach, and most of the people are black, quite black against the white sand and blue sky." Suddenly he glanced at me. "You are thinking that in this new country I had forgot the riddle. But how could I? It was ever before me, in the white lords who passed, in the turbaned soldiers, and in the black and brown men. But I found the answer . . .

"I do not know how I came to the Street of Throbbing Drums," he announced, lowering his eyes. "Taglat and Ghomang Lobsang were not with me. It was a dim street, for only a few lamps burned, and at one end a lonely palm leaned upon a purple sky. In a house a drum was beating. As I passed, it seemed to beat upon my eyes and heart. I imagined I could hear a musical cling-clong, imagined I could see her coming toward me, smiling. . . . But did I say I passed? . . .

"A woman ran out and caught my arm. She was a nautch, dressed in silks crimson as a Manchu woman's mouth, and her lips, too, were red, but red with betel-stain. From her hair came the odor of jasmine, a sweetness that closed about me like a cloud of incense. But I drew away. I would have run had not another woman appeared from a house across the street. She spoke angrily to the nautch, she even struck her. And I saw her face, pale as a young moon in the night. . . . There is a cobweb over that scene. I remember that she led me into her house, and that I went—to watch the fires dance in her golden hair.

"She gave me something to drink, something cool and sweet like the chilled juice of berries. She seemed surprised when I spoke Russian and asked many questions. Russia was her country, she said. But she was not like the Russian women I had seen. . . . Presently, as I sat there—ah, she was a pale gold poem in the lamplight!—I grew frightened, as I had that day in Darjeeling. I left. At the door her hand touched mine; yes, a thread of hair, too, fragrant as the branch of a sandalwood tree; and she told me not to come again to the Street of Throbbing Drums."

His voice tapered off into a whisper.

I remained silent for a moment, picturing the burnished beauty of that half-caste Magdalene whom chance had brought from Himalayan heights to the coast of Coromandel. . . . At length I stirred; sighed.

"But you did go back," I pronounced.

Chan Tsering looked at me then, and that illusive, melancholy smile slipped into his eyes.

"The next night Taglat, Ghomang Lobsang, and I prepared to leave for Ceylon to visit the shrines at Anaradhapura before sailing for Russia. After dusk we went out to a great ship in the harbor, ah, an immense ship! It would not leave until morning, Taglat said. After he and Ghomang Lobsang were asleep I lay there, in the midst of men who sweated and stank, thinking—thinking. I could hear the surf on the beach, throbbing like a drum. I listened, and my very heart seemed to beat with it. I saw her coming toward me, smiling. . . .

"And so . . . and so I stole out on deck. A sampan was beside the ship and I bade the boatman take me to the beach. There I hesitated, almost decided to go back. When I reached her house I found the door closed, but I opened it and went in . . ."

A russet undernote had crept into the sunlight; the mountains, dim with shadow, locked the valley in like a stronghold. I realized that I had overstayed my time. Yet I felt reluctant to stir, felt that I had a task to perform before leaving.

"But surely," I began desperately, "surely you won't let . . ."

But I didn't finish. For I saw in his face (a face strangely like that of St. John cast in bronze but for the slight obliquity of the eyes) the unshakable conviction of the East. . . .

"I could have returned to Lhasa," he declared, "and the Auspicious One, whom I disobeyed, might . . . Ah, only God can tell what might have happened! It was too uncertain. I could not go into Nirvana with a flaw. Here, in my cell, the days will be spent in prayer and penitence. And then . . ."

He closed his eyes; quoted:

"If thyself thou art muted as a gong that is broken, thou art come to Nibbana, the perfect stilling of the voice of self-assertion."

Then, suddenly, his eyelids lifted from dark, troubled eyes. "But in my sleep," he said, "when I dream, I still see them—the young men going down into the world; some grave, some laughing, some heedless but all seeking knowledge. . . ."

When I last saw him (we were riding over the hill toward Dongtse, and dusk lay thick on the world) he looked like a pigmy in a giant's cup of stone. Behind him, the Lamasery blended into the gray of the mountains. The very air of the valley seemed asleep.

Warning to a Blasé Lady

By HERBERT S. GORMAN

Delicately discompose
Your airy knowledge of the rose
And learn awhile with me
Of life's dubiety.

This sweet sophistication kills
The ardor of the daffodils
And feigns a doubtful trance
Midmost our summer's dance.

So much is seen that we may see
In icy perspicacity,
But past our clicking brains
Another world remains.

And there the rose is not the rose
But something that may discompose
Our wit; the daffodils
Are of a race that kills.

And nothing that you there may see
But has a tragic history,
And subtly seems to dance
To Time's deliverance.

So uneventful are our brains
Beside the secret that remains
Behind the idle rose
And all our knowledge knows!

In the Driftway

THE DRIFTER cannot resist finding a place for the following letter:

"MY DEAR DRIFTER:

"Do you remember the night we went to see Meggie Albanesi? I went to see her again last fall in 'The Lilies of the Field.' How charming, how brilliant, how sparkling she was! And now comes the news of her sudden tragic death at only twenty-four. At seventeen she left some academy of dramatic art—and walked right into the front of the London stage. Child of a talented mother—the novelist—her rare personality dominated a too-slight frame and the English public recognized her gifts even in the dark days at the end of the war. Never has anybody won the favor of the London audiences more quickly. There was a polish, a mastery of technique, an assurance, a skill, in addition to her sweet and fetching personal appearance, which confounded those who aver that it is only by a long course of training in stock that an actor can really be schooled into something worth while. The London critics could see no limits to her possibilities; Shakespearean roles, they were sure, were hers to be conquered as soon as ever she essayed them. Now they declare that there has gone a first-rate actress in a time almost barren of great dramatic figures—they have no one to compare with our Walter Hampden over there. And so the 'curtain has gone down at the end of the first act.'

"THE FIRST SCENE, I should say. Never shall I forget the charm with which she played a part which had it not been skilfully done must have made the 'Lilies of the Field' ridiculous. It was the story of a country girl who made a hit in London by going around in a crinoline as a Mid-Victorian until, in a sudden overwhelming desire to be true to herself and her suitor, she stripped off the crinoline and stood, a slim young thing in undergarments, carrying the audience with her by the convincing power of her outburst. Meggie Albanesi in crinoline! It inspired some one to verse which the Playbox Theater program roguishly attributed to the Rev. John Head (Meggie's stage father in the 'Lilies'), 'upon the occasion of his first sight of Miss Meggie Albanesi in a crinoline.' I take from it these lines:

"The Lion and the Unicorn were fighting for the crown.
It seems a silly thing to do. But that's what's written down,
And I have lately seen a sight which beats that marvel 'aisy'—
To whit: the flimsy crinoline of Meggie Albanesi.

"ENVOY

"Dear friends who read these cryptic lines, I am not really crazy,
But devastated by the charms of Meggie Albanesi.

"THE MOURNER"

Correspondence

Germany Hungers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was invited by the Quakers' Relief Committee in Berlin to see some of their relief work done. Today I saw over 1,000 children get their Christmas dinner, which consisted of rice soup with meat and a loaf of bread. They were also given two yards of linen each. The children brought their own plates or little pails to eat from, and often they received second or third helpings to take home.

It is something horrible to see these starving children, twelve or thirteen years old, with bodies of normal children of eight or nine. It is evident that they have been suffering from starvation for a long time. I saw one child stumble and fall to the floor, too weak to carry her small pail of soup to the table. Mothers stood anxiously waiting by the door to take their children home with the bread and the linen and the remaining soup. I saw one mother look into her child's pail and when she saw it was empty one could read her thoughts at once. Another man and I induced the child to go back to get some more of the soup so that her mother would also have a little.

The mayor and others spoke with great gratitude for the people of the United States for feeding these children, and the children with their feeble bodies cheered and cheered. In their hearts will ever remain a warm spot for the people of the United States.

There are at present about 60,000 children being fed in Berlin by American Quakers—only a small percentage of those needing help. In one school, for instance, there are 700 children of whom only forty are being fed. At least half of the 700 children are underfed, but only in the very worst cases can assistance be given on account of lack of financial resources.

I do not know of a better way at present to help the starving children than for the people of the United States to support, financially and otherwise, the Quakers' Relief Committee, which is doing such good work with so little money.

Berlin, December 21

JOHN VAN NULAND

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Austrian League of Nations Union has taken the initiative of addressing an appeal especially to the Anglo-Saxon world in favor of the famine-stricken population of Germany.

We earnestly hope that the Anglo-Saxon world, without regard to their political feelings, will contribute to the success of our humanitarian work. We other Austrians know what the suffering of a whole people means, having suffered ourselves so much during the last years. But at the same time we are very grateful, especially to England and America, which kindly helped us during our darkest days. We therefore hope that Great Britain and America will help the German people in its terrible situation.

We should be very much obliged if you would kindly print this appeal in your great journal. Donations and checks may be sent by registered mail to our Vienna address, Vienna I, Elisabethstrasse 9, Austria.

Vienna, December 24

DR. JOSEF L. KUNZ,

For the Austrian League of Nations Union

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to thank the readers of The Nation who, after reading my article Missing Most of Europe, published October 3, sent generous contributions for the relief of impoverished students at the University of Munich. At the time I wrote the article I thought conditions in Munich could not possibly grow much worse; but I am finding now that I had no conception of just how much misery the human constitution can endure.

Last spring the Ausländische Studentenhilfe (Foreign Students Relief) could support a student on $2 a month. When I wrote, the amount had risen to $3. And now it is $6—and still going up. With $6 a month we can supply a student with one fairly adequate meal a day and a pound loaf of rye bread for home consumption: nothing very sumptuous, to be sure, but enough to keep him alive if he has no funds and can't find work. There are somewhere around 100,000 unemployed in Munich now, and a student hasn't much chance.

The Hilfe has undertaken to see a number of the most deserving and advanced students through their examinations; and despite the enormous rise in the dollar cost of living we feel we cannot repudiate this responsibility. Besides at least several thousand students eat their dinners at the Verein-Studentenhaus at reduced prices; and now, when it is most needed, we don't want to see this kitchen closed for lack of funds. To Americans this may sound like only another of the many appeals for help coming from Europe; but I am hoping to reach students or college graduates who will be especially interested to keep the German university student on his feet and enable him to aid in the reconstruction which, after all, must some time come. We can use also old clothes in good condition—shoes, suits, shirts, overcoats, hats, etc. Address all contributions and packages to the Ausländische Studentenhilfe, Universität von München, München, Germany.

Munich, December 1

HARBOR ALLEN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I ask for a little space to call the attention of Nation readers to the starving condition of many well-known German musicians? Dr. Wölbing, in association with Herr Georg Heinrich, proprietor of the Steingraber Verlag and publisher of the Zeitschrift für Musik, has tried to collect moneys to assist German musicians. So far, however, their efforts have been unsuccessful in relieving the wide-spread distress.

It is not an exaggeration to say that scores of elderly artists whose names are known the world over are actually in a starving condition. Piece by piece, they have sold their household goods. Many of Germany's best public artists and composers now find themselves playing in motion-picture theaters, for the people find concert tickets too expensive a luxury to be indulged in at the present time. The majority of German musicians have, indeed, no profession any longer; they cannot travel to foreign countries; they are compelled to beg or to starve. Those who have been able to obtain some other kind of employment are very few. A musician makes a poor laborer in a country where unemployment is growing ever larger.

Thousands of American students have received their musical training at the hands of the very men and women who today are destitute and economically helpless. I know it is hard to conceive of an entire nation facing the slow torture of malnutrition and starvation, but that is the situation in Germany.

Will the readers of The Nation come to the assistance of Germany's musicians and composers? A month from now may be too late!

Contributions should be sent (either in the form of personal or bank checks) to Dr. Wölbing, care Verlag Steingraber, Berlin, W. 15; Uhland Str. 48, Germany.

Salzburg, Austria, December 7 JEROME LACHENBRUCH

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You were so kind as to open the columns of The Nation for October 3 to a letter of mine appealing for books, etc., on culture in the United States. It has been answered in a most wonderful way by many American people from Hawaii to New York. The number of parcels I received has grown so large that I am not able to thank each one of the generous donors personally.

We university professors in Germany have to be thankful that we receive at least the necessities of life so that we are able to pursue our aim of raising the young generation to the spirit of self-sacrifice for a rebirth of our country. But we are not able to buy any foreign books and periodicals or even too many stamps for letters outward bound.

So I am very thankful to The Nation for giving publicity both to my appeal for this literary material which had been lacking and to my thanks for its impressive fulfilment. The readers of The Nation have shown to me and my students that they at least in America are aware of the most precious thing that is at issue now in Germany: the faint belief in the common altruistic aims of this quarrelsome family of mankind.

Königsberg, East Prussia, November 21 GUSTAV HÜBENER

One Little Boy

By Hugh de Selincourt
HAVELOCK ELLIS:

"I have long regarded Hugh de Selincourt as one of the most interesting and original of our novelists. One Little Boy . . . is among the happiest examples of his art."

J. D. BERESFORD:

"What I so greatly admire in One Little Boy is Mr. de Selincourt's passionate and single desire to tell what he believes to be the absolute truth. No novelist has yet told the real truth about certain aspects of a boy's life as de Selincourt does here, honestly, I may say scientifically, and yet with such an intense feeling for beauty."

MARGARET SANGER

in N. Y. Tribune:

"One Little Boy is interwoven with irony and satire. But there is no stridency, no anger, in the pen of Hugh de Selincourt. Like his master, Havelock Ellis, there is only gentleness, tenderness, understanding. This curious blend of qualities makes possible in even greater daring in frankness of expression than the ordinary, since the author unites unusual power of expression with a fine delicacy of perception. He is never offensive or shocking. When we finish reading One Little Boy we realize as never before that the sins of the fathers that are visited upon the children are too often psychic sins—the sins of pruriency, hypocrisy, suppression and inhibition, diseases which may be more devastating to the younger generation than actual physical ailments. Unless we are honest, straightforward, and frank ourselves, we cannot expect our children to be healthy."

$2.00 NET

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI
39 West 8th Street, New York

CHICAGO IS HUNGRY FOR BOOKS

The wide popularity of The Wednesday Book Page of The Chicago Daily News proves it. The increasing number of book stores in Chicago proves it. The response to book advertising in The Daily News proves it.

Chicago dealers stock books that are advertised in The Daily News. It is cooperation they need and the highest form of cooperation they receive. Such books are known throughout Chicago. The dealer has calls for them—enthuses about them—pushes them. The market is active.

Book advertising in The Chicago Daily News reflects this condition. Lineage figures for the year 1923 are as follows:

BOOK ADVERTISING IN CHICAGO NEWS-PAPERS FOR THE YEAR 1923

	Comparison Agate Lines	Agate Lines
The Chicago Daily News.....	176,859	176,859
The Daily Tribune	127,429	127,429
The Post	100,532
The Daily Herald-Examiner....	15,673
The American	5,589
The Journal	1,441
Sunday Papers
The Sunday Herald-Examiner .	27,381
The Sunday Tribune	9,303
The Daily News' excess over the next highest score, that of The Daily Tribune		49,430

Enterprising publishers who back up the enterprising book dealers of Chicago with the most effective advertising do it in

The Chicago Daily News
First in Chicago

Books

Greek Fundamentalism

Hippocrates and His Successors in Relation to the Philosophy of Their Time. By R. O. Moon, M.D., F.R.C.P. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.

THIS little book describes briefly the physiological and pathological theories, most of them quite erroneous, which lay under the therapeutics of Hippocrates, and then goes on to deal with the ideas of his followers. Among these followers there were, roughly speaking, four schools, the Dogmatists, the Empirics, the Methodists, and the Pneumatists, and Dr. Moon attempts to relate them to the four schools of philosophy of that time, the Stoic, the Epicurean, the Skeptic, and the Eclectic. The relationship, it seems to me, was often very remote, and seldom very important. Whatever their differences over metaphysics, all these post-Hippocratic Munyons had at least one essential thing in common, and that was their common ignorance. Their ideas, as set forth by Dr. Moon, are almost unanimously nonsensical. One generation after the death of Hippocrates the new art of medicine, lifted out of absurdity by his genius and made dignified and honorable, had already returned to the scientific and ethical level of politics, labor leading, and fortune-telling. And there it remained for two thousand years.

Against Hippocrates himself I am surely not one to raise a clamor at this late date. He was the first physician to keep accurate histories of his cases and to publish them without editing them. He suspected all drugs, and believed in water, fresh air, and a simple diet. He wrote very sagaciously upon fractures. He gave his name to the professional oath which, even to this day, forbids fashionable New York doctors to charge a patient more for "curing" a cold in the head than his total annual income. He described malaria, epilepsy, and anthrax, and improved the art of bandaging. But even Hippocrates, compared to a first-year medical student of today, was a dreadful ignoramus, and the tragedy is that, for century after century, the fame of his genius served only to perpetuate his worst errors. Down almost to our own time his influence was so vast that it was scarcely challenged—and that influence was heavily against free inquiry, experiment, the establishment of exact facts. He created an art of medicine without creating an underlying science, and the art without the science was as useless as an army of brave men without guns. The nineteenth century had come before the human race began to unsaddle itself of his childish theory of innate heat, his still worse theory of the four humors, and his surgical doctrine that what is not curable by iron is curable by fire.

As for his followers, their influence was ten times worse, for they left no good to offset their evil. To this day many of their nonsensical notions survive in folklore and contribute to the prosperity of osteopaths, chiropractors, and other such quacks. Yet all of these men lived and flourished in the Golden Age of Attica, and many of them were the contemporaries and friends of Plato and Aristotle. What moral is to be drawn from this circumstance? The moral, I believe, that the modern world, succumbing to sentimental nostalgia, has permitted itself to overestimate colossally its intellectual debt to Greece. Why is the debit side of the ledger so persistently overlooked? We think of the Parthenon—and forget the endless puerilities of Greek philosophy, a curse to the world down to the time of the Renaissance. We remember Greek ceramics—and forget Greek politics, still surviving among us in gaseous, abominable forms. We cherish the name of Sophocles—and forget that the Greeks invented the actor. We recall Praxiteles with a sob—and forget that the therapeutics of such salient Greeks as Dexippos of Cos, Menodotus, Asclepiades, and Thessalus of Tralles, between the years 300 B.C. and 1800 A.D., probably caused a billion deaths and filled Europe with cripples and incurable invalids.

Habits of mind, particularly if inherited, are hard to break. Dr. Moon is an intelligent man and a very learned one, and so he must be well aware, if only unconsciously, that nine-tenths of the Greek physicians he discusses were of little more skill or sense than so many itinerant quacks. Their observations of anatomy and physiology would disgrace a schoolboy of today; their surgery was barbarous and idiotic; their medical treatment, nine times out of ten, was entirely illogical and ineffective; compared to them a country horse-doctor of the present takes on the majestic stature of a Karl Ludwig or a Virchow. Yet Dr. Moon discusses them with perfect gravity, and endeavors solemnly to relate their silly dogmas and guesses to systems of "philosophy" that, realistically considered, are even worse. I denounce this Hellenic fundamentalism and pass on. It is more dignified than that other fundamentalism which now engages the newspapers, but by the same token it is more hollow.

H. L. MENCKEN.

Theseus Balks

Labyrinth. By Helen R. Hull. The Macmillan Company. $2.

IT is much to be able to say, as one can of this book, that it is intelligent and records many delicate perceptions of personality and mood, even when one must add that it is probably intended chiefly as a thesis, since it does not too seriously concern itself with the difficulties of craftsmanship, of constructing those simple-seeming but infinitely ingenious nets which Turgenyev, Balzac, Flaubert, James, and other great novelists spread for their prey.

The argument assumes that a job outside the home constitutes self-expression, and without touching upon the inadequacy to that end of most jobs available in our industrial order, or the fact that self-expression is too often crammed into the leisure hours after work, whether that work is done in or outside the home, by men or women, regretfully records the failure of a woman with a husband and three little children to hold one down. Miss Hull is evidently almost overwhelmed by the difficulties and objections though she shows them to be arguable, and though she fully savors the humor involved in its being considered quite the thing for a woman to leave her children in the evening when her husband wants her to go out with him, but criminally negligent for her to leave them in the daytime to do some valuable work. And eventually she lets this particular woman be defeated and driven back to the approved domestic drudgery because the objections to her working career are held to be valid by the people with whom she lives. In the words of the introductory fable, Ariadne would not have been able to slay the monster without the help of Theseus, and the modern Theseus won't help. Or as Catherine's staunch feminist friend sums it up, "Women can't alone. Not without men helping them. Being willing to help them," a conclusion which one doubts on the lips of any feminist, since it is so at variance with the facts in woman's long struggle to win for herself the right to a personal life other than that she lives through her husband and children.

It is a serious defect in the book that it generalizes from individual and limited grounds. Charles may still be the typical man, but if so it ought to be possible for women to laugh him out of existence in the next half-dozen years, for Miss Hull shows him childish, petulant, a philanderer who wants a wife always at hand so that he can creep back to her to be mothered whenever his clandestine affairs strike rough going. In short, woman must give up trying to stand alone not because she is unable to do so, but because man needs her for a crutch.

There are other exaggerations. Children are more open to reason than the exigencies of this argument permit us to believe, and quite susceptible to pride in their mothers' outside achievements. It is difficult also to believe that all of Catherine's $250 a month salary need have been absorbed by her domestic substitutes, since the same brains which made her a successful investigator might have been supposed to enable her to run her house successfully by proxy.

The book reinforces the belief that the whole matter is a problem chiefly because we have struggled with it as such. Let once the generalization be accepted that it is fitting and desirable for a woman as for a man to have substantial activities outside her home, and the problem vanishes. That is not to say that life immediately becomes a charted, easy affair, only that it is not necessarily more complicated by a mother with a job than by a mother without one. Possibly less so, if we are to believe the educators who tell us that one of a child's greatest handicaps is a too devoted mother. For if a woman is to find her only self-expression through the personalities of others, it follows that she may commit the unpardonable sin of remolding those personalities to make them express her.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Nature and Nurture Anthropology. By A. L. Kroeber. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

MAN, to the anthropologists, is a being whose distinguishing trait is that he has everywhere and always built up around himself an environment of traditional ideas, material adjustments and institutions, which transcends the individual as it transcends the physical processes in which it is ultimately rooted. This environment, or "culture," we are peculiarly ignorant about. We tend to explain its manifestations in terms of individual psychology, or of misapplied biology. Habitually we do not take into account at all the existence of cultures different from our own. Even in realms where provincialism would not be tolerated if it reached the light of day, we nevertheless are content to limit history to the story of our own antecedents around the Mediterranean basin, and to accept in sociology "laws" that are obviously applicable only to our own moment of white civilization.

Mr. Kroeber's book is a most stimulating presentation of the knowledge and lack of knowledge at the present time concerning these processes of cultural growth and diffusion. It is full of matter, but a book nevertheless so easily and intelligently presented, pervaded by so individual and wise an insight, expressed in so rare a surety of phrase that it stands high among those books to which the intelligent non-professional reader may go to discover the results of modern research.

The fundamental question, as Mr. Kroeber conceives it, to which the labors of anthropology are directed, is in how far the forces at work in civilization are cultural, and in how far organic or due to heredity; what is due to nurture, in the rhyming phrase, and what to nature. It is first of all necessary to be able to recognize those elements that are received from tradition, those which are ours because we have been brought up in a particular group or country. Only then can we presume to discuss that residue which is due to heredity and to the psychology of the individual.

Thus, in his discussion of race problems, he is fundamentally concerned with stripping off the cultural factors that have entered into the history of the great divisions of mankind, leaving in the end, as the total remainder of all the noise and shouting, nothing more than a problem of qualitative differences as yet unproved. He considers it as in the highest degree probable that congenital differences can ultimately be shown to exist in the mental as well as in the physical make-up of races, but no approach to the problem has yet been made the results of which may not be explained as due to facts of culture.

Culture plays a prominent part in what so often passes loosely as the biological problem of race, and Mr. Kroeber shows that it plays an equally important role in matters that are just as likely to be explained in terms of individual psychology. The seven-day week is not an instinctive need of mankind, nor even the logical consequence of man's early observations of the passing of the sun and moon around the earth, but an arbitrary invention of one time and place, spread in several thousand years over the face of the globe. So also the arch and the alphabet; among all except one of the innumerable peoples who make use of them, that use is explained by the fact of diffusion or borrowing, and the problem involved is one of the social acceptance of a cultural trait.

The book, however, is not consistently focused upon the author's stated goal of the interpretation of the relations between the social and the organic forces in civilization. A considerable proportion is a topical presentation of the traditional main concerns of anthropology; of prehistory, especially, which he has expanded in the last chapters beyond the usual facts of paleolithic man to a rather cursory review of the prehistory of the world. In this Mr. Kroeber follows accurately the history of anthropological preoccupations, but it follows that the promise implied in his definition of the problems of anthropology is relegated for a considerable portion of the book to the role of the incidental and the illustrative. His discussion of aboriginal American culture, especially, where his knowledge is most rich and intimate, is organized toward the task of establishing time sequences and stages. The section on native California religion, which he uses as illustrative of the reconstruction of undocumented history, attempts very little more than a crude equation of space to time—the geographically widely distributed to the ancient, the locally distributed to the modern. Some such equation is of course one of the indispensable tools of such reconstruction, but it is capable of taking a finer edge.

The double approach of which Mr. Kroeber has made use, now from the angle of culture, now from that of time-sequences, makes possible the inclusion of a larger amount of anthropological fact than would have been possible otherwise. He has written the first book to make available both the raw material and the fundamental point of view of modern American anthropology, and he has done it with a felicity of phrase, a sanity, an individuality of outlook that leave us greatly in his debt.

RUTH BENEDICT

"Sport with Human Follies, Not with Crimes"

The Outline of Everything. By Hector B. Toogood. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

Aunt Polly's Story of Mankind. By Donald Ogden Stewart. George H. Doran Company. $2.

The Collector's Whatnot. Compiled by Cornelius Obenchain Van Loo, Milton Kilgallen, and Murgatroyd Elphinstone. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

WE have been told on high authority that "the remedy for democracy is more democracy." It needs no Byzantine logothete to press the analogy and to coin such unimpeachable adages as that "the remedy for misinformation is more misinformation" and "the remedy for ignorance is more ignorance." Acting apparently upon this principle a successful English dramatist and a reputable Royal Academician have been standing sponsors for certain "Outlines" of the world's art and literature from which it is expected that the demos will derive a thin smattering of culturine. I had thought to review these much-advertised "Outlines," but I have been convinced that such talents as I possess as a reviewer are of a serious and sober cast, and the volumes in question can be properly reviewed only by a Master of Burlesque. Perforce I must restrict my comments upon contemporary letters and arts to a few works of serious import, such as the three volumes under consideration. To be sure, the inattentive reader may be deceived into classifying these volumes as burlesques. In reality they are propaganda in favor of good, old-fashioned, much-neglected common sense; and they are cordially to be recommended to subscribers to advanced periodicals, devotees of civic forums, members of women's clubs, patrons of little theaters, visitors to one-man exhibitions, haunters of cozy bookshops, frequenters of odd antique shops, girls with abbreviated heels and hair, men with artistic neckties, and other odd ingredients which boil and simmer on the surface of the American melting-pot.

The learned Doctor Toogood, with the cooperation of Sir J. Arthur Wellswater, Mr. Hugh Jawpole, and other distinguished specialists, has managed to compress an epitome of everything within the compass of a modest volume by means of an ingenious classification of all knowledge into -ologies, -ographies, -osophies, -isms, -onomies, and so forth. Like Bacon, and with similar success, he has taken all knowledge as his province and into this ample domain he introduces the willing reader. His method is that of the elimination of the non-essential. A thorough knowledge of the wombat is an open sesame to the insignificant remaining details of biology. What more need the average cultured reader know of Dante than that he "wrote the 'Divine Comedy,' but it is no joke to read it"? A Day in the Life of an Amoeba makes clear the mystery of evolution. The humble asterisk serves as a satisfactory diagram of the appearance of the planets. A distinguished authority contributes, for a stupendous emolument, a special article on Me and the Great War. I have mentioned but a few features of this invaluable compilation. True, the editors may not have succeeded in their high-hearted undertaking. Some readers may close this book without knowing everything; but upon their hitherto purblind faculties will have dawned some appreciation of that neglected and misprized but, by some of us, ardently desiderated quality, the aforesaid common sense.

I have sometimes wondered what sort of precipitate remains upon the infantile intelligences that have been held for a time suspended in the solutions concocted by Mr. Van Loon. Mr. Donald Ogden Stewart has tackled that problem in his satirical outline of progress, which is the second volume on my list. The wealthy Aunt Polly undertakes to "do something for" the three children of her less fortunate sister; and in a series of instructive afternoons tells them the story of mankind from the amoeba, through the cave man, the Egyptian, the Greek, Roman, and Crusader, to that apex of modernity upon which her husband, bulwarked between bank and church, is comfortably and complacently perched. The edifying narrative suffers certain changes as it passes through the alembic of the children's imagination; and it emerges in their games and squabbles, studies, chatter, and other activities as something rich and strange. Inconvenient questions are propounded; problems in childish casuistry are mooted that shock Aunt Polly; her effort to organize an army of Christian scouts, under the banner of the cross, breaks up in a free-for-all fight. Mr. Stewart has seen very far into the minds of children; nor are his portraits of adult characters less admirable. The millionaire banker; his spoiled, priggish, cry-baby of a son; his skeptical young nephew and nieces; the captain in the American Legion who drills the scouts; the successful clergyman—such a good sport, so liberal, so clever—who is honorary chaplain: these and other figures are deftly drawn. And the background of plushy elegance, limousines, and country clubs is thoroughly in keeping.

These two books may do some good. Alas! I fear that the mission upon which the authors of "The Collector's Whatnot" have set out is a hopeless one. The fads and follies of the collector are past hope and past cure. His eagerness, his greed, his willingness to descend to trickery, his pretended expertise, his credulity, his gullibility, his self-styled superior taste, his pose of aestheticism—all are beyond the reach of the sword of common sense and the silvery arrows of the Comic Spirit. He wears the enchanted armor of the elect. His good breeding conceals his scorn; and he turns away to his bibelots and petiteries, his dingy antimacassars and rickety whatnots, confident in the possession of "that personal taste that is distinctive" and murmuring in well-modulated tones: "They do not know; they cannot understand."

SAMUEL C. CHEW

The Old and the New

Jealousy, Enemies, The Law of the Savage. By Mikhail Petrovich Artzybasheff. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

A Week. By Iury Libedinsky. B. W. Huebsch. $1.50.

TO feel the force of Mr. Ransome's statement, in his introduction to "A Week," that here is something new out of Russia, read Artzybasheff's three plays on marriage. For here is something old enough to make almost anything seem new: old situations—marital quarrels, assignations, discoveries, deceptions, crimes of passion; old familiar characters reminiscent of his pre-revolutionary books—the student with tuberculosis, the pessimistic old doctor, journalists, officers, idle and aimless women; hoary old generalizations about men and women, particularly women, which boil down to some biological truism like "men are men" and "women are women."

It is apparently for the sake of the generalizations about sex and marriage that the plays were written. It isn't enough that the characters should express them, appropriately enough, out of their own emotional exasperations. The author has set them all forth in the preface, with the result that we begin to read the plays with a predisposition to argue, not to feel. Here are a few: woman isn't the same sort of human being as man (though she is a human being, it is conceded); they inhabit entirely different worlds; sexual desire builds a narrow bridge across the chasm; no matter how much husband and wife may love each other, they will, remarkably enough, always remain man and woman; a happy marriage is impossible, for man and woman are separated by an abyss of mutual misunderstanding; it would be possible only if the two sexes became absolutely alike in their modes of life, their physical and spiritual characteristics, and their reactions toward other people; "otherwise marriage becomes but a series of compromises and mutual concessions, which invariably infringe on the most precious right of a human being—personal liberty."

Is any human relationship free from compromise and concession? And how extraordinarily dull if any two people became identical! One incidental phrase is more significant than all the generalizations: "just as it is indecent and terrible that the spiritual life of man should be so closely linked with his animal needs . . ."—hatred and fear of the body. No psychoanalyst would pass by that admission without scenting a complex.

Most of the situations in the plays arise out of the assumption expressed by the author and his characters both, that men want only one thing from women—instead of the thousands of things they actually do want; and that the only problem of marriage is sexual fidelity. Only in "Enemies" is there any recognition of other factors. An elderly professor and his wife play a variation on the theme dear to Strindberg and Hauptmann, that the creative genius of the man is often frustrated by marriage. "Geniuses are unhappy married"—"And so are their wives," retorted Mr. Dooley.

The professor is far more interesting than the cynic and sensualist who betrays his friends and seduces his wife's sister and finally murders the man to whom his wife had gone to take revenge in kind on her husband ("Law of the Savage"); or the Othello who goes nearly insane because he can't tell whether his wife is lying or not—it was fairly obvious she was—and strangles her ("Jealousy"). After these performances it is an immense relief to turn to "A Week," where people kill one another for other reasons than sex and where the author is not trying to prove anything. It is this last virtue—the absence of propaganda either revolutionary or counter-revolutionary—that Mr. Ransome, surveying the field of recent Russian literature, finds encouraging.

The young author takes a minor incident of the hostility in the provinces between town and country, communists and peasants, and handles his carefully selected group of Whites and Reds as if they were all simple human beings. Fresh and sincere as his treatment is, he doesn't really break with the old tradition. One is reminded of Chekhov, Dostoevski, Tolstoi. Of Chekhov, for instance, in the picture of the little town, which hides a timorous dislike of all change and stir; "the life of the people who live in these crowded houses is like a gray September day, when a drizzle of rain sounds monotonously on the window, and through the panes, lined with the running drops, you can see a gray railing and a red calf wandering in the mud." And there is a scene in the snowy forest, when five naked White Guards are executed, which thrills like similar scenes in "The Possessed" and "The Seven Who Were Hanged." To the young Communist who took part in the horror, life suddenly became meaningless, as it did to Tolstoi's Pierre, when he watched men executed. It was a frozen nightmare and afterwards, "it is just as if the blood of those naked White Guards had splashed my soul. They stick in my memory, undressing in the light of the moon, their trembling naked bodies, the rattle of the shots, and their groans." This is powerful, but not new. The book is not so much the literary pioneering that Mr. Ransome calls it as literary salvage.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

A Fairy Romance

Billy Barnicoat; a Fairy Romance for Young and Old. By Greville MacDonald. Illustrated by Francis D. Bedford. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

GREVILLE MACDONALD, son of George MacDonald, is a magician in his own right. Heir to "At the Back of the North Wind," "The Princess and the Goblin," and "The Princess and Curdie," he adds to his inheritance a fresh creation of character and incident. He conjures with moonshine and sunshine. His fancy, now wild and whimsical, now beautiful and tender, plays with true flesh and blood and with shadowy creatures of a wonder-world. A mermaid, the white-maned horses of the sea, the witch's cat Kreepiclaw, Billy's own Caroline with her sensible cat's talk are all convincing—"as real as pilchards." Mr. MacDonald's way of combining humor with realism and fancy is straightforward and charming. As far as I know nothing like this book has happened before. A child discovers here for us a world of human experience.

The story is localized in Cornwall, where Jack-the-Giant-Killer was born—a region unique for wild scenery and simple legend and a most suitable setting for a fairy romance. Greville MacDonald knows Cornwall intimately and finds there the real human personalities necessary for his purpose. He has taken as his thesis a Spanish proverb, "'Tis Love makes all ranks equal," and proves it by bringing a high-born "Papisher" soul into contact with primitive Methodist fisher people.

The baby boy cast ashore with other treasure from the wreck of the "Maria Santissima" was rescued by Rachel Hornisyde, wife of the fisherman Jacob Hornisyde, and taken to live with them in Primrose Cottage. They gave him the name Billy Barnicoat. As the boy grew older he got his bearings in the Cornish environment, which, strangely enough, suited his Spanish temperament admirably. His adventurous spirit was rough at times and ready for the buffeting of the storms that rage along the rocky coast. We feel the close bond between the wind's will and the boy's will. Billy often heard Aunt Rachel's neighbors say: "He come on the wave an' he'll go on the wind," so he took it for granted that sometime he would be off on the wings of the wind and was ready when the time came.

Sometimes his mischief brought him into conflict with the elemental human nature of Jacob Hornisyde, a strong man who had "found religion." That often meant a "lerruping" for Billy—all for the good of his soul. But the triumph at the end of the book is Billy's when he succeeds in changing his Wrongs into Rights because he has conquered his own soul. Then Billy, a small boy, and Jacob, a veritable giant in his sea boots, meet as man to man on the common ground of their nobility. Their rank is equal.

Greville MacDonald understands the poetry and the whimsy in a boy's nature. He plays in Cornwall like a boy himself. Among the rocks dreaded by sailors but prized by wreckers—and by authors whose trade is romance and adventure—he finds a smugglers' cave, a shipwreck, and a Piskie Town buried in the sand. His aunt Merrymaid has flopped into the story straight from ballads centuries old, sung by lusty sailors and fishermen of the coast.

We see and feel far Cornwall in Francis Bedford's pictures, which interpret the lore of Cornishmen and the author's fancy gloriously.

Children eight years old (Billy's age when he began "plotting") are ready for their own adventures. Some like one kind and some another. The important thing is to give all children their chance to enjoy such a book as "Billy Barnicoat," which is as simple as its title and as profound as life itself.

HARRIET SABRA WRIGHT

Books in Brief

Illini Poetry, 1918-1923. Edited by Bruce Weirick. Covici-McGee Company. $2.

Collected Verse by The Poetry Club of the University of Chicago. With an Introduction by Robert Morss Lovett. Covici-McGee Company. $2.

These two anthologies from the leading universities of that State which has produced Edgar Lee Masters, Vachel Lindsay, and Carl Sandburg are an indication among other things that poetry still flourishes in the Middle West, and flourishes widely there. Much of this verse is merely on the level of American college verse generally, and that at present is high; but the best of it is remarkably vigorous and original. T. P. Bourland and Lois Seyster Montross at the University of Illinois easily stand first in both collections, but Janet Loxley Lewis, Jessica Nelson North, and Elizabeth Madox Roberts at the University of Chicago are represented by pieces of genuine and native distinction.

Aspects of Jewish Life and Thought. Letters of Benammi. Bernard G. Richards Company. $2.50.

There is very little of Jewish life or Jewish thought in the writings of Mr. Benammi. This is Judaism of the canned variety served on a platter of very primitive design. The Jews are supposed to be pure angels doing nothing but musing over the glory and super-humaneness of their religious inheritance. All who know Jews to be simply human and Judaism as a religion and a church, will read this book (if they ever do) with a feeling of pity for the author's naivete.

The Tapestry of Life. By Raymond Blathwayt. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

This is Mr. Blathwayt's intellectual biography. He is a firm environmentalist, and has omitted no influence, however trivial its outward seeming, which might help to make him a more accountable figure. Mr. Blathwayt is an Englishman, a traveler, actor, raconteur, interlocutor of great men, and a writer. He is pedantically allusive as only an educated Briton can be, and as colloquial as familiar habitation in Hollywood, California, can make him. So his style is, by turn, starched and limp, making the way hard, too often, for both narrative and reader.

The Eighth Wonder, and Other Stories. By A. S. M. Hutchinson. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

These stories are compact and authentic; they have ideas and humor. Some are in the vein of "If Winter Comes," although one or two reveal a greater spiritual depth. Mr. Hutchinson might have expanded them into the dimensions of novels, but as they stand, they are well-considered and adroitly constructed narratives carrying no excess baggage.

ORIENTALIA

The Only Shop in America Dealing
Exclusively in Books on the East

The following catalogues and lists may now be had free on application:

*Books on the Arts and Crafts
of Asia
Books on China and Japan
Books on Mythology and Folklore
Books of Voyages and Travel to the East from Earliest Times
New Holiday list of books
List of Oriental art objects and textiles suitable for gifts*

ORIENTALIA

32 West 58th Street New York City

E. WEYHE

Art Books in all Languages

794 Lexington Ave.

New York.

Paintings by Alfred H. Maurer;
Watercolors and etchings by Arthur
B. Davies and other modern artists.

Catalogues sent.

Drama

"The Miracle"

THE DRAMA can pierce to one's soul through many mediums. The simplest words of a brief play on bare boards can seem to say all there is to say about existence; so much converges in a single character that his whisper or his cry brings all the universe singing against the breast like an arrow. Yet exactly the same poignancy may be achieved by opposite means, and it has been so achieved by Max Reinhardt at the Century Theater. "The Miracle" is not merely vast and bold, as any good spectacle must be; it is what the few great spectacles on record are—it is subtle. The wealth of Morris Gest, the genius in design of Norman-Bel Geddes, and the art of the incomparable German have combined to create a picture of life which in the very quality of its completeness strikes intensely upon the mind.

The audience sits almost disregarded in the nave of a medieval cathedral whose solid columns soar out of sight in a dusk only accentuated by hanging lamps. Great windows of stained glass glow softly overhead and behind the reredos, and from some undiscoverable place an organ fills the church—it is never a theater—with appropriate sound. For half an hour the candles at the feet of the Virgin burn white and silent in their solitude; then two processions of nuns rustle along the cloister walks that flank the audience and swarm before the altar, preparing for the ceremony to come. A tall abbess instructs the young Sister Megildis in her new duties as Sacristan, and the tone of her authority is echoed by the jangling of bells far aloft in the darkness.

Now the main procession floods the aisles, and it is this, more than anything else in "The Miracle," that overwhelms. The reason is not so much that hundreds of people participate, or that they are costumed to the point of perfect convincingness, as that they represent an old and important world come back to life. These Crusaders with their sloping shoulders, these awed villagers, these creeping nuns, these knights in cumbersome armor, these little girls in meek dresses, with small daisies in their hair—all these long-dead people are marching toward the Virgin, and they are gazing at her with simple and equal and adoring eyes. After seven centuries their desire is real again; together they approach the thing through wanting which they have forgotten that they exist; and the spectator's sudden sense of containing so much life within his separate soul is likely at this point to be too much for him.

The spectacle is never again so powerful. There follows the long story of Megildis—the story already familiar to many through Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice" and John Davidson's "Ballad of a Nun." Her seven years away from the church in the service of Life the Piper are necessarily rapid and confused; and Reinhardt is certainly right in making them prevailingly grotesque, with their Robber Counts, their Princes, their Emperors, their battles and feasts and mobs. But unity of course is missing; the spectacle becomes a spectacle, and the audience is at liberty to admire its magnificent variety. Only at the end does it draw back into itself, with the return of Megildis to the cathedral where the Virgin has taken her place, and where she discovers that her experiences elevate her almost to sainthood.

Lady Diana Manners as the Virgin is at all times profoundly touching. Her slow, pale movements and her inviolable gravity make the adoration of the crowd a credible thing. The crowd in every case is adequate to its situation. Rosamond Pinchot plays Megildis impetuously and beautifully, though now and then with a slight stiffness, perhaps because of her inexperience. Mariska Aldrich as the Abbess is memorably stern. Rudolph Schildkraut is at once blunt and fine in the person of the insane Emperor. And over all these the ever-present Piper, Werner Krauss, performs a particularly difficult role with supreme skill.

MARK VAN DOREN

LECTURES AND AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents
FAY Bainter in
"THE OTHER ROSE"
with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 45th Street
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

BELMONT

48 St. E. of B'way
Evs. 8:30. Mats.
Thur. & Sat. 2:30

4th
Month
tarnish

"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."—Ludwig Lewisohn,
THE NATION.

"One play
in a thousand"

Alexander Woolcott
in the Herald

Outward Bound

with a Distinguished Cast
at the

RITZ THEATRE

West 48 St. Evs. 8:30.
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

PRINCESS THEATRE
39th Street
east of Broadway. Evenings, 8:45. Matinees
Thurs. and Sat., 2:45.

SUN UP

By LULA VOLLMER

With
LUCILLE LA VERNE

YIDDISH ART THEATRE

27th St. and
Madison Ave.

Maurice Swartz, Director
Abraham Goldfaden's classic comedy revival
"THE TWO KOONY LAMMELS"
Premier performance, Friday, 8:30
Also Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!

DAVID BELASCO Presents

LIONEL BARRYMORE

with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Evs. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Theat., 41st St., W. of Broadway, Evs., 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander
Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

Every Eve. (except Mon.)
Matinee on Saturday.

"This
Fine-Pretty World
BY PERCY MACKAYE
IS

a brilliant, subtle and altogether unusual comedy."

—Edwin Arlington Robinson.

"The play has the feel of authenticity and the smell of the soil."—GLENN FRANK, Editor of The Century.

Last Performance, Sunday evening, January 27

Orchestra $1.50. Balcony $1. Telephone Dry Dock 7516.

BROADHURST Theatre, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:30
RICHARD BENNETT in
THE DANCERS
"I have not seen a better play than 'The Dancers' for a long while."
—JOHN BARRYMORE.

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL DINNER

7 P.M., Jan. 28, 200 Fifth Ave.

Speakers

Prof. Morris Cohen
Dr. J. H. Holmes
Rabbi Stephen Wise

Dr. P. S. Grant
Mr. O. G. Villard
Rev. E. B. Chaffee

Dr. Will Durant, Chairman

Tickets $2.00

RAND SCHOOL

Courses beginning

Feb. 1, 8:40 P.M. Horace Kallen

"Religious Character of Social Programs"

Feb. 5, 7:00 P.M. Margaret Daniels

"Elementary Psychology"

Feb. 6, 8:40 P.M. Clement Wood

"What's Right with Modern Poetry?"

Feb. 8, 7:30 & 8:40 P.M. Scott Nearing

"Methods in Sociology"

"Applied Sociology"

Feb. 9, 11:00 A.M., 3:15 P.M. Scott Nearing

"Social Values"

"Social Revolution"

Write for Bulletin.

BERTRAND RUSSELL lectures postponed to April 5 and 12SATURDAY CAMERADERIE

Every week at 4 P.M.

People's House, 7 East 15th St., New York

Jan. 26th

Author's Reading

Zona Gale

Four lectures on Current Drama

H. W. L. DANA, PILD.

Feb. 2 Saint Joan and Shaw

Feb. 9 The Pirandello Plays

Feb. 16 The Molnar Plays

Feb. 23 Subject to be voted by audience

Admission 25 cents

SPECIAL LECTURES

Under the Auspices of the Students Co-operative Association
At the New School for Social Research, 465 W. 23 St., N.Y.

Friday, February 1st and February 8th—8:20 P. M.

Two Lectures

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS—SECRET DIPLOMACY

Mr. Sidney B. Fay, Professor of History, Smith College

Admission $1.25

Saturday, January 26th—8:20 P. M.

THE MODERN NEWSPAPER—
ITS STRENGTH AND WEAKNESSMr. Bruce Bliven, Associate Editor New Republic, former Editor The Globe

Admission 50c

Saturday, February 2nd—8:20 P. M.

THE MELLON PLAN

Dr. David Friday

Tax Expert, Special Investigator, Federal Reserve Board, Ex-President Michigan Agricultural College

Admission 50c

International Relations Section

Italian Labor on the Rocks

By PAUL BLANSHARD

BEHIND a large flat desk in an office in Rome sits Edmond Rossoni, former leader of the I.W.W. in New York, now head of the Fascist unions of Italy. He is rotund and affable. "Yes," he says, "I know Mr. Gompers very well. You know we stand for the same thing as the American Federation of Labor—a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. It is a great mistake to assume that Mussolini is an enemy of labor; he is only opposed to international labor, not to labor that supports the nation. . . ."

"Yes, the government gives us protection. We have nearly two million members now. We will start a daily newspaper soon. Mussolini has given us permission. . . ."

Rossoni is like a figure in a picture puzzle. The whole Italian labor movement is in the puzzle and it is a puzzle without a key. There are no precedents to go by in analyzing the present situation. Fascism, which is itself a most complex movement, has been superimposed upon one of the most complex labor movements in Europe. The result can be compared to a camera film that has been twice exposed.

Three years ago Italy appeared to be following Russia. The seizure of the factories by workers led to wild prophecies by gullible journalists. The economic life of Italy was disorganized by constant strikes. In the spring of 1921 when the Confederation of Labor held its first national congress after the war the labor line-up was roughly as follows: The Confederation of Labor, which was definitely socialist, had about 2,000,000 members, not counting the independent federation of sailors and the Catholic unions, which had considerable strength in the Northern textile mills. The unions showed a marvelous and rapid growth. They trebled their strength in the years immediately after the war. Unlike the unions in England and America they had actually lost membership during the war. Along with the sudden growth of the unions there was a sudden and substantial growth of the Socialist Party, which at that time was the leading party in Italy with 156 members in Parliament. There was a feeling of expectancy in the air; it was taken for granted that capitalism in Italy was passing through its final stage. The Confederation of Labor voted down the Communists by 3 to 1, but the vote did not express opposition to revolution. It expressed a desire for an Italian revolution with no Moscow yardstick.

Then came Fascism. The Fascisti smashed the unions, they smashed the cooperatives, they smashed the Socialist Party. In the name of national safety they killed and castor-oiled and battered some of the best men in the Italian labor movement. They confiscated property ruthlessly and destroyed every independent daily newspaper in Italy. Far from being the motion-picture heroes described by the Saturday Evening Post, they often attacked the weakest places in the Italian labor movement, leaving alone the most dangerous revolutionary centers. Nominally, they were out to save Italy from communism, actually they spent their time putting labor in its place. They were successful in their campaign partly because of their own strength and partly because of the lack of capable leadership in the labor movement.

It is over a year now since Mussolini assumed dictatorship in Italy after the march on Rome. The year has been one of rapid and necessary readjustment for all those forces opposed to Fascism. In the industrial field the labor army is divided into three sections, the Confederation of Labor (Confederazione Generale del Lavoro), the Fascisti Federation (Confederazione delle Corporazioni Sindacali Fasciste), and the Catholic Federation (Confederazione Generale dei Lavoratori Italiani).

The Confederation of Labor, although reduced to about 400,000 members, still remains the most representative body of Italian workers in the industrial field. Even in normal times the figures of dues-paying membership among Italian workers are not of great significance. Italians are not noted dues-payers either in the United States or at home. The Confederation of Labor with some 400,000 members probably represents several million workers who are more or less loyal to its ideals, but who could not be officially connected at the present time without danger of battered heads. The confederation is not merely a convention of labor but a union of unions with power to call a national general strike. In 1919 it ordered a national general strike for the eight-hour day, but no strike was necessary because the Government yielded to its demand. It includes a few powerful national unions of metal workers, building workers, printers, electrical workers, street workers, and the fragments of many more. It also includes the city chambers of labor, which resemble our central trades and labor councils with this exception, that the Italian city chambers of labor have been vigorously revolutionary for many years. They have the power to call municipal general strikes and they have not hesitated to call such strikes for industrial and political reasons. During 1920 and 1921 the life of Milan was completely paralyzed on a number of occasions by municipal strikes ordered by the Milan Chamber of Labor.

The Confederation of Labor is now officially independent of the Socialist Party, having withdrawn its support last year when the Socialist Party expelled the reformists. In fact, the Confederation of Labor is run by the right-wing Socialists, who were expelled from the Socialist Party. Headed by Ludovico d'Aragona, the general secretary, these leaders have been maneuvering for some kind of cooperation with Mussolini, enough cooperation so that the local unions may be saved from further smashing. Mussolini has met them more than half way. The issue came to a head in a special convention of labor officials called by the Confederation of Labor in Milan in the last few days of August. The officials did not dare to call a great congress of workers for fear of Fascist raids upon the assembly and of Fascist persecution of local delegates. They changed their meeting-place twice in Milan and shifted the hour of assemblage, excluding all newspaper representatives. In spite of great pressure by the leaders the convention opposed actual cooperation with Mussolini and passed a meaningless resolution allowing "technical" cooperation. This means that Mussolini cannot pull the teeth of the Confederation of Labor by giving it a seat in his cabinet. In spite of the wobbling of the leaders the confederation remains the bulwark of working-class opposition to Fascism.

Meanwhile, the members of the confederation unions are not allowed to strike or to picket. They are intimidated by the employers and by the Government. But the confederation unions have grown in strength since last spring. In a recent election of a works' committee in the Fiat automobile plant in Turin the confederation leaders secured an overwhelming majority of votes although less than half of the workers belonged to the union.

The confederation has one great organic weakness: the railroad workers on the chief Italian railroads are not included. They have an independent union of their own which in the past has been rated as one of the most revolutionary of Italian unions. The absence of the railroad workers and the fact that Italy has practically no miners leaves the confederation without the two great mainstays of the labor movement of other countries.

The Fascist unions might well serve as a model for the industrial relations committees of our chambers of commerce. Their literature reeks of company-union propaganda. One can almost hear Governor Allen speaking at the employees' dinner of the J. Stuart Smith Company of Keokuk while the faithful beneficiaries nod in well-combed satiety. "We stand for a realistic national unionism which recognizes the benefits of productive discipline, subordinates right to duty, and associates the destiny of labor with the destiny of the nation." (Official declaration.)

The Fascist unions have divided Italy into categories. The class struggle is abolished: it is superseded by the cooperation of categories. On the land, for example, there are three categories all in the Fascist unions: the farmers who work their own land, foremen and managers, and farm workers. They are never supposed to fight. "We do not believe in strikes," a Fascist leader assured me. "We settle our disputes by negotiation." The Fascist unions have recently made an agreement with the National Federation of Employers and Mussolini has issued a decree which will enforce contracts between employers and Fascist unions. The employers and the workers are to deposit money with the local government and the side which violates the contract first loses the money.

The Fascist unions have not gained many recruits from the city proletariat except the employees of local Fascist administrations. Scarcely any chambers of labor have gone over to Fascism in spite of the campaign of terrorism. The strength of the Fascist unions lies in the rural districts where the largest union in Italy, the Federation of Farm Workers, has gone over bodily to Fascism. This union with a membership of 850,000, constituted almost half of the Confederation of Labor, and it constitutes much more than half of the working-class membership of the Fascist unions today. It went over to Fascism chiefly because its members were helpless against Fascist raids when the farm owner cooperated to destroy the union.

The Fascist unions include all sorts of professional associations in their categories—doctors, lawyers, and midwives. They include thousands of foremen. They are organized in a highly centralized machine with Rossoni as dictator; he has the power to appoint or remove every secretary of every local Fascist federation in Italy. But in spite of the anti-strike gospel of the Fascist unions and the large injection of middle-class members, Italy has witnessed several Fascist strikes during recent months. In the province of Padua the Fascist union members rose and armed against the landlords who had formerly sent them against the Socialists. A Fascist strike against the chemical fertilizer trust lasted several months. A Fascist textile strike near Milan attracted some attention. Most of these strikes, like everything else which Mussolini frowns upon, receive scant notice in the press, but they are of great importance because of their effect upon the capitalist support of the Mussolini dictatorship. The landlords of Italy have been bled white in many districts in financing the activities of local Fascist hands: they are as fed up with Fascism as America was fed up with liberty-loan drives five years ago. The accession of many labor elements to the ranks of Fascism and a few Fascist strikes may cause a serious split among the Italian capitalists who are backing Mussolini.

The Catholic unions have lost their importance in the Italian labor situation. Their membership is small and consists chiefly of women in the Northern textile mills. They were organized before the advent of Fascism in order to give to Catholic workers an opportunity of belonging to trade unions which were not definitely socialistic.

In the political field Italian labor is as hopelessly divided as in the industrial field. The Socialist Party, which had already been devastated by the Fascisti, was finally split in two last year on the rock of Moscow. Since then the Socialist Party has had another split, also on the rock of Moscow. Today there are the reformists (Partito Socialista Unitario) with two daily newspapers in Milan and Naples, the regular Socialist Party with the great daily Avanti, which has maintained much of its strength through all the storms, and "the fusionists," headed by Serrati, who has been expelled from the Socialist Party for continuing to attack and criticize it in his independent weekly Le Pagine Rosse. The reformists have most of the big leaders of socialism and they also have the Confederation of Labor, but Avanti continues to be the paper of the Italian revolutionary proletariat. The Communists have been almost destroyed as a party, although they still have several Communist deputies in Parliament. The old syndicalists have disappeared, some of them going to the Communists and some to the Fascisti.

Meanwhile, Mussolini dominates Parliament with only a handful of bona fide Fascist delegates and many small parties. The two largest parties in Parliament, the Socialist and the Catholics, are both officially opposed to Fascism and might command enough votes to overthrow Mussolini, but they cannot agree upon a suitable compromise policy. Of the Socialist delegates in Parliament the reformists have about twice as many as the regular Socialists. A reunion of Socialist forces is not altogether impossible if the council of saner leaders in both wings prevails. A coalition Socialist government backed by the Catholic Party seems to be the one plausible alternative to Fascist domination. The Catholic Party is attacked by the Fascist journals with the same bitterness that marks the attack on the Socialist parties. In July several Catholic papers were sacked and burned because the Catholic Party would not play Mussolini's game.

But, while local Fascist bands are fighting the Catholic Party, Mussolini is successfully playing politics with the Vatican. He has reestablished the teaching of religion in the schools and reinstated the crucifix in the classrooms. The church is putting its money on both horses, hoping that when Fascism and Socialism have killed each other off, the church may come in and dominate the scene with a humanitarian, middle-of-the-road program.

In spite of Mussolini's promises the condition of the Italian workers is deplorable. Real wages are low and they are going lower, especially in northern Italy. Although Italy is one of the worst countries in the world for statistics, it is possible to glean some general notion of wages from the reports of the Cassa Nazionale Infortuni, the government organization for workmen's compensation. The average wage of those workers who received workmen's compensation for injury in 1922 was 18.22 lire a day, which means that their wages will certainly not buy any more in Italy than $10 a week would buy in America. As exchange goes now it is about $5 a week. It is true that Mussolini has maintained the eight-hour day even on the farm, but the workers won this right originally through the unions.

The struggle between Fascism and Socialism is confined almost entirely to north and central Italy. Southern Italy continues to sleep in the sun, its village civilization quite apart from the industrialism of the north. Mussolini uses the south as conservative ballast in much the same way that a Northern Democratic President in the United States takes the South for granted. In both cases illiteracy is an important ingredient in political sluggishness. In north and central Italy the illiteracy ranges from 16 to 37 per cent (no statistics guaranteed). In south Italy and Sicily the illiteracy ranges from 50 to 58 per cent. The Socialist vote corresponds quite remarkably to the literacy of the people.

Originally the Fascisti were simply white guards out to crush the threatened revolution. Today there are indications that the whole basis of Fascism is shifting to an economic liberalism which will offer to labor all the most attractive substitutes for revolutionary unionism that can be found. Mussolini is making the most strenuous efforts to assume the role of defender of the nation and not defender of the capitalist class. If he succeeds in holding his capitalist support, Italy will be the scene of a great struggle between two types of labor thought, revolutionary-internationalism and patriotic cooperation.

The Janina Murders

WE print below the text of the report made by the special commission sent to Janina by the Ambassadors' Conference to supervise the Greek inquiry into the murders of the Italian delegation to the Greek-Albanian Frontier Commission. The Manchester Guardian of December 20 comments on the report and the decision of the Ambassadors in these words:

The Ambassadors' Conference appointed the commission on the express condition that its report should be forwarded to the Court of International Justice at the Hague, and that the Hague Tribunal should thereon decide what proportion of the fifty million lire deposited by Greece should be forfeited by her for her responsibility in the outrages. On the strength of this assurance Greece accepted the commission. The Ambassadors' Conference, however, never referred the report to the Hague, but on its own responsibility declared the whole fifty million lire forfeit. In so doing it went back on its word and by implication saddled the Greek Government with full responsibility for the murders. It had no evidence before it save that of the report which we publish today. Even if the report had found Greece clearly guilty, that would have been no excuse for taking the final decision out of the hands of the Hague Court. But, in fact, the report does nothing of the kind. The commission had only ten days in which to investigate, and reported that "it could not hope to elucidate the mystery" in that time, though it believed it was "getting near the truth." . . . Altogether the report is a document upon which no self-respecting tribunal would pass sentence, and clearly was not intended to be taken as such, for the commissioners at the end of the report suggest the proper procedure for pursuing the inquiry further. The Ambassadors' Conference had no right to arrogate to itself the right of judging, since it had already conveyed that right to the Hague. Least of all had it the right to judge on the strength of such evidence as the commission here brings forward. That it should not have dared to publish the evidence is natural, but confirms the belief that it acted, and knew that it acted, not in a spirit of justice, but in a spirit of base political expediency.

The text of the report follows:

By its decision of September 8, 1923, the Conference of Ambassadors decided to send to Janina a special commission composed of delegates from France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan under the presidency of the Japanese delegate to control the inquiry operations carried out by the Greek Government with a view to the discovery of the authors of the outrage committed on August 27, 1923, against the Italian delegation to the commission for the delimitation of the Greek-Albanian frontier.

The Interallied Control Commission in Epirus, composed of Colonel Shibouya (president), Japan; Colonel Beaud, Italy; Lieutenant Colonel Lacombe, France; Commander Harence, Great Britain, was constituted at Janina on September 17 and immediately mapped out in its main lines the general plan of its work. [Here follows a list of the witnesses from whom the commission obtained evidence on which the report was based.]

FIRST REPORT

In conformity with the instructions received from the Conference of Ambassadors, the commission on September 22 telegraphed to that conference the result of the observations made by it in the course of the first five days of its work. In the first report the commission formulated its findings as follows:

At the present stage of its labors, both by reason of the difficulties and of the complexity of the problem to be solved, the Interallied Commission of Janina cannot yet formulate a firm, definite, and unanimous opinion on the responsibilities incurred in the outrage of August 27. From evidence collected and from observations made by the commission it follows that—

1. The crime was prepared and carried out in conditions so minutely studied that clearly it is a case either of a political crime or of a vendetta carried out against General Tellini, in which the other victims were sacrificed by the assassins only for the purpose of removing all the witnesses of the deed.

2. The inquiry carried out by the Hellenic authorities after the crime certainly shows cases of negligence on the part of those authorities, but the observations made up to this date are not complete or decisive enough to allow the commissioners to judge whether the Greek Government ought to be held responsible for the negligences revealed or whether these negligences are the result of the defective organization of a police administration which disposes of imperfect means of criminal investigation. For the moment the Italian commissioner for reasons more particularly of a moral order inclines rather to the first hypothesis, while the other commissioners incline to the second.

3. Search for the culprits: On this head also the commission has established several cases of Greek negligence, but it ought to be pointed out that on the one part the atmosphere of mystery and fear which surrounds the crime, and on the other part the nature of the territory, make investigations difficult.

4. The commission is actively pursuing its investigations, and is making energetic representations to the Greek authorities to continue the search for the culprits.

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT

From September 22 to 27, the date on which it was asked to return to Paris to give an account of its work, the commission prosecuted its investigations and its researches both in Epirus and in Albania. It is able to define as follows the results of its findings:

BEFORE THE CRIME

(a) A fairly violent press campaign was launched before the crime against General Tellini, who was accused by public opinion of unfairly favoring Albania to the detriment of Greece in the work of delimiting the frontier between these two countries. The Hellenic Government appears not to have exerted itself to put a stop to this campaign or to calm down opinion, which had been stirred up by excited patriots.

(a1) The Governor General of Epirus and the authorities of Janina were aware of rumors which circulated in that town before the outrage of August 27, on the subject of the appearance of bands of brigands in the frontier region toward Kakavia (the point where the route from Janina to Santi Quaranta touches the Greek-Albanian frontier). Several days before the crime the Governor General had advised the Italian Consul not to travel without escort to Santi Quaranta, where he was to embark for Brindisi. Under these conditions it is astonishing that no special measures should have been taken by these same authorities to assure the protection of the Commission of Delimitation in the suspected region.

Even admitting that General Tellini did not ask for an escort, and even if General Tellini had refused an offered escort, it would evidently have been prudent for the Greek authorities to have insisted that General Tellini should accept this escort, and in case the general persisted in his refusal to have asked him to release them from all responsibility.

CONDUCT OF THE INQUIRY

In a general way the commission has established that the Hellenic judicial inquiry has been conducted with all the dispatch made possible by the habitual working methods of the Greek authorities. This inquiry reveals certain important gaps, to which the commission draws the attention of the Conference of Ambassadors.

(b) On the day of the crime the motor-car which carried General Tellini and his companions was preceded, at an interval of a few minutes, by the car of the Albanian delegation. The latter car held five people, not one of whom has been questioned by the examining magistrate of Janina. Their declarations might, however, afford a certain amount of interest.

(b1) The motor-car of General Tellini, at the moment of the outrage, was stopped in the road by a barricade of tree branches which had been placed across the road by the assassins, who were posted in the neighborhood. That barricade would have afforded evidence for the trial; its constituent elements ought to have been preserved so that the finger-prints, which must have been on them, could be taken. It is true that orders were given with this object by the Hellenic authorities, but it appears that they were not precise enough. By the very evening of the crime the branches had disappeared, and were burned by the soldiers of the neighboring Greek post, although there was no shortage of fuel in the brushwood surrounding the post itself.

GREEK RESPONSIBILITY AS REGARDS PURSUIT OF THE CULPRITS

The crime took place on August 27, toward 9 o'clock in the morning. Now the Hellenic military authorities did everything to conceal the news of the outrage from the Albanian delegation which preceded General Tellini's car. During the whole day of the 27th this delegation, ignorant of what had taken place, was surprised at the general's delay in reaching the rendezvous, but the Hellenic military authorities forbade the delegation to return to Janina. It was only at 7 p. m. that the Albanian delegation received the authorization to return to Janina, which it had asked for several times.

Being prevented from traveling by a motor-car breakdown, the Albanian delegation asked the officer in charge at Kakavia to inquire into the reasons for the general's non-arrival. The answer he received was that General Tellini was tired and had returned to Janina with his party. It was only on the following morning that the Albanian delegation was able to find out about the disaster. . . .

It is a matter for surprise that the Albanian delegation, which was only 10 kilometers ($6\frac{1}{4}$ miles) from the place of the crime, was not told of this crime by the Greek authorities, in spite of repeated requests. The officer in charge at Kakavia was close at hand and had a telephone with which he could communicate with the telephonic post of the Battalion Reserve from which was given the order forbidding the Albanian delegation to return to Janina.

It is proper to observe that Kakavia is only 40 kilometers (25 miles) from Argyrocastro, and that an Albanian telephonic post makes communication possible with the chief of police of that town. If, therefore, the Albanian delegation had been informed of the crime as soon as it was discovered, immediate measures could no doubt have been taken on the Albanian as well as on the Greek side of the frontier. . . .

The British delegate observes that if the crime was so carefully concealed from the Albanian delegation it was no doubt because Lieutenant Colonel Botzaris was afraid lest the inhabitants of the Albanian villages near the frontier, in which he perhaps knew there were some of the accomplices of the crime, might take steps to conceal the authors of the assassination and prevent their detection. . . .

It appears that Lieutenant Colonel Botzaris had the entire responsibility for concealing the crime from the Albanian delegation.

(c1) Orders certainly appear to have been given in good time by the Greek military authorities for strengthening the vigilance of the frontier posts and for pursuing the culprits, but these same authorities do not appear to have assured themselves personally of the execution of the orders given by themselves or by their subordinates. . . .

ALBANIAN RESPONSIBILITY

On August 31 an inhabitant of the Albanian village Causi (five to six miles east of Santi Quaranta) named Timio Lollo went and warned the Albanian authorities that a band of thirteen brigands had come into his village, that the chief of this band, Yani Vancho, a man of Greek origin, had admitted to him that he and his band were the authors of the crime, that he had recognized in this band two men also of Greek origin but Albanian subjects named Stefan Cerea and Gola Senitza.

The Albanian authorities of Argyrocastro, as soon as they were made aware of this deposition, dispatched to Causi a detachment of thirty gendarmes. With the exception of Stefan Cerea the brigands escaped toward the Greek frontier, which they succeeded in crossing again, thus passing into Greek territory.

The Albanian authorities did not inform the Greek authorities of the deposition made by Timio Lollo, nor of the events which followed it.

Moreover, on September 12 Stefan Cerea was placed under arrest by the Albanian authorities of Argyrocastro, a fact which again was never reported to the Greek authorities, nor was anything said about it to the Interallied Control Commission when it went to Santi Quaranta on September 17.

COMMISSION'S CONCLUSIONS

The problem to be solved is very complex. Much time and caution are needed. In the short period at its disposal the commission cannot hope to elucidate the mystery of the outrage of August 27. The commission, therefore, is not in a position to pronounce definitely and emphatically on the real responsibilities incurred. At the present stage of the inquiry it can only refer on this subject to the opinion already given in its report of September 22. Nevertheless, we seem to be getting near the truth.

On the one hand, the Greek authorities have laid hands on a bandit Constantine Memos, notorious in Greece for his numerous crimes and for the price placed on his head by the Greek Government. Nothing as yet would authorize us to declare that Memos was one of the assassins, but the past of this brigand, whom rumor widely accuses, furnishes a presumption of guilt.

On the other hand, the arrest in Albania of the bandit Stefan Cerea gives to the Albanian authorities a serious basis for inquiry, and allows one to hope that a clue has been found which may lead to the apprehension of the leader of the gang, Yani Vancho, whose confession was received by a witness who has made a formal deposition on the subject.

Before leaving Janina the commission deemed it a duty to communicate to the Albanian Government the information collected in Greece about Memos, to the Greek Government the information obtained in Albania on the Vancho band and on the arrest of one of its members, Stefan Cerea.

INQUIRY INCOMPLETE

But this precaution is insufficient if it is desired to ascertain the full truth. To arrive at this result it is indispensable to insure that complete understanding between the Albanian and Greek governments. This understanding can only be realized under the energetic pressure of the Ambassadors' Conference. The Interallied Commission, therefore, earnestly requests the conference to intervene with both governments in order that the inquiry should be continued in agreement with the judicial authorities of both countries. And in order to assure that agreement the commission suggests that at least one neutral person, an expert in criminal investigation, should be placed at the disposal of the Greek and Albanian governments.

(Signed) The President, SHIBOUYA
The British Delegate, HARENCE
The Delegate of France, LACOMBE
The Delegate of Italy, BEAUD

ITALIAN DELEGATE'S DECLARATION

The Italian delegate asked that the following declaration be inserted after the present report:

The Italian delegate, while associating himself with the general lines of the present report, does so under the reservation of sending to the Conference of Ambassadors a special report about the circumstances which enable him to establish at once the grave responsibility of Greece, and to give indications which may lead to the discovery of the culprits.

(Signed) The Delegate of Italy, COLONEL E. BEAUD

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1924

No. 3057

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	127
EDITORIALS:
Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and Coolidge	130
At Last a Pacifist Cabinet	131
The Freeman	131
Lenin	132
OIL SPEAKS. By William Hard	133
BRITISH LABOR CELEBRATES VICTORY. By H. W. Massingham	135
THE SECRET CORRUPTION OF THE FRENCH PRESS. By Lewis S. Gannett	136
AMERICA IN POLYNESIA:
I. Where Sugar Is King. By Padraic Colum	138
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	141
CORRESPONDENCE	142
BOOKS:
Musical Chronicles. By Pitts Sanborn	144
The Vitalizing of Education. By Herbert W. Horwill	144
More Broken China. By Alice Beal Parsons	145
Don Juan. By W. L. Fichter	146
What Do We Want? By Henry Raymond Mussey	146
Three English Critics. By Mark Van Doren	146
Books in Brief	147
DRAMA:
Amid Shadows. By Ludwig Lewisohn	147
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
British Labor and the Labor Government	149
Economic Revival in Russia	150
Back in the Fold	152
German Note Circulation	152

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY
MANAGING EDITOR

IRITA VAN DOREN
LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

ANATOLE FRANCE
ROBERT HERRICK

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON
H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS
CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

SOMETIMES THE FACT that we are in a presidential campaign works well. President Coolidge has at last discovered the alarming distress of the Northwestern farmer. In a special message to Congress on January 23 he informed that body that the existing situation "is reaching an acute stage that requires organized cooperation on the part of the federal Government." The picture that he draws of the present crisis is not exaggerated: "Great numbers of individual farmers are so involved in debt both on mortgages and to merchants and banks that they are unable to preserve the equities of their farms. . . . They are unable to meet obligations and thereby has been involved the entire mercantile and banking fabric of these regions." To give point to the President's message comes the news that 300 banks have failed in the Dakotas, Montana, and Nebraska and that 400 more failures are expected. Mr. Coolidge recommends the continuance of the powers of the War Finance Corporation until the end of this year, the loan of federal money direct to farmers, the creation if need be of new financing institutions, and cooperation with the government by the large business concerns, the railroads, the mercantile establishments, the agricultural supply houses, and all those businesses whose welfare is immediately connected with that of the farmer. While we agree with Senator Brookhart that the President's message "comes six months late," we welcome it none the less. A special session last summer would have saved many farmers from ruin; now the effort must be to rescue the survivors. It is of the utmost importance that Congress respond at once and that the desired cooperation of government and private enterprise take place immediately.

IT IS WITH PROFOUND SATISFACTION that we record the decision of Senator George W. Norris of Nebraska to yield to the appeal made to him in an editorial in this newspaper (Thou Shalt Not Despair, December 26, 1923) and by hundreds of admirers and friends, and to become a candidate for reelection. The loss of this sturdy patriot, this consistent, high-minded, incorruptible legislator, would have been great at any time; at this hour when the trail of corruption leads to the Cabinet of the United States and stops only at the doors of the White House, Mr. Norris's retirement from public life would have been nothing short of a calamity. We assume that a grateful State will renominate and reelect him.

WHERE LEONARD WOOD goes look out for fighting. It was his record in the Philippines before; it is his record now. Our constabulary has been fighting vigorously with the Colorums, the religious fanatics in Sungao, where they went about the "pacification" of the island in the most approved civilized fashion. Thus Colonel Bowers reports that he burned the town of Socorro after landing his men under cover of machine-gun fire. To the surprise of the authorities, this kindly act did not have the desired effect. "The constabulary has practically given up hope today [January 24] that the Colorums will surrender peacefully." Three days later 54 Colorums were killed, 19 wounded, and 13 captured by Colonel Bowers with the loss of two men wounded—a nice little one-sided slaughter. It next appeared (January 28), ominously enough, that after all the trouble makers "are not religious fanatics but outlaws. . . . Observers here [Manila] believe that only most vigorous measures can now prevent a wide-spread and dangerous unrest in the Southern Philippine region." A Senator has attacked the burning of Socorro, declaring it to be "unnecessary, unjustified, and unlawful." Quite naturally Secretary Weeks denies once more the report that General Wood will be recalled; the worse his failure as Governor General the closer will Mr. Weeks stick to him.

EDWARD W. BOK and the senators investigating him acted as if they were engaged in a joint conspiracy to divert attention from the fundamental issues at stake. Mr. Bok at first refused to tell how much money the contest was costing him. Estimates set it at from a quarter to a half million dollars, and while Mr. Bok can only be praised for spending so much on propaganda for any kind of peace plan the public also has a right to know how much money is being spent in propaganda, good or bad. The senators' ill-mannered attempt to bully Mr. Bok and his able manager, Miss Lape, did not help matters; and apparently it occurred to no one to ask how the summary on the ballot came to differ so widely from the prize-winning plan itself. They were all engaged in hunting or denying the existence of a deliberate, deep-dyed plot; a little study of the unconscious might have helped explain the accident of a jury so sympathetic to the League of Nations. Mr. Bok's sportsmanship in offering a new $100,000 prize for a plan to be selected by the investigating senators was a safe and effective way of turning the tables; perhaps he knew how the thought of reading 22,164 peace plans would affect a senator's digestion.

THE MOTTO of the British trade unionists, upon the advent of the first Labor Government in the history of England, seems to be "business as usual." The railwaymen belonging to the Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen go out on strike; the railwaymen belonging to the National Union of Railwaymen for the most part act as strike-breakers; Mr. J. H. Thomas, who has resigned as secretary of the latter union to become Secretary of State for the Colonies, pursues the tactics of opposition to united action by means of which he broke the fighting force of the Triple Alliance in 1921; the dock-workers are talking of a nation-wide tie-up; and the usual sequence of conferences and compromises eventually brings the various crises to an inconclusive end. All of which events are typical of the country in which they are taking place. Labor's rise to power does not mean a cessation of disputes and strikes and embarrassing difficulties in the interests of a safe launching of the new Government; nor does it result in a sudden access of solidarity and united revolutionary action. British workers indulge in few heroic gestures and their own first Government will be allowed to cut its teeth on the gristle and bones of as tough a set of industrial problems as any previous Government has faced and failed to solve.

PEOPLE IN THE PALATINATE probably pay little attention to the advent of Ramsay MacDonald, the death of Lenin, or the exposure of Mr. Fall. They are too busy with their own troubles. The Separatists, supported by the French, are punishing the men who told the truth to Mr. Clive, the British consul general at Munich, who was detailed to investigate conditions. Even the Separatist leaders admitted to Mr. Clive that 75 per cent of their group came from outside the Palatinate; presumably, however, they will not punish themselves for so damaging an admission. Among these leaders Mr. Clive reported "a large element of ex-criminals." (We do not understand why he called them ex-criminals.) Most of the townsfolk he found utterly hostile to separation from Bavaria; some of the Socialist workmen favored a Rhineland state within the Reich. The peasants in general, he said, were "indifferent to politics and only wanted to be left in peace with no risk of expulsion." They would sign anything to be left alone, and their signatures, often obtained under threat, meant nothing. Now dispatches report that new expulsions and punishments have begun; the men who talked with Consul Clive are all in danger. What can a Bok prize do for peace while French militarism runs riot unchecked and all but unnoticed?

AN IMPERIAL SALUTE of 101 guns recently announced to the land of Nippon that its Prince Regent Michi-No-Miya Hirohito had been wed to Princess Nagako. The royal pair were magnificently decked out with all the art of silk and embroidery. Ten thousand soldiers and police lined the imperial path to make it safe. Gallant gendarmes cleared Tokio of "suspicious characters," radicals, and other persons considered dangerous were rounded up and held in jail until after the ceremony. Simultaneously forty thousand miscellaneous convicts—thieves, cutthroats, and murderers were gloriously amnestied, among them Captain Amakasu, whose particularly brutal murder of the Socialist leader Sakaye Ohsugi, his wife, and young nephew was described in The Nation for January 16. To murder a Socialist family seems to be a lesser crime in imperial Japan than having "dangerous thoughts."

IN VARIOUS PARTS of the country the birth-control movement is adopting the simple course of challenging the law and then if necessary testing it in court. In Chicago a clinic has actually been opened and licensed by the city, by order of Judge Harry L. Fisher of the Circuit Court, who issued a writ of mandamus restraining the Mayor and the Health Commissioner from interfering. Judge Fisher in a rather remarkable decision said that "in the light of the difference of opinion on this subject, courts should not by judicial pronouncement, without legislation, condemn such an earnest movement as immoral and contrary to public policy. . . ." "Morality in a healthy state of society," he said, "must depend upon its acceptance as a principle of life and not upon fear and ignorance." Meanwhile in New York a birth-control clinic continues to run and so far the police have left it unmolested. The public mind is changing faster than our legislators choose to believe; even the League of Women Voters, a nonpartisan organization of real political power and of consequent caution, made up of middle-class women—Catholics, Jews, and Protestants—with the prejudices of their class and religion; even this body in New York State has voted to support an amendment to the present law. We Americans are slow and hesitant in matters that touch on moral taboos; it will be long before we approach this problem with the directness of the Russian Government, which has accepted the report of a commission of physicians—appointed at the demand of the women—and is now prepared to "furnish birth-control information professionally."

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE has asked Congress to appropriate $1,000 for a "claim against the United States, presented by the British Government for the death on November 1, 1921, at Consuelo, Dominican Republic, of Samuel Richardson, a British subject, as a result of a bullet wound inflicted presumably by a member or members of the United States Marine Corps" and recommends this payment "as an act of grace and without reference to the legal liability of the United States in the premises." But would it not be worth several times one thousand dollars to find just what is the legal liability of the United States for lives—other than native—in a country conquered by force of arms without declaration of war and in violation of all existing treaties? Thirty-three thousand dollars was the price collected by our State Department for the only American ever killed in Santo Domingo under autonomy—thirty-nine years ago. Has the cost of lives (white) so greatly diminished? Or are we confronted with a new form of rebating between the mighty for the accidentally killed trespassers on each other's imperial preserves?

THE MILLS OF THE GODS, grinding slowly in Minnesota, have finally ground out a measure of justice toward the great iron-mining companies that so long enjoyed unreasonable privileges. In the early days of the industry, back in 1881, a pliant legislature was persuaded to pass a law exempting ore lands from all taxation and requiring instead the paltry sum of one cent on each ton of iron removed. This piece of stark favoritism lasted for sixteen years, when, after a bitter fight, the exemption law was repealed. But still the companies continued to despoil the State of its mineral wealth without paying anything for it as such. Finally, in 1921, the Minnesota Tax Reform Association, with C. J. Buell as its executive secretary, got the legislature to pass a law levying a 6 per cent tax on the net profits of all engaged in mining and shipping ore, and last year a law went through imposing a 6 per cent tax on royalties. After a fight in the courts in which the net-profits tax was finally sustained, the Oliver Mining Company (a subsidiary of the Steel Trust) paid the State more than four million dollars under the law last November. Later in the year two millions more were collected from other sources. An effort will be made to get the legislature which meets next year to increase both the royalty tax and that on net profits to 10 per cent.

THE PEOPLE of the State of Missouri will vote on February 26 on several proposed amendments to their constitution. Among these is a most hopeful one looking to simplification of legal procedure, shortening the law's interminable delays. Its purpose is twofold—to shorten the delays of litigation by enabling the judges to carry a peak-load of work all the time and to simplify procedure by giving to the judges themselves what amounts to legislative power over technical matters of legal procedure and practice. A judicial council is given power to transfer judges temporarily from districts where business is light to districts where business is heavy, and the appellate tribunals sit in two divisions, no appeal to be heard by the full bench unless there is dissent in the division. This last provision will well-nigh cut in half the time needed to dispose of an appeal, for the great mass of appeals are decided unanimously. The grant of power to the judicial council to legislate rules of practice is a step in advance of any yet adopted in this country, but it is in line with modern proposals for the reform of legal procedure. Certainly the processes of law need simplification, and this amendment reads like sound, good sense. We hope that the people of Missouri adopt it.

TWO HUNDRED EXCITED PERSONS gathered before Magistrate Bell in Princess Anne County, Virginia, accused seventy-year-old Annie Taylor of witchcraft. Whether convinced or not that Annie could kill a mule by waving a cane at him, "queer" the rising of good corn bread, or put snakes in a woman's stomach the court banished her to North Carolina. The judge was wise. If there are any witches left in the country North Carolina should welcome them. That State, through its Board of Education, headed by Governor Cameron Morrison, has banned from its public schools any biologies that "in any way intimate an origin of the human race other than that contained in the Bible." Governor Morrison admits evolution into his vocabulary but writes his own definition:

Evolution means progress, but does not mean that man, God's highest creation, is descended from a monkey or any other animal. I do not believe he is, and I will not consent that any such doctrine, or any intimation of such a doctrine, shall be taught in our public schools.

The Governor may be kept rather busy combing out of all the books in North Carolina every reference to evolution (even under his own Carolinian definition), embryology, comparative anatomy, or paleontology, lest some one read, put two and two together, and draw conclusions differing from the chief executive's.

PRESIDENT MEIKLEJOHN is gone from Amherst College, but one of the reforms which he worked for has just come to pass under his successor. In an effort to make college athletics less commercial Dr. Meiklejohn called a conference of the presidents of twelve of the smaller Eastern colleges and proposed that they agree to abolish the seasonal coach, arranging to have all teams coached by members of the faculty only. Dr. Meiklejohn believed that true sport had been edged out in a system in which overpaid outsiders came in temporarily to match their skill against similar men in other institutions. Games were actually played by the coaches, with the students as so much raw material in their hands. No direct results seem to have ensued in the colleges approached by Dr. Meiklejohn, although several already had in whole or in part the system which he advocated. Amherst put the plan through, and hereafter athletic coaches will be engaged and paid by the college. They will be in residence throughout the college year, with various other duties when not coaching. The evil of the professional coach is not all that is the matter with college athletics, but improvement here is a practical contribution toward better conditions.

MR. FRANK MUNSEY, dealer in dailies, has just purchased the Evening Mail of New York, the ninth newspaper he has acquired in that city. Just as he destroyed the Globe a few months ago by merging it with the Sun, the Mail is to be merged with the Telegram. Mr. Munsey has now destroyed six New York newspapers since 1891. As in the case of the Globe, he avows the economic motive with complete frankness:

This purchase puts the evening newspapers of New York in a safe, strong position. Financially they are now impregnable. . . . Fortunately for New York, there is and will be no lack of nourishment for the remaining five evening newspapers—the Evening World, the Evening Journal, New York Evening Post, the Sun, with which the Globe is intertwined, and the New York Telegram, with which the Evening Mail is now intertwined. The owners of the three first-named papers are rich men—very rich—and the owner of the last two is still able to take over another newspaper or two if pressed to do so.

Commercialization of the press is almost complete. The metropolis is without a single thoroughgoing liberal daily—the World and the Evening World still fall short of the opportunity and influence which should be theirs. At night the public now has the choice of getting its information and its newspaper opinions from Messrs. Hearst, Pulitzer, Munsey, and Cyrus Curtis. In the morning it must take its news and opinions from Messrs. Hearst, Pulitzer, Munsey, Ochs, Reid, and the Chicago owners of the incredibly bad and enormously read Daily News. Yet gatherings of journalists and teachers of journalism continue to assure us that all is well in the world in which they work. There is no more menacing development than this gradual control of public opinion by a smaller and smaller group, by men who, with only one or two exceptions, are in the business solely for money-making purposes.

Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and Coolidge

FOR once the lid has come off at Washington and the people have had a glimpse of what is underneath. Why should anybody be surprised? The Teapot Dome scandal has merely revealed what every thinking man knew to be the truth about our government as it is now organized and run—that it serves primarily to enrich the privileged at the expense of the country as a whole. A vast public oil tract was bestowed upon a speculator whose counsel declares that he stood to make a profit of $100,000,000 out of it. The excuse was that the tract was being drained by nearby wells privately owned; so the government was “taken out” of private business. Now it appears that the wells which tapped this reserve were granted to the Standard Oil some years ago in defiance of the protests of minor officials whose reports were “lost.” The navy officers who protested against the further alienation of the other naval oil tracts were exiled from Washington for their impudence. The Republican Party was true to its traditions. It is once more revealed as an aggregation of rich profiteers busily engaged in exploiting the country for the enrichment of its backers by means of tariffs and other favors. It is shown once more to be a government of, by, and for the holders of special privilege. Once more the country faces the question Boss Tweed insolently asked of the people of the city of New York: “What are you going to do about it?”

So the royal road which Mr. Coolidge was so smoothly traversing to the White House has suddenly led into a morass! Almost overnight there has broken the greatest scandal Washington has known in four decades, and, behold, the President, who seemed so certain of nomination, is in such jeopardy that he is calling on outside counsel to do the work of the Attorney General, is considering jettisoning several of his Cabinet members, and has issued a midnight statement to the effect that he will punish the rascals and otherwise perform the duties he took a solemn oath to carry out. Already there are frantic party appeals such as the telegram from five Kansas representatives urging the President to take drastic action at once, as well as easy-going assurances that the scandal will not affect Mr. Coolidge if he appoints prominent lawyers to conduct the prosecution. After all, it is argued, these besmirched men were Mr. Harding's appointees and the censurable acts were committed before “Lucky Cal” became President.

The public will be fooled by no such sophistry no matter if John W. Davis or Henry L. Stimson or anybody else undertakes the prosecutions. There are certain facts that all the dust which Mr. Coolidge can possibly raise cannot obscure. They are these: (1) Mr. Coolidge as Vice-President sat in the Cabinet when the oil leases were granted; (2) Mr. Coolidge retained Messrs. Denby, Roosevelt, and Daugherty in office and would doubtless have retained Mr. Fall had he not voluntarily resigned; (3) Mr. Coolidge, if a man of ordinary intelligence and information, must have known that the Teapot Dome scandal was brewing—he could have read of it in The Nation more than a year ago; Mr. William Hard and numerous senators and representatives could have told him all about it months ago had he been jealous of the good name of his Administration and of the rights and property of the American people; (4) Mr. Coolidge in his midnight statement betrays no indignation, no alarm, at the facts revealed, none of the white heat that a sensitive statesman ought to feel at such a revelation of corruption and of incapacity in his own official family. He is content to declare that “every law will be enforced”—after his hand has been forced. Not by his own independent research and study has this corruption been revealed; he used neither the mighty powers of his Department of Justice nor his Secret Service to uncover wrongdoing. During all the weary months of steady, persistent probing by the Senate committee Mr. Coolidge lifted not one finger to aid. When the relentless pursuit of the truth by that extraordinarily able and right-minded public servant, Senator Walsh of Montana, brought out the facts—then the President moved.

Was ever any American President in so grave a position? Senator Caraway and others have declared that the Attorney General is of too damaged a reputation to be trusted to conduct the investigation to locate the crimes. Mr. Coolidge confirms their statement by appointing others to do the Attorney General's work at considerable extra expense to the taxpayers. And as we go to press, Mr. Daugherty is resting in Florida and there is no word that Mr. Coolidge has asked for his resignation. As for Mr. Coolidge's Secretary of the Navy, did ever a President have to read a debate as scorching—and as truthful—as the following about a member of his Cabinet? Referring to Mr. Denby's approval of the sale of the Teapot Dome leases, Senator McKellar of Tennessee asked if the Secretary of the Navy was not morally guilty of having aided in the disposition of these reserve oils. The debate then took this course:

“The Senator from Tennessee is a lawyer,” said Mr. Caraway, “and knows that a man cannot be held liable unless he has understanding enough to know what he does. He must have comprehension of the act. . . . A man who thinks it is a mere matter of detail to sell for a corrupt consideration every gallon of the nation's reserve oil upon which the nation must depend in time of war—a man who regards that as a mere detail to which he should give no concern I do not think could be liable criminally for anything he might do.”

Senator Walsh has since demanded that Mr. Denby resign and Senator Robinson moved that he be impeached. In the face of these facts how can Mr. Coolidge justify himself by retaining in office a single day Mr. Denby and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt, who induced Mr. Harding to sign the executive order disposing of the oil reserves?

Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt—they must and should go. They have proved themselves at best too dull and too stupid to be intrusted with the interests of the United States. The President, if he is to save anything from the wreck, must throw them all overboard. A clean sweep, Mr. Coolidge, is what the country needs! The Harding Cabinet was an offense when it was appointed. It may be hard luck to those who are raising great sums of money for a Harding Memorial that this revelation of its essential inefficiency and corruption should come out just now. But the country needed the lesson. If these Teapot Dome revelations, these heaven-crying demonstrations that corruption has reached right into the Cabinet itself, do not arouse the country what else can? The very least thing they ought to accomplish is to make impossible the candidacy of Calvin Coolidge.

At Last a Pacifist Cabinet

RAMSAY MACDONALD'S Ministry has attracted the wide-spread attention a first Labor Cabinet deserves. To us, however, its pacifist character is as important as its Labor aspect. Both Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Philip Snowden, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, proved themselves consistent pacifists in 1914 when they refused to countenance England's entry into the World War. During that struggle Mrs. Snowden held five hundred peace meetings at some of which her husband spoke; not until after the war was he molested. Then, although compelled to use crutches, he was thrown to the floor in a theater lobby and maltreated by some returned soldiers. Lloyd George and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman opposed the Boer War while their country was in it and became prime ministers afterward; but their opposition to their country's course was not based upon the principle that all wars are wrong but was due to dissent from the attack upon the Boers.

But the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are not the only members of the new Government who refused to "go along" in 1914. Charles P. Trevelyan, the new President of the Board of Education, resigned from the Government in 1914 as a protest against the war policy. Margaret Bondfield, Under Secretary for Labor (she should have been in the Cabinet itself), opposed the war; Lord Parmoor, Arthur Ponsonby, and F. W. Jowett stood behind every peace movement from the time the war began, the latter two being founders of the Union of Democratic Control—an organization of protest against the undemocratic system of government, the secrecy, and the lying which put Europe into the war. Noel Buxton and Colonel Josiah Wedgwood took service during the war, the former on the civil side; both have been proud to call themselves pacifists since. On the other hand, Arthur Henderson, J. H. Thomas, and J. R. Clynes were the three Labor leaders in the War Ministry; yet no one can doubt that today their voices would be lifted in unison against any policy which would involve the use of force. Even the general who has taken over the Air Ministry, C. B. Thomson, the author of the striking article in last week's Nation, resigned from the army at the earliest opportunity in thorough disgust and allied himself with the Labor Party as the hope of the future. If Sidney Webb was not during the war attuned to its real significance and its uselessness save as a destructive force, he is surely of a different mood now. Viscount Haldane, perhaps the most unpopular man in England during the war because of his supposed partiality for the Germans, has recently declared that today he is pro-German. Indeed, it is one of the glories of this Cabinet that there is no one in it with any war hatred, no one unsympathetic with the present plight of the former foes or blind to the fact that the restoration of Russia and Germany is essential to the reconstruction of Europe. Finally, in Sir Sydney Olivier, the new Secretary of State for India, one of the wisest writers on the Negro problem in America and the British colonies, a former most successful governor of Jamaica, Mr. MacDonald has selected a man who should do much to improve the relations between England and India.

We are well aware that the Cabinet is, in some respects, a compromise; Mr. MacDonald has undoubtedly desired to draw from the Liberals some strong men of cabinet experience. That this maneuver has helped to wring from the London press the universal admission that it is a far stronger Cabinet than Mr. Baldwin's proves its immediate wisdom. Whether, in the long run, the great differences of opinion between a man like Lord Haldane and John Wheatley, the Minister of Health, who represents the radical Scottish Labor men, can be reconciled remains to be seen. The point we wish to make today is that this Ministry represents an extraordinary break with the past; no ministry in England or in any other country, so far as we are aware, has embodied such a spirit of pacificism, of humanitarianism, of internationalism, of freedom from all imperialistic and capitalistic influences. Whatever may be said of Mr. MacDonald's Ministry in the future, no one will be able to allege that it spoke the voice of privilege or that it sought to exalt England at the expense of other human beings.

The Freeman

IT is with profound regret that we learn that our contemporary the Freeman is to suspend publication on March 5. The best written and most brilliantly edited of the weeklies of protest, its establishment and maintenance for four years have been acts of most generous public service on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Francis Neilson, who had no other motive than to contribute to political and economic education in this country. That it should fail now for lack of popular support is quite as discouraging in its field as is the tendency toward monopoly and commercialization in the daily press. Here was a literary production to compel admiration, whether one agreed with its views or not. Yet, if we are correctly informed, it never obtained more than 7,000 readers.

It is a symptom of our political backwardness in America and our lack of interest in fundamental reform. It is true that the Freeman has been limited by belief in a panacea, the freeing of the land. It is true also that it has not been willing to advocate reforms of a palliative character; it did not feel it its duty to make practical suggestions of immediate value. So it has had to encounter much conventional fault-finding, as if criticism—self-criticism—were not the primary need of the hour in America. The memory of its vigorous differences from The Nation does not prevent us from expressing our sorrow that the Freeman is to go, our grateful thanks that it has existed, and our belief that it would be a misfortune if some other medium were not found to avail itself of Mr. Albert J. Nock's exceptional equipment for editorial service.

It is unfortunately true that the weekly field is extraordinarily difficult for journals of opinion be they conservative or liberal or radical. The Outlook goes the even tenor of its safe and sane—and dull—way; the Independent is in bankruptcy; the Weekly Review, which was to have counteracted the bad influence of the New Republic and The Nation, has disappeared. As the daily becomes a less and less reliable medium for facts upon which an intelligent electorate might form its opinions, there should be a strengthening of those journals which aim to give new ideas and to present varying political opinions. It is an ill omen, therefore, that the Freeman, with the excellence of its style and of its presentation of facts, and the brilliance of its book reviews and its literary comment, should perish for lack of popular approval.

Lenin

LENIN is dead. A half million people are marching past his red-draped bier in Moscow, and all over the world men are mourning or exulting.

What was the secret of his might? It is hard to analyze. No man of position in the world ever felt his power less. "I have never met a person so destitute of self-importance," said Bertrand Russell, and it was probably literally true. "Lenin struck me as a happy man," said Arthur Ransome. "I tried to think of any other man of his temperament who had had a similar joyous temperament. I could think of none. This little, bald-headed, wrinkled man, who tilts his chair this way and that, laughing over one thing or another, ready any minute to give serious advice to any who interrupt him to ask for it, advice so well reasoned that it is to his followers far more compelling than any command—every one of his wrinkles is a wrinkle of laughter, not of worry. I think the reason must be that he is the first great leader who utterly discounts the value of his own personality." He utterly lacked dignity; none of the outward trappings with which politicians and statesmen usually enhance their appearances played any part in his influence. He did not cut his hair impressively, like Lloyd George, or even Trotzky; he probably never wore a tall hat or a frock coat in his life; he had no pomp of manner. Sometimes, coming late to a party congress or Soviet assembly, he would stray down the crowded aisle and seat himself half way up the steps to the tribune, leaning over the next step to take notes, and when an opponent scored a point against him he would lean forward, ironically applauding.

Yet this undignified little man became the idol of his people. The hundreds of thousands who marched past his casket were not by any means all Communists, or even revolutionaries. They were simply Russians, mourning their national hero. Within Russia even those who despised Lenin's communist theories trusted him somehow to lead Russia out of the slough into which the years of revolution, war, and blockade had plunged her. No other leader, within or without the ruling party, had a tithe of the universal respect and devotion which was Lenin's. The peasants affectionately called him "Ilyich"; within his party he was "the old man," and his word carried conviction.

"His strength," Bertrand Russell thought, came from his "honesty, courage, and unwavering faith—religious faith in the Marxian gospel, which takes the place of the Christian martyr's hopes of paradise, except that it is less egotistical. He has as little love of liberty as the Christians who suffered under Diocletian and retaliated when they acquired power. Perhaps love of liberty is incompatible with whole-hearted belief in a panacea for all human ills." It must have required a terribly intense belief to hold office through the period of the "Red terror."

The generation of revolutionaries which came to power with Lenin had indeed been tried by fire. No group of men in the history of government has matched them in readiness for sacrifice. Lenin's own brother was hanged for participation as a student in a revolutionary movement. Lenin himself gave up his position as a member of the lesser aristocracy, spent three years as a prisoner in Siberia, and most of his life in exile in devotion to his principles. In 1905 he directed, from Finland, the work of the bolshevist minority in the first Duma. As an exile he was recognized as leader by his own party, though almost unknown outside it. During the war he led the tiny band of international socialists who saw the whole carnage as a conflict of rival capitalisms and met in Switzerland to preach peace—peace by revolution. When the revolution came he sought the first opportunity to return to Russia, and was soon regarded in Petrograd as the most dangerous of those fiery street speakers who denounced the compromises of Kerensky and the imperialism of Miliukov. He believed in the destined mission of the industrial working class. He believed that parliamentary democracy, in a nation 90 per cent illiterate, with an aristocracy and an oligarchy used to the technique of rule, was a farce. Someone would have to dictate, and he was determined that it should be the class-conscious minority of the working class. It was.

That class rule infuriated the class which ruled the rest of the world. Germany invaded Russia, but fell victim to the virus of revolution; the Allies blockaded Russia, shut it off from the rest of the world by a "sanitary cordon," and then invaded it from all sides. They supported the Czecho-Slovak legion invading from within, Tchaikowsky invading from the north, Kolchak from the east, Denikin and Wrangel from the south, Petlura, Yudenich, and the Poles from the west. But Soviet Russia, under Lenin, stood the test of battle. It fought off the world, and then set an example unparalleled in history in the series of generous treaties which it made with its neighbors. That long struggle, however, following four years of war, sapped the strength of the nation. It was left in no condition to attempt the largest-scale social experiment of history. Whether, under other circumstances, communism might have worked, we do not know. It never had a fair chance in Russia. And Lenin, still far-sighted, was the first to proclaim the necessary compromises.

Compromise was another of his strange virtues. He was trained in the dialectic school of exiled revolutionaries, where theorists usually learn chiefly to chop logic in a thin world of abstractions. In office this café scholar directed the government of a hundred million people. Trotzky was an abler administrator, but Trotzky looked to Lenin for guidance and often enough after debating with him for months accepted his dictum and reversed his own position. Lenin early lost interest in world revolution. He made two right-about faces in his policy toward the peasants. But where lesser men would have devised ingenious arguments to show that they had never changed their minds, Lenin had the courage to say, "We were wrong; we must change our policy."

Lenin is dead. His country has had to make many painful compromises since his ragged crew took power, but it is running the railroads and marketing the wealth of Russia today. The Communist Government preaching and, to the best of its ability, practicing the gospel of economic revolution, still fills the breast of Mr. Hughes with alarm. Whatever may come of it in Russia that doctrine—that political democracy without economic liberation is a farce—has swept the Western world, and the Western world will never again be quite the same. The French Revolution was crushed, but it molded the history of nineteenth-century Europe. The Russian Revolution is compromising; Lenin is dead and Trotzky is ill, but they will long continue to make history.

Oil Speaks

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

EDWARD L. DOHENY, miner, prospector, finder of deposits, founder of properties, multi-millionaire, is about to testify. The large oblong room is crowded. Lights in three great glass glittering chandeliers, hung from the ceiling, give a touch more of gloom than of brilliance to the daylight air streaming into the room from windows all on one side. The opposite side shows high folding doors leading to the corridor of the Senate Office Building. In the middle of the room there stands a long massive table. At the head of it, with a mirror of stately proportions on the wall behind him, sits Senator Lenroot of Wisconsin, chairman of the Public Lands Committee. His face is rigid and at the same time anxious—determined and at the same time uneasy. He has not been very much impressed by previous testimony against ex-Secretary of the Interior Fall. Now it seems that he expects to be impressed.

At his right sits Senator Smoot of Utah. He, too, has not been much impressed by previous testimony against Mr. Fall. He, too, knows that Mr. Doheny's testimony will cause millions of people to be very much excited. Mr. Smoot, however, is not excited, is not anxious, is not uneasy. He remains imperturbable. He is not assertive about it. His face does not say: "I am imperturbable." His face just imperturbably says nothing.

About the table, on each side of it, for some distance down toward its foot, sit other senators. Then, beyond them, down and around the rest of the table there are newspaper men who arrived early. Other newspaper men in large numbers are seated between the table and the windows and are seated between Senator Lenroot and the mirror and are seated also in other parts of the room among the mere spectators. Among these mere spectators one also sees numerous senators who are not members of the Public Lands Committee, but who have come to see the most poignant play presented in Washington since Mr. Louis D. Brandeis put his pursuing foot upon the heel of Richard Achilles Ballinger, who was Secretary of the Interior by act of President Taft even as Mr. Fall, the person now of all persons the most pursued, was Secretary of the Interior by act of President Harding.

Among these visiting senators one notices the smartly dressed Hale of Maine, the expansively animated Ashurst of Arizona, and the poker-game-faced and dueling-ground-mannered Reed of Missouri. Above all, one notices La Follette of Wisconsin, who looks more than ever like a chunky charging little Japanese general about to assault

Port Arthur and who, having been the outstanding initiator of this investigation, has now come in to be the most observed spectator of its climax.

Many eyes search for Mr. Doheny, first in this and then in that part of the room. At last he is located by the preliminary locating of his well-known and magnificent attorney Mr. Gavin McNab of San Francisco. Mr. McNab is indeed worthy to be the attorney of an industrial magnate. He is tall. He is broad-shouldered. He looms and he glowers. He has an enormous dome of a head. He has an enormous steel-trap of a mouth. His lips curve down with a gigantic hold upon any bone of fact or argument. He looks able to crack raw bones and eat them.

Unobtrusively Mr. Doheny sits beside him. Mr. Doheny is small. His shoulders are not too narrow, but they are not broad. They are not commanding. At no point does Mr. Doheny seem commanding. He seems too gently inclined and too humorously inclined to be commanding. His eyes have a twinkling humor and also—perhaps always—perhaps only at this moment—a competing film over them of dulled sadness. He is dressed very neatly and even dapperly. On his wrist he wears a watch. On the little finger of his left hand he wears a large ring. His hair is parted in the middle, or just a few millimeters away from the middle. It is wavy hair, brownish, but beginning in streaks to be whitish. He has a mustache. It is a gleaming and total white. His complexion is a desert red. He wears spectacles with fine and almost invisible bows over his ears. He seems largely to consist of smiling pathetic eyes with a gleam of glass in front of them. He does not look dangerous. On the contrary, he looks extremely inoffensive. He looks as if he might well need the towering janizary, Mr. Gavin McNab, who looms and glowers protectingly over him. Many spectators, gazing at Mr. Doheny, immediately at this moment form a resolution to try to look as deserving of protection and of help and of ensuing millions as Mr. Doheny or Mr. Andrew Mellon.

Mr. Lenroot, at the head of the table, calls the table and the room to order. Mr. Doheny's name is mentioned. Mr. Doheny rises from beside Mr. McNab and steps forward to the table and sits in the chair which electrically has been left vacant for him. He sits in it and leans forward. Across the table from him he sees his pursuer-in-chief, his Louis D. Brandeis.

This new Brandeis is an old personal friend of Mr. Doheny's. It is Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, United States Senator, Irish like Mr. Doheny, a Democrat like Mr. Doheny, and Mr. Doheny's friend personally but, as it soon appears, not officially and not in any manner contrary to Mr. Walsh's immediate duty.

Should Auld Acquaintance Be Forgot?

Too Much Oil in His System

Mr. Walsh in this inquiry has pursued Mr. Sinclair. He has pursued other Republicans. He also, however, has already pursued Mr. Doheny, his fellow-Democrat and his fellow-promoter of an Irish Ireland. He did it in a previous hearing. He is about to do it again now.

Mr. Walsh is a man of a slow, unrelenting speech. A sentence from him is like the laying down of brick after brick in a sort of verbal causeway across a deeply suspected swamp. He is not going to fall off into the swamp. Nor, on the other hand, is he going to be swerved from his destination. Slowly, patiently, often dully, he for months has been putting down these bricks while reporters absented themselves and notables went to luncheons on the other side of town and the White House was uninterested and the Department of Justice sent no representative to listen and numerous political experts said that in all this naval oil reserve inquiry there was an ultimate outcome of nothing. Mr. Walsh, learned, deep, pondering, just, scrupulous, charitable, regardful of right, tenacious of truth, continued to follow tame clue after tame clue till at length at the end of weary mile after weary mile of unregarded exploration he has brought this inquiry to the brink of this volcano now about to thrill the country with an eruption of inward national political scandalous secrets.

He has shaggy and protruding eyebrows. He used to have a mustache the corners of which came further down than those of any other mustache extant. They hung, or drooped, well down over the whole lower part of his face, so that at that time his eyebrows and his mustache together gave him the aspect of a cave man of savage hairiness. Of late months he has consented to abate the mustache.

He is among the few senators who cannot aspire to the White House. He is a Roman Catholic. Incidentally and irrelevantly it is said that he is a devoted and devout one.

His strongest political characteristic is that along with being a lawyer he has a sense of law as law. He has a sense of law not merely as a means of livelihood and not merely as a matter of legislation, but as a reign of duties and of rights. A leading member of the Democratic Party, a convinced follower of Woodrow Wilson's internationalist ideas, a detester of revolutionary radicalism, he wrote a report which covered the treatment accorded to alleged "reds" by Mr. Wilson's Attorney General, Mr. Mitchell Palmer, and which for all the recorded time through which the American republic may exist will demonstrate the illegality and injustice and unrighteousness of Mr. Palmer's "red" raids.

Undeterred by party, uncorrupted by friendships, Mr. Walsh automatically asks Mr. Doheny to speak. Mr. Doheny begins to speak. His voice is as uncommanding as his appearance. It is high, thin, almost shrill. It is shrill in pitch, not in penetration. It is not a noisy voice. It is almost a weak one. It is thoroughly unassertive.

In print Mr. Doheny's words seem to have been uttered with a roar. In life they proceed from him more with the effect of a diffident squeak.

Mr. Doheny begins to speak of Mr. Fall. He begins also to speak of himself. He and Mr. Fall were miners together. They were miners in a place where there were Indians. Mr. Doheny acutely observes that persons in peril may not like each other at the time, but they always like each other afterwards in their common memory of the peril and of the escape. Mr. Doheny adds this stroke of wit to the picture and then adds a stroke of pathos when he speaks of Mr. Fall's loss of his children by death. Mr. Doheny at this point finds it hard to continue speaking. He hesitates and stops. He then regains control of himself and goes on. He goes on and reverts to humor. He describes Mr. Fall's reasons for finding himself without money. He remarks that people without money always find good reasons for finding themselves without money. They have had bad luck. Almost all his fellow-prospectors of his old mining-camp days have had bad luck. He now lends them money. Mr. Fall has had bad luck. Mr. Fall's mines in Mexico turned out to be poor in profits. This was largely because of revolutionary disturbances in Mexico. People in the United States do not realize what these revolutionary disturbances in Mexico are. At this very present time Mr. Doheny's employees in Mexico are resisting demands from the revolutionary Mexican De la Huerta Government for $400,000. Many of Mr. Doheny's employees in Mexico in the course of the last few years of revolutionary disturbances have been killed. When Mr. Doheny speaks of their having been killed, he again for a time finds it hard to continue. He remembers his old fellow-prospectors. He remembers his old employees. Some of them are dead. The rest, if one may stretch his testimony a bit, seem to borrow money from him. He points out a certain difference between him and most other rich men. He does not merely possess property. He possesses cash. If he had to give somebody a million dollars tomorrow morning, he would not need to do it in securities. He would not have to sell part of his business. He could go to his bank and get that million in cash. His little low-volumed and high-keyed voice produces this thought to the hushed amazement or amusement of his auditors. Still more stimulated, still more stunned, they hear him then equably narrate his expectation of making one hundred million dollars for himself and his company out of his lease on Naval Oil Reserve Number One. Manifestly he sees nothing upsetting, nothing prostrating, in the idea of making one hundred million private dollars out of the public chore of draining a public oil reserve. Manifestly, moreover, he might have sent a mere one hundred thousand dollars to almost any affectionately remembered old fellow-pro prospector. He did send one hundred thousand dollars to Mr. Fall on a note and in a satchel, in cash.

At these words there goes around the room a shiver, a shudder, a grin, a pursing of mouths, a rolling of eyes, an exquisite pang of horror and of pleasure. Where a moment ago there was prurient curiosity, there now is satisfied virtue. Where a moment ago there was a trembling over the contestants, there now is a gloating over the defeated. Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny lie on the sand of the arena. A year or so ago, back in the dim past, they were among our favorite gladiators. Shall they now be spared? A hiss of hostile breath from their old admirers, from their old friends, says gloatingly "No."

It was a victory for the service of the state. Senator Walsh did his duty. He looked across the table at his old friend Mr. Doheny. He had brought him to a public confession of a public error. He did not turn his head. If he had turned it, he would have gazed with contempt at the mob of pleasure-seekers who while evidence of the plundering of the public domain was being presented were not there, but who, when the blood of reputations was to flow, were present and exulting.

The voice of Senator Smoot is heard. He would like Mr. Doheny to see him in his office about the chances of an oil-well he knows in the West.

The making of the world's living goes on.

British Labor Celebrates Victory

By H. W. MASSINGHAM*

London, January 11

I HAVE seen many political demonstrations in England, beginning with the great Gladstonian progress of 1886, but I have never seen anything like this week's celebration of the Labor victory of last December. To understand it, it is necessary to say a word on the most critical situation in English politics that has arisen since the passing of the First Reform Bill. It is a new situation for which neither the constitution nor the party system makes any exact provision. We have had an indeterminate state of parties before—indeed, that condition held till close up to the seventies. We have also had a semi-revolutionary movement, like Chartism, arising out of a prolonged period of misery and repression. But Chartism was never able to win parliamentary power, and though parties in the early Victorian period were made up from loose and variable groupings, the grand era of liberalism was at hand, and was being steadily prepared for. Next week the curtain rises on a widely different scene. There are three definite parties, and only one of them offers a real aspect of solidarity. The Liberal Party, nominally reunited and subject to a momentary revival in numbers and discipline, is still on the decline, with an indifferent and divided leadership and a loss of faith and coherence which has persisted since the war and of which the causes lie deep in its constitution and social outlook. Toryism again is in a state of acute internal misery. It has come from one of the worst of its elections enraged with the naivete of its leader in challenging such an issue as protection in such a manner; alarmed at the prospect of the immediate arrival of "socialism," and yet unwilling to combine with the non-socialist liberalism of Mr. Asquith save on terms of a second and dominantly Tory coalition. From this solution the Liberals have drawn back in dismay. It would have meant the breaking off of the Radicals and the formation of a Liberal-Labor group, and it would have been downright treachery not only to Liberal idealism, but to the fairly progressive electoral program of the party.

It was with the knowledge that the Liberal vote would be used to destroy the Conservative Government, and that Labor thus stood on the threshold of power, that the great "thanksgiving" meeting at the Albert Hall assembled. The critical trial of the virtue of laborism—its leaders, ideas, and policies—had come to it as suddenly as the call to the prophet Elisha, found plowing with his twelve yoke of oxen in the field. And Labor's response was exactly what might be expected of it.

To the thousands of young men and women—the average age struck one as between 20 and 30—who poured into the Albert Hall, and moved to their places in one tier or another of its vast circumference, the event came as an almost solemn act of dedication rather than the flaming signal of party triumph. The British Labor Party resembles the Catholic church in at least two particulars. It has a faith and an organization, and it is the union of these two characteristics that produces the effect of disciplined enthusiasm of which these central assemblies are the evidence. The order of the Albert Hall meeting was perfect, evolved as it was out of the simple and impressive ritual of the Labor demonstration and the close harmony of its poetry and aspiration with the temper of the audience. Vast as was the space to be filled, the work was done without a sign of bustle or confusion. In a few minutes every ticket holder had his seat, from the distant and slightly raised platform up to the dizziest tier of the arena. The singing, mostly in hymn tunes and led by a trained choir from the orchestra, was set to the three or four fine English poems by Morris and Carpenter, whose familiar rhythm makes the marching music of the party and spiritualizes their vision of a new social order. The programs, beautifully printed, closed with a commemoration of the saints and pioneer figures of the movement and of the great democratic hierarchy from which they sprang. Here and everywhere was the evidence of the spirit not of a party so much as of a religion, which it means to apply, in full confidence, to the art of government.

This tone of mingled buoyancy and seriousness, with its suggestion of a young evangelistic church in the bloom of its days of faith, was not the only remarkable feature of the Albert Hall meeting. There was something more notable still, and that was the harmony between leaders and followers. Mr. MacDonald and his colleagues had come to say a difficult word to an idealistic audience. The word was moderation. It was spoken, gently but with firmness, by every one of the orators, in particular by Mr. MacDonald, with the refined artistry of which he is a master, and by Miss Bondfield, who seemed to make every accent of her beautiful voice audible to its most distant hearer, with the persuasiveness of the religious teacher. Mr. MacDonald's speech contained one passage which could be called an appeal to passion, and that was the very homely passion, long denied to hundreds of thousands of English folk, of having a decent roof over their heads. Save for the necessary warning that if (as in the past) the ring which has hung up the housing movement since the war took the field against a Labor government that ring would be "broken," this vein of sober rationalism was never once abandoned. The effort of the Labor Ministry to establish itself as a governing force would, he made clear, proceed by a dual and connected movement. It would endeavor to establish a new concordat of peace, based on the immediate recognition of Russia and an attempt to bring Germany back into the European system. And it would make an offer to capital to engage with it in a great scheme of productive employment. I held my breath at an odd moment or two as this evolutionary movement was led up to and expounded in language of singular simplicity and skill. Impatient idealism might have revolted, and had it done so the life of a Labor government, if it had ever begun, would have dwindled to a short and inglorious episode. But the response was perfect. The enthusiasm of the meeting was restrained and enhanced; and it was evident that the new Government, basing itself not on the class-war, but on the cooperative and even the religious instincts of the whole nation, would have behind it the wonderful movement which brought it into being.

* It has been reported that Mr. Massingham will probably be appointed British Ambassador to Germany.

The Secret Corruption of the French Press

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

FILED away in the secret archives of the old imperial government of Russia lie tons of documents, some of which have been brought to light and some of which are still hidden. A new and amazing series has just been exposed by Boris Souvarine in the columns of l'Humanité of Paris. Souvarine, a young Frenchman of Russian descent, spent two years in Russia ransacking the files of the Russian Ministry of Finance, and returned with a load of sensational documents revealing in detail the manner in which the Czar's Government systematically bribed the French press from 1904 until the Soviet Revolution stopped the game. This was the period during which the Franco-Russian alliance was developed and the first Russian revolution put down in a bath of blood, during which Finland lost its autonomy and fifteen billion francs of French money were invested in Czarist bond issues. The crushing of the revolution and the strangling of Finland were made possible by the stream of French gold that flowed to Russia from the wool stockings of the French peasants and workmen, and the stream was maintained by a systematic press campaign to deceive the French people as to the true state of affairs in Russia. This campaign, the documents reveal, was bought and paid for by the Czar's Government, which in a critical year such as 1905 spent nearly four million francs to keep the Paris press quiet, and continued its subsidies intermittently until its downfall in 1917. Indeed, the Kerensky Government, which still nourished some of the imperialistic designs of its predecessor, continued the system of bribes, at least in so far as concerned the great semi-official mouthpiece of the French Foreign Office, the Temps.

Here, in downright bribery, is the secret of the strange alliance between republican France and imperial Russia; here, too, is the key to the rabidity with which the French press in peace-conference days opposed President Wilson's attempt to come to terms with Soviet Russia, and to the readiness of the French Government and of the Paris press to support any bandit chieftain who set himself up to oppose the Bolsheviks. For it must be remembered that in France all politicians are journalists, and almost all journalists are politicians, and that to bribe one group is to bribe the other. More than a score of Paris daily papers were on the Czar's pay roll, and still more individual journalists—managing editors, financial editors, owners, and feature writers—including Raymond Recouly, who came to the United States in 1922 to lecture before the Williamstown Institute of Politics as the recognized spokesman of France. On the same pay roll were several men who are still senators, among them Henri Berenger, who recently toured the Little Entente nations as Premier Poincaré's handy man and returned to recommend the loans of hundreds of millions of francs which are sealing France's diplomatic and industrial control of Central Europe. These men who sold themselves to the Czar are still making the policy of the Paris press and of the French Government; and if other revolutions come, political or industrial, we may discover their names on the post-war pay rolls of newer nations or of kings of finance and industry. Indeed, the fall of Stambuliiski in Bulgaria has exposed one of the Czar's

French henchmen again selling himself, as correspondent of the Temps, to another foreign Power.

The Czar's own agent used the phrase: "the abominable venality of the French press." Probably no press in the world is more venal. The French Government itself subsidizes it to keep it in hand; before the war one scandal after another revealed its readiness to accept money for editorial aid in floating various kinds of loans. There was a scandal in which the readiness of patriotic papers secretly to accept Austrian money was revealed; indeed, there is little reason to distinguish between acceptance of money from Austria and acceptance of money from Russia when one understands the sordid origin of the Russian alliance. The documents found in the Soviet archives incidentally reveal that French papers secretly accepted money from the Boers in the days when they had money to spend, and from Argentina and Brazil when they wanted to interest French capital in their countries. The Czar's money was used, of course, not only to influence investors but also to influence public opinion in politics. So close was its control that we find the Czar's secret agent writing to Petrograd to inquire whether he should consider the publication of a Tolstoi manifesto by the Matin as "a breach of contract."

Paris is not alone. The London Times and the London Daily Telegraph also felt the touch of the Czar's money. One of the favorite camouflages was to pay for the publication of special Russian numbers, the contents of which were carefully supervised by the Russian representatives. On April 19, 1914, M. Davidov, of the Russian Ministry of Finance, wrote to his chief, M. Bark, that he had been approached by the editor-in-chief of the Monde Illustré, and that while he had been unable to meet M. Dupuy-Mazuel's request in full he had felt its importance and had made a verbal report to the Czar, "who approved my views and agreed to grant M. Dupuy-Mazuel a subvention of 10,000 rubles, like that received by the Times, the Daily Telegraph, and a few other papers." This incidental reference is revealing enough; possibly some Englishman will follow in M. Souvarine's footsteps and track the Czar's money through the London press as thoroughly as Souvarine has traced it in Paris.

Paris is, however, probably alone in this: that it was at the direct instigation of the French Government that the Russian Government began its thirteen years of bribery of the press. This was in 1904, when the outbreak of the Russo-Japanese War threatened the success of a Russian loan. It is worth referring to a report made in November, 1905, by Arthur Raffalovich, known to the public as an officer of the Legion of Honor, member of the Institute of France, a regular contributor to the Journal des Débats and the Economiste français, and as editor of the Marché financier. Unknown to the public Raffalovich was the Czar's secret agent who advised upon methods of corrupting the French press. Raffalovich wrote:

These subventions to the press began in February, 1904, at the time of the panic provoked by the outbreak of hostilities in the Far East. Upon the express request of M. Rouvier, then Minister of Finance [later Prime Minister of France] . . . the director of the [Russian]

Ministry of Finance agreed to open a credit of 200,000 francs through the Russo-Chinese Bank. The Paris banks, in the common defense of Russian credit, furnished 100,000 francs in addition to our 200,000. The money was expended through the regular agent of the French Ministry, M. Lenoir, and continued until the issuance of the 800-million-franc loan in May. Our sacrifices were then interrupted until autumn, when the monthly allocations were resumed, slightly increased. In March, 1905, after the battle of Mukden and the failure of the French loan by fault of the bankers, Verneuil demanded an enormous sum each month until peace was signed. . . . After consulting M. Rouvier semi-officially, we agreed to increase the monthly allotment by about 110,000 francs. . . . The internal events in Russia, the disturbances, mutinies, and massacres created a very uneasy state of mind among the owners of our securities in France and it appeared that if the press were left to itself it would not fail to upset the public still more. When M. Noetzlin returned the outlook was so threatening that the Banque de Paris put 50,000 francs at our disposition, which was used as follows: 10,000 francs to the Havas Agency [the Associated Press of France], 7,000 francs to Hebrard of the Temps, 4,000 to the Journal on November 30, as much again on December 30, plus Lenoir's commission. The costly sacrifices to Havas and the Temps are absolutely necessary. In our difficult circumstances the support of the majority of the press is—unfortunately—indispensable to us until the loan is put through. The papers have become greedier as the loan becomes more distant, and one may judge what they would say if given rein by the tone of a few papers which have remained outside the arrangement. . . . We must continue the 100,000 francs for three months, and look forward to paying Havas 10,000 francs for an even longer period. . . . The canceled checks are in the hands of the Ministry of Finance.

In all, the Russians spent on the Paris press in that expensive year of 1905, 3,796,861 francs—and the franc was then at par. The list of papers which received the gold, some of it in the camouflaged form of loan advertising, included the Temps, the Journal des Débats, the Echo de Paris, Figaro, the Gaulois, the Journal, the Petit Parisien, the Matin, the Liberté, the Presse, the Patrie, the Libre Parole, the Petit Journal, the Eclair, the Rappel, the Radical, the Intransigeant, the Lanterne, and a host of others. Of course the financial papers received their share, and even the Vie Parisienne appears upon one list of the favored.

The subsidies continued, somewhat less fluently, for more than two decades. They were resumed in 1912, the disbursement being supervised by M. Poincaré. Of that, and of his use of the Russian gold to stifle pacifist sentiment during a war scare, I shall speak in a later article. The Temps, as the mouthpiece of the French Government, the most influential and most quoted paper in France, was a chief beneficiary. During the World War the alliance between the Temps and the Russian Government assumed a unique intimacy. Perhaps never in history has a great newspaper so sold itself, body and soul, to a foreign Power. The terms of the contract, signed at Petrograd on January 15, 1916, tell the vile story:

The Imperial Ministry of Finance and M. Charles Rivet, representative of the Temps in Russia, have agreed as follows:

The special numbers of the Temps devoted to the financial and economic life of the Empire will appear as free supplements, folded in with the paper, beginning in 1916.

There will be two numbers per year, to appear toward the end of January and of June.

M. Charles Rivet, correspondent of the Temps in Russia, is authorized in a letter signed by the director of the Temps corporation, dated January 14, 1916, to prepare the aforesaid supplements in collaboration with the Minister of Finance. To facilitate relations and in the interest of the publication all matters concerning it, journalistic or financial, are the exclusive concern of the Petrograd office of the Temps and are to be handled directly between the chancellery of the Ministry of Finance and M. Charles Rivet.

The Russian Ministry of Finance has entire freedom to select the text of the Russian numbers, which will be published only under its supervision. It may, accordingly, dispose of all or part of the 5,000 lines contained in each of them, just as it may furnish all or part of the photographs to illustrate them.

The Ministry's material should be at the disposition of M. Charles Rivet or of his representative about one month before publication; if the material exceeds the volume of a single number it may be carried over into the next.

Furthermore the Russian Ministry of Finance, exclusively through the Minister's chancellery, may transmit to M. Rivet or to his representatives such economic or financial news as may seem to it of a nature to interest the readers of the Temps, and this news will be printed in that paper. These communications will be handed to the Petrograd office of the Temps and should not include such news as the Russian Government may feel it wise to give out in Paris—as to which the Temps is not bound by the present agreement. The Ministry's communications will not exceed 5,000 lines per year. To facilitate their transmission and in order not to overburden the budget of the paper the Russian Imperial Ministry of Finance will recompense M. Rivet or his representatives for the telegraphic expenses of the Temps, to the extent of a maximum of 500 words per day, or of 15,000 words monthly, this to continue until the conclusion of the diplomatic pourparlers and of the events which follow the war and constitute its liquidation. This telegraphic gratuity may be continued still further if the Ministry of Finance does not object.

The Temps assumes all the cost of printing and distributing the Russian numbers. The Ministry of Finance grants M. Charles Rivet an annual subsidy of 150,000 francs, payable in two instalments of one-half each when the material for the numbers is transmitted, or in one lump sum at the beginning of the year, at the option of the Minister of Finance.

The publication of the Russian numbers will continue in following years upon the same conditions unless one of the two parties objects. In that case the changes to be made are to be noted when the last number of the year is in course of publication, i.e., in June, in default of which notice the present agreement will remain in force for the ensuing year.

Rivet and the Temps were hard up and greedy. This contract was not enough to satisfy them. In August, 1916, we find them pressing the Russian Government to pay in advance the 150,000 francs for 1917. "In return, dear sir, we are entirely at your service; what we ask is one of those things which one never forgets, and we shall be most sincerely and profoundly grateful." Groveling could hardly go further. In September Rivet was begging again. His annuity of 150,000 francs came from the Russian Ministry of Finance. He tried to get more from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It was a question, he wrote, "of an agreement of a high political bearing"; Sazonov, Neratov, and Baron Schilling were all favorable, but the Prime Minister had not formally approved the project. Rivet felt that as "an enlightened patriot" the Minister should approve this second subvention. Rivet got an advance of the first half of the 1917 subvention, but in January he was begging again for the other half; "you can count on our entire devotion," he wrote. The Foreign Ministry doubted the wisdom of a second subsidy and telegraphed to Raffalovich in Paris for advice. He replied uncertainly; the Temps was important, but it was already heavily subsidized. However, he added, "in view of the state of war, and looking forward to the need which the Ministry may have of enlightening public opinion upon Russian interests during the peace negotiations, it might be useful to make sure of a means of having our ideas and communications printed in that paper, on condition that they be printed in the paper itself, not in the supplement."

The Kerensky Revolution made no difference to Rivet and the Temps—what they wanted was the money, and if Kerensky would pay they were as willing to serve him as the Czar. In April we find Rivet announcing that he had made such changes in the forthcoming supplement as the occasion required, and offering to print whatever the new Finance Minister desired. He even suggested that he had had "his modest part in the happy changes in Russia"! On May 2 he acknowledged a check from the Kerensky Government. Meanwhile Rivet had formed a little "Balkan Telegraphic Agency" of his own, and was soliciting aid for it too.

The Bolshevik Revolution put an end to this gold mine and naturally Rivet and the Temps bitterly opposed it. In that counter-revolutionary period their tracks are covered; no revolution has yet disclosed what financial dealings, if any, Kolchak and Denikin and Wrangel had with the Paris papers. Rivet in the course of time was sent as a special correspondent to the Balkans. There new evidence of the corruption of the Temps and its correspondent has come to light. The Belgrad Vremya printed in November, 1923, a facsimile letter from Rivet to one of the agrarian leaders. Rivet said that he needed money in order to complete a three-weeks journey through Bulgaria for which the Temps could not pay. The Bulgarian Embassy in Paris had paid for his outgoing journey, and the rest of his expenses were to be covered by the Bulgarian Government. He wanted Stambuliiski to settle the account. The Vremya recalled that Rivet and the Temps had systematically belittled Serbia and praised Bulgaria, and suggested that Serbian statesmen were naive if they thought they could get the truth about Serbia into the French press without paying for it.

American journalists are hardly subject to such crass corruption as these documents reveal in the French press. But there is a subtler form of corruption which was practiced by the Czar before the war and is in vogue with the French Republic today. French journalists used to vie with each other for the honor of decoration by the Czar, and American correspondents today covet the rosette of the French Legion of Honor. Some of them have won it. Can it be that the achievement or hope of that bit of red ribbon has anything to do with the strange fact that these men who send daily cables to their American papers have not noticed the amazing news which l'Humanité has been printing day after day for weeks, undenied by the culprit papers themselves?

America in Polynesia*

By PADRAIC COLUM

I. Where Sugar Is King

IN acres and acres and hundreds of acres spreads the green that is richest of all greens—the green of the sugar cane. In the Hawaiian Islands it is only when we go away from where water can be poured out, it is only when we get to places where a black lava-crust lies upon the earth that we lose sight of that triumphant green. Sooner or later, if we would understand the islands, we will have to go by one of the roads that lead through this green growth and come to someone who can really tell us about the plantations.

All the islands except Molokai which is lacking in water have great sugar plantations—Oahu, Kauai, Maui, Hawaii. But it is on the island of Hawaii that the production of sugar is at its simplest; there the abundance of water permits of direct transportation from the field to the factory, and furnishes power besides for the running of the factory. On the other islands one sees the brown stalks of burned and cut cane being drawn on railway trucks through the living green of the plantation. On the island of Hawaii the bundles of the cut cane are transported as lumber is transported down the rivers—they are rushed by flumes to the factory.

The cane crop is continuous and the fields need never lie fallow; leave the roots in the ground and the crops will rise up again, thinning only after four years. Here is a field that the power cultivator has broken: bundles of cane lie near—they are to be planted in the ridges by the women and children of the plantation. Here is a field that has not yet come to maturity; it is due to ripen in from three to six months, and here is a field that has been burned to get rid of the growth of leaves so that the cane can be easily cut.

Water comes swiftly down in a flume that is about eighteen inches across. The flow is in a concrete trough, and it rushes along like the water of a mill-race. Bundles of cane are being swept along in it; it is carrying the cane down to the factory six miles away. Day and night, in a twenty-four-hour shift, this flume and the flumes converging on it are carrying the cane from the field into the factory—carrying it, in this particular place, right into the machinery that cuts it, crushes it, and makes it yield up its juice.

So there is the utmost simplicity here. But indeed on the Hawaiian Islands generally the conversion of land and labor into wealth by way of the cane-plantation and the sugar factory has a rather terrifying simplicity. There is no curve in this conversion; it is in a perfectly straight line. Practically the whole economic life is concentrated on the production of sugar. I suppose such a concentration amounts to an economic scandal. On Maui, perhaps the most productive spot on the globe, it is impossible to get fresh vegetables; the lettuces, even, come from the coast; butter comes from New Zealand; everything comes out of a can. One has to go into the wild recesses of the land to find Hawaiians, Portuguese, or Chinese working a farm on the smallest and simplest scale. And there are no markets for the stuff they produce.

* This is the first of a series of three articles by the same author on the subject of American Polynesia. The other two articles will describe village life in the islands and the origins of Hawaiian folk songs.

We follow the flume that is sweeping to the factory the brown bundles of the burned and cut cane. We come to the mill, and we are ready to view the climax of all this drama of growth and labor.

The mill is not spacious, not imposing; it is not much more extensive than the ordinary street-car barn in New York. And there are not many hands about. The cane comes down the flume; it is cut by four knives at the entrance; it is carried a little lower down and crushed, and we see the oozing juice.

One follows the juice as it is drawn to the compartments above; here are great inclosed boilers with glass retorts on the outside that permit us to see the dark-brown juice as it becomes more and more purified. Molasses is formed; by centrifugal force the sugar is separated, and the molasses again is made to yield up its sugar. Brown sugar comes out warm; we see it packed in bags, carried away, and stowed in the wagons that will take it to the steamer; it goes to New York to be refined into the white sugar that we use. The bundle of cane that we saw being rushed along by the flume has added its crystallized juices to the mass that has gone into one of these bags. There is one thing more to be looked at. As we leave the mill we note a heap of dark-brown soil near the railway tracks. This is the clay and fiber that has been pressed out of the cane; it will be used as fertilizer. Then there is the molasses that in spite of the centrifugal force has remained molasses more or less; it is in a heap outside; it will be used as fuel in the factory or as feed for the horses and mules of the plantation. Everything in the cane has been accounted for.

When you are in the Hawaiian Islands you hear the word "camp" over and over again. Now although one-tenth of the military forces of the American Republic is stationed in these mid-Pacific islands, the "camps" spoken of are not for soldiers; they are for the laborers, for the workers in the plantations.

The Hawaiian Islands are singular in this—whereas other countries have not always enough work for their populations, these islands have not enough population for their work. Since the thirties and forties when the monarchy sanctioned the importation of Chinese, labor agents have been searching for and bringing into the islands labor from many quarters—Chinese, Portuguese, Japanese, Filipino, Porto Rican, Korean. You come to note the different types as you go through the plantations. The Japanese have the biggest quota, the Portuguese come next, then the Filipino. Few Hawaiians are on the plantations; the Kanaka, a small farmer and fisherman by tradition, does not take to the hard-driven labor of the cane-fields.

The very word "camp" gives the history and status of this imported labor. There are no villages here for the plantation workers, for the village belongs to generations of people, and these men and women have not grown up, they have been dumped down, on this land. The word "camp," too, implies something regulated, and the places where the workers and their families live are under supervision.

And yet the collection of houses that form the newer "camps," from the point of view of hygiene or of comfort, are ahead of most villages in Europe. They are neat, these framehouses; they have a washhouse for the family outside with a shower-bath; they have runs for fowl. Every "camp" has a clubhouse for men. The schools that are about the plantations are pleasanter than any schools I have ever been in; the teachers are of a high type, and they have not only consideration but affection for their polyglot charges. In Ireland, or England, or Scotland, places like these "camps" would be regarded as model villages, and it would be altogether out of the question to have schools like these near-Irish, English, or Scotch villages—schools so well built, so well staffed, so well equipped.

And the people who live on the plantations have wages that would look good to a farmer in many parts of America. They have a dollar a day to begin with. They have a bonus with this pay. They have money for overtime, and their women and children are able to work alongside if they like and make a good addition to the wage of the head of the family. They have a free house; they have free light, fuel, nursing, and medical attendance. The plantation owners are quite open to suggestions for the betterment of life in the "camps"; indeed they have, in several places, brought in enlightened and devoted welfare workers, who are putting into operation well-conceived programs for social betterment.

And yet, if there is one thing clear about it all it is that in this beautiful country, in this ideal climate, in this paradise for children the workers, with steady jobs and many advantages, are not at all anxious to stay on the plantations. Few of the children grown up here go into the cane-fields. The adult workers do not regard themselves as settled here; when, a few years ago, the bonus was so large that they were able to save a considerable sum, a great many plantation workers pulled up stakes and left the islands. During war time when sugar was at a high price the owners almost bribed them to work. But when they got their large bonus they stayed away from the plantations for weeks and weeks.

Is the aversion to the cane-field due to the work there, or is it due to conditions outside? I have an idea that to a great extent the aversion to the plantations begins in the "camp." It would be wise, I think, for the plantation owners to discard that word with its suggestion of transitoriness and regulation and rootlessness. These collections of houses should be given names—names perhaps derived from another land and endeared to the people who live or grow up in them. The namelessness of the place he lives in is one more way of showing the worker that, for the plantation owners, he is only the economic man.

In the camps there is no wine-drinking, no cock-fighting, no uproarious love-making, no festivities that go on through days and nights; a man cannot have a good row with his wife, a family cannot throw things at each other without the camp-policeman appearing on the scene. There is nothing, in short, to remind one of the normal, energy-wasting, dramatized life of the European village. There are movies that the plantation worker and his family can go to; the young people of the camps, no doubt, have ways of getting together, but human life is certainly subdued—it is subdued for the production of the economic person—the man or woman who can put in eleven good hours in plantation work.

There is something in human nature that asserts that man is not purely an economic creature. He is an economic creature some of the time, but most of the time he is something that is quite different. "Sometimes we experienced surprise that they should labor so arduously at their sport and so leisurely at their plantations and houses, which, in our opinion, would be far more conducive of their advantage and comfort," wrote the Rev. Mr. Ellis, an early missionary to the Hawaiians. "They generally answered that they built houses and cultivated their gardens from necessity, but followed their amusements because their hearts were fond of them." The Hawaiians who made that answer spoke on behalf of the whole human race—the Japanese in present-day Hawaii perhaps excepted. Man created as an economic creature—even well-treated as such—is left with much of a grievance.

The camps are of all conditions—they vary as they are old, new, or very recent constructions. The recent camps are very much improved; they are in better situations, they have roomier houses, they have wider gardens; they have—a worth-while privilege, this—access to the plantation dairy, where they can get milk and butter at cost price. The old camps, built for the earlier Portuguese laborers, are like slums set down in the countryside.

They stand, these nameless villages, through all the greater Hawaiian Islands, collections of board houses without chimneys, beside the green of the cane-fields and inclosed by the many-blossomed hibiscus hedges with their high greenery. The races are segregated; one does not find Japanese and Portuguese families or Filipino and Porto Rican families living side by side. The houses, even the houses in the most recent constructions, are small. But then much of the home life is lived in the open air and the cooking is always done outside. A lanai or veranda is outside all of the houses, and this makes an extra room—the room, indeed, that is most frequented. Near the camp is the plantation store with its enormous array of goods in cans, biscuits, and salt meats, with its display of camp notices in Hawaiian, Japanese, Portuguese, Spanish, and that odd-looking Malay language full of "ngs" and "bangs" that a section of the Filipinos have for a vernacular. Down the road is the school charmingly arranged in bungalows, with trees and delightful flowers around and with happy-seeming children within and without—Japanese children mostly, with their shy geniality, their slit eyes and their microscopic noses, and their little flowered kimonos—and with few Hawaiians, some Portuguese, and other children representing odd racial mixtures. One is made sad to think that so few of these little people will grow up with any attachment to this beautiful place, that they will come to have the mind of transients, the children of a camp.

Out in the cane-fields the men and women are working, and the luna or overseer watches this group and that group. What do they feel about their work in the field and their life in the camps? They are not inarticulate, this alien-speeched folk, and two of their testaments have come my way. The first is a poem—a poem that for all its uncouth, foreign words and all its cramped expression has power and impressiveness.

Battle Hymn of the Laborers

BY A LABORER OF MAKAWELI

At four-thirty the bugle sounds.
Still camps rouse into motion
And the noise of men breaks the stillness of night.
Companies are armed—
Regiment of hapaiko men,
Regiment of "cut cane" men,
Regiment of hanawai,
Regiment of hoehana.

A mixed battalion of Japanese, Filipinos, Chinese,
Koreans, Portuguese, and Spanish.
Our Captain is mean.
He rides on a horse with a big rod.
Companies are divided in two;
They press forward riding on train,
To the Castle of the Capitalists,
To the Castle of the Poor.
Hapaiko! Cut cane!

Hey! Enemies are strong—
Big rain, terrible storm.
Why fear, you cowards!
Front-line men are killed,
Second-line men are wounded,
Third-line men are aged.
Alas! Only help is National Guard.
Hapaiko! Hanawai!

You're shot!
Your bayonet is broken!
Your ammunition is gone!
You fool!
Fight! Fight! until it falls—
Castle of the Poor!
Cut cane! Hoehana!

Fight!
Fight for the freedom of mankind!
Scholars, be baptized with mud!
Priests, be baptized with spirit!
Rich men, be baptized with love!
Poor men, be baptized with freedom!

Charge!
Charge!
Be not misled.
Hapaiko! Cut cane!
Hanawai! Hoehana!

There is no mistaking the resentment that is back of this poem. Written by a Japanese plantation laborer, it was published in a Japanese newspaper on the island of Kauai; it was brought to the notice of the Hawaiian attorney general, who had to consider whether the publisher of the poem should be tried for revolutionary intent. Thanks to its being brought to the notice of the law and being published as a document in the case, we can glimpse plantation life as seen by an embittered plantation worker.

The "Captain" who is "mean," who rides "on a horse with a big rod" is the luna or overseer. The rod that is so sensationally noted is only a riding-crop. "Front-line men are killed"—that refers to the first importation of Japanese laborers who are now all dead or incapacitated by age. "Second-line men are wounded." That is an allusion to the crippling effects of the hapaikou work at which men weighing 140 pounds or less pack bundles of cane weighing 180 pounds or more from the fields to the freight cars. "It is true that they themselves set the weight of their own bundles," says the Honolulu journal that published the poem after it had been brought to the attorney general, "but it is also true that, after five or six years of it, they become permanently deformed and can be distinguished from their fellows by the depression of the shoulders on which the bundles have rested. It should be said in justice that the planters for years have been seeking to develop mechanical leaders that could compete in the field against the human pack animal and that it appears they are on the verge of success." The flumes and the wires that carry the bundles from the upland plantations to the factories are mitigating the labor of the human pack animal.

You're shot!
Your bayonet is broken!
Your ammunition is gone!

All this has reference to the strike of the year before last and the dissipation of the strike fund.

I believe that there is only one solution for the population problem in Hawaii—that is the break-up of the great plantations and the creation of a body of homesteaders engaged in the growing of cane or pine-apples. Looking at it humanly, the problem of the islands is not a problem of labor, but a problem of population. What kind of population can Hawaii afford to have? Is it an unrooted population, living in nameless collections of houses, or is it a population of homesteaders living in real villages? The effort to settle homesteaders on the island lands—notably on Molokai—is quite distinct from the effort to break up any of the large plantations. The first is being already discussed. "So far as land is concerned there is no difficulty, but these men do not want land unless it can be proved to them that they can make a little money on their gardens. For this reason efforts are being made to test all kinds of crops. . . . When these experiments have demonstrated that small farming is profitable and feasible as well in Hawaii as on the mainland, it is hoped the plantation laborers will work to earn enough money to buy an upland farm, not tickets to San Francisco. They and their children will come down to the cane-fields to work in harvesting the crop, just as a similar class of small farmer works in the harvesting season in California. In this way only will the problem of laborers for the plantations be permanently settled, and, at the same time, the Territory will have gained a steady and reliable population." This is from "Hawaii Past and Present," by William Castle, Jr., and it is interesting as showing that a member of one of the ruling families is looking to the abolition of the camp.

That solution still envisages the wage-earner in the field. I believe that another solution some time will be urged—the break-up of the plantation, the acquiring of lots by homesteaders, and the production of sugar on a cooperative basis. A labor leader whom I have talked with speaks out for such a solution. And a man whose name places him among the half dozen families who have great proprietary rights in the islands has talked to me hopefully about it.

But the labor question in Hawaii is now taking on some of the mythology of a racial issue. The bulk of the work on the plantations—that is to say, the work that has meant the largest turnover for the islands—has been done by men and women of the Japanese race. They were brought into Hawaii in the eighties to take the place of Chinese coolies, who had become unsatisfactory to the government and the plantation owners. The Japanese were worked unsparingly in the beginning; they have worked themselves unsparingly since. Will their children born on the islands be permitted to have votes and to enter the legislature? That is the great political issue in Hawaii now. And if they acquire political power—and their numbers entitle them to considerable political power—what effect will that have on labor in the plantations?

In the Driftway

FULTON FERRY has stopped running. To the Drifter it is almost as if a friend had died. That ferry has made history and poetry. It was a very Methuselah among American ferries; as early as 1642 boats ran regularly from what is now Peck's Slip, Manhattan, to what is now Fulton Street, Brooklyn. That was a year before the settlement of "Breuckelen" itself, and the colony about the ferry terminus was known simply as The Ferry. In its day Fulton Ferry was a fashionable passage, and before the fire of 1848 lower Fulton Street, Brooklyn, was lined with dignified buildings and shaded by fine old elm-trees, which made Talleyrand's exile in America a joy. Half a century after Talleyrand Fulton Ferry still bore a thousand listeners from Manhattan each Sunday, eager to hear Henry Ward Beecher preach.

* * * * *

IT was in those days that Walt Whitman learned to love Fulton Ferry:

My life was curiously identified with Fulton Ferry [he wrote], already becoming the greatest of its sort in the world, for general importance, volume, variety, and picturesqueness. Almost daily I crossed on the boats. . . . I have always had a passion for ferries; to me they afford inimitable, streaming, never-failing, living poems. The river and bay scenery, all about New York island, any time of a fine day—the hurrying, splashing sea-tides—the changing panorama of steamers, all sizes, often a string of big ones outward bound to distant parts—the myriads of white-sailed schooners, sloops, skiffs, and the marvelously beautiful yachts—the majestic Sound boats as they rounded the Battery and came along toward 5, afternoon, eastward bound—the prospect off toward Staten Island, or down the Narrows, or the other way up the Hudson—what refreshment of spirit such sights and experiences gave me!

On that ferry Whitman wrote:

Now I am curious what sight can ever be more stately and admirable to me than my mast-hemm'd Manhattan, My river and sunset, and my scallop-edg'd waves of flood-tide, The sea-gull's oscillating their bodies, the hay-boat in the twilight, and the belated lighter . . .

The ferry has ceased running! Whitman never dreamed of such a fate:

Others will enter the gates of the ferry and cross from shore to shore;
Others will watch the run of the flood-tide . . .

Others will see the islands large and small.
Fifty years hence, others will see them as they cross, the sun half an hour high;

A hundred years hence, or ever so many hundred years hence, others will see them,

Will enjoy the sunset, the pouring-in of the flood-tide, the falling-back to the sea of the ebb-tide.

THERE is still the bridge—though most who cross it ride on the “L” and bury their noses in newspapers. There are even new glories that Walt Whitman never knew—the fairy garden of skyscrapers when fog or night blots out the architect’s lines and leaves a chaotic heaven of star-like windows, and the glorious aspirations of the topmost towers when the early morning sun catches them triumphantly piercing a low-hanging cloud. In the forties, when Walt Whitman rode the ferries, the bridge was beginning to live in imagination, but the Woolworth tower was still beyond fancy, and tunnels beneath the river had not been dreamed of. The ferry filled the stage. Today there are three downtown bridges and three tunnels, and more are under way; skyscrapers have been born and are taking ever new fantastic forms. Eighty years hence—will the bridges seem as archaic as the poor little ferry today? Will the tunnels be closed and air traffic seem as commonplace as the subaqueous route today?

* * * * *

WELL, the ferry is gone. The Drifter will miss it; he will seek consolation in the hope that the three doors on the Manhattan side may long continue to bear the cryptic inscriptions “Freight,” “Passengers,” and “Crabs.”

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Still Eating

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Where is this pumpkin pie that your designers of the All-American dinner so glibly speak of? Where can it be found? Is it not non-existent, like the “million dollars” that small boys bet each other so blithely?

To the best of my knowledge and belief the last American pumpkin pie was baked toward the close of the nineteenth century by a stern old New England matron, who carried the secret of its composition and blending to the grave. Surely you do not believe that the chrome-yellow, glucosey disk they purvey in New York restaurants is an American pumpkin pie? For one thing it is usually not made out of the field pumpkin at all but of the so-called “sweet pumpkin,” a hybrid of the true pumpkin and a squash; a monstrous, warty, insipid melon; the latest rape upon Mother Nature by the horticulturists.

Your true pumpkin pie was made from the common field pumpkin, those globes of gold whose fair, round bellies shone among the ripening corn. It was seasoned judiciously with but few spices; tinct with cloves and ginger and cinnamon; a comparatively simple affair. Like the chiseling of the sculptures on the frieze of the Parthenon, all that it required was a couple of centuries of study and eighteen or twenty years of practice. In appearance soothing, smooth, and mild; in taste an exquisite pleasure approaching pain, the bewildered palate not knowing whether to seize on the flavor of the pumpkin as distinguishing this true food of the gods, this Theobroma, or the saucy cloves, warm ginger, or aromatic cinnamon.

But it is gone! The pumpkin pie is gone! That confection that made the mouth gape like a wound is gone! Thus would Burke cry if, living today, he surveyed the state of culinary affairs in America.

Philadelphia, December 18

H. H. SMITH

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Our fathers were very religious. They had to fight each other, and they had to fight the Indians and the wild beasts. There was no medicine and few doctors. Their chances to live were fewer than their chances to die. So they had to be prepared to die. To prepare them to die was the office of religion. Therefore, the country camp-meeting was an important part of their affairs. Each summer the old-time corn-fed circuit rider would hold protracted meetings under brush arbors. The old settlers would revive their religion and the new-comers would “get” religion. Everybody had to have religion. The preacher at these camp-meetings would preach practically all day. But during the noontime there would be a sort of recess and the ladies would spread white cloths and have dinner on the ground. These dinners were not trumped-up in a hurry. The women-folk had prepared for them since the last camp-meeting. Fried chicken, country-cured ham, and good biscuits were piled high, surrounded by all kinds of accessories, and to cap it off egg custards were hauled out of the grub-boxes. Gosh! I say “gosh” because those egg custards bring back pleasant memories and start my saliva glands to running. I looked forward to those dinners as one looks forward to Christmas or the Fourth of July. They were in fact annual feasts, and as a boy I would eat until I could hardly navigate for several hours afterwards. Being a child those gorges did me no permanent injury. The old folks, being lean, stood them admirably. The preachers thrived on them, for they worked hard.

But the period—the long, long period—of isolation is gone, and gone, and going, with it are the characteristics it produced. Today our manners and our food come to us, from the four corners of the earth, standardized and ready for use. All of our stomachs and all of our backs receive about the same blessings.

Dallas, Texas, December 28

D. W. KING

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Perhaps the dinner subject is rather worn out—but it impresses me that your correspondents have all forgotten to consider, in connection with their menus, what a dinner ought to be. That is, scientifically—or perhaps I should say chemically—speaking. Of course, most people don’t think of dinners in that way, and they are inclined to look upon anyone who does as a queer type of cold-blooded ascetic that’s trying to take the joy out of life. Yet it’s a simple enough fact that there are certain other elements which the body must secure from food, and certain other elements which it cannot utilize in excess quantities. And when our traditional menus crowd the medicinal fruits and vegetables into the corner to make way for plentiful dishes of meats and devitalized sugar and starch products—well, our doctors are usually kept busy.

So here’s another menu, and I think it will stand the test of a chemist’s laboratory as well as of a healthy appetite:

Radishes, or ripe olives
Lettuce salad
Baked potatoes
Omelet
Creamed spinach
Chopped figs with cream
Sweet apple cider

Yankton, S. D., December 27

BEULAH CHAMBERLAIN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Our country is too big for any one menu. Its various sections eat with characteristic differences. Also, our kitchens are melting-pots where, though recipes from the old countries have always been our mainstay, yet these in many cases have ... suffered a sea change

Into something rich and strange.

(Or if not “rich” most decidedly “strange,” as when the apple pie of the parent country—deep below the rim and rising to a mountain height above it—was most regrettably flattened out by us into a thin tart, a form in which its own mother wouldn’t know it.)

Yet, nevertheless, and notwithstanding, we have made you a menu, and further we have made you a commentary on that menu. It stands for the kind of dinner we would serve Mr.

Lloyd George if he were our guest, and it has in it several dishes that he would not be likely to get at an English or a French dinner, and which are acknowledgedly American dishes. This, we think, is what he wanted when he asked for an American dinner.

I
Okra and Tomato Soup
Saltines
Radishes		California Ripe Olives
II
Planked Shad
Parker House Rolls
Sliced Cucumbers		Stuffed Celery
III
Roast Vermont Turkey		Peanut Dressing
Cranberry Sauce
Succotash		Franconia Potatoes
Pickled Watermelon Rind		Barberry Jelly
Sweet Cider		Frozen Punch
IV
Hearts of Lettuce
Thousand Islands Dressing
V
Washington Pie
Baked Alaska with Maple Sugar Sauce
Concord Grapes		Florida Kumquats
Jonathan Apples
Salted Pecans	Coffee	Wintergreen Candies

Three more courses could be added: a cocktail to open up with; a fritter to follow the fish course; a game course with or preceding the salad. Too elaborate, is it? Well, no, for we think it is only in keeping with our guest, and to be expected of any hostess who would entertain such a guest, and who would want to put her best foot first and make a good splurge, and let the Spread Eagle spread himself for all he was worth.

P. S.—We forgot to insert our accompaniment to the hearts of lettuce salad with the Thousand Islands dressing. Here it is: Wee triangular sandwiches of Boston brown bread filled with sage cheese. These are really very dainty; the bread is cut very thin, the filling is thin, they look attractive, and they taste good. Naturally, you would expect us to include our Boston specialty in any American menu.

JANET M. HILL AND MARY D. CHAMBERS, Editors of American Cookery Magazine

Boston, December 31

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Frankly, our sympathies are with Oscar, because we do not believe there is an American dinner. American cookery is as cosmopolitan as its citizenship, and in our judgment it is little to be wondered at that Oscar found difficulty in making a single selection that would be typical in the one meal of all the wealth of American tradition. The New England dinner is to be sure an American dinner; but the Southern fried chicken is no less so. Moreover, in its own locality the one is an entire stranger to the other.

Perhaps, after all, Oscar was not so far wrong in offering to his English guest a dinner that was flavored by that contact with the Old World which America enjoys.

New York, December 27 MILDRED MADDOCKS BENTLEY, Chairman, Advisory Board, Good Housekeeping Institute

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Aw, heck! Why continue all these epicurean essays on How to Overfeed Mr. Lloyd George in the face of a starving world? Why will we Americans insist on trying to "put on the dog" for a man who has seen more "dog" than we can produce? Novelty and nourishment will appeal to him more. Therefore, in behalf of the greatest State in the union, Texas, and in the name of some of its most virile citizens, I rise to suggest the typically American dinner of "sow belly and beans."

Delhi, California, December 14

E. L. PACKARD

YOU THINKERS OF THE NATION—

who are au courant with national and international issues, the latest trend in literature, arts and sciences, who read with avidity and understanding everything that inspires thought, discussion and progress, come to THE FORUM!

It is a real Forum—in which there is free speech—and to which you may bring up any topic for discussion.

THE FORUM seeks to discover rather than to guide public opinion; to give a hearing rather than to impose a doctrine.

Note the Contents for February

Than which there are none better in any magazine.

THE LITTLE FRENCH GIRL: Anne Douglas Sedgwick, the author of "Tante" and "Adrienne Toner," begins her new serial novel. It is a story which presents highly colorful pictures of life in semi-Bohemian France, in vivid contrast with the staid habits of life in rural England.

MY LIFE IN ART—some chapters from the life of Constantin Stanislavsky, Director of the Moscow Art Theatre. A truly remarkable account of the materializing of an ideal—the building up, from apparently nothing, of an organization which attains the pinnacle of success wherever it appears. This is the first instalment of a series.

THE FLY: Luigi Pirandello, author of "Seven Characters in Search of an Author."
HOW CAN PSYCHIC PHENOMENA BE EXPLAINED?

1. Fragments of Psychical Science, Walter Franklin Prince.
2. The Animus of Psychical Research, Joseph Jastrow.

Mysterious manifestations which never lose their fascination are debated by two philosophers who have devoted years to the investigation of the subject.

WHY EUROPE HAS NOT MADE PEACE: Guglielmo Ferrero.

One of the greatest living European historians makes some illuminating and caustic observations on the general bungling that has been indulged in by European statesmen.

And Many Other Features

THE FORUM

A Magazine of Discussion

Edited by Henry Goddard Leach

SPECIAL OFFER—SEND NO MONEY

Every dealer in good magazines sells THE FORUM at 35 cents a copy. But because we should like to introduce THE FORUM as quickly as possible to those who will appreciate it to the fullest we will enter your subscription for 4 months, beginning with the current issue, at the special price of $1.00. If your check book is not handy, don't delay. Send the order without money and remit on receipt of bill.

This Special Offer is temporary, so send the coupon NOW.

THE FORUM,

247 Park Avenue, New York.

In accordance with your Special Offer, enter my subscription to THE FORUM for 4 months, beginning with the current issue.

☐ Enclosed is $1.00.

☐ I will remit $1.00 on receipt of bill.

(Place x in box showing method of payment preferred.)

Name

Address City State N

Foreign $1.20.

Books

Musical Chronicles

My Musical Life. By Walter Damrosch. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

Musical Chronicle: 1917-1923. By Paul Rosenfeld. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

ACCORDING to Voltaire the secret of being a bore is to tell everything. Walter Damrosch, far from imparting boredom in "My Musical Life," leaves the reader in the plight of Oliver Twist, begging for more. Not a little of this volume is taken up with family matters, ancestry and childhood and sprightly memories of calf love ("The following year I fell madly in love with Madame Teresa Carreño. . . . I was sixteen and she was twenty-four, radiantly beautiful, brilliantly educated, and a remarkable linguist. . . . But my schoolboy adoration received a severe shock when, on the last day of our tour, a handsome and very robust Italian baritone, by the name of Tagliapietra, came to meet her and I found that she was madly in love with him. They were married a short time after"). These and kindred subjects would not need dwelling on in another volume, and Mr. Damrosch could continue without stint to gossip of his memories and recount illuminating anecdotes about musicians dead and living. For one suspects that in the present volume Mr. Damrosch makes only a small, though highly entertaining, draft on an inexhaustible store.

Several of the chapters in the book are valuable as contributions to the musical history of America. Still, it is the less official reminiscences that make the most engrossing reading. They run from James G. Blaine and Andrew Carnegie to Theodore Roosevelt and General Pershing; from Liszt, Wagner, and von Bülow to Saint-Saëns, d'Indy, Nadia Boulanger, and Fauré. Indeed, there are moments when the reader becomes positively dizzy before this unremitting procession of the mighty. But Mr. Damrosch carries it all off most gallantly at a pleasantly allegro pace.

Quotation is inevitable. Take the story of Marianne Brandt, the Austrian contralto, calling for a registered letter at the New York post office. The clerk asked her for some identifying document. The lady had none with her, but she was Marianne Brandt of the Metropolitan Opera House and she wanted that letter! The clerk stood on the strictness of the rules.

By this time Brandt was in a state of high indignation. "You will not give me the letter? I will prove to you that I am Marianne Brandt!" And then she proceeded with full voice to sing the great cadenza from her principal aria in "Le Prophète." Her glorious voice echoed and reechoed through the vaulted corridors of the post office. Men came running from all sides to find out what had happened and finally the agitated official handed her the letter, saying, "Here is your letter, but for God's sake be quiet!"

There is a delectable glimpse of Lilli Lehmann and Lillian Nordica going out from a "Lohengrin" rehearsal into a terrific New York downpour.

Lilli saw Madame Nordica approach a coachman in livery who was waiting with opened umbrella to take her to her coupé. Lilli, clad in a long, gray rain-coat and old hat, turned to Nordica: "Ha, you ride? I walk!" she said, as she lifted her dress and showed a pair of great boots.

Mr. Damrosch adds:

Our performances of "Lohengrin" with this combination proved artistically very interesting. . . . Lehmann's Ortrude was truly demonic, worthy to rank with that of Marianne Brandt's in its representation of concentrated hatred.

The chapter on Hans von Bülow is one of the richest and most vivid in the book. An engrossing chapter on Liszt and Wagner ends with an unexpected and enthusiastic appreciation of Liszt's oratorio "Christus," of which Mr. Damrosch conducted the first complete performance in America.

Mr. Damrosch has one passage that is simply priceless on the hidden orchestra system, à la Bayreuth, versus the "prima donna conductor," he who through his gestures "dramatizes" the music:

By the skilful manipulation of his arms and hands, his hips and his hair, he gives the impression that when the 'cellos play a soulful melody it really drips from his wrists, and when the kettledrums play a dramatic roll it is really the result of a flash of his eye. There are many people, especially among the gentle sex, to whom admiration for one conductor entails a deep hatred of all others. It would be interesting to note how many of them could pick out their favorite if half a dozen of the prima donnas of the baton were to perform invisibly with an invisible orchestra in quick succession.

Two or three surprising inaccuracies have crept into the book. Of course Mr. Damrosch knows that 1861, not 1849, is the date of the historic introduction of "Tannhäuser" to Paris, but his idea that Bispham, not Mertens, was the Chillingworth in the first stage performance of his opera "The Scarlet Letter" might be set down to an unfulfilled-wish complex.

Mr. Damrosch devotes one chapter to "dead composers," meaning the composers that are dead for him. Bruckner, Mahler, Raff, and Rubinstein are conspicuous on his obituary list; he pronounces lifeless the "Anacreon" overture of Cherubini, the "Melusine" overture of Mendelssohn, and the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark. Well, each and every one of us is entitled to a private tonal cemetery. Mr. Rosenfeld in his "Musical Chronicle" has his, but regards Bruckner as very much alive, and though he chants the requiem of Mahler and Saint-Saëns he is an earnest apologist for the "Mona" of the late Professor Parker.

Mr. Rosenfeld denominates his book a "chronicle," but it deals far less with the actual experience of the concert-room and the opera house than with the musical bookshelves. Since his opinions are expressed with great positiveness and little nuance, his readers will have sport a plenty agreeing or disagreeing with him. I am personally grateful to him for his praise of Arnold Schönberg's orchestral transcription of two Bach choral preludes. These finely sensitive and skilful arrangements, shot through with moted sunbeams from the Leipzig cantor's Thomaskirche organ loft, found little favor in New York, seemingly because they present Bach as Bach, not as an overgrown teak-wood packing case.

PITTS SANBORN

The Vitalizing of Education

Sidney Ball: Memories and Impressions of "An Ideal Don."

Arranged by Oona Howard Ball. Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 10s. 6d.

The Story of a Great Schoolmaster. By H. G. Wells. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

"CAN these bones live?" was the text of one of the most famous of Newman's sermons from the pulpit of St. Mary's, Oxford. It was the possibility of a religious revival that concerned the great preacher, but the same question has been pertinently asked with respect to the national service rendered by the university as a place of higher education in general. Nothing short of a miracle, it has seemed to many, would avail to emancipate Oxford from deadening conservatism and bring her into vital contact with the progressive movements of the new time. How far she has traveled since Newman's day may be gauged from the fact that a few weeks ago the Master and Fellows of Balliol placed the college buildings at the disposal of the Drapers' Chamber of Trade of the United Kingdom for a summer school! The reforms which have so drastically transformed the older universities during the last few decades are due in the main to the influence of such men as Sidney Ball—a college don wholly unknown to the popular newspapers and the general public, but with a personality that made a deep impression upon the academic world.

A strong Liberal with Socialist views, he was elected in 1882 to a fellowship and tutorship at St. John's, where the spirit of the place was ultra-Tory and an ecclesiastical tradition of High Church Jacobitism was zealously maintained. How his rare qualities of mind and character speedily disarmed opposition can be learned from the contributions made to this memoir by some of his colleagues. The active help he gave to the foundation of Toynbee Hall was one of the earliest indications of his desire—one might almost say his passion—for making the universities a force for social amelioration. "Languor," he once said, "can only be conquered by enthusiasm; and enthusiasm can only be kindled by two things—an ideal which takes the imagination by storm, and a definite intelligible plan for carrying out that ideal into practice." That belief was virtually the key-note of his own life. It found expression notably in the service he rendered to the Workers' Educational Association, the most fruitful of all the recent movements for the democratization of education in England.

But, however keen may be the interest of a college tutor in social problems outside, his first duty is to his own pupils. If anyone wishes to understand why Oxford men swear by their tutorial system, let him read and ponder this biography. After all, the main element of Sidney Ball's influence was his power as a teacher and inspirer of youth. Old pupils testify that he stimulated more than he directed or formed; that he did not mold minds so much as kindle them and bring them into living touch with the great thinkers; that he was a fountain of generous encouragement to younger men, always seeking, and always ready to welcome, any signs of promise; and that he had a ready responsiveness, which invited and deserved confidence.

The problem of modernizing an ancient institution without destroying its most characteristic and valuable features is no less difficult and insistent with regard to the old endowed schools of England than with regard to its universities. The composite biography of Sanderson of Oundle shows us with what courage, insight, and skill one headmaster of recent years set himself to solve it. He took hold of an obscure and dwindling school of fifteenth-century foundation and raised it to the front rank. In this respect his achievement suggests comparison with Thring's at Uppingham, and he resembled Thring also in the gusto with which he flung himself into every task, in his constant insistence upon more abundant life as the great desideratum, and even in the explosiveness of his temper. The school, he maintained, must be closely linked with community life, so that adult life should not be a breaking away from it but a continuation and development of it.

It was a maxim of Sanderson's that "a modern education does not consist in discarding Greek." He was no enemy of literature and the arts, as the importance he attached to the teaching of music clearly showed. At the same time, he emphasized the necessity for giving science a more effective place. He complained that, although science had come into the schools, the scientific spirit, outlook, and method had not touched the fringe of school life. School, he insisted, should be a place where a boy comes not to learn but to create, and it was the creative value of science that most appealed to him. He was, himself, experimenting all the time; he wanted his masters to be always experimenting in new directions; and he stimulated the same spirit of inquiry and initiative in the boys. Another of his notable traits was his love of spaciousness. "A school," he said, "should be 'a spacious garden' in which each boy has been set that he may 'dress it and keep it.'" When a school chapel was being planned, the building was to be lofty and spacious, with no fixed seats—a place not for the mind to sit down in but for the mind to move about in. He hated "wretched little books"; boys should have free access to sumptuous, "spacious" editions.

This biography might be advertised as a teachers' tonic.

HERBERT W. HORWILL

More China Broken

Lazy Laughter. By Woodward Boyd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

TO abjure that most perverse of critical vices, finding fault with a book for not being something it never was intended to be—as for instance berating Mr. Van Loon for not being Mr. Wells, and berating Mr. Wells for not being Mr. Gibbon—it is necessary to discover what the author does intend, a task more difficult in the present instance than would at first appear. For at first one says this is a story of laziness, too blithely told for offensive moralizing, hereditary laziness, aided and abetted by the possession of sufficient wealth to make activity unnecessary. But as the pages proceed without shedding any new light on the motivation of laziness, or on its manifestations, this easy conclusion appears questionable. We are not led to infer that Dagmar is unable to act because she is neurotic, or because of any twist in her nature traceable to a cause. She is simply a lively, saucy, piquant girl who rides and dances and criticizes the older generation and her own with sufficient fervor, but is too lazy to get up in the morning or to do any work requiring continuous application.

Yet laziness as a theme has various connotations that might have borne directly on Dagmar's story. The book reveals a healthy disdain for inaction, but it would seem to be of the unquestioning, naive variety, since it gives no hint of any possible work better worth doing than remaining idle, the implication apparently being that one should work for work's sake. Mere activity as such has little more in its favor than quiescence, a discovery that the sons and grandsons of self-made men are making, not without bitterness. Here is material for a drama of our generation quite as absorbing as the older one having to do with man's development of a newly discovered continent. But the writer passes it by. Dagmar is a lazy girl and laziness is reprehensible, though charming and provocative of despair in the Marthas of an unequal world.

But if the book is not written with the malicious object of making people more energetic by contemplating the sad fate of this heroine who, very like her mother before her, is obliged at the end to marry a fifty-year-old man whom she doesn't love instead of a handsome blond boy whom she does, all because she is too lazy and too spoiled to be poor; if, in short, the book isn't written to point a moral, and isn't written to give us a picture of laziness, what is it all about?

It contains the usual sprightly exposé of the younger generation, but with Floyd Dell turning out his third painstaking monograph on the subject, with Scott Fitzgerald, C. Kay Scott, and numerous runners-up all active, the competition in that field has become so keen that the jaunty tossing off of half-a-dozen samples of the argot of the species no longer suffices to make a successful book. In "Lazy Laughter," in spite of every inclination to feel initiated, one is even a bit suspicious of the genuineness of some of the patter. When Dagmar says to the fifty-year-old admirer who sits next to her at a dinner given by one of St. Paul's Social Register hostesses: "I think he's an egg, don't you?" "Rather," said Will, smiling. Joe Brown, however, had caught the last part of the conversation. He beamed. "Egg? Oh, yes, egg. I think that's an awfully good expression. I always use it!"—even senile credulity balks.

This is a horrible example. There are much better specimens. As Dagmar of her mother: "A concert's awful on the poor thing's muscles. She's a nice woman and a good mother, but she will pose at concerts. I do it sometimes too. It keeps me from being bored thinking up different scouful expressions. Margaret does it all the time. She always has to have an extra-facial massage after a concert."

But a book of 295 pages relieved by some dozen high spots like this?

In short this book of and by the younger generation leans rather heavily on the lipstick and the rouge-pot. Some hundred pages of sloppy, commonplace writing such as "Dagmar was not of the caliber which frets either openly or secretly because she is deserted for wealth. She had too much charm to ever be deserted completely," etc., are relieved by an occasional bit of red on the cheeks or maspero under the eyes. But to find that "the eraser rampant is the heraldic insignia of the younger generation" is insufficient compensation for the heavy passage work. Laughter is its own excuse for being, but it can't carry too heavy a load.

Miss Boyd has a talent for satire. She is a well-informed and saucy reporter on the younger generation, and is able to view her surroundings with some detachment. For the present she is still engaged in crowing over her toes and breaking over again those poor battered pieces of china which have been smashed so profitably times out of number during the last few years.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Don Juan

The Love-Rogue. Transmuted from the Spanish of Tirso de Molina by Harry Kemp. Charles and Albert Boni. $1.75.

OFTEN there is a magic about words half understood that entirely disappears when their exact meaning and connotation are known. Especially is this true in reading in a foreign language, where although we grasp the common meaning of the individual words the strangeness inherent in sound and syntax throws over the whole a kind of poetic haze where none exists. Only thus can I explain the enthusiasm that Harry Kemp professes he felt in "transmuting" "El Burlador de Sevilla y Convidado de Piedra" (The Deceiver of Seville and the Stone Guest), the seventeenth-century Spanish play from which, directly or indirectly, springs the vast Don Juan literature.

This play, usually ascribed to Tirso de Molina, is certainly not great in the sense that Harry Kemp believes it to be. "As I read on and on," he tells us, "the greatness of the work dazzled me. . . . Its dialogue was at times as succinct and rapid as Euripides at his best" and the long speeches and soliloquies were buoyed up by a "rushing flame of poetry." If Tirso's play deserves the attention of posterity, it is rather because of the creation and depiction of the character of Don Juan. In poetic expression it falls far short of most of Tirso's work and the best productions of his contemporaries. Mr. Kemp, however, contrives to find in its prosaic language and the poetic clichés common to Spanish literature of the time, a "running fire that sparkles and lives beneath the flow of verse and line." In justice to Tirso, however, it should be stated that the play has come down to us only in a very imperfect text, which undoubtedly suffered mutilation after leaving the dramatist's hands.

Mr. Kemp tells us that his method of translation is that of Fitzgerald in his rendering of the Rubaiyat, a free carrying over into English of the aroma and richness of the original. In all fairness it should be said that Mr. Kemp has succeeded in doing this in so far as his original allowed him. He has even added some lines of his own making, most of them not out of keeping with the spirit of the Spanish play. A totally incompatible addition is, however, Don Diego's remark when Don Juan's deceptions become known, that his son "knows no honor." For if the modern reader is to find the character of that Spanish Don Juan at all convincing, it can only be by understanding the peculiar ideas of morality and honor held in Spain at that time. Judged by them Don Juan was the arch-deceiver of women, immoral certainly, but not dishonorable. Dishonor for the Spaniard of those days could come only from the failure to avenge a wrong done to him or to a woman of his immediate family, and Don Juan was never in such a predicament. His betrayal of the daughters and sweethearts of other men brought no stain upon his own reputation. Indeed, in accepting, not without mockery and bravado, the fatal challenge of his enemy Don Gonzalo, returned from the other world, he kept his honor unsullied until the very end of his wild career, though he lost his life and soul. However hard we may find it to stomach this Don Juan today, the conception of his character was consistent with the age and race that produced it.

W. L. FICHTER

What Do We Want?

A Theory of Consumption. By Hazel Kyrk. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

WHY do we want what we do want? Miss Hazel Kyrk has written a 300-page Hart Schaffner and Marx book to tell us, and probably she has succeeded about as well as anyone can in the present rudimentary stage of social psychology. She concludes, unflatteringly enough, that most of our choices are quite unreflectingly determined by standards of living foisted on us mostly by social inheritance. By the time a man is old enough to be free to buy what he wants, his tastes are largely formed, and thenceforward he simply helps tyrannize over the oncoming generation. So we go forward, formally free to choose, actually subject forever to a social control subtly exercised through our individual choices. It is certainly a discouraging world for an independent man, and the worst of it is that it's true. Give an ordinary person a larger income, and the only thing he can think of to do with it is to incorporate into his standard the expenditures of his pecuniary betters. Some of us concluded a long while ago that the worst thing about gross inequality in distribution of wealth is the wholly factitious and undeserved importance it gives the rich in helping determine what the rest of the community shall spend their money for. Miss Kyrk comes near proving it.

But if we are all tied to existing standards of living, like horses to hitching posts, standards of living, unlike hitching posts, themselves move, happily or unhappily. Miss Kyrk doubts whether the producer bosses us in this respect quite as much as we like to assume in our moments of indignation, and she even has the temerity to suggest that he is interested in stability rather than instability of styles. However, "behind all the incentives to change and expansion of the mode of living inherent in the individual and the social organization, there is the pressure of the deliberate organized effort of profit-seeking producers. They augment and accelerate, if they do not initiate and govern, changes in standards." Odd that we think it safe to let any genius who cares to do so make us want Gorton's codfish or Gillette safety razors or Wrigley's spearmint gum. It's an odd world anyway in its irrationality, and Miss Kyrk's book will only help rob the reader of any sneaking suspicion he may have harbored of rationality in his own choices or in social choices—in a world of war and politics, and of love and sunshine.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Three English Critics

Some Authors. A Collection of Literary Essays, 1896-1916.

By Walter Raleigh. Oxford University Press. $5.

The Continuity of Letters. By John Bailey. Oxford University Press. $4.20.

George Gissing. A Critical Study. By Frank Swinnerton. George H. Doran Company. $2.

R. L. Stevenson. A Critical Study. By Frank Swinnerton. George H. Doran Company. $2.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH'S posthumous volume gathers up the best of the critical work which for one reason or another was never included in any volume while he lived. If he had been the editor, he doubtless would have found a few commonplaces or statements of irrelevant fact to remove; but the essays in general stand by themselves, and admirably round out a body of critical writing which included books on Milton, Shakespeare, Wordsworth, Johnson, and Stevenson, and which without doubt belonged with the richest modern writing of its kind.

Sir Walter was a professor at Oxford, but he had very little patience with professors. "One misfortune which attends the growth of universities," he says in his essay on Boccaccio, "is that learned debates and investigations on the incidents of the life of a great man are carried on by trained bores, whom no one would dream of trusting to give judgment on any incident in the life of any one who is still alive." And later on he dismisses the awful academic concern with "sources" as superfluous in view of the fact that Boccaccio himself did not know the origins of his stories. "He picked them up where he found them—the greater part, perhaps, in conversation. A man who buys wares and trinkets from a traveling peddler does not generally concern himself much with the trade routes of Europe." Sir Walter was sensible, direct, and imaginative, and he had the experience of life and literature which makes it possible to drive straight into the center of a great author. His account of Boccaccio is perhaps the finest thing in the present volume, though Cervantes fares almost as well. The deeper layers of irony in "Don Quixote" are carefully uncovered, and an understanding of the Don himself is reached which makes it clear how the reader's love for him complicates that irony. The essay on Sir Thomas Hoby is well known to those who have used the translation of Castiglione to which it was an introduction. It is ripe with lore of the Renaissance, and richly expressive of the ideal of many-sidedness which Sir Walter cherished. Sir John Harington, Dryden, and the first Marquis of Halifax are handled with characteristic discernment, and there is a most informing study of the seventeenth-century battle between the ancients and the moderns. The essays on Burns, Blake, Shelley, Arnold, Whistler, and Burke are slighter, but all of them contribute toward the self-revelation of a scholar who, while subscribing to the oldest and most respectable of literary traditions, never lost himself in generalities and always had something shrewd to say.

Mr. Bailey has less to say. He evidently aspires to the company of Saintsbury, Raleigh, and Ker, and if enthusiasm or wide reading alone sufficed he would be there. But he tries to cruise with too slack a sail along the shores of the world's literature, and he seldom arrives definitely in any port. His vast commonplaces settle fewer questions than at first they seem to settle. Of what value, for instance, is the conclusion that poetry should be compounded of both life and art—not too much or too little of either? How can the Grand Style be defined by one who relies loosely upon the adjectives large, serious, and noble? What does sanity mean, and centrality, and universality, and immortality? Mr. Bailey never quite tells.

Mr. Swinnerton's studies of Gissing and Stevenson are reprinted with a few changes from the original issues of 1912 and 1914. They were called astringent then, and they are astringent now, but fewer now will call them unjust. They are the farthest possible in temper from the more leisurely, genial essays of Raleigh and Bailey. For one thing, they deal with contemporary authors about whose figures no irremovable deposit of sentiment and idea has accumulated. For another thing, they are the work not so much of a professional critic as of an artist concerned intensely and practically with the rules of his art. Mr. Swinnerton is a writer of fiction, and he has very bravely sat down to see how capable his subjects were as writers of fiction. He has not cared in the least to make allowances for Gissing's poverty or for Stevenson's ill health; for his purposes Grub Street and R. L. S. do not exist. The result is harsh but refreshing. Gissing is found to be the author of half a dozen almost first-rate novels, and Stevenson is reduced to his style—such as it is—and a handful of perfect short stories. Contemporary English criticism can profitably emulate this terseness, and it will do well to attain this accuracy.

MARK VAN DOREN

Books in Brief

Problems of Modern Science. Edited by Arthur Dendy. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

This attractive volume consists of a series of eight public lectures delivered at King's College, London, by officers of that institution. For the most part these lectures present well-written, interesting, and up-to-date statements of the problems in process of solution in various scientific fields. Unfortunately, however, the treatment is not uniform, and in three of the fields, namely, organic chemistry, biology, and botany, the accounts given seem inadequate and somewhat out of tone with the rest of the book. This is unexpected, for from the material available one would expect to find these fields among the most interesting. Thus, in the chapter on biology, where many of the most vital and interesting problems lie close at hand, Mr. Dendy gives what really amounts to a rather uninspired classification of the various biological sciences. Perhaps Mr. Halliburton's chapter on physiology appeals most strongly.

The Complete Poems of Robert Louis Stevenson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

Contains over two hundred new poems, most of which are occasional and scarcely worth reviving except for the sake of completeness.

Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1923 and Yearbook of American Poetry. Edited by William Stanley Braithwaite. B. J. Brimmer Company. $3.

The latest volume in Mr. Braithwaite's famous and invaluable series. The introduction this time is pessimistic, for although the editor has seen many good poets born during the past year he has seen no great ones; and among those who were great already he is alarmed to note a tendency to waste creative energy on other things than poetry—on fiction, criticism, anthologies, and biography. Is the new poetry, then, so early old?

Memoirs of the Harvard Dead in the War Against Germany. By M. C. Howe and others. Volumes I-IV. Harvard University Press. Vol I, $3; Vols. II-IV, $4.

Perhaps nowhere in America was there more genuine passion for the war as a holy crusade than at Harvard. These boys went out as eager volunteers, gallant, adventuresome, courageous. Their stories, told in their own letters and journals and in the reminiscences of their comrades-in-arms, form an authentic chapter, one of the noblest and, in the light of post-war events, one of the most pathetic in the whole history of the war. These were fervid and sensitive spirits who found in battle an ultimate test and realization which civil life had failed to give them. There are relatively few doughboys among them—most of them naturally took their places as officers (with a proud sense of noblesse oblige that made them beloved of their men)—and if they felt it they omitted from their letters the overwhelming monotony and dirt which to Barbusse and Dos Passos were symbols of trench life. Nor is there in their letters more than a rare hint of any realization of the futility of their sacrifice. They died, like so many Americans, still incurable romantics. Romantic hope, after all, is the power of America, and these memoirs record more than the loss of lovable boys; they bare the enormous waste of a generation given no better way to spend its generous energy.

Drama Amid Shadows

THE PROVINCETOWN PLAYHOUSE reopened the other night with Strindberg's "The Spook Sonata." The program leaflet contained brief essays by Mr. Eugene O'Neill, Mr.

Robert Edmond Jones, and Mr. Kenneth Macgowan, all very interesting and subtly intelligent and well-written and all saying that the imitation of nature in art was crude and vieux jeu and that the new drama, the expressionist drama which derives through Wedekind from the plays of Strindberg's last period, is the only kind of drama which can, so to speak, get under the flesh and bone of life and show the forces by which this human and this cosmic show is run. It may be so. And it is doubtless true that naturalism, having been brought to a point of marvelous perfection by Strindberg and Hauptmann, must yield—in the swing and sway of mood—to some immediately fresher form of projecting action and meaning on the stage. But what our expressionist friends always forget is that the imitation of nature is one of the permanent moods of literature, that it is not outworn because "A Doll's House" seems a little stale to them, and that the "fat-facts," in Mr. O'Neill's contemptuous phrase, radiate significance in Homer and Goethe and Fielding as well as in Ibsen and Hauptmann.

Having taken this theoretical exception I welcome the new Provincetown group. The production of "The Spook Sonata" was extraordinarily sensitive. Nothing in it was more interesting than the use of Mr. James Light's masks for certain of the characters. One accepted these without question; they made for both the remoteness and ghostly intimacy which are the strangely blended notes of these latest "chamber-plays" of Strindberg. And Mr. Walter Abel, Mr. Stanley Howlett, Miss Helen Freeman, and, especially, Miss Clare Eames all, in their several ways, tugged at one's nerves if not at one's heart with the blind pain of their lives. . . .

The blind pain. . . . That is what is rendered here. That is why, with an enormous admiration for Strindberg, the whole Strindberg, I am comparatively unimpressed by "The Spook Sonata." It is not very profound; it is only opaque. And it is opaque because Strindberg never, for a moment, freed himself from the seven veils of illusion. As a naturalist he is great; his facts speak out beyond his vision. Here he seems to seek vision. But his eyes are neither on the earth nor on the horizon. They are still fixed on the old, old wounds in his nerves.

I do not, Heaven forbid, ask for silver linings. I ask for transcendence. It may be of the sternest kind; it may be of the kind expressed in Bertrand Russell's "A Free Man's Worship." But to me, at least, the synthetic or symbolic treatment of life in art has, from the nature of things, no inner reasonableness, unless there is a transcendence. There is none in "The Dance of Death." There need not be. All that is perishable is an intelligible symbol. In "The Spook Sonata" we are robbed of our own interpretative function. Nothing remains but a rendering, in dark, confused, muffled tones, of the pain and wretchedness and hatred of the dance of death gone quite blind and cold and stale.

Fresher and more interesting is "The Race with the Shadow" by Wilhelm von Scholz, which the Theater Guild presents in special afternoon performances for its subscribers only. Scholz belongs to a small group of German playwrights, of whom Moritz Heimann is the chief, that rebelled against both Hauptmann and Wedekind and attempted a kind of psychological neo-classicism. "The Race with the Shadow" explores the secrets of the creative imagination, rather, perhaps, of creative intuition. Without words Dr. Martin has drawn from his wife the necessary history of her past. He embodies it, with naive creative instinctiveness, in a novel. The progress of this novel catches in the snares of the creative imagination the wife and the man who comes out of her past. The play, though difficult, is full of profound perceptions, reachings out into the unexplored country of the soul, new relationships and new shadings. Mr. Arnold Daly and Miss Helen Westley gave very adequate performances. Mr. Ben Ami was vocally heavy, almost melodramatic. This admirable artist needs passion as his theme. He is a stranger among shadows.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents
FAY Bainter in
"THE OTHER ROSE"
with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 45th Street
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

BELMONT
48 St. E. of Bway
Evs. 8:30. Mats.
Thur. & Sat. 2:30
tarnish
"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."—Ludwig Lewisohn,
THE NATION.

"One play
in a thousand"
Alexander Woolcott
in the Herald
Outward Bound with a Distinguished Cast
at the
RITZ THEATRE
West 48 St. Evs. 8:30.
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

PRINCESS THEATRE 39th Street
east of Broadway. Evs.
8:45. Matinees
Thurs. and Sat., 2:45.
SUN UP With
LUCILLE LA VERNE
By LULA VOLLMER

YIDDISH ART THEATRE 27th St. and
Madison Ave.
Maurice Swartz, Director
Abraham Goldfaden's classic comedy revival
"THE TWO KOONY LAMMELS"
Friday, 8:30
Also Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!
DAVID BELASCO Presents
LIONEL BARRYMORE
with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Evs. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Thea., 41st St., W. of Broadway, Evs., 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano
de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander
Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

BROADHURST Theatre, 44th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:30
RICHARD BENNETT in
THE DANCERS
"I have not seen a better play than 'The Dancers' for a long while."
—JOHN BARRYMORE.

International Relations Section

British Labor and the British Labor Government

WITH the completion of its first Cabinet, the debate that has been stirring the forces of British Labor since December has acquired a new edge: What will, what should the first Labor Government do with its power? Labor's answers to this question, as reflected in its journals, reveal what wide differences of aim and outlook separate one group from the other within the labor fold. In its general support of the new Government, labor from the Communist Party to the Social-Democratic Federation is a unit; in its advocacy of governmental program labor is sharply split. While recognizing generally the difficulties confronting the new Government, opinion on this latter point tends to fall into one of three categories: official (reflecting the aims of the dominant group in the Labor Party), opposition, and trade union. The following extracts from current British labor journals illustrate respectively each of these three types. The Labor Magazine, official organ of the Trade Union Congress and the Labor Party, expresses its attitude to the task at hand as follows:

We remain unconvinced of the sincerity of those who opposed a Labor government on the ground that it will be a minority government, but who would welcome either a Tory or Liberal government on the same basis. Political power does not rest solely upon party numerical strength. The quality and merits of government measures are a vital factor, and if the Labor Party sets itself to deal faithfully, wisely, and prudently with the pressing problems of unemployment, the international situation, housing, industry, education, and finance the strength of their position will not be accurately measured by voting power. This can only be the case if Liberals and Tories refuse to deal with Labor proposals on their merits and decide their parliamentary attitude in a narrow partisan spirit. If this were done, we believe the country would, in due course, express its indignation in a very emphatic manner. . . .

Premier Ramsay MacDonald has insisted from the outset that the task of the new Government will be more political than an administrative one. In his election message he sounded the major note upon which he has played ever since:

The task of the Labor Party is to move in such a way as to consolidate political issues in two camps divided on principle (i.e., to eliminate the Liberal Party from British political life).

It is significant that in a signed editorial in the New Leader, weekly organ of the Independent Labor Party, of which Mr. MacDonald is the leader, Mr. H. N. Brailsford expressed the same view:

We must limit our outlook to a period of two or three months. . . . The danger before us leaps out from some of the extensive programs which have already appeared in Labor speeches and in print. If we set our hopes on a big agenda, if we talk even of six or eight months of office, then inevitably we shall drift into the fatal attitude of buying it on the only possible terms—by arrangement with the Liberals, which would obscure our Socialist policy, compromise our independence, and make us in the end mere caretakers of a capitalist and imperialist system. . . .

The actual issues considered by the supporters of the dominant group within the new Government emphasize unemployment relief through guaranties and some loans, the "recognition of Russia within twenty-four hours of our assumption of office," tax reforms, "parliamentary procedure" and electoral reform, and a new foreign policy.

THE LABOR OPPOSITION

To the opposition groups a desirable program for the new Government is very different. The position of the Communist Review reflects more or less faithfully that of this entire bloc within the ranks:

The idea of conquering capitalism by a policy of "gradualism" is one of the fundamental errors of MacDonaldism. . . . The advent of a Labor Government, even of a liberal type, would, nevertheless, be a matter of tremendous importance in world politics. For one thing, it would help to spread confusion in the camp of the swash-buckling reactionaries now rampant in Middle Europe. This, in turn, may open a period of democratic pacifism which would have an effect upon such large masses of the working class, instinctively yearning for peace, as to postpone any revolutionary action for a decade. . . . A Labor Government, therefore, in Great Britain might conceivably give rise to that era of "Wilsonism" predicted by Comrade Trotsky at the Fourth Congress of the Communist International. That is a prospect to which we Communists cannot shut our eyes and ignore.

But for the Labor Party as a whole such a prospect presents a dilemma. Is it the business of the party to restore and preserve the economic balance of Europe in favor of capitalism? Or should it work to neutralize and paralyze, if need be, the baneful system of exploitation which has brought ruin and starvation to millions of the world's workers? On this point we have already two clearly marked tendencies before us. Officially, we may reasonably assume MacDonald, Webb, and the other Fabian leaders of the party will strike the road of "Wilsonism." In the opposition camp of the party we have Wheatley, Maxton, Johnston, etc., already committed to the policy of a fight to the finish with capitalism. Wheatley is right when he says to those who show concern at the present political stalemate and the importance of carrying on the King's Government, "We do not see the necessity."

. . . By all means, then . . . let it [the Labor Government] declare for a radical policy on unemployment, such as will establish the principle of work or guaranteed adequate maintenance, while aiming at cutting out the demoralizing anomalies in relief schemes and insurance acts. In this connection, political recognition of Soviet Russia with extended credits must be an essential part of any policy to tackle unemployment. There is also the principle of nationalization of the mines with a guaranteed minimum wage to meet the overdue claims of the miners, which are again being brought to the front. With such elementary and pressing home demands backed up by the policy of an all-international conference, including Russia and Germany, the Labor Party can give such strength and stimulus to the whole working-class movement as would sustain it in the challenge sure to come from both Liberals and Tories.

We insist, therefore, that the Labor Party will neither succumb to the bourgeois fetish of the two-party system, nor be deflected from a bold course by the sudden campaigns for reform in the electoral machinery. The demands of the working class are too serious to be postponed by playing at being "His Majesty's Opposition" or "His Majesty's Government. . . ."

The Worker, official organ of the British Bureau of the Red International of Labor Unions, and the Labor Monthly give voice both to warnings and to program suggestions very similar in underlying thought and aim. An outstanding characteristic of the opposition is the support it asks for the new Government in spite of differences. The Labor Monthly puts it as follows:

The first need for all of us at the present moment, whatever our differences, whatever our criticisms and distrust, is to unite in support of a workers' government and its supremacy first and foremost, and to exert all our forces one and all to fight on its behalf foursquare against the whole capitalist world.

The Communist Party had no candidates running against Labor Party candidates. In its election plea the Communist Review said:

We must close up the ranks of all the working-class organizations in a single united front against all the representatives of capitalism. . . . The Communist Party, while putting forward its own candidates and program, urges forward at this election the return of a Labor Government.

The Worker, too, is asking from the Government the creation of "a united front of labor" in politics and industry.

TRADE UNION OPINION

Most of the trade union journals grant the new Government their full trust and faith. Some, however, insist upon the separateness of trade-union activity. In view of the recent railway strike and the threatening miners' strike this latter attitude may lead to significant developments. The Electrical Trades Journal, official organ of the Electrical Trades Union, voices the trust typical of the majority of unions:

We believe that, notwithstanding the difficult circumstances under which the Labor Government will take office, they will be able to effect a real improvement in the economic and social conditions of the people.

The Record, official organ of the Transport and General Workers Union, ends its discussion of "Fit to Govern—and Ready" with a warning:

It appears obvious that at no distant date—in fact, in a few months—there must be another appeal to the country. That will be the true testing time. It behooves us to be prepared. . . . Funds for the next fight must be collected now. Machinery must be perfected.

The Railway Review, official organ of the National Union of Railwaymen, which was "neutral" in the recent strike, reprints a New Year's Message from Mr. C. T. Cramp, union leader of the striking enginemen and firemen, in which he says:

Even a Labor Government can only deal with national and international affairs at present and it must be left to trades unions to deal with the actual conditions of labor.

On the other hand, the Labor Magazine appeals for the political phase of the movement to the miners whose present balloting on the termination of the current agreement may precipitate a strike:

We are sure that the miners will not embarrass the first Labor Government by pressing untimely demands.

[The above is the first of several summaries of the opinion on various important questions of British and European labor and its organs.]

Economic Revival in Russia

1. THE LOW POINT OF 1920

INTERNATIONAL war, revolution, civil war, invasion, the blockade, and the famine combined to disorganize Russian economic life so completely that in 1919-1920 the total output of big industry had fallen to 511 million gold rubles, or 14.6 per cent of the pre-war figure. This proved to be the low point in Russian production. The three subsequent years show a steady improvement:

	Production in millions of gold rubles	Per cent of pre-war
1920-21.....	527	15.1
1921-22.....	754	21.3
1922-23.....	1,127	32.0

(Russian Information and Review, December 1, 1923, p. 346.)

The gain of each succeeding year has been greater than its predecessor. Thus the improvement has been progressive.

2. THE REVIVAL IS GENERAL

The improvement in production is not confined to any particular economic group, although it varies considerably from one group to another. In all groups, however, the progress made within the past year may be seen from this summary of the productivity of state industry for the year ended September 30, 1923:

Industry	Output	Per cent of 1913	Per cent of 1921-22
I. Fuel—
Coal (mil. tons).....	10.3	37	114
Oil (mil. tons).....	5.1	55	114
II. Metal—
Cast iron (mil. tons) .	.3	7	176
Steel (mil. tons).....	.6	14	186
III. Electrical goods—
(mil. rubles).....	26	61	174
IV. Textile—
Cotton thread (thous. poods).....	71	27	140
Wool (thous. poods) ..	14	36	137
Flax (thous. poods) ..	28	83	174
V. Chemicals (thous. poods)	205	45	152
VI. Leather—
Hides (mil. pieces)...	5.4	33	132
Footwear (mil. prs.) .	3	6	103
VII. Glass (thous. tons)....	61	34	246
VIII. Paper (thous. poods)...	63	43	230

(The same reference.)

These figures show that within the past year the fuel industry has improved about 14 per cent; that the steel industry has advanced about 75 per cent; and that other important industries show corresponding gains. Metal mining, though far below pre-war levels, has doubled since 1921-1922.

3. RUSSIAN CURRENCY AT PAR WITH STERLING

The debacle of the ruble made any form of foreign trade difficult or impossible. About a year ago the Russian Government established a form of currency based on a gold reserve in the Russian State Bank equal to 25 per cent of the note issue. These new notes, called "chervonetz," after a pre-war ten ruble piece, stood, on December 1, 1923, at 26.9 million chervonetz, making the proportion of gold reserve to note issue 33 per cent.

On November 25, 1923, the chervonetz was quoted in

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

Levitzki at his Steinway Carnegie Hall, New York

FOR more than 60 years the greatest figures in the world of music have elected to play the Steinway. Liszt and Wagner, once they heard the Steinway, would have no other piano. It became the voice of Paderewski, of Hofmann and Rachmaninoff. It is the one piano used by Friedman and Cortot. Mischa Levitzki said of the Steinway, "It is the only piano that satisfies my every wish." The qualities that endear the Steinway to the immortals of music contribute equally to the happiness of those who are lovers of music. For the pianist of the home there is no inspiration greater than the Steinway tone. Its perfection aids the musical development of children. All music achieves a higher plane when played upon the Steinway. It is because these things are true that every Steinway piano, no matter what its style or size, is a complete and perfect example of Steinway art.

There is a Steinway dealer in your community or near you through whom you may purchase a new Steinway piano with a cash deposit of 10%, and the balance will be extended over a period of two years. Used pianos accepted in partial exchange.

Prices: $875 and up; plus freight

STEINWAY & SONS, Steinway Hall, 109 East Fourteenth Street, New York City

London at 21s. 1d., which is the equivalent of ten pre-war rubles. On this basis, British and Russian business is being carried on with the two currencies at par.

The report of the State Bank Note account for December 1 shows gold coin and bullion of 8.7 million chervonetz. (Russian Information and Review, December 15, 1923, p. 377.)

This financial rehabilitation of Russia is probably the most important economic achievement of the past year. It has stabilized both internal and external trade relations.

4. THE RUSSIAN BUDGET FOR 1924

A budget department has been created in the People's Commissariat for Finance, and the state budget for the new year has been issued. The estimated sources of revenue include 28.8 million chervonetz from the agricultural tax, 4.5 millions from the industrial tax, and 4 millions from the income and property tax, making a total of 37.3 million chervonetz from direct taxation. Indirect taxes are counted on for 26.4 millions; income from state properties is placed at 6.4 millions; the railways, posts, and telegraphs are expected to yield 65 millions, making, with some miscellaneous items, a total of 140 millions. In addition, credit operations are relied on to yield 25 millions.

Heavy reductions have been made in the expense account of many of the departments. The one exception is the Commissariat for Education, which carries an increase of 15 per cent.

Although the Russian budget does not balance, it comes closer to it than that of any of the other great budgets, except that of Britain. The real test of the economic rehabilitation of Russia lies, not so much in its budget or in its finances as in its mining, farming, transport, and manufacturing industries. In some of these directions, at least, the past year reports quite a phenomenal improvement.

Back in the Fold

AN advertisement published in the Economic Review (a London business paper) for December 15, 1923, reads as follows:

State Bank of the Russian Federated Soviet Republic Created by Decree of the Soviet Government of October 12, 1921.

Chervonetz
Capital 5,000,000
Total amount of notes issued on Dec. 1, 1923. 26,776,000
Gold Reserve of Issue Department. 8,741,240
Note: 1 chervonetz is equal to ten gold rubles.

Head office:

Neglinni Proezd, 12, Moscow

The bank is represented by over 200 branches and agencies in all the principal towns of European and Asiatic Russia; the bank accepts deposits and opens current accounts in foreign gold and Russian currency; remittances to all parts of European and Asiatic Russia, payable both in Russian and foreign currency, effected; documentary credits opened; bills discounted; documents payable in Russia collected; banking business of every description transacted.

London Agents:

Lloyds Bank Limited
Barclays Bank Limited
Westminster Bank Limited
J. Henry Schroder & Co.
Arcos Banking Corporation, Ltd.

Thus completes the advertisement, with the exception of one phrase. Here is the Russian Soviet Government, advertising a full fledged banking business in the heart of the London financial district, having as its agents some of the strongest and best established of British banks, and having, in addition to the five already listed, "Guarantee Trust Company of New York, 32 Lombard St.,"—the London Branch of one of the most powerfully connected of all American banking institutions.

German Note Circulation

OFFICIAL records of the Imperial Bank of Germany of its "notes in circulation" at intervals from January 6 to November 30, 1923, together with the value in United States dollars and number of marks equaling one dollar, at the current rates of exchange for the respective dates, give the following startling picture:

	Marks Note Circulation ¹	Number of marks equaling one U. S. dollar ²	Equivalent of note circulation in U. S. dollars ²
Jan. 6.....	1,336,500,000,000	8,695	$153,697,500
Feb. 7.....	2,253,963,000,000	36,363	61,983,980
Mar. 7.....	3,871,256,000,000	20,619	187,755,910
Apr. 7.....	5,624,110,000,000	21,062	267,145,225
May 7.....	6,723,070,000,000	36,764	183,203,657
June 7.....	9,309,532,000,000	76,923	121,023,916
July 7.....	20,241,750,000,000	222,222	91,087,875
Aug. 7.....	62,326,659,000,000	3,125,000	19,944,530
Aug. 15.....	116,402,515,000,000	2,777,778	41,904,905
Aug. 23.....	273,906,373,000,000	4,347,826	62,998,465
Aug. 31.....	663,200,000,000,000	9,523,809	69,636,000
Sept. 7.....	1,182,039,000,000,000	33,333,333	35,461,170
Sept. 15.....	3,183,681,000,000,000	105,263,157	30,244,969
Sept. 22.....	8,627,730,000,000,000	172,413,793	50,040,834
Sept. 29.....	28,228,815,000,000,000	204,081,630	138,321,193
Oct. 6.....	46,933,600,000,000,000	909,090,909	61,626,960
Oct. 15.....	123,349,786,603,000,000	4,000,000,000	30,837,446
Oct. 22.....	524,330,557,246,000,000	41,444,444,444	11,797,487
Oct. 31.....	2,496,822,908,936,000,000	166,666,666,667	14,980,937
Nov. 7.....	19,153,087,168,804,000,000	2,500,000,000,000	7,661,234
Nov. 15.....	92,844,720,742,927,000,000	4,000,000,000,000	23,211,180
Nov. 23.....	223,927,315,083,796,000,000	5,000,000,000,000	44,785,463
Nov. 30.....	400,267,640,291,750,000,000	6,666,666,666,667	60,040,146

¹ From official reports of the Imperial Bank of Germany.

² At current rates of exchange at the dates named.

MUSSOLINI as Revealed in His Political Speeches

(November, 1914—August, 1923)

Translated by Barone Bernardo Quaranta di San Severino

Published by E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY. Price, $3.50

James Harvey Robinson

Distinguished author of

"The Mind in the Making" levels his keen intellect on the most vital of problems in

THE HUMANIZING OF KNOWLEDGE

"A complete revolution in the manner of spreading and presentation of scientific findings may be looked for as a result of the publication of this little volume."

At All Booksellers $1.50

DORAN
BOOKS

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1924

No. 3058

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	153
EDITORIALS:
Of the Making of Books	155
Reformers Must Reform	156
Woodrow Wilson: A Supreme Tragedy	156
The Political Deeps Breaking Up	158
THE TRIUMPH OF LENIN. By Anna Louise Strong	159
WHAT—AFTER ALL—IS "PROGRESSIVISM"?	160
PAGE DR. COUE. By H. S. Stockton	162
THE REPUBLICAN PARTY—A STRICKEN MOB. By William Hard	163
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	164
CORRESPONDENCE	165
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
"To Laboring Humanity"	167
The German Unions Fight for Life	167
German Students and the Jews	168
MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION
THE NATION'S PRIZE POEM FOR 1924:
Jezebel. By Scudder Middleton	169
CARL VAN DOREN. By Carl Van Doren	170
CHILDREN AND INTERNATIONALISM. By Hugh Lofting	172
BOOKS:
How the Empire Grows. By Henry W. Nevins	173
Plain and Colored. By J. W. Krutch	176
A Man Out of His Time. By Kimball Young	176
Economic Vitamin. By Henry Raymond Mussey	178
Mr. Frank Looks at His World. By Charles Merz	180
A Gaelic Romance. By Padraic Colum	182
For Students of Art Criticism. By Herbert J. Seligmann	184
Uplift and Understanding. By Kathleen Millay	186
Passionate Cooperation. By Stuart Chase	187
Blunt the Rebel. By Charles J. Finner	188
ON SOME NEW MUSIC. By Pitts Sanborn	189
DRAMA:
Max Reinhardt. By Ludwig Lewisohn	190

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY

IRITA VAN DOREN

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE

JOHN A. HOBSON

NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK

H. L. MENCKEN

CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, JR.'S, political course seems run. We cannot believe that after the Teapot Dome revelations he will be available as a candidate for Governor of New York or for any other than some decorative diplomatic post. The Republican politicians in New York are rejoicing at this because they have felt that he was not of the caliber to merit the governorship. They have not forgotten the grim jest at the Albany correspondents' dinner last winter when in reply to a question whether Theodore, Jr., would rise as high as his father the reply was: "Why not? He's light enough." The plea is made for him that he did not understand the significance of Teapot Dome, though he is charged with drafting the transfer order which Mr. Harding signed. But any son of the President who sponsored the conservation policy should have understood these things and resigned. Archie Roosevelt is praised by Senator Pepper and others for getting out of Sinclair's company and informing. The fact is that he saw no harm in being vice-president of a company doing such vital business with the Department of which his brother was assistant secretary. By his own confession on the stand he was a mere figurehead. To Senator Walsh's query, "Your official position seems to have been somewhat nominal then?" Archie Roosevelt replied, "Yes." Subsequently he admitted he had had nothing whatever to do as vice-president of the Sinclair company during the past year except to supervise a little Russian business. In other words, he was merely selling the Roosevelt name for a good salary.

ONCE MORE THE AMERICAN LEGION is indulging in wild anarchy, and setting itself up as a sort of fascist super-government. The action of legionnaires at Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, in marching armed with bayonets into a hall where a Lenin memorial meeting was being held, and in breaking it up at the points of their guns, was a disgrace to the Legion and to America. The public abdication by Mayor Daniel L. Hart, however, was even more humiliating. "I shall not tolerate any organization holding meetings in this community that is opposed by the American Legion," said this abject official, who presumably once swore to uphold the law. "All meetings of this character in future will be submitted to the Legion committees for approval before they are permitted. Freedom of speech under the American flag is welcome, but under the red flag of anarchy will never be tolerated." Some day the mayor might take five minutes off from his other duties and look up the meaning and derivation of the word "anarchy," and then reflect upon his own acts as coming under the definition. In Connecticut, too, the Legion has been seeking to abolish free speech and to stop Lenin commemorations. In Springfield, Massachusetts, and in Newark, New Jersey, the police have stopped Lenin meetings, and are properly being sued for false arrest. It is high time for a revival of the good old-fashioned American principles of free speech and free assembly. "Reds" cannot possibly do as much to bring the Constitution into contempt as these public officials with their arrogant disregard of its explicit guaranties.

GREAT BRITAIN has granted unconditional de jure recognition to Soviet Russia! Ramsay MacDonald's note, to be sure, adds that "to create the normal conditions of complete friendly relations and full commercial intercourse it will be necessary to conclude definite practical agreements on a variety of matters," such as the pre-war treaties, the old debts, and propaganda. But he has taken the ostrich-head of diplomacy out of the sand and faced the fact of the existence of Soviet Russia. To the visitor from Mars it might seem obvious that the way to settle these questions was to discuss them with the rulers of Russia, but this simple theorem has been too much for the great minds that have guided Allied diplomacy since the war. Italy is reported on the point of following England's lead. France still hesitates, worried by the fifteen million francs which Frenchmen invested in Russian imperialism; but it is almost certain that the April election will bring the same change of heart in France as the recent overturn brought in England. Curiously, financial circles seemed to like the news; the pound sterling actually rose five points.

GANDHI HAS BEEN RELEASED from prison. It is a satisfaction to think of this twentieth-century saint once more breathing fresh air and living in the sunlight, even though physicians report that his health is so badly undermined that he must spend six months on the seashore if he is to recover. He is, apparently, set free only when it is believed that he is too sick to preach his gospel effectively. Yet this is the man of whom John Haynes Holmes said in a recent issue of The Nation:

In his organization of a vast social movement in terms of non-violent coercion or non-resistant love, his life marks a new epoch in the annals of the race. In purpose, method, and ideal he reveals to our time, as Jesus revealed to his, the way of life. Yet England today, like Rome yesterday, sees nothing to do with such a man but to destroy him!

Perhaps this release is another indication of the new humanity of England's Labor premier. Ramsay MacDonald could do nothing greater for his century than to show that it is possible for the government of an empire to cooperate with a saint.

WHAT EFFECT THE FRIENDLY EXCHANGE of notes between Mr. MacDonald and M. Poincaré will have upon European politics is not clear. It may remove the initial irritation which M. Poincaré must have felt when he read the Labor premier's frank interview in the Paris Quotidien, beginning "We blame you for the occupation of the Ruhr." "We can be frank without being hostile," Mr. MacDonald says to M. Poincaré, "and can defend our countries' interests without being at enmity." M. Poincaré replies that he will be no less frank than the British Prime Minister, and no less fervid in defense of French interests. This is a good way to begin, but it reminds us a little of the traditional kiss with which French boxers used to preface their battles.

SMEDLEY BUTLER, OF THE MARINES, has not yet returned to Quantico. He is very busy in Philadelphia. He is shuffling, dealing, discarding members of his police force by the hundred; thumbing his nose at politicians and the civil service. He is god in Philadelphia, and it's a hard job. One of the most annoying aspects of deity is the recalcitrant behavior of the rest of the world. You wave an Olympian finger—nothing happens. Vice, for instance, continues to flourish. You close a dive from 10 p. m. till morning, and lo, the next day it runs from morning to 10 p. m., and somehow vice seems particularly vicious when it flowers by day. Saloons remain objects of suspicion even though your police "chaperons" accompany every man who enters, and sniff the beverage he drinks. You announce forty-eight hours as the longest period the last criminal may remain at large and alive—and then you give him another forty-eight hours. What, in circumstances like these, in a world like this one, is omnipotence to do? We have only one suggestion: let it tie up its wounds in the rags of its self-esteem, take off its special near-civilian uniform, retire to Quantico, and leave the job to ordinary human beings.

WE HAVE EXPRESSED occasional doubts about the methods used in awarding and advertising the Bok peace plan; we even have looked with an unfavorable eye upon the plan itself and believed it inadequate in the light of a world in chaos; but we have no feelings of either doubt or disfavor in regard to the winner of the prize. Charles H. Levermore is a scholar and an educator and a man whose work for peace, covering a period of many years, leaves no question about his honest desire to find a way to international decency and to control by reason. The thought that a man who is so obviously disinterested, whose opinion is controlled only by his own conscience, has suddenly become the possessor of world-wide fame and a considerable fortune, is one that warms the heart. We almost wish that we had taken the opportunity offered by the innumerable ballots deposited on the desk in the outer office and sent in a few score votes. It would be a pleasant sensation to help any one win $100,000; and who would not rejoice to help transfer such a sum from Mr. Bok to Dr. Levermore!

HIGH-SCHOOL STUDENTS in New York City voted the death of Lenin the "biggest news" of the week ended January 27; they ranked the accession of Labor to power in England second in importance, and the Teapot Dome scandal third. The record of this vote in the columns of the New York World may interest the historian a century hence almost as much as the events themselves. Labor governments may have become commonplace; Lenin may appear as a personal incident in a century-long struggle; Teapot Dome may be forgotten. The historian will want to know what boys and girls growing to maturity were thinking. It is surely a hopeful sign that students in their 'teens should look thus broadly across the world. Would a poll in Chicago or in Denver, we wonder, have shown as world-wide an interest—how much did New York's cosmopolitan makeup affect the vote? The World's first prize, we note, went to Elihu Platowsky, who says that The Nation is his favorite reading. His essay asserted the importance of the Labor Government in England, whereas Lawrence Fleming, with as Anglo-Saxon a name as could be invented, was the prize-winner who wrote on the death of Lenin. Would a poll of parents show as striking a result?

POOOR RICHARD in a singularly effective fashion reminds us of his "Hints for Those that would be Rich":

A Penny sav'd is Twopence clear
A Pin a Day is a groat a year.

One hundred and sixty-five years ago Benjamin Franklin, then in London on the business of the American colonies, placed £100 in the hands of members of the Society of Friends, as a trust. After one hundred and fifty years the trustees were to make awards from time to time, at their discretion, for the most valuable contributions to the science of "cures," particularly in relation to surgery, the nervous system, and "mind-treating." The trustees now announce their first awards: a major award of a £2,500 scholarship to Pierson W. Banning of Los Angeles for his volume "Mental and Spiritual Healing" (Franklin, it is to be remembered, was one of the commission that exposed the impostures of Mesmer); a posthumous award of £1,000 to Charles P. Steinmetz of Schenectady for his privately published treatise "The Nervous System as a Conductor of Electrical Energy"; and a minor award of £500 to Fusakichi Omori of Tokio for his unpublished treatise "The Rotary Knife in Surgery." The faith which we already had in the canniness of Franklin will keep us from being too much impressed by the success of this "trick" of his "for doing a deal of good with a little money," but we are fairly humbled by the long vision of a man who in the eighteenth century could foresee three of the subjects which most concern medical science in the twentieth.

Of the Making of Books

IN spite of the Psalmist it is a very pleasant circumstance that of the making of books there is no end. We may retire to the great masterpieces of the past, but meanwhile there is, as Browning once remarked, our life here. We want its immediate chronicle and comment; we want to see it clarified and made objective in art—we want and need that both for instruction and delight. Above all we want recurrently to be assured that the creative spirit is not a thing of legend and dim years, that it lives and functions here and now, that the wonder and glow of the muses is in our midst no less, if with less splendor, than it was in Florence, Stratford, Weimar, Athens, Rome.

To descend from such general considerations to the actual American books of the year is by no means as violent a process as it might seem. The creative spirit has an infinite variety of manifestations. There have been other periods when beauty and exaltation were not the chief notes of literature. There is an analogy which will, to be sure, not bear pressing too hard, between, let us say, Fielding and Smollett, and Dreiser and the Chicagoans. We have, perhaps, less humor and exuberance and style; we have higher veracity, a deeper searching. At moments, for instance, in Mr. Anderson's "Horses and Men" a thing happens that was said of Wordsworth: Nature seems to take the pen from his hand and write. The same thing is felt in long passages of Miss Fannie Hurst's "Lummox," intolerably mannerized as much of it is. We feel that plain inevitableness also in parts of Mr. Dell's "Janet March."

Meanwhile there is no lack of beauty either, though the beauty is frugal and scrupulous. It has not perhaps been sufficiently noted that American poetry has definitely entered a new stage of development. One no longer thinks primarily of the hoarse vigor of Sandburg or the glittering futility of Amy Lowell. There are the new women poets: Edna St. Vincent Millay, Elinor Wylie, Genevieve Taggard. What a curious and unheard-of age in which young women write with Horatian precision and finesse and stylistic self-discipline and in which so many poets of the sex once called stern fail to trim their lamps and gird their loins! Miss Millay's "The Harp-Weaver" is especially important. She has not the steel-blue sheen, the jade and granite polish of Elinor Wylie. But she is more lucid than either Mrs. Wylie or Miss Taggard, and lucidity is a crying need in all our finer literature.

What we miss, as so often in our modern American literature, is fine prose. The novelists, except Hergesheimer and Miss Cather, are no more than adequate. Mr. Anderson has moments when he writes with a beautiful simplicity, but he does not yet distinguish constantly enough between ease and sloughing. Mrs. Wharton's last book failed utterly on the side of substance, and her style, exquisite at its best, was always derivative. One of the finest American prose books of the year is Mr. Paul Rosenfeld's "Musical Chronicle." We are aware of Mr. Rosenfeld's mannerisms, excesses, Corinthian tendencies. But he has both fire and polish; he is sedulously aware of the problems that are involved in the shaping of fine prose; he has passages that are in truth both rich and racy, that have both lovely flesh and the taut muscle beneath the flesh. The novel, of course, still leads in both appeal and importance, and we have no quarrel with this natural fact. But those who are concerned with beauty, with style, with literature as a fine art among us, will find much that is genuinely stirring in the fact that our American generation is making books such as Miss Millay's and Mr. Rosenfeld's.

Reformers Must Reform

WILLIAM H. ANDERSON, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, has been convicted of forgery in the third degree. He will appeal from the verdict of the jury—but apparently the appeal will be based upon technicalities rather than upon denial of facts.

What was Mr. Anderson's crime? The substance of it was this: Mr. Anderson hired a Mr. Phillips to collect funds for the League; he agreed to pay him 20 per cent of the first $25,000 collected yearly, and 10 per cent thereafter; but when Mr. Phillips's commissions were about to produce for him an income larger than Mr. Anderson's own salary, Mr. Anderson insisted that Mr. Phillips split commissions with him—not with the League, but with its director. This transaction did not appear upon the books of the League; it was a secret arrangement between Mr. Phillips and Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Anderson personally ordered that the books be altered so that the sum split was transferred from Mr. Phillips's salary account and charged as "expenses." This order the jury considered "forgery in the third degree." Incidentally the trial brought out the fact that Mr. Anderson had secretly received considerable sums from mysterious private individuals. These sums were not entered upon the books of the League, but were used, according to Mr. Anderson, for the good of the cause.

Officials of the Anti-Saloon League profess to see in this conviction no reason to lose confidence in Mr. Anderson. For the sake of their cause they should wake up and clean house. Mr. Anderson's usefulness to the forces fighting liquor is done. It is undoubtedly true that he has been persecuted beyond the merits of his case; the forces opposed to prohibition have yelped with joy, and magnified into a sensation every minute disclosure of his trial. We do not doubt Mr. Anderson's sincerity in the fight against liquor, but that is not enough; those who set out to reform the world assume a peculiar obligation to meticulous honesty.

Prohibition has suffered much from its advocates. There has been a fanaticism which has led to the assumption that the end justified any means. Mr. Anderson's methods of lobbying, effective as they have seemed at the time, have redounded against his own cause; denunciation of all who do not believe that one-half of one per cent of alcohol constitutes a sort of divinely set limit of innocence in drinks has lost many worthy soldiers to the ranks, and the firmly fixed theory that all who oppose prohibition are in the pay of the brewers and distillers is another unfortunate delusion. The Nation believes that this country wants some kind of prohibition made effective, but that it is sick and tired of a fanaticism which only renders enforcement more difficult. Washington is tossing in the throes of one scandal today; another, perhaps even greater, will soon be uncovered. There have been more than hints that Anti-Saloon League officials have winked at the loss of bootleggers' lists containing the names of high Washington officials. When the housecleaning comes, if prohibition is to stand the strain, its advocates must be above all suspicion of careless financial standards.

Woodrow Wilson: A Supreme Tragedy

And so, once upon a time, there came out of the vineyards to speak brave words one as with a silver tongue. Young and old, rich and poor, stopped their work, gathering in the market-place, saying: "Behold, there is one who tells the truth. Do you not see that he is not of the Philistines? Let us listen and be guided of him." Whenever he spoke men echoed his words, so that more and more came to listen and to revere. When all the tribes of Israel went to war it came to pass that his words winged their way wherever men battled and women suffered; as men lay dying of their wounds they cried out to him to prevail in order that none others might perish like unto themselves. Widows with starving babes at their breasts called down blessings upon his name. Serfs and bond-slaves lifted up their voices before his image, saying: "Lo, He has come again." And when the day dawned when men fought no more, and he went abroad, humble folk kneeled down before him, crying: "Thou art the man!"

Yet one day, falling upon evil companions, his strength and wisdom went out from him and his voice was no longer as the trumpets before Jericho. Conceiving greatly he yielded greatly, doing wrong in the hope that some little good might come. Beholding, the people cried: "He is no longer the Messiah that he was. Do you not perceive how now he strikes hands with those who have misled us?" Soon were heard lamentations throughout the land. Men beat upon their breasts, declaring that woe was theirs, that darkness was now indeed upon all His people, and that there was no light upon the waters. Returning thence to his own tribe, men cast him aside, saying: "Thou hast no longer the voice of thy other days; we are betrayed and by thee shall we be led no more."

WOODROW WILSON came into the political life of America as if in response to prayer. It was given to him as to no other to step suddenly out of a cloistered life into high office. Then, as today, there was profound distrust of those conducting the government; startling revelations had laid bare both the corruption in big business and the control of the government by those in the seats of the commercial mighty. Neither the spurious liberalism nor the halfway, compromising reforms of Theodore Roosevelt, with his incessant knocking-down of men of straw, had satisfied the thoughtful or cut deeply into our political sores. To Mr. Wilson, as he once remarked in the office of The Nation during his governorship, what the country needed was "a modified Rooseveltism"; what he preached was not only that, but a far greater vision of reform, with a far keener and truer analysis of what was wrong. This he set forth with an extraordinary skill and eloquence which placed him in the front rank of American orators of his or of any time—by the beauty of his language, the wealth of his imagery, the aptness of his illustrations, and the cogency of his arguments.

His "modified Rooseveltism" seemed to the business masters of America far more dangerous than the doctrines of Roosevelt himself; they had known how to get around the latter when the pinch came. Wilson was of a different type. There was none of the swashbuckler and far more of the true crusader in him; his lips set in different and more dangerous lines; his eyes blazed with a different fire; here was all the stubbornness of the Scotch-Irishman with a Roundhead's absolute faith in the completeness of his wisdom and the infallibility of his judgment. Plainly he was not to be trifled with, and the way he went after the New Jersey corporations with his "seven-sisters" laws boded ill for big business everywhere. When the election of 1912 came Wall Street was ill at ease. Taft, its favorite, could not win; so the choice lay between the "wildness" of Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson, who, as former president of one of the staidest and most conservative of universities, the very citadel of intrenched wealth, should have been safe and sane, yet was nothing of the kind. When big business men examined Mr. Wilson's speeches and his book, "The New Freedom," their hair bristled. Here was radicalism indeed. He declared that the government had been transferred from Washington to Wall Street, whither the President must go "hat in hand" for orders. He affirmed that the "strong have crushed the weak," and that therefore "the strong dominate the industry and the economic life of this country." "Our government" he asserted to be "under the control of heads of great allied corporations with special interests." Again and again he cried out: "We stand in the presence of a revolution . . . whereby America will insist upon recovering in practice those ideals which she has always professed, upon securing a government devoted to the general interests and not to special interests. We are upon the eve of a great reconstruction." Since "an invisible empire" had been "set above the forms of democracy" Mr. Wilson demanded an end to the "exploitation of the people by legal and political means," saying "the masters of the government of the United States are the combined capitalists and manufacturers of the United States."

This was treason, and when Mr. Wilson entered the White House the severance between it and Wall Street was complete. The members of J. P. Morgan & Co. were for the first time denied admission to the President's office. So far as Mr. Wilson could make it his was a government of the people and in its interests. To him men rallied in increasing numbers, even of the disappointed bands who had followed Colonel Roosevelt to defeat with a fervent personal idolatry and a religious enthusiasm unsurpassed in our history. Mr. Wilson's followers were actuated less by adoration of him than by admiration for his ideals; yet there were plenty to give him a personal devotion and loyalty such as men are capable of but once in their lives. This kept up even though a change rapidly came over the President. As Governor of New Jersey he had sat in an office where all might see him and approach; in the White House he became less and less accessible. What was probably an unconquerable shyness was coupled with much intellectual pride and relentless bitterness toward all who disagreed. No friendship could survive long when the other party to it criticized the President. It became more and more his habit to work alone. Thus it came about that when the Lusitania was sunk, the note that satisfied the country yet kept it calm was written in his closet without personal contact with any members of his Cabinet until it was read to them for their approval only—not for their criticism or advice. In this it resembled many another state paper.

Progress there was. The federal-reserve system came in time to take up the shock of the outbreak of the war;

a system of rural credits was established; there was a real tariff revision downward; a beginning was made of a most hopeful series of arbitration treaties. The whole atmosphere of the government changed for the better. Then came the catastrophe of catastrophes, cutting squarely across the pathway to domestic reform, to end Mr. Wilson's "bloodless revolution." His first steps after the war clouds broke were all good; he commanded for the country a neutrality in thought and deed which he himself at first lived up to. His unusual executive talents were at their best. But the old spell was broken. Declining Mr. Bryan's God-given suggestion for an organization of the neutral countries headed by the United States, to compel respect for neutral rights and then to compel peace, Mr. Wilson gradually violated his own precepts for American neutrality. The powerful note to Great Britain in protest against the seizure of American ships on the high seas—the Solicitor of the State Department declaring publicly at this time that "there was not a canon of international law which England had not violated," a statement now admitted by Englishmen—lay upon Mr. Wilson's desk from May, 1915, until November, finally to be sent so emasculated that its author in the State Department could hardly have recognized it. As Mr. Tumulty finally confessed in his book, the scales were no longer held even. Yet when seeking reelection, Mr. Wilson eagerly benefited by the slogan "he kept us out of war," only to violate later this implicit pact with his people.

On January 22, 1917, Mr. Wilson rose to the highest point of his often extraordinary intuition and of his statesmanship. Then he gave utterance to words of profoundest wisdom, acclaimed at the time by almost the entire press of the country—these words that have been justified ten thousand times over by every event since the treaty of peace:

It must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. . . . I am seeking only to face realities and to face them without soft concealment. Victory would mean peace forced upon the losers, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest not permanently, but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last.

The crimes of Versailles, the collapsing treaty which has made that name infamous, attest the profound and perpetual truth of these words. There is no prophecy in history so justified by the event, so marvelous in its tragic fulfilment.

Three months later the breach of faith was complete. America entered the war. Wilson, the champion of democracy, struck it one of the deadliest blows received since the theory of democracy was conceived. That fatal day every reform for which Mr. Wilson had contended lay prostrate. For the first time he found himself congratulated by Henry Cabot Lodge, warmly indorsed and visited by Theodore Roosevelt, for whom there was in his heart the bitterest hate. He was acclaimed with joy by every munition-maker, every war profiteer, every agent of big business, all the evil forces against which he had fought for the "new freedom." To the partners of J. P. Morgan & Co. the White House doors now swung wide open. Positions of the highest responsibility were given to them; they were among his most trusted advisers at Paris. When the war ended the control of the government by big business and the war profiteers was complete—the gift of Woodrow Wilson himself.

What it was that won Mr. Wilson over to the war is not yet clear. It is the great unsolved mystery of his career. Whether it was due to the desire he cherished from 1914 on to be the arbiter and dominator of the peace, whether it was a yielding to the pressure of those who deemed the millions they had invested in Allied securities doomed unless the Allies won, whether an emotional desire to save the Allies from defeat, or sincere belief that no other way remained, is yet to be revealed. In any case Woodrow Wilson sinned against the very ark of the American covenant. Not a civic right of the American but was trampled upon with Mr. Wilson's knowledge and consent. The suppression of free thought and free speech, the terrorization of great masses of loyal Americans, the fettering of the press, the ruthless imprisonment of dissenters, the turning over of the destinies of the people to lawless officials and judges, the filling of the country with the bitterest diatribes of hate and Berserker rage—these Mr. Wilson neither checked nor reproved; they were "necessary acts of war time." He was unable to see that whenever and wherever liberalism links itself with war and war-madness it is liberalism which perishes. He could not perceive that he had struck down as with a dagger the causes he had held dearest. He could not, of course, for all his rare intuition, divine that he himself would be the most tragic victim of the anti-social, anti-democratic, anti-Christian forces which he had unleashed. It was the same Wall Street crowd, the same Henry Cabot Lodge and Theodore Roosevelts, who had applauded him in April, 1917, who were the first to turn and rend him when he had done what they had wished. This they did as soon as we were once more out of the hell of the war in which we Americans made so needless and useless a sacrifice. What honest American citizen who looks upon Europe today can deny that our hundred thousand dead might as well have perished against walls in the streets of New York for all they did to end war, safeguard democracy, or destroy that militarism which today rears its head more ominously than in 1914?

Yet the Fourteen Peace Points, whether they came, as alleged, from the pen of Walter Lippmann, or from Mr. Wilson's own, lifted the spirits of men; it seemed, if they could be achieved, that a new charter of liberty, a new world order would be mankind's. Mr. Wilson went to Europe exalted on high; he was the Messiah. And if only he could have met his supreme test he would rank today in the minds of men next after Jesus of Nazareth. The kneeling, praying masses before whom he passed, prayed and kneeled in vain. It was to Orlando, to Foch and Clemenceau, to Lloyd George, in whom the good and evil demons struggled hourly for control, that the victory went. Hate, revenge, and brutal force, the lust and avarice of the conquerors prevailed. It was indeed "a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished," "accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice," with the result that today the next great war looms upon the horizon. To Paris Mr. Wilson went unprepared, ignorant, by his own confession, of the secret treaties widely published in the United States ten months before his departure, which were the key to all the Allied acts from the day the war began. They were the explanation of the Allies' motives and the charter of the real aims so skilfully hidden behind altruistic assertions that the Allies were the anointed of God and their cause entirely unselfish and righteous. So Mr. Wilson was not on guard in Paris against aims as self-seeking and as godless as those of the enemies he had defeated in the war. Nor was he able to cope with what then confronted him. The evil habit of compromise, which came upon him in the White House, as on many another, making him accept doctrines which he had previously declared that he never, never would, beset him here. His personal weaknesses, like his compromises, fell upon him and disarmed him; his very taking counsel of himself became part of his undoing. But above all it was foreordained that the truth that good shall not come out of the evil of war should remain beyond challenge wherever men walk.

Upon these things will the historians of the future pass, each according to his bias and to his interpretation of state papers now sealed, documents now hidden, events yet to take place. Philosophers will always wrangle as to whether that man's offense is worse who deliberately destroys the rights and liberties of a people or the crime of him who exalts the spirits of men by a glorious vision of a new and inspired day, only to let the uplifted sink back, utterly disheartened and disillusioned, into the darkest slough of despond. As to the merits and demerits of Woodrow Wilson books will be written to the end of time. Those who worship him will continue to keep eyes and ears closed to facts they do not wish to hear; those whose very souls he outraged and betrayed will judge as through a glass darkly. But one fact no one can deny: Aspiring to the stars he crashed to earth, leaving behind him no emancipation of humanity, no assuaging of its wounds, only a world wracked, embittered, more full of hatreds, more ready to tear itself to pieces today than when he essayed the heavens. The moral of his fall is as immutable as the hills, as shining as the planets. If humanity will perceive and acknowledge it that will be Woodrow Wilson's priceless legacy to the world he tried to serve so greatly.

O. G. V.

The Political Deepes Breaking Up

WHAT Woodrow Wilson called the "invisible empire . . . set up above the forms of democracy" is being unveiled in Washington. We are at last permitted to see what has been going on underneath, just as in Germany government by Hugo Stinnes and his piratical associates has boldly come out into the open, negotiates with sovereign France, and rules beside or in front of the government of Ebert and Dr. Marx. Like lightning out of a clear sky the revelations have burned upon the consciousness of the people things ordinarily hidden as by the darkness of the night. The bolt has seared and burned and destroyed. Men's reputations have withered overnight. The press reports that the politicians of both parties are in a funk, that "no such panic has been known in Washington since the Civil War." Even one of the most conservative news agencies now admits what it would not two weeks ago—that Mr. Coolidge's candidacy has been fatally injured and that an irresistible demand is likely to come up from the country for candidates entirely unaffiliated with Washington and its political stews. The friends of the President still hope that by vigorous action he may make clear his independence and let all the blame rest upon President Harding. It is too late. Whatever Mr. Coolidge's own record the mere fact that he sat in the Harding Cabinet while such things as the sale of these oil leases were under discussion is enough to make his candidacy impossible. Only the Progressives are unmoved—their record is clean.

What has come out so far? Among the Republicans Secretary Fall accepted "loans" of $125,000 from Messrs. Sinclair and Doheny at the time when he was secretly giving them the navy's oil reserves, and then lied about it before the senatorial committee. The Secretary of the Navy was a party to the transaction from the beginning, not, apparently, from corrupt motives, but because he was too stupid and ignorant to understand what it was all about; his Assistant Secretary, Mr. Roosevelt, helped to transfer the oil reserves to Mr. Fall's department and personally took the order to Mr. Harding for his signature. The Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty, knew all and did nothing. Among the Democrats Mr. Lane, ex-Secretary of the Interior; Mr. McAdoo, ex-Secretary of the Treasury; and the former Attorney General, Mr. Gregory, all upon retiring from office accepted retainers from Mr. Doheny or his companies, which were in large measure offered because of his belief that these gentlemen would have influence with the Administration from which they had just retired. George Creel, the official publicity director and apologist for the Wilson Administration, fell over himself to take $5,000 in an oil transaction as the price of his influence with Mr. Daniels. This, of course, is nothing new; it is all part of the easy political morality of Washington. But a keen ethical sense, the kind of ethical sense the American people have a right to expect of their highest government officials, would certainly lead a man to refuse to accept money for using his personal influence with his former associates in office, as did Mr. McAdoo when he accepted Mr. Doheny's retainer.

Now conservative circles are frankly saying that the worst feature of these revelations is that they will increase radicalism in the country. These wiseacres are not hanging their heads with shame that corruption is in the highest places; they have no words of denunciation for the bribers who were found out. We have noticed no sizzling denunciations of Messrs. Fall and Denby from the American Defense Society or the National Security League. What concerns the super-patriots of this type is only the thought that the radicals may gain strength by these revelations.

If American citizens sit supinely and permit themselves to be robbed in this way, they are certainly beyond help. If they wish merely to leap again from the Republican frying-pan into the Democratic fire they will richly deserve their fate. It is the hour for a new party. Yes, the revelations will increase the radicalism of the country, if by that is meant that they will increase popular dissatisfaction with the organized system of political plundering in Washington. Mr. Wilson asked the public in 1917 this question: "Don't you know that some man with eloquent tongue, without conscience, who did not care for the nation, could put this whole nation into flame?" This country needs today more than anything else some man with eloquent tongue, with conscience, to put the whole nation into flame, to wipe out both the rotten, crooked, and meaningless old parties, and make room for a new alignment like that in England, where the issue is now clear and sharp.

The Triumph of Lenin

By ANNA LOUISE STRONG

FEW men in our time have lived so fortunately and died so triumphantly as Lenin. No man in all history has been so widely and so affectionately mourned.

For never till modern times have conditions existed in which one man could touch so intimately the lives of tens of millions. To the peasants of the greatest stretch of farming country on earth he is known as the ruler who gave them at last their land. To the city workers of Russia he is the comrade who gave them dominion over government and industry. To the patriots within the borders of Russia, even old Czarist generals and anti-communist professors who have suffered the loss of property and the pangs of hunger, he is none the less the strategist who brought their country through wars which the whole world launched against them, and laid the foundations of national greatness on which they are now building in peace. And to tens of millions of plain people, outside of Russia, in every land of earth, he is the prophet of a new era in history.

Down in the famine area I have heard peasants cursing the local authorities corruptly administering taxes. But they have ended: "We will send to Moscow about it. Our Ilyich [Lenin] is a good man." I have heard discussions among country people about sins of Communists and the human frailties that made communism in their view impracticable; but often these discussions ended: "This communism our Ilyich tells about—that is truly the right way to live."

I talked in Samara to a French governess who hated all things Russian. Employed years ago by a noble family, she had been stranded in the midst of civil war and famine. She could not say enough evil about the Russians—"They are barbarous, dirty, lazy, dishonest." Then we passed into an office and she saw a photograph of Lenin. "One honest man," she said, regretfully, "but what can he do in a nation of thieves?" Even she, the most prejudiced woman I met in Russia, believed in Lenin.

From the Arctic Circle to the warm shores of the Crimea and the hot deserts of the Baku oil fields, in villages and mines and factories and children's homes, I have traveled. Only once in my two years in Russia did I meet anyone who spoke ill of Lenin. For while to the outer world he has remained the leader of upheaval, to the dwellers in Russia he has been for six years the steady preacher of order and discipline and hard work and production and punctuality and efficiency and all the other unromantic virtues whose achievement in Russia would be the height of romance.

He was the leader who never disguised mistakes, who never deluded himself or his followers with optimism.

Not once through the six years of the revolution to the end of his days did he prophesy sure success. Instead, he emphasized difficulties, dangers, shortcomings, saying coolly: "But there is a chance of success, if we conquer these things." In his last significant message to the Russian Communist Party Congress a year ago he warned them clearly that their progress toward socialism would be defeated unless they eliminated red tape and bureaucracy from the state machine. Such were the dull, technical details to which he gave his life, and which every pamphlet of his treated; but he handled them with such will and intelligence that they became studies in the essential building and managing of human society.

Thirty-five years ago he first planned revolution, and laid down clearly even at that time the road he would follow. His father, a successful schoolmaster and later director of schools for the province of Simbirsk, had spent his life in slow education of the peasants as the hope for Russia's freedom, only to see the schools he founded taken over by the most backward church in Christendom. His brother, impatient, had followed the path of individual terrorism with the students of his day, and been executed for an attempt on the life of Alexander III. Lenin chose a different road to revolution—his plan involved the organization of the city workers under the leadership of professional revolutionists. For thirty years he studied and organized in prison and exile, he watched the World War prepare the way. When the time came and the old forms of Russian society collapsed utterly under the strain of war and corruption he was ready with his organization and his plan.

How much of the detailed action of those first years of Soviet power was due to previous planning, and how much was forced upon him by the necessities of war on a dozen fronts, prolonged for many years, is a matter for the historian to analyze. The nationalization of property took place to a large extent as a war measure, partly because empty properties were left abandoned, and partly as a spontaneous seizure by workingmen, which had to be regularized afterward in some way. The seizing of the peasants' food was also a measure of war, not of Socialist planning. The "terror" was an outburst after assassination and invasion had created an atmosphere of suspicion and revenge. Many things, which through those years were called bolshevism, were either the tactics of a besieged city, or the wild dreams of people shut off by a ring of iron from an outside world which they consequently were bound to misinterpret.

But step by step, through disorder and mistake and hunger and defeat, Lenin built the disciplined and organized government which carried Soviet Russia through to ulti-

A drawing from life by Nathan Altman mate triumph. Without him there would have been indeed a great upheaval and chaos; this outburst was created by events, not by any man. But without him there would not have been the final success of organization; there would have been a vast territory of broken peoples, each under its own dictator, all of them the playthings of international imperialism, as China is today. The Russians know that it was from this that Lenin saved them.

Lenin

No man could have chosen a better time to die. If he had died in the midst of the civil war, the war might have ended otherwise. If he had died before the new economic policy was planned and carried into being, a conflict between peasants and city workers might have permanently wrecked the revolution. But he lived to carry through the purpose he held from his youth; he perfected an organization which could continue for indefinite years after his death.

Then he died, knowing that he was loved by the people of a great nation and by millions of simple folk in all the lands of earth; knowing, as few rulers have ever known, that within his own government he had no whisper of opposition to his personality or his achievements; knowing also that he had lived through a great turning-point in history and had had the chance to play in it a directing part; and that his work, as far as a man's work may be, was finished, and sealed, and secure, and that for generations to come, past his grave under the Kremlin walls, in the great Red Square, the workers and children of free Russia would celebrate May Days and October Days in triumph.

What more could any man hope from life—or from death?

What—After All—Is “Progressivism”?

Senators, Representatives, Editors, Poets, and Private Citizens Compete in William Hard's Prize Contest

WILLIAM HARD'S offer of a lock of Senator Shipstead's hair for the best definition of “progressivism” has called forth as many answers apparently as could have been evoked by an offer of mere money. One contestant only is dissatisfied with the nature of the prize held up before him to reward his efforts.

Mr. Charles A. Darius of Upper Montclair, New Jersey, refuses “Senator Shipstead's hair” and demands “Senator Smoot's scalp.”

Mr. William Floyd of the Arbitrator indeed brings forward a point which all contestants have a right to have cleared up. Mr. Floyd has written Mr. Hard as follows:

The value of your prize so rare,
Plucked from its deep, progressive lair,
Depends upon the power to wear.
So tell us—you'll admit it's fair—
What color is this Shipstead hair?

It is a very beautiful color—a soft brown streaked attractively with a thoughtful white. Also, it exists in profusion. The contestants are wrong who in considerable multitudes have written in to say that of course they realize that Senator Shipstead must be bald. This contest is an honest one.

Senator Shipstead has hair; and Senator Moses's Committee on Propaganda has been unable nevertheless to discover that in Mr. Hard's Prize Contest there is any element of any improper use of anybody's possessions, in trust funds or otherwise, for the purpose of manufacturing public opinion or of coercing the Senate. Senators and newspaper editors agree that Mr. Hard has found a way of conducting a contest for a prize of great historic value without exposing himself to the charge of trying to convert anybody to anything by bribery and corruption.

The Baltimore Evening Sun, it is true, makes short work of it by saying that Mr. Hard's curiosity and confusion of mind regarding progressivism is due precisely to his looking for definitions instead of looking at the actual behavior of progressives in real life. That behavior, according to the Sun, can be described thus:

Here is a railroad. Things aren't going right with it.

It has capable and intelligent managers and it serves a rich and valuable territory. But it doesn't do what it ought to do. What remedy does the progressive prescribe? He prescribes a law.

Here is a section of the country—rich, fertile, peopled by industrious and progressive farmers. Something happens and the farmers all go broke. Call in a progressive and what does he prescribe? He prescribes, invariably, a law.

Here is the shipping industry. It isn't doing what it ought to do. Cargoes are scarce, wrecks are frequent, insurance is high, and operation shows a deficit instead of a profit. What to do? Consult a progressive, and the answer is inevitable. There ought to be a law.

The progressive, in brief, is a man who believes that there is some magic in government which enables commonplace men to do something through its agency that they cannot do without it.

Meanwhile, however, the San Jose News follows a different trail to a different water-hole, thus:

Our reply to Mr. Hard is that the conservatives in general represent big business and that the progressives in general represent little business. Little business shades off into big business on the one hand and into labor on the other in such a vague and indefinite fashion that it is inevitable that progressives are divided in their counsels. Progressivism inevitably has here and there a tinge of stand-pattism just as it has inevitably here and there a tinge of socialism. Progressivism is constantly shifting and wabbling. Nevertheless this newspaper is avowedly progressive and proud of it. We are prepared to indorse neither extreme communism nor extreme corporationism. We prefer to fumble along, trying to salvage some of the old pioneer Western American qualities of courage and independence, being illogical, inconsistent, and full of fight.

The contestants who have answered by mail are as individual and as determined as the two editors of these two widely separated newspapers. Naturally it is physically impossible to print more than a tiny proportion of the number of answers received, and it is impossible equally to print more than excerpts from most of those few. However, from time to time, as the contest proceeds, we shall print such answers—and such excerpts from answers—as Mr. Hard, on chance or on merit, happens to send to us.

This week Mr. Hard, out of the first flight of answers arriving during the first few days of the contest, has sent us the following:

MR. HAPGOOD LEADS OFF

It is not devices but purposes that distinguish the progressive or liberal from the conservative. He whose purpose is honestly to seek a wider diffusion of power, political, economic, and social, is a liberal. He who instinctively resists all proposals aimed at this wider diffusion is a conservative.

Norman Hapgood

HORSE SENSE AND LANGUAGE FROM THE WEST

A progressive is a person who wants to do the greatest good for the greatest number all the time, and he keeps the pulling collar filled with his shoulders and the traces taut. A conservative is one who seeks class advantage and who backs into the breeching along the road of life.

B. S. Rodey, Albuquerque, New Mexico

AS SEEN FROM WASHINGTON

Progressivism is a status of the ego in which a statesman mirrors himself as the sole anointed to lead his flock where others do not take them.

Elisha Hanson, Washington, D. C.

ANOTHER VIEW FROM WASHINGTON

A progressive is a Republican who thinks his district is going Democratic.

*Henry T. Rainey,
Democratic Representative from the 20th Illinois Congressional District*

OFFICIAL!

FROM THE LEADER OF THE HOUSE "PROGRESSIVE GROUP" HIMSELF

What is a progressive? Looking within, listening to my progressive associates in Congress day by day, and thinking over the long political life of such a leader as La Follette, it seems to me that a true progressive is one who seeks to approximate in politics the moral code. By that I mean, broadly speaking, that in legislation he looks for righteousness. And what is right is the only direct way to what is good. He seeks the light of truth in principles and in facts, facts, facts, everywhere; and, above all (or, rather, as the fruitage of seeking the right in the light of truth), there comes into his heart a fiery zeal for service to his fellow-men. This naturally leads him to abhor and to fight special interest or privilege, to detest hypocrisy and sham, and to despise selfishness and greed in public life. Being only human, with all the frailties of the race, he finds it very difficult always to see clearly and to apply practically his ideal (reflected for all time in the great principles—justice, wisdom, and love); so he becomes broadly liberal in his personal relations with all classes of men, especially in the humbler walks of life, believing that the tyrant of all tyrants is intolerance. He speaks of himself as progressive because he realizes that life means action, endeavor, progress, and that reaction always ends in individual or national death.

*John M. Nelson,
Republican Representative from the Wisconsin 3rd
Congressional District and leader of the House
"Progressive Group" of both parties.*

A DROP OF ACID FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE

Progressivism, as a principle of American political philosophy, means the seeking of special privilege for groups and classes at national expense and the enforcement of special prohibitions through the agency of the national government; distinguished from conservatism, which means the preservation of the rights of the individual to equality in opportunity, in liberty, and in working out his own salvation according to his intelligence and his conscience.

Progressivism as a present political phenomenon is the composite blur of the mental disturbances of those all dressed up with no place to go, and of those who do not know where they are going but are on their way.

Richard D. Ware, Amherst, New Hampshire

ILLINOIS SPEAKS AGAIN

Progressivism is that principle of political conduct which holds that, from time to time, laws should be framed and institutions molded so as to be adjusted to meet the requirements created by changed conditions, in order that the greatest amount of happiness and prosperity, both present and future, may be enjoyed by the largest number of persons.

Henry R. Rathbone, Republican Representative at Large in the 68th Congress from all of Illinois

WITH APOLOGIES TO HERBERT SPENCER

Progressivism is an integration of humanity and a dissipation of riches, during which the people rise from an indefinite incoherent heterogeneity to a definite coherent homogeneity and during which the retained capital undergoes a parallel transformation.

Archibald Craig, Jersey City, New Jersey

SOMEWHAT MORE PSYCHOLOGICAL

Three qualities are essential to the progressive.

To begin with there is tolerance. People who cannot see the other person's point of view are in no sense progressive, since in a larger way they thus fail to see the general currents and tendencies of a given epoch.

Another essential quality of the progressive is mental flexibility. Life is forever changing, and in order to be a progressive one must be able to follow life.

And that brings us to the most essential quality of the progressive. It is vision. People without vision can only see their own narrow pet ideas and so-called principles and the immediate present, which is altogether fatal to progressivism.

Beatrice S. Greenberg, Boston, Massachusetts

SUSPICIOUS, BUT COMES THROUGH

You, William Hard, are so much of a spoofer that I hardly feel sure you are not kidding us in this invitation, but I guess you are in earnest. I'll bite anyway; and if a considerable proportion of your Nation readers do, your scheme should in some measure answer the purpose of a Progressive National Convention. So here is the idea of a dirt farmer, a western New York grape grower.

The "clearly-defined distinction between a progressive party and the older parties already existing" should appear in a platform which emphatically recognizes the control of the old parties by big business. This is the outstanding issue.

We should be looking forward both to the time when in the United States the primary purpose of industry generally will be the freest possible production and distribution of the necessities and comforts of life for the many instead of the production of dividends for the few. The progressive surely knows that the existing system of industry must remain until a better one is ready to replace it and that the replacement must be gradual. If he is really awake, he knows that this radical change has already been brought about on a tremendous scale and with great success in Europe through the cooperative movement.

Frank R. Rosseel, Rosseel's Vineyard, Church Road, Eden Village, N. Y.

SENATOR McCORMICK'S PLEA

We ought to strive resolutely, intelligently, and considerably for orderly and ordered progress. We ought to strive to enact laws and so to administer them that in ever greater degree economic and social justice may be done every man, woman, and child in this land. You have only to read the Declaration of Independence to realize that the Fathers of the Republic believed that it was better to endure, and patiently labor to redress, wrongs rather than to have recourse to violence and revolution. In these days who shall say who is a conservative or a progressive? And who shall distinguish between the industrial, financial, and agrarian radical and conservative? Those of us who believe in political progress, in social justice, and sound economics ought to think a little more upon the modern history of society, ought to be more mutually tolerant, and ought more eagerly and more open-mindedly to seek to learn from one another.

Medill McCormick,
Member of Republican Steering Committee of the United States Senate

TOO MANY PTOLEMAISTS

No doubt progressivism should progress toward something. But toward what? Conservatism too should conserve something. But, again, what? The official progressives have no common thought except perhaps a vague notion that economics may possibly have a bit of heft that should be considered in legislation.

The difficulty, as I see it, is that our political astronomers are all Ptolemaists. They are tangled in a system of cycles and epicycles by which some problems may be solved after a fashion, but which is utterly and totally inadequate to do the job which must be done now. In this day of grace we need a political Copernicus to give us the key to the practical complexities of economics, psychology, and spiritual living.

Do you see him any place in the offing? I do not.

George A. Briggs, Los Angeles, California

ANOTHER CALL FOR COPERNICUS

A progressive is one who knows what human nature is under unjust social conditions and strives to improve those conditions so that human nature may express itself in an ideal human brotherhood.

Henry C. Lippincott, Woodstown, New Jersey

EVERYBODY SLIGHTLY MIXED

No one is wholly progressive or conservative; and this is aptly illustrated by William Hard, a most unusual correspondent, in comparing his articles published in the Nation with those published in the Chicago Daily News, as to degree of progressivity.

Fundamentally the present condition of society is ruled to too great a degree by competition and those instincts that evolve from conditions under the general term of hate. This fundamental condition the progressive wishes to change to cooperation and to the dominance of those instincts evolved from conditions under the general term of love. So we find that the progressive wishes progress toward real democracy.

Joseph Pestal, Lamar, Colorado

MORE ACID

Progressivism is an attempt, politically, to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. After the "kill" has been made the weeping hunter—or progressivist—tries to revive the corpse of the poor animal. But it insists upon remaining dead, defying all attempts at resurrection. That corpse is orthodox republicanism.

Reuben Freedman, Chicago, Illinois

Page Dr. Coue

By H. S. STOCKTON

FOR some weeks we had been noticing in the paper that the Society of Applied Psychology met in the public library on Wednesday evening. So when an open meeting was announced we spent a dollar to have the children taken care of and went to see what it was all about.

The room was in the cellar of the library, inadequately lighted and furnished with folding chairs on which in brightly expectant attitudes sat eight or ten men and thirty or forty women with an average age of thirty-five or forty and mostly with that thin, drawn but determinedly hopeful look of half-starved dogs. The front wall above the shallow platform was covered with a huge American flag forming a background for a grand piano and a small deal table. Behind the table sat a lean, artificially colored lady, her mouth a thin red line of courage—or was it obstinacy? Beside her sat a severe lady in black with horn-rimmed glasses and white collar and cuffs who toyed with a long book with a black cover. Lounging about in attitudes meant to betoken ease and self-confidence was a gentleman in correct black clothes, black hair, curly black mustache, and with a red rose in his button hole.

The thin red line of the chairwoman parted sufficiently to emit muffled sounds to the effect that the meeting was open. The gentleman with the button-hole bouquet advanced toward the front rows with a confident smile and shouted in a hearty voice:

"How do we all feel this evening?"

To which the answer came back in startling unison:

"Fine and dandy and getting better every day!"

"Very good," said the gentleman in black.

It seemed evident that this gentleman was the Applier for the Society of Applied Psychology, for he proceeded to say in engaging tones:

"You know you can't be a psychologist without relaxin' to get in tune with the universe. Most folks don't relax because they can't concentrate on the part they want to relax. We aren't conscious of the parts of our body and have to concentrate to relax 'em. Now we'll relax from the tops of our heads to the tips of our toes. I want you to relax by concentratin' your attention on the part of your body as I name it and relaxin'. Are you ready?"

All bent forward as if in prayer and shut their eyes.

"The top of your head—relax.

Very good.

Your mouth and ears—relax.

Very good.

Your chin and neck—relax.

Very good.

Your right arm and shoulder—relax.

Your left arm and shoulder—relax.

Very good.

Your hands and fingers—relax.

Your chest and back—relax.

Very good.

Your hips and thighs—relax.

Your knees and legs—relax.

Very good.

Your feet and toes—relax."

(A pause—"VERY GOOD—Very good.")

"Now you know they say you can't be a deep thinker unless you are a deep breather so we will take a breathin' exercise. We'll all have to stand up for this (everybody got up). Take a deep breath and count."

Everybody took a deep breath hissingly and counted in unison—1-2-3-4-5-6-7-8-9-10-11-12-13-14 (some of them began to come up for air but they valiantly continued counting anyhow) 15-16-17-18-19-20. The last number was shouted by a large lady in the back row who seemed quite proud of her ability to hold her breath and count longer than anybody else. Whereupon the Applier seemed pleased and said: "Very good—Very good."

"Next to relaxin' the most important thing for a psychologist is concentration. We should all learn t' concentrate, and I want somebody to give us a constructive word to concentrate on and while we're concentratin' we'll have a little soft music to help us."

Someone suggested "harmony."

"'Harmony' has been suggested as a constructive word to concentrate on. Very good—very good. We will concentrate on 'harmony.'" He put his hand over his brow in thought and the members of the Society of Applied Psychology did likewise while a lady in a large hat with a feather went to the piano and played soft music, her feather keeping time with her hands and feet.

All breathed hard while they concentrated on the constructive word "harmony" and the soft music went on.

The music stopped. The Applier lifted his hand from his brow with an effort.

"Very good," he said.

By that time my wife said if she didn't get out in the air she would undoubtedly scream, so we left. She said she felt sorry for them, they looked so starved and hopeful, but what hurt her worse than anything else was to know that such people had a vote.

I think I got something out of the meeting. I know now why Christianity was so successful at the break-up of the Roman Empire. The vast majority of the people of that day were just such mentally and physically starved and just such empty-souled, hopeless specimens. To have a hope and to live for something outside of themselves offered a new world and new life; these people were seeking the same thing and not finding it in present-day Christianity. How are you going to reach them with new ideas? They are seeking for something and, not finding it, are swayed by every passing gust of fancy or every hope held out by every well-meaning fool. You cannot get them by reason, statistics, or a constructive program. A "constructive word" is about their limit and their minds are excrescences on their emotional complexes. What are you going to do with such people—breed them out of the world by restrictive eugenics or give them something to live for?

The Republican Party—A Stricken Mob

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE Republican Party seems to be suffering from a violent attack of panic in the legislative branch, complicated by an almost equally violent attack of obstinacy in the executive branch. Both ailments go back to the same cause. They go back to the present modernistic decline and decay and, one might almost say, demise of effective party organization.

This situation indeed exists almost equally in both parties. In 1920, when the Democrats were getting pounded, and when President Wilson had fallen ill and was unable to take the field against his accusers, there was no Democratic party organization effective enough to present a really coherent and coordinated defense to the Republican attack. Today, even with a President who is well and who is alert, the Republicans, finding themselves similarly exposed to fire, behave similarly like a stricken mob.

The legislative part of the mob is for the most part engaged simply in running for its life while the Democrats bombard it with charges about the naval oil reserves, about the Veterans' Bureau, about the prohibition-enforcement service, and about other administrative functions and activities which the Republicans are accused of perverting to private property. Meanwhile the executive part of the mob, in the various departments and bureaus, where a secure separation from the electorate produces a haughty scorn for "politics," puts its head into the bureaucratic sand and discards both the ignominy of flight and the shame of any concession to popular opinion, and awaits the kick of doom with its tail held high in air.

The Treasury Department, for instance, insists upon it that the Republican taxation bill in Congress must reduce the top surtax from 50 per cent all the way down to 25. This drop, the Treasury Department magnificently unpolitically argues, is demanded by economic industrial considerations. Therefore, according to the Treasury Department, it must be put into the bill. If no miracle of conversion, if no heavenly stream of enlightenment, is granted to the Congress, this unpolitical, economic, industrial, austere idea will be congressionally smashed. Nicholas Longworth, floor leader of the Republicans in the House of Representatives, and William Raymond Green, chairman of the House committee dealing with taxes, have both of them explained to the executive branch its virtually inevitable approaching humiliation in the final tax-bill vote on Capitol Hill. The executive branch, however, is permeated with the idea that even if it is defeated in Congress it can go to the country on a platform demanding Mr. Mellon's full and unabridged reduction of taxes for the higher taxpayers and can get sweepingly returned to office.

The flaw in this reasoning, to the mere political mind, is that such an appeal to the country would be made by a divided party—a party only half willing to go along and accordingly fully half willing to turn and flee. The Mellon taxation-reduction plan, irrespective of its economic merits, has diminished the political fighting power of the Republican Party because a certain considerable proportion of the total number of regular Republican congressmen are not convinced by it in its full and unabridged form and cannot valiantly and effectively fight for it in that form.

Yet the executive branch insists upon that form with no dimple or freckle of it removed. In former days, when the Republican Party was a party and not a chance encounter of miscellaneous passengers proceeding to different destinations in the same cruising omnibus, it was not infrequently possible to weld the opinions of legislative Republicans and of executive Republicans into one sword. Now, increasingly, there is no party sword and every political personage has his own little bowie-knife.

He accordingly, if he is a Senator or a Representative, having never received any tribute of consideration from the Treasury Department in the initiating of taxation schemes, or from the State Department in the originating of foreign policies, or from the Interior Department in the adopting of new anti-conservation decisions, or from the Navy Department in the unauthorized alienating of conserved naval oil for administratively invented long lines of steel storage tanks, is at any moment ready to desert them when they fall into popular criticism and disrepute.

A certain defense of the leases of naval oil reserves to Mr. Doheny and to Mr. Sinclair is possible. The Republican Party in Congress did not make that defense. Stunned by revelations of improprieties, ignorant of Interior Department and Navy Department policies and performances, sundered from the executive branch both by the old inherent haughtiness of that branch and by the new absence of authoritative cohesive party organization, the Republicans in Congress, without information, without guidance, without morale, broke and ran. A few individual heroes, Nicholas Longworth conspicuously among them, were seen at least shaking their fists and hurling curses of "You too" and "You're another" at the Democrats as the rout rolled across the legislative landscape. These few maledictions were the bulk of the Republican defense. Except for them the debates in the national legislature on the naval oil-reserve leases produced few sounds except the firing of the Democratic guns and the gasping of Republicans running for funk-holes.

At the same time in the executive branch the retention of Secretary Denby at the head of the Navy Department continued to be thought desirable. The Republican Party in the executive branch continued to shelter Mr. Denby. The Republican Party in the legislative branch left him argumentatively naked to his enemies. There was one attitude toward him in the party at one end of Pennsylvania Avenue. There was another attitude toward him in the same party at the other end of the avenue.

Unless mitigated and replaced by some restoration of party discipline, these conditions portend a near day when the party in opposition will always find it easy to get into power and, having gained power, will find it almost impossible to keep it.

In the Driftway

WHEN Woodrow Wilson was Governor of New Jersey he was quoted as saying that experts are generally fakers. He had learned this, he said, in Princeton University. A good school, no doubt, in which to come by such wisdom; but there are others. It was in others that the Drifter long since reached a similar conclusion. It is pathetic how many men and women there are who can talk or act intelligently in regard to nearly every subject except the one in which their own pretensions or the flattery of ill-advised friends has set them up as experts. There are numerous clergymen who are delightful conversationalists on sport or literature, but are insufferable coxcombs when they launch upon theology; there are plenty of soldiers whose opinions on politics or painting are entertaining but whose ideas on war give one a stomach-ache.

* * * * *

NOT that the Drifter would deny the value of expertism in technique. He would rather be operated on for appendicitis by a man with some reputation as a surgical expert than by a tinsmith; if he had the construction of a suspension bridge over the Mississippi River he would call in an engineer in preference to a deep-sea diver or even a hangman. In the field of technique expertism is only another word for craftsmanship, something for which the Drifter has the highest respect and reverence in the world. It is not in the creation or the doing of something that the Drifter resents expertism, but in the appraisal of it. The job is up to the craftsman, but the finished product is up to the public. It is not for the artisan or the artist to judge his work or that of his fellow-craftsman. Its acceptance or rejection is the privilege of the community which supplies his bread and butter.

* * * * *

WHEN the Drifter comes into the ownership of a great metropolitan daily, say the New York Evening Post (everybody else has owned it, so why not the Drifter?), he will get to his office at 9 a.m. on the first day of possession and at 9:01 he will issue an order decapitating all the critics and experts in the shop. He gives them fair warning herewith. On second thought, he makes two reservations: (1) He will not get to the office at 9 a.m. (2) He will not decapitate the critics and experts. The Drifter imagines that about the time he becomes the owner of a great metropolitan daily he will conclude that 11 or 12 o'clock is plenty early enough to get to office. And as for the critics and experts the Drifter has, on consideration, a better scheme than to set them on the street. His scheme is this: he would send the financial editor out to write up the performance at the Metropolitan Opera House; he would pack the sporting editor off to cover the varnishing day of the winter exhibition of the National Academy of Design; he would instruct the musical critic to attend the baseball series for the world's championship; he would assign the art critic to give his impression of the session of the Stock Exchange. The Drifter would impress upon them all that they were to write exactly what they saw and felt and thought. The public would learn things about both Wall Street and the National Academy of which it had never dreamed. It would get the response of an average, intelligent man to the arts and institutions which are—or ought to be—maintained for other average, intelligent men; instead of the prejudices and sophistication of the professional critic. The result would be the greatest criticism and the best reporting ever done.

* * * * *

ONLY it would be nothing of the kind. On mature reflection the Drifter realizes that the sporting editor would not give his honest, individual opinion of the pictures in the National Academy; he would write what he thought he was expected to think. And the art critic would shed no new light on Wall Street; he would get one of the old-timers to give him the "dope"—or chuck up his job.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

In Defense of Osteopathy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the issue of The Nation for January 30, H. L. Mencken, in an attempt to be amusing, speaks of "osteopaths . . . and other quacks." This may appear a subject for persiflage, but to those of us who are practicing this specialty it is a reflection which cannot be passed over lightly.

In the dictionary definition of a quack—"a pretender to medical skill, an ignorant practitioner or empiric"—a lack of education, training, and regulation is implied. For the benefit, then, of Mr. Mencken and others who are laboring under a misapprehension regarding the status of the osteopath today, be it known that the osteopath is a licensed physician. He takes the same examination that any other doctor does before the State permits him to practice. In order to take this examination he must have been graduated from a college which is under the control of the State Board of Regents; this insures definite educational entrance requirements and definite scientific training. This course in the college is four years and is substantially the same as that of other medical colleges, with this exception, that orthodox drug therapy is omitted and osteopathic and physical therapy substituted.

The osteopath, having been trained in colleges under State supervision, takes State board examination in surgery, diagnosis, obstetrics, pathology, bacteriology, hygiene, sanitation, and allied subjects. Having, therefore, as thorough a comprehension of disease as any other doctor, it is reasonable to suppose that an osteopath can prescribe proper treatment.

This of course is a thing apart from quackery.

New York, February 1

EUGENE R. KRAUS

A Protest from Emporia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have your note in which you say "a dishonest trick" has been played by the man who wrote the advertising for the Bok award. You base this, as I understand it, upon the fact that the World Court is first mentioned in the advertising instead of the League of Nations. As a matter of fact, the plan distinctly does not provide for membership in the League of Nations. When a joint resolution of Congress provides an appropriation of money for the use of the President in naming commissioners to cooperate with the various welfare commissions of the League, and when the entrance has been made under the Hughes resolutions into the World Court, and further, when a committee for codification and development of international law has been appointed with American participation, every positive provision of award No. 1469 of the American Peace Award will have been accomplished as I see it.

The clauses referring to entrance into the League of Nations are negative clauses, providing specifically that entrance shall be denied until all articles establishing the use of any kind of force have been abrogated by the League.

This being the case, it seems to me there was no moral turpitude in making the order of the advertising read "World Court, cooperation with the League, and international law commission." I am a subscriber to The Nation. I am quite sure your advertising, which I regard as a model of perfection, does not emphasize the fact that sometimes you are a mean and inconsistent pacifist. It puts forth all the good things that you stand for in their best form and order, and when I run across an editorial like The Great Bok Humbug I don't feel I have been cheated by the advertising of The Nation which lured me as a subscriber; but I feel this is a free country and if you have that idea about the Bok Peace Prize there's no reason why you shouldn't utter it and no reason why I should complain your advertising was misleading. Even though I think your editorial was unfair.

After all, in this world, I think we go further and happier if we assume a certain amount of honesty in our fellows and don't read ulterior and impossible motives into the conduct of either our friends or our enemies.

Emporia, Kansas, January 15 WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

[When Mr. White admits that the summary of the prize plan printed on the ballots was "advertising," i.e., designed to win votes rather than to give an unbiased and impartial summary, he seems to us to justify our criticism. And when he says that "the clauses referring to entrance into the League of Nations are negative clauses," he leads one to fear that he has read the "advertising" rather than the plan itself.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The Bok Plan and the League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I call your attention to a significant indication that a vote in favor of the Bok peace plan is a vote in favor of the League of Nations. Those students at Harvard who voted Yes in the recent referendum are receiving the following invitation from the League of Nations Non-Partisan Association:

The Bok peace plan has received the support of the university by an overwhelming majority. Inasmuch as you were one of those who voted for the plan, will you not help put the plan through by joining the League of Nations Non-Partisan Association, which heartily indorses this plan and through which you may lend your support to the project.

I submit that this appeal is excellent follow-up work.

Cambridge, Massachusetts, January 28

A. G. H.

Magnus Johnson on the Army

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial on Prussianism in Our Army, describing the treatment of Captain Paxton Hibben, hits the nail on the head in regard to the situation of our army—or perhaps any other army, for that matter.

It is an outrage that Captain Hibben should be treated so shamefully simply because he has had the courage to come back here and state the facts as he found them in regard to Russia. But if I am any judge, it will not be long till Captain Hibben's position will be fully vindicated. The important thing now is to prevent him from being deprived of his commission in the army.

Washington, D. C., January 21

MAGNUS JOHNSON

Contributors to This Issue

SCUDDER MIDDLETON is the author of two volumes of poetry, "Sheets and Faces" (now out of print) and "The New Day" (1919, Macmillan). He was born in New York City where he still makes his home.

CHARLES MERZ is a journalist of note, formerly on the staff of the New Republic and the New York World.

KIMBALL YOUNG, who is now at the University of Oregon, was formerly professor of psychology at Clark University.

HUGH LOFTING, creator of Doctor Dolittle, has been lecturing in this country on internationalism and the education of children.

H. W. NEVINSON, a British writer and press correspondent of many years' experience, is the author of a new volume of personal experience, "Changes and Chances."

CHARLES J. FINGER is the editor of All's Well.

To Irish Americans and others

UNDER the editorship of Mr. G. W. Russell, the famous .E., a team of the foremost Irish writers, in Political Science, Literature, Economics, Music, Art, Agriculture, has been brought together. It includes Bernard Shaw, Sir Horace Plunkett, W. B. Yeats, James Stephens, Padraic Colum, Lennox Robinson, Senator James Douglas, Stephen Gwynn, etc.

IF you wish to be kept in close touch with Irish thought—securing a true picture of all that is best in the new Ireland—don't fail to take in—

The Irish Statesman

Edited by
G. W. RUSSELL (Æ)

3d.
WEEKLY

with which is incorporated

THE IRISH HOMESTEAD

Free specimen willingly. Sales already exceed 8,000 per week. Add your name today. Subscription, including postage, $4.00 a year.

To the Manager Irish Statesman
16, South Frederick St., Dublin, Ireland

THE NATION

Please mail me the IRISH STATESMAN each week for year, for which I inclose remittance of $..... and continue till countermanded.

Cheques or personal drafts accepted, payable to "The Irish Statesman."

John Maynard Keynes'

MONETARY REFORM

By the Author of
"The Economic Consequences of the Peace."

A clear and vivid analysis of international currency and credit.

"There are few among either bankers or economists, business men or politicians, who may read it without profit."—Carl Snyder in the N. Y. Herald. $2.50

Gustav Cassel's

A THEORY OF SOCIAL ECONOMY

Prof. of the University of Stockholm.

Author of the Nature and Necessity of Interest.

A complete restatement of fundamental economic principles. It covers such topics as the mechanism of prices, interest, rent, wages, money, exchange, and the business cycle. One of the most important economic conceptions of recent times. $5.00

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave.
N. Y.

Recent Catalogues of Secondhand Books:

No. 786—Science and Technology, Part III.:

Astronomy and Astrology, Chronology, Geodesy, Horology, and Dialling; including many Incunabula, and other Rare items.

No. 787—First Editions of Great Writers, Colour-plate and Sporting Books, French Illustrated Books of the XVIIIth Century, etc.

No. 788—Miscellaneous Prose Literature, Folk-Lore, and Cheap Remainders at greatly Reduced Prices.

Post free from

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.

43, PICCADILLY, W. 1, or 140 STRAND, W. C. 2

LONDON, ENGLAND

International Relations Section

"To Laboring Humanity"

AT the funeral ceremonies when the body of Nikolai Lenin was laid in the tomb the following declaration from the Federal Soviet Congress, addressed "to laboring humanity," was read aloud to the thousands of listening mourners:

We are burying Lenin. The genius of the workers' revolution has gone from us. His great sagacity and will to action are dead. Hundreds of millions, peasants and colonial slaves, mourn the death of the powerful leader. Laboring Russia, which he united through all dangers in the victorious struggle, in hundreds and thousands are crowding to his final resting-place.

From the whole world swells a wave of lamentation, mourning, and sorrow. His enemies, against whom he waged the struggle of a flaming revolutionary, unwillingly lower their flags. All recognize that a bright star of humanity is eclipsed. From his grave Lenin rises before the world in gigantic stature. On the threshold of a new epoch he will stand for centuries as a grandiose figure. For Lenin was, and will remain even after his physical death, the lord of a new humanity, its herald, prophet, and creator.

Through the centuries human attempts to win freedom from persecution, slavery, and oppression have followed one another. For the first time in world history the oppressed classes came forth into the arena of struggle and conquered. They were the first to clothe their victory in the armor of the proletarian dictatorship. They were the first proletariat of the cities, poor peasants and downtrodden slaves of the old imperial colonies, to take the mastery of the new life and direction of their historical destiny into their own hands. For the first time in human history these laboring masses realize their own strength.

Yes, they can conquer. Yes, they can gild, and are gilding, the kingdom of labor, of which the best and brightest spirits of humanity have dreamed. The peoples of Asia, enslaved for centuries, have hailed the father of this new humanity. The revolutionary proletariat of Europe and America, the greatest civilized continents of our world, recognizes Lenin as its beloved and brilliant leader. And in this wonderful unity, this universal alliance of all the oppressed, all the enslaved, all the producers, lies the guaranty of victory over capital, that devilish obstacle to general progress.

Lenin is an unquenchable volcano of revolutionary energy, from which spouted the whole sea of underground revolutionary lava. But possessing all that was best of the old culture, he took in his hands the mighty weapon of the Marxist theory, he the man of storm and thunder, and led the potent, scattered masses to the granite shore of revolutionary accomplishment.

His vision was colossal, his intelligence in organizing the masses was beyond belief. He was the greatest leader of all countries, of all times, and of all peoples. He was the lord of the new humanity, the savior of the world.

Lenin is dead. But Lenin lives in millions of hearts, lives in the great alliance of workers, peasants, and colonial slaves; he lives in the collective intelligence of the Communist Party; lives in the workers' dictatorship which he established, solid and menacing, on the boundary between Europe and Asia.

The old world is dying. Ruined, crippled, and disfigured lies Europe, the hoary mother of capitalistic civilization. For centuries European capital labored, achieving with the hands of her workers marvels of technique, living in the full daylight, enslaving millions, establishing an iron yoke upon both hemispheres of the globe. For centuries it built upon the earth its empire of cruelty and oppression, blood, slavery, and terror.

But, caught in its own net, putting its skill and technique at the service of scientific self-destruction, it caused the first gigantic fissure in its own structure by the World War. The devilish machine of capital, shaken and tottering already, will soon fall to pieces. But today capital in Europe and the whole world still holds out; only one force, a gigantic savior, victorious, can sweep it away. That force is the laboring mass—that energetic and powerful class guiding and uniting hundreds of millions of men.

The leader of the soul of these masses was our comrade Lenin. He held the key to the spirit of all the workers and peasants. Penetrating to the depths of every human heart he stirred the consciousness, aroused the class instinct, and set the most downtrodden and oppressed on their feet. At the mighty ones of this world he flung the simple and madly daring slogan, "All power to the Soviets," and the miracle was performed.

The union of our governments is growing and waxing stronger. Toward the new life the masses—workmen, workwomen, peasant men, peasant women—are striving. More and more avidly and resolutely they are seizing upon governmental power and abolishing step by step old, decrepit, worthless things. After the bloody struggle our country stands firm on its feet and the kingdom of the workers and peasants is growing.

We have lost in Lenin the beloved captain of our vessel. That loss is irreparable because in all the world there never was such an indomitable will, such mighty energy, such radiant sympathy, as that of Lenin, who held the rudder of the state through all dangers.

Henceforth his work is on the right path. Hundreds of thousands of comrades of Vladimir Ilyich hold his mighty banner firm. The whole world is taking on a new shape.

Comrades and brothers, raise our red flag higher. Do not falter in the struggle for liberty. The working class can never lose. Already it is transfiguring the world. Proletariat of all lands, unite!

The German Unions Fight for Life

WE take from a recent issue of the Advance parts of a translation of an appeal received by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers from the German Wearing Apparel Workers' Union. In response to this appeal the Central Executive Board of the Amalgamated has sent the sum of $3,000 to the German workers.

The steady and rapid sinking of the mark, and the demoralization of German economic life as a result of that, have created conditions unparalleled in the history of civilized peoples, conditions which no people can lastingly endure. . . .

The first ones to realize the true situation are the unions and their responsible officials. Their constantly growing tasks in the interests of labor have reached proportions which are entirely beyond their strength. Volumes could be filled by an attempt to give a general outline of conditions in the labor movement. We shall confine ourselves to a brief statement of conditions in our own wearing-apparel industry, represented by our organization embracing a membership of about 150,000. This organization includes men's and women's tailoring, young men's and boys' clothes, rubber goods, ready-made clothes, waists, men's and women's white goods, and all kindred branches.

. . . Germany, as a highly developed industrial state, with manifold relations with the world market, is dependent in every way in its economic life upon international trade relations. Isolated from the world market, Germany cannot live. . . . In the textile and clothing industries we are entirely dependent upon foreign countries for raw materials. The fact that this demand for raw materials, such as wool, cotton, flax, silk, etc., may be met only by countries with a high rate of exchange makes conditions in our industry particularly bad. Each fluctuation in the rate of exchange affects the market value of raw materials, which are within the country, and prices change automatically. Expressed in terms of dollars, the fluctuation in the rate of exchange presents the following picture:

	Marks
July, 1921	76.67
December, 1921	191.93
July, 1922	493.20
December, 1922	7,589.30
August, 1923	7,700,000.00

You may judge from this the effect on prices in the wearing-apparel industry. The purchasing power of the German people is constantly weakened and, in the end, it is not sufficient to purchase the daily necessities of life. The workers and the salaried employees, with their dependents, who constitute 80 to 85 per cent of the German population, are, as a result of this depressing state, no longer available for the German business market. Prices prevailing today are: Eighty to one hundred million marks for a suit of cloths, six to eight million marks for an ordinary shirt. That makes those goods prohibitive for the workers. That small section of the population which is still able to buy has such a large supply of clothes that it needs no more. As a result we have a business crisis, with general underemployment and unemployment. . . . In previous years it was possible by means of strenuous trade-union activities to keep wages more or less at a level with the cost of living; now lack of employment is reducing us to pauperism.

A brief statement of the changes in the scales of wages for the past year—August, 1922, to August, 1923—will give a slight idea of the tasks of our organization and its officials. On August 12, 1922, we had in the men's tailoring industry in Berlin, Frankfurt-on-Main, Hamburg, Cologne, and other large cities a maximum wage of thirty marks per hour. Since then there have been, in this one branch, under the direction of the general organization, twenty-eight wage increases. In those cities the wages are now from 400,000 to 500,000 marks per hour, an increase of fourteen thousand to sixteen thousand five hundred times.

In the men's and ladies' tailoring industry, forty-two wage increases have been effected in 250 cities. About 200 more cities, in which there were no employers' organizations, accepted the standard set by the others. Since the last negotiations, as a result of the opposition of the employers, the method of uniform adjustment of wages has been discontinued. Wages must now be determined in more than 400 places each week, locally, which is a practically impossible task for our organization. It is, therefore, impossible to determine wages on a uniform and sound basis. Increased resistance on the part of the employers will probably force the workers to a stubborn struggle.

In the men's and boys' ready-made clothing industry we added, in July, 1922, to the pre-war wage scale an increase of 1,850 per cent to meet the higher cost of living, whereas in this week, after twenty changes in the scale, the cost of living has risen to 3,904,800 per cent (or 390,481 times). The weekly wages for Berlin present the following condition:

	Marks	Marks
	Week of July 31, 1922	Week of Aug. 24, 1923
Cutters	2,214.90	26,885,090
Pressers	2,025.10	23,464,740
Tailors	1,784.80	21,763,320

This means an increase for the time workers of about 12,500 times in the course of the past year.

In the men's underwear industry the weekly wages in Berlin were:

	Marks	Marks
	Week of Aug. 12, 1922	Week of Aug. 13, 1923
Cutters	1,645.00	16,163,300.00
Tailoresses	1,063.00	10,126,350.00

The wage increase in this branch has been 10,000 times. . . .

In those branches in which wages are largely regulated weekly and locally, because of the absence of employers' organizations, we conducted in the past year about 22,000 wage-increase movements. What work that meant for the officers of the union need not be said here. Frequently a new revision became necessary before the ink on the first agreement had dried.

It may, therefore, be seen that there are no uniform wage scales in the twenty-four branches represented in our union, and the changes are likewise unequal, as the increases are lower where the organization is weaker.

We also have the task of our own financial management in view of the fluctuations in the rate of exchange. The longer this state of affairs continues the more burdened the organization becomes. As a result of this state of affairs the members are very much in arrears with their dues to the organization.

Even if the members could pay their full dues to the union, our difficulties would still be great, for it takes five or six weeks for the dues to reach the central office from the different parts of the country, and by that time the value of the money has fallen so low that it is not even enough to meet the most urgent administration expense. As a result we are now confronted by tremendous difficulties. Despite all the sacrifices made by our members, the union's ability to serve its members is endangered.

The fact that we are now, in our great distress, appealing to you for fraternal help to save the life of the union should be sufficient proof to you that our need is real.

German Students and the Jews

THE Jewish Telegraphic Agency in its News Bulletin for January 15, prints the following dispatch from its correspondent in Berlin:

As already reported briefly by cable, a group of Aryan student bodies, including the Berlin Waffening, the Finkenschafft, and the corporation of the High School Ring of Germanism, a section of the German students' organization "Guilel-mia," have proposed the following resolution for consideration by the executive of the Berlin Students' Organization and the Berlin Students' Parliament:

In order to prevent the excessive growth in numbers of the Jewish students the executive of the students' bodies is instructed to take steps to provide that in future all candidates for admission to the university should be obliged to state whether they are of German origin and whether German is their mother-tongue. They should also be obliged in all cases to state their religious belief. The German middle-class is unable at present to afford the luxury of allowing their sons to study at the universities. We must therefore be on guard that the Jews do not take advantage of the situation to swamp the German universities with an overwhelming percentage of Jewish students.

This resolution is regarded as a first step toward a numerus clausus agitation in Germany. Nationalist student circles declare that two-thirds of the Berlin students are organized into Aryan nationalist bodies, and that approximately the same ratio obtains in regard to the rest of the German universities.

In the event of the resolution being adopted, the next step will be to submit it to the Prussian Ministry for Education. The Vossische Zeitung, in reporting the resolution, draws the attention of the Minister for Education to the ordinance issued in July, 1922, declaring that there must be no discrimination against Jewish students. The Vossische Zeitung expresses the hope that the Minister for Education will know how to deal with the resolution when it is submitted to him, and points to the urgent necessity of nipping the numerus clausus agitation in the bud before it has grown to formidable proportions.

The Nation

Vol. CXVIII, No. 3058

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1924

Distinguished Books

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD

The Man of Tomorrow

by ICONOCLAST

With an Introduction by Oswald Garrison Villard

HERE is the first complete and authoritative biography and study of Great Britain's first Labor Prime Minister, the foremost political figure in the world today. This is the absorbing story of his rise and a study of the personality of the man upon whose doings, as the head of his party, depends in large measure the destiny of Britain, and, indirectly, of the world. The author is a well-known British writer and editor. $2.50

WANDERINGS IN ARABIA

by CHARLES M. DOUGHTY
The Authorized Abridged Edition of

"ARABIA DESERTA"

Edward Garnett, with the approval of the author, has made this abridgment of the "stupendous prose poem," which hitherto has been out of reach of many because of its bulk and high price. The shortening has sacrificed none of the scholarly value of this noble work. Two 8vo vols., boxed. $7.50

A PERFECT DAY

by BOHUN LYNCH

A story of infectious gaiety, which, says the Morning Post, "fulfills the perfection of its title." $2.00

LOVE LETTERS TO A DEAD WOMAN

by H. D. HARBEN

A first-rate novel by a new author, the simple story of the growth of a great love. $2.00

ESCAPADE

by EVELYN SCOTT

This fearless, powerful autobiography remains the finest personal record ever penned by a woman. 8vo. $3.00

D. H. LAWRENCE

An American Interpretation

by HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

The first full-length critical estimate of all the work of "the most significant writer of his generation"; a brilliant, searching study of the art and philosophy of a great personality. Every person to whom art and ideas are of value should read this book. *Paper cover 25c
Full cloth 75c*

STIFFS

by MELBOURNE GARAHAN

The "Stiff" is the aristocrat among tramps. Here is a fascinating autobiography of a stiff, and the story of his adventures. $2.00

KANGAROO

by D. H. LAWRENCE

The Odyssey of a man's soul—beautiful, powerful, searching. $2.00

DR. GRAESLER

by ARTHUR SCHNITZLER

The story of a middle-aged physician's search for a wife, written by "a born story-teller." $2.50

WHAT THE BUTLER WINKED AT

by ERIC HORNE

Being the Life and Adventures of ERIC HORNE (Butler), for fifty-seven years in service with the Nobility and Gentry. A genuine autobiography, written without guile. "A first-rate book," says William Bolitho in the N. Y. World. $3.00

SEMBAL

by GILBERT CANNAN

The story of a "fierce, passionate intellectual in post-war England." $2.00

LETTERS FROM A DISTANCE

by GILBERT CANNAN

The record of a trip over the African veldt, and of "a man's search for a confirmation." $2.50

THE HOPEFUL JOURNEY

by BEATRICE KEAN SEYMOUR

A story of love and marriage in three generations of women—"Far surpasses Norris' many-edited success," says the N. Y. Telegraph. $2.00

THOMAS SELTZER, Publisher, 5 W. 50th St., NEW YORK

THE FIRST TIME IN HISTORY

Two Years of Russia's New Life

by ANNA LOUISE STRONG

With an introduction by LEON TROTSKY

The story of the gigantic upbuilding of a new kind of human life, the working out of an experiment whose laboratory is a fifth of the Globe, whose elements are 140 million human beings, whose outcome will affect the farthest corner of the world and the humblest and proudest of humanity. $2.00

THE COLOR OF A GREAT CITY

by THEODORE DREISER

"A volume packed closely with the magic vistas, the sharp contrasts, the grim tragedies of cosmopolitan life... achieving effects that stir you strangely to quick emotions as you read."

—N. Y. Herald

Illustrated by C. B. Falls $3.50

MY UNIVERSITY DAYS

by MAXIM GORKY

"Gorky's gift is that of putting on paper the stark actuality of experience—physical, mental and emotional. Under and through it all there is evidence of courage and striving, and of an intellectual honesty beside which merely artistic realism shows pale and meaningless."—Portland Oregonian. $3.00

THE PROLONGA- TION OF HUMAN EFFICIENCY

A Book on the Steinhach Method of Rejuvenation by Dr. Paul Kammerer. Dr. Paul Kammerer is the noted biologist and discoverer of the heredity of acquired characteristics. He has been Dr. Steinhach's collaborator and his book is the only authoritative and full treatment of this subject. $2.00

THE CREATIVE LIFE

by Ludwig Lewisohn. A book well worth waiting for—a study of contemporary art and life, to be published March 15th. $2.50

CRYSTALLIZING PUBLIC OPINION

by Edward L. Bernays. How individuals and groups may get the ear of the public; a fascinating account of the rise of a new profession, its workings, and first revelations of some unusual publicity coups. $2.50

56 NEW GOOD BOOKS

Write in for the new Spring B. & L. catalog and learn about all the 56 new good books

Novels that reveal us to each other

TOLD BY AN IDIOT

by ROSE MACAULAY

This latest novel by the brilliant author of "Potterism" and "Dangerous Ages" is reported England's best seller. "He who touches this book touches civilization."—London Daily News. "A masterpiece, using that restricted term in all strictness."—N. Y. Herald. $2.00

SIEGE

By SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS

A story taken from American life—the clash of two women and the lives they sway—the SIEGE of the old by the new. Feb. 25th. $2.00

RAPTURE

by RICHMOND BARRETT

No book within memory deals so powerfully and greatly with the consuming power of passion. Mr. Liveright considers RAPTURE the finest first novel he has ever read. $2.00

MIRAGE

by EDGAR LEE MASTER

Mr. Masters considers MIRAGE to be his finest novel... a stirring, frank book—one of the important publications of the season. Feb. 25th. $2.50

The HUSSY

by BOINE GRAINGER

"When a man goes here, there and everywhere looking for love he is called an idealist; when a woman does it, she is called a hussy." A brilliant novel about the adventures and discoveries of "a hussy." Feb. 25th. $2.00

THY NEIGHBOR'S WIFE

by LIAM O'FLAHERTY

The Aran Islands off the Irish coast are among the last strongholds of primitive Gaelic life. This story brings it to us with all its vivid color and homely truth. Feb. 25th. $2.00

THE REAL

Sarah Bernhardt

Whom her audiences never knew

by MME. PIERRE BERTON and BASIL WOON

This entrancing volume was authorized before her death by Mme. Bernhardt and contains material not in her own autobiography. "Fit to stand, if not beside, at least in the shadow of Boswell's immortal portrait of Samuel Johnson."—London Times. Illustrated with rare photographs. Feb. 25th. $3.50

Other Notable Biography

A book about "a merchant in brains," the story of a fascinating personality's encounters with other fascinating personalities, Shaw, H. G. Wells among them, is MY CRYSTAL BALL by Elisabeth Marbury. Illustrated. $3.50. A startling autobiography that all Nation readers will find delight in, HAUNCH PAUNCH AND JOWL, which drew enthusiastic praise from Booth Tarkington, Leroy Scott, Burton Rascoe among others. Anonymous. $3.00

The Season's Great Plays

RAIN, by John Colton and Clemence Randolph ($2.00), and THE SWAN, by Franz Molnar ($2.00), are now joined by the book version of OUTWARD BOUND, which Boni and Liveright are publishing ($1.75).

HUSBANDS AND LOVERS

by FRANZ MOLNAR

The noted author of "Liliom" and "The Swan" presents dialogues which, with infinite deftness and penetration, reveal the life of troubled gaiety characteristic of Vienna. Feb. 25th. $2.00

THE LOGIC OF CONDUCT

by JAMES MACKAYE

A very important book which will make a deep impress on the organized thinking of our time and the common sense of all readers; changes ethics and behavior from a Philosophy to a Science of life. Mar. 25th. $3.00

REBELLION IN THE LABOR UNIONS

by Sylvia Kopald, Ph.D.

A significant development is the growing rebellion of elements within the unions. Outlaw strikes, boring from within, etc., are leading to momentous results, and this is the first interpretive book on what is happening, and how and why. Mar. 15th. $2.00

SALVOS

by WALDO FRANK

In SALVOS, one of the most discussed and analyzed of American writers turns about and analyzes his contemporaries. As brilliant and clear as "Our America." Feb. 25th. $2.50

New Volumes in the
MODERN LIBRARY
The Modern Library grows. Just added, Theodore Dreiser's FREE AND OTHER STORIES, introduction by Sherwood Anderson, and James Branch Cabell's BEYOND LIFE, introduction by Guy Holt. Limp binding, gold stamped. Write for complete Modern Library catalog. 95c.

GOOD BOOKS

A Primer of
MODERN ART
by Sheldon Cheney
By assembling the most complete and representative collection of modern art in all fields and putting it between the covers of one book, Mr. Cheney has given us today the most beautiful many ways, the most useful book available on Modern Art. $6.00

BONI & LIVERIGHT

61 WEST 48th STREET
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Midwinter Book Section

The Nation's Prize Poem for 1924

Jezebel

By SCUDDER MIDDLETON

We know she lives upon that thorny hill,
We see her lights and watch her chimneys spark—
But her we have not seen. The old wives say,
Remembering when she came, her ways were dark,
And that her only name is Jezebel.
One gray idiot tells his tale of love,
Mixing her beauty with the stars of May.

Perhaps we idly wonder if she wore
A flower in her hair, or if the beat
Of her small heels upon the sidewalk stone
Was heard at midnight through our lamplit street;
Or why it was she went away to live,
With all her perfumed satin and her lace,
In that wind-beaten, far-off place, alone.

We never wonder more of Jezebel.
We have our work to do and God is hard.
Serving the wheels or guiding straight the plow
Leaves little thought of frankincense and nard.
Yet, she is like deep waters of the Spring
Running along our minds; down at the roots,
The miracle that makes the April bough.

No man goes near that house above the town.
No man has seen her shadow on the blind,
Though through the night, till dawn, the tallow drips.
But, sometimes, when the chains of duty bind,
Because we reach too eagerly for Heaven,
Sometimes, like little bells within our sleep,
It seems we hear the music of her lips.

Then we have left what we most dearly love,
And, momentary lords of Heaven and Hell,
We have gone up through briars and the night,
And seen the secret face of Jezebel.
There, in that still confessional where she waits,
We all have had the blessing of her breast,
As over us she leaned to blow the light.

Up in that room above our godly town,
We have denied the vows we bleed to keep,
We have torn off the lying masks we wear,
And sown without the fear that we must reap.
The young, the pious, and the old alike
Have been glad penitents upon her heart—
She has absolved us by her kisses, there.

She has forgiven us and let us go,
And we have wakened in our homes again,
To hear the breathing of an earthly bride,
To watch the real world blooming on the pane.
The field, the wheel, the desk have called once more,
And we have stooped to pick the slender threads
By which we weave the patterns of our pride.

That day, we do not bargain with the sun,
Or curb our pride because one angel fell—
We are the wilful brotherhood who sing!
We bend, without a thought of Jezebel,
Above our work, no longer do we drudge;
We are, awhile, like happy, armored men
God's searching whip of anger cannot sting!

From three thousand poems submitted by fifteen hundred writers, the editors of The Nation have chosen Scudder Middleton's poem "Jezebel" for their annual poetry prize of one hundred dollars. However, they were so impressed by the distinguished workmanship and character of "A Parable of Paradise" by Genevieve Taggard that they have decided to award a second prize of fifty dollars to this poem. It will be published in next week's issue. They would like also to give honorable mention to Wilbert Snow's poem "Advice to Clam Diggers," which will appear in the issue of February 27.

Carl Van Doren

By CARL VAN DOREN

WITHOUT being clever or notably astute, Carl Van Doren has always been lucky. Ten years ago, when he set out to become a specialist in American literature, he seemed to many of his friends to be cutting off his future with an ignorant if not with a deliberate knife, much as if he were some improvident youth who had vowed, against all advice, to court Cinderella while she still huddled among her cinders. Then came the sudden prosperity of Cinderella. New poets began to step forth on every bough and sing; new novelists discovered that honesty is a good policy in their trade; new critics lifted powerful and not entirely untrained voices which were heard in circles heretofore quite innocent of such exciting sounds; even new dramatists wriggled in the womb of eternity. Commentators and interpreters being called for, Mr. Van Doren became one of them, and has ever since busily made hay under the unanticipated sun.

It may be hoped that there is some connection between his sense that he has been rather fortunate than deserving and his discreet method in criticism. So far as it is possible for a critic, he stands quietly, if not stealthily, behind his work. The shortest of the pronouns is almost the rarest of the words he uses; if he were writing about himself, he would be likely to write in the third person. Whatever noise he makes in the world he prefers to make vicariously, with the subjects of his criticism the real protagonists—his subjects, in fact, and not his victims. They are as he sees the matter, the source and end and test of the critic art. The authors who mean enough to warrant criticism do not always reveal their meanings unmistakably. Their books have been conceived in passion and brought forth in enthusiasm, these at one period of growth and those at another, some successfully and some unsuccessfully. Public opinion concerning any given author is generally confused, based upon loose hearsay, false guesses, insufficient knowledge of his whole significance. To the problem thus arising Mr. Van Doren likes best to address himself. Intending to exercise no craft but that of sympathy, he turns the documents of his author over and over until he has found what he believes to be the central pattern. This is his chief delight in criticism: to find a pattern where none has been found before. He would probably stop here if he had his choice, but being by profession a journalist, and having so many pages to fill each week or month, he goes on to his explanation of the pattern and his incidental interpretation of the author to the general public. His business with the problem ends, he thinks, when he has made it clear to the limit of his capacity. He leaves to other-minded critics the fun of habitually pointing out what meanings, what patterns, would be better.

Confined as he has been by his specialism to the literature of one country during barely three centuries, and still further confined, for the most part, by his journalism to writers of the present century, Mr. Van Doren nevertheless surveys his field not without perspective. Euripides is the tragic dramatist, Lucretius the poet, Montaigne the essayist, Fielding the novelist, Heine the wit, Shaw the comic dramatist, Socrates and Leonardo da Vinci are the persons and the saga-writers the historians, whom this home-keeping specialist and punctual journalist actually most enjoys. Yet in his criticism he seldom ventures into argument by comparison. With what must seem a kind of chameleon ardor he has managed to discuss the most varied types of Americans. A striking number of these subjects of his analysis, and those not the least diverse in aims and achievements, testify that Mr. Van Doren has come as close to their designs as any critic can decently be expected to come. He would, however, be one of the promptest to admit, what he has had enough critics to point out, that he is singularly, if not fatally, non-committal. Where are the scalps, they ask him, that should dangle bloodily at the critic's belt? Is so much impartial interpretation anything but virtually so much praise? Has the roving critic no prejudices, no principles, no causes? Is he a critic of many minds and therefore a man of none at all?

In answering these questions it is only just to turn the tables upon so reserved a critic and to look for any pattern, any ground-plan, which may underlie his movements. What first of all appears is his preference for those authors who are civilized: intelligent, skeptical, ironical, lucid. Viewing the general life of mankind, its dim history, its shifting manners, its tangled aspirations, as a thing which is, for the artist, both raw materials and fair game, Mr. Van Doren looks particularly in an author for the mind, the rational conception of existence, by which he shapes his matter. This may be a mind as detached and disciplined as George Santayana's, as impetuous and loose as Vachel Lindsay's, as speculative as Mary Austin's, as empirical as George Ade's, and Mr. Van Doren can still give it all the benefit of the philosophic doubt whether one kind of mind is absolutely better than another; but he does not really sympathize with it unless it stands definitely on the side of the reason as against superstition or mere tradition. He does not greatly trust impetuous surmises or mystical illuminations: "Civilization, after all, is but the substitution for first thoughts of second or third or hundredth thoughts, reason supplanting passion, and polity guiding anarchic instinct"; "All the tools with which mankind works upon its fate are dull, but the sharpest among them is the reason"; "At least as much good is done in the world by the devils who merely question as by the angels who merely pray; and the devils are more entertaining."

So implicit a confidence in the rational faculties of the human race might well suggest in Mr. Van Doren an exaggerated taste for the universal, the abstract, the mathematical, or the smart in literature were it not offset by his equally implicit confidence in an element which he discusses in connection with his favorite doctrine of "the fourth dimension in criticism." It is not enough, he argues, to ask about a masterpiece only "Is it good?" "Is it true?" "Is it beautiful?" There is still the unavoidable query, "Is it alive?" "The case of Socrates illustrates the whole argument. Was he good? There was so great a difference on this point among the critics of his time that the majority of them, translating their conclusions into action, put him to death as dangerous to the state. Was what he taught the truth? . . . It seems clear that he had his share of unscientific notions and individual prejudices and mistaken doctrines. Was he beautiful? He confused Greek orthodoxy by being so uncomely and yet so great. But whatever his shortcomings in these regards, no one ever doubted that he was alive—alive in body and mind and character, alive in war and peace and friendship, alive in bed and at table. Life was concentrated in him; life spoke out of him.

"So with literature, which collects, transmutes, and utters life. It may represent the good, may speak the truth, may use the modes of beauty—any one or all of these things. Call the good the bow which lends the power; call the truth the string which fixes the direction; call the beautiful the arrow which wings and stings. But there is still the arm in which the true life of the process lies. Or to change the figure, one of those gods who in the mythologies model men out of clay may have good clay and a true purpose and may shape his figure beautifully; but there is still the indispensable task of breathing the breath of life into it before it will wake and go its own course and continue its breed to other generations. Life is obviously what makes the difference between human sculpture and divine creation; it is the same element which makes the difference between good literature and dead literature. . . . Neither creator nor critic can make himself universal by barely taking thought about it. He is what he lives. The measure of the creator is the amount of life he puts into his work. The measure of the critic is the amount of life he finds there."

Mr. Van Doren is of course aware that this creed of vitality can not be held to equip the critic with any idiot-proof formula for estimating works of art. Not all persons will agree upon what it is that makes a book alive, and some will find a book throbbing when others find it cold. No scheme of measurement is impartial or precise enough to determine whether Shakespeare creating Hamlet or Goethe appreciating the achievement was indubitably more or less alive than the random citizen cracking his best joke or his companions roaring at it. Criticism, however, being rarely the concern of random citizens, finds it prudent to consider the processes of the Shakespeares and Goethes whom it does concern. Thus biased to the side of experts, the critic habitually tends to lose himself in technical considerations, to admire masterpieces because of the minor difficulties they have overcome, to approve the exquisite adjustments of matter to form. By this tendency the pedants and puritans of criticism are manufactured. To resist it the critic who wishes to be alive must keep his attention fixed much of the time upon the primary substances of art: the stormy passions of mankind, the swarming hopes, the noisy laughter, the homely speech. Let him be delighted as he may be by the final product, he must still, behind all the modes of literature except those whose chief merit is their artifice, feel the rough document. He must understand that the best civilized poets or novelists, though perhaps not the most civilized, have shaped their art out of materials which, being original and obstinate, did not too glibly slip into neat molds.

For Mr. Van Doren it has doubtless been easier to be a critic of this sort than it might have been had he worked with some literature not so relatively rich in documents as the literature of America and not so relatively poor in final products. But his chosen specialism has exacted a penalty. It has confirmed him in his native disposition to overlook deficiency in art for the sake of abundance of vitality. Back and forth over the continent of American literature, with possibly too much gusto and certainly not enough fastidiousness, he has moved in search of biographers, travelers, amateur anthropologists, adventurers, and eccentrics no less than of conscious artists; and he has expounded them all with a sympathy which is to blame if now and then the swans and geese, the sheep and goats, within Mr. Van Doren's critical fold look lamentably of the same dimensions and significance.

Taken in some candid moment, this friendly critic would undoubtedly admit that sympathy, however valuable a function of criticism, is not its total function. There are authors who deserve less to be explained than to be attacked like weeds in a useful or lovely garden, without too much consideration for their unavoidable instinct to be weeds. But for such lethal functions Mr. Van Doren has apparently small appetite. He has, with all his considerable industry when enthusiastic, the particular kind of indolence which seeks to avoid controversy. Though his vivisection of Booth Tarkington and of Winston Churchill seems to have been accomplished with certain cruel thrusts and twists of the scalpel, he ordinarily prefers to use in such cases the colder knife of silence. Nor is this preference the result of any calculated pride, unwilling to stoop to the smaller fry of letters. It comes from a positive aversion to reading undistinguished or trifling authors and to doing the hard work upon them which goes into Mr. Van Doren's criticism. If he touches an author of this sort at all, it is because he thinks the author's works have settled into a false place in history.

Rather an historian, strictly speaking, than a critic, Mr. Van Doren is bold enough where history is in question. He has labored untiringly to dig the weeds out of the annals of American fiction; he was nearly the first to lift a voice in the revival of Herman Melville; among his contemporaries he reaches a probably too eager hand to many if not to all kinds of excellence, in something the spirit of a radical historian quick to welcome new materials to the record. Being so occupied with history, that is, with things already done, Mr. Van Doren has almost no interest in the metaphysics of criticism. He seldom struggles in the speculative void where subtler critics argue about the boundaries and purposes of art. He undertakes only plain jobs with definite materials. He sets forth the patterns which he believes he has found in his subjects of investigation as if they were any other contribution to knowledge. Subtler critics may disagree with him, but he does not return to the theme unless he has found new facts which force him to modify his opinions. Though no longer given so much as formerly to minute research, he still insists that his usefulness, if he has any, must be based upon the opportunity which he affords for unprofessional readers, with his professional help, to make up their own minds about the authors whom he interprets.

The truth of the matter is, Mr. Van Doren practices one branch of criticism to the exclusion of several others. That he is little perturbed by his limitations, that he does not greatly care to rise to passion or to descend to prejudice, means, in part, that he is more wilful in his behavior than sometimes appears. It means, also, that criticism has never been with him a major aim. What really interests him is human character, whether met in books or out of them, and it is always human character which he studies. His fourth volume of more or less formal criticism being now completed, he plans, so far as it may be permitted him, to withdraw to other provinces.

Children and Internationalism

By HUGH LOFTING

MR. BOK'S peace-essay contest is concluded and the winning "essay" has been published. It cannot be said to be a very fertile document. But the contest (besides conferring vast publicity on the name of Edward Bok and the publishing house with which he is associated) at least took the twin topics of Permanent Peace and International Cooperation out for a nice airing.

Presumably timeliness is of the essence of good publishing. The peace prize has been offered at a time when the question of internationalism, consciously or unconsciously, occupies the political cogitations of almost all of us. It would not be too much to assert that recently there has been hardly anyone—of those who give thought at all to public affairs—who has not experienced a lurking suspicion that we're not going to get anywhere until we do face this question of nationalism versus internationalism.

One can't help thinking that it might be an excellent thing if Mr. Bok were to follow up his idea with the offering of a second prize to be competed for by children. For when the structure of our society conscience and conduct is analyzed it becomes apparent that the mental reorganization necessary for the development of internationalism begins—perhaps begins and ends—with the children. Certainly by offering the schools a prize for an essay of this kind we would at all events show that we are not afraid to tell the rising generation that its political duty to society goes further than waving a national flag. Whether or not that would eventually show our children that there can be only one flag, the flag of Justice, would remain to be seen. But in the schools it would unquestionably give a boost to the advocates of peace as opposed to those adults who play with tin soldiers.

An ingrained admiration for tin-soldierdom seems as yet to be part of every child's metamorphosis. It too, like the Hymn of Hate, will pass—in time. But for the present it seems to have very tenacious roots. Many zealous advocates of internationalism complain that their small boys, who have heard nothing in the home in praise of war since they were born, insist when they reach a certain age on making wooden swords, marching up and down the garden, and smiting off the heads of dandelion enemies.

The reason for this is not very far to seek. The boy may not have heard his father boasting of the glories of a crack regiment, but he has read a whole heap of so-called Children's Classics in which highly painted heroes galloped, glorious and victorious, across bloody battlefields. That kind of battlefield has gone for good—it is still bloody, but you don't gallop. And since that kind of battlefield has gone, that kind of book—for children—should go too. Even the rabid nationalist ought to concede that. Surely it is very wrong to misrepresent things to children—and none the less wrong when we plead patriotism as an excuse.

Suppose that a book of merit, truthfully descriptive of modern war, were written for children; it would be interesting to see if any publisher would accept and print it.

The trouble with all heroes and all heroic games has been that they were always selectively reported. Both sides were very seldom fairly given of either the man or the game. Yet truthfulness, realism, is a prominent characteristic of modern writing. And you can make a hero out of anyone, e.g., Potash and Perlmutter. There's no misrepresentation there. Yet people love them.

So the experiment, after the military heroes of past times have been respectfully interred, of initiating a 1919 school of war literature for children should not discourage the enterprising writer.

No one would want the supreme sacrifices made by the soldiers who died in the World War to be forgotten. But neither must we forget that the main thing they died for was to make future war impossible, to make peace permanent. And the modern battle-book for children should depict the war of 1914 not as a field on which any individual army showed its sportsmanlike excellence over all others; not as part of the "good old fighting days"; not as a chance to win medals. But beneath all the braying of the brass bands and the cheering of the girls who lined the streets it should be displayed as the death throes of two ugly giants, the epochs of Competitive Industrialism and Armed Imperialism. In this great struggle, it should be shown that millions of men gave their lives for ideals which the rest of us, as soon as the armistice was signed, failed to live up to. And that whether the giants are to come back to life and have their ugly fight all over again, with still less of the Queensberry code of rules in evidence, rests with them—the children.

Such a book, provided that it got a good sale (which would largely depend of course on its being interesting as well as meritorious), would contribute a great deal toward the chances of permanent peace—as much as, if not more than, Mr. Bok's late contest.

In the determination of his aesthetic leanings and sociological opinions the force of emulation from a boy's books is almost as potent as that from his living heroes and companions. Charles Dickens did a great deal of good with his novels directed against the Debtor's Prison and the Work-house. He did a lot of harm with the "Tale of Two Cities" and his apotheosis of Sydney Carton, the picturesque martyr-drunkard.

Neither militarism nor Sydney-Cartonism (the romantic pastime of drinking yourself to death when your girl jilts you) quite enjoys the popularity today that it once did. Post-war taxes have done much to discredit the first; and Senator Volstead has made the second very expensive. But there are still those who would tell us that juvenile saber-rattling and the sowing of wild oats are a necessary part of the normal development of every "red-blooded" male.

But now, when so many of the old idols and ideals that molded society have crashed in fragments about our bewildered feet, the voice of the laboratory prophet is heard telling us that vitamins and Scotch oats contribute a good deal more to the making of red-blood than nitro-glycerine or wild oats. And for personal prowess and adventure (which is all the youngster is really seeking) there are always the amateur boxing ring and those uncharted portions of our planet which still dare the hardihood of the explorer and the enterprise of the pioneer.

Those terrible, conservative, apoplectic "red-bloods," those bombastic "he-men," the "what-was-good-enough-for-father" school, they will be the die-hards of war and nationalism. But they cannot stay the tide. With the professional demagogue and the race-hatred trafficker they will finally be swept by the flood of enlightened evolution into the limbo of anachronism.

But how long must we wait? How many wars will they start, and others finish, before they pass?

If one were to suggest that all the war-hero books that are outdated be closed to ages under twenty one would probably be met with opposition from still another quarter. This, the romantic curator of the folk-tale. Those dear people who, blinded by the need of antique glamor in an ugly utilitarian world, would raise the child upon the sagas.

The beauty of the sagas is something none of us would like to see disappear. Yet their aesthetic burden includes many things besides beauty. Bloodthirstiness, superstition, bigotry, and primitive ignorance are among these. Of a great deal of this lore of old stories and rhymes which we hand down to our children the only virtue allowable is that it is old—that it was handed down to us. What merit has

A diller a dollar

A ten-o'clock scholar that it should be included in the Mother Goose Rhymes? And still less excuse can be found for Taffy was a Welshman,

Taffy was a thief.

The war of 1914 began with the murder of the Archduke at Sarajevo. Before that it began with two big empires striving for economic mastery of the world. Going back further still it began with the misrepresentation of government bureaus and the press. But before all of these it began with the sagas—with the folk-tales, the tribal legends that were purposely designed to keep alive race hatreds combined with a paramount respect for military prowess.

"Arma virumque cano!"

The little naked boy listening over the peat fire, or at the door of the tribal tent, grasps his wooden sword, his small frame quivering with ardor! And as the song goes on, telling of the evil deeds of the hereditary enemy, he lifts his toy weapon and shakes it toward the stars. "I, too," he cries, "when I am a man, will be a warrior such as these great ones. And woe to any of that tribe who wronged our people if he cross my path!" And the old gray-beards nod approval, saying: "He is a true son of a martial race. Our enemies shall tremble at his name."

That was where the war of 1914 started. And there perhaps is where the most effective work for rational internationalism can today begin. By education, by getting the child to realize that the day of the old-fashioned military hero is gone; that war henceforth, if we must have it, will be at best a contest of chemists and machinery design, we shall do more toward laying the foundations of permanent peace than by any devices of statesmanship which run ahead of popular education. If, beginning with the children, we launch a campaign for the right kind of Peace Preparedness, the working out of governmental plans later will be easier.

It is in this education which we the older work out for the younger generation that another great stumbling-block to internationalism and peace is obtrusively apparent. And that is the attitude which we encourage in our young nationals toward the peoples of races other than their own.

Our passive offenses in this direction are perhaps more pernicious than our active. We don't always say, "Remember that you are the only wholly decent people on the earth," but we very frequently let our children think it. And soon they begin pretty nearly to believe that "God's Country" really is the country where God (and I) come from.

If we make children see that all races, given equal physical and mental chances for development, have about the same batting averages of good and bad, we shall have laid another very substantial foundation stone in the edifice of peace and internationalism.

Recently a good deal toward this has been done by the new schools of pedagogy and aesthetics. Here, as in all fields of up-to-date thought, internationalism crept in whether invited or no. Learning has always been international, ever since pilgrim-students flocked to the universities of Salamanca and Paris: so has art—ever since the Caesars scoured the four quarters of the earth to find craftsmen to beautify the city of Rome.

Within the last few years one or two candid history-writers have helped too.

But what is needed above all is some association of parents who will band and pledge themselves against that terrible phrase "My country, right or wrong." Those teachers who are valiantly trying to show the children their duty to society through mutual tolerance and undisturbed self-expression cannot accomplish very much while they are vastly outnumbered by benighted mothers and fathers who have the children's attention through more than four-fifths of the total hours in the year.

If parents will give children a chance to get away from some of that bigoted misrepresentation which it took most of us so many years to learn and unlearn, then the children themselves will bring about some form of a rational internationalism.

And with that Rational Internationalism will come Permanent Peace. For the one cannot exist without the other.

Books

How the Empire Grows

The Story of My Life. By Sir G. Harry H. Johnston. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

WHENEVER I have met Sir Harry Johnston, either at the Royal Geographical Society, or at public dinners, or on the platform speaking for woman suffrage, or in his own sequestered and ancient home in Sussex, his very appearance has filled me with astonishment. I have seen a short, active but "dumpy" little figure, surmounted by a little head with a rather smug, commonplace, and self-complacent little face, but on public occasions so covered with medals, orders, ribbons, and decorations of all sorts that really there seemed no room for any more in front. Do you have Bands of Hope, and Oddfellows, and Teetotal Foresters in your country? I know you have Elks, and Crocodiles, and the Ku Klux Klan, all no doubt wearing their peculiar insignia. Well, our Oddfellows and the rest look something like that when they are celebrating their Orders, and Sir Harry Johnston looks just like an ordinary official among them.

And then I have thought to myself, "Can this really be one of the greatest travelers in the world, one of our greatest Empire Builders, the man who has probably seen more of Africa's enormous continent than anyone living, and has administered savage provinces in regions unexplored and indeterminate?" The thing looks obviously ridiculous, and yet, like so many British absurdities, it is true; it has worked. That rather insignificant-looking person has accomplished all those exploits. His name is almost as well known in Africa as that of Livingstone or Stanley or Rhodes, and there he stands before me, covered with high distinctions for service, and speaking in a high-pitched little voice equally well on the suffrage or Liberal politics or the Bantic languages or that queer animal the okapi, which he discovered in the forests of the Upper Congo. It is hard to believe.

Now that he is sixty-six, he has given us the story of his life in this volume of 520 pages, and it must have taken him all his time to compress it even within those spacious limits. (While I am in the way with it, I do protest against the publishers' slovenly manner of bringing out a large and discursive book like this without any Table of Contents, without any names to the chapters, and without any headings to the pages except the weary repetition on each page of The Story of My Life. Why on earth should we have that title repeated 520 times? Who wants it more than once? Or what guide and help is there in such futile repetition?) No one could have foretold such a life for the little student at the Royal Academy Schools where Harry Johnston learned to draw. And here again I think it a great loss that Sir Harry and the publishers have not included reproductions of his own admirable drawings of places he has visited and especially of the splendid and fast disappearing animals he has seen. His brilliantly painted pictures of African animals and birds have astonished me almost as much as the contradiction between his own appearance and his real greatness. The insertion of a dozen of them in addition to the very meager supply of the four illustrations (two portraits and two unnecessary photos of his present house) would have given much pleasure and revealed the artistic side of his nature. In any case, however, if one reads the book one recognizes the artist's eye for beauty. What delight he has in fine scenery and noble architecture! How he hates the hideousness of modern life! How he loathes the invasion of his lovely Sussex by villas and golf courses!

Consider to what diverse regions in Africa alone he has journeyed, not as a mere traveler or tourist, but as one holding authority and having definite business in hand. Angola and the islands of San Thomé and Principe, in the west; East Africa and the mountains of the Moon, Kilimanjaro and the vast volcanic region; Egypt, Tunis, and Uganda; the Cameroons, again in the west; Mozambique and Nyasaland on the east and center; the Cape and South Africa; and a finish in Liberia, again in the west. All these he has known, and in most he has intimately studied mankind and its different languages, all animals and plants, and the soils and rocks. Even so I have left out the Lower Congo, and outside these African journeys there are India and your own country, both the Northern and Southern States. It is an amazing record, all the more when we remember that for the most part the African lands were then unexplored, uncharted, and devoid of the uninteresting convenience of railways. In the greater part of them also he was not a merely independent traveler, but stood responsible for the future and well-being of that peculiar collection of races called the British Empire.

When I read his account of his visit to Angola and the two Portuguese islands in the Gulf, I had to force myself to remember that it was his first journey to tropical Africa, that it all happened long ago—forty years ago, and nearly twenty years before my own careful investigation into the slave trade there—that, as he says, the cocoa tree was then a new source of wealth and had not developed anything like its present commercial importance, and that in reality he was far more interested in the landscape, the fauna, and the vegetation than in the social conditions of the people whom he met or saw. Very likely the slave system was not then so atrocious as it had become when I was there, and as we fear it has become again since the war, though it was fast declining in 1913, largely owing to the vigorous representations of the British Government and our Anti-Slavery Society. Otherwise I think a kindly and sympathetic man like Sir Harry Johnston could never have written of this abomination with the easy nonchalance he appears to affect. For he writes:

From about 1878, from the dawn of cocoa success, the Portuguese had been introducing into San Thomé many recruits for labor from Angola and the western Congo. I dare say there was pressure, an unfairness over this; that it was a disguised slave trade. But once these people reached San Thomé I can aver they were well treated, though I dare say—in those days—their wages were meager and their chances of regaining freedom in their old homes very slight. The initial fact was that originally they had been prisoners of war or "criminals"—you could have been in those days a "criminal" in native Africa without having done wrong under any European code—and that they escaped a far worse fate in coming to San Thomé.

No doubt that is a fair account of what Harry Johnston himself saw as he traveled about San Thomé with "a Portuguese doctor" who had charge of the "laborers." But when I was on that island twenty years later I could not soothe my conscience with such easy-going optimism. I had traveled far into the interior of Angola and seen how the slaves were there bought or captured, sometimes nominally as "criminals," it is true, but far more often by force or fraud; how they were driven down to the coast, shackled up at night to prevent their escape; how they were there sold and apportioned to the various cocoa plantations on the islands of San Thomé and Principe; how they were shipped to those islands, never—never by any chance—to return. I had the opportunity of being the first to expose this abominable traffic, but my report has since been abundantly confirmed by others, some of whom were perhaps sent out in the hope of disproving it, but in the end could only admit that I had even understated the horror. Before the war the case was proved beyond contradiction, and owing, as I said, to the action of the British Government and the Anti-Slavery Society, new regulations were ordained by the Portuguese and many thousands of the slaves were even returned to their homes. What the conditions have been since the war we cannot say for certain, but Portuguese regulations are no better than other government regulations unless their execution is carefully enforced.

It was just after his return from this first African journey that Johnston was invited to visit Leopold, the notorious King of the Belgians. He wondered, as well he might, why it was that this monarch of evil repute was taking so much interest in the Congo and was even expending enormous sums upon its exploitation. Apparently he did not foresee, as Leopold foresaw, what immense commercial assets lay hidden in the unknown forests of the Congo, if only rubber could be extracted from them in lucrative quantities by the employment of barbarous troops and officials who were encouraged to stick at no atrocity but to practice every possible cruelty and torture upon the natives in order that ships might reach Antwerp with cargoes fully laden. Though Johnston accomplished much excellent work in Nigeria and the Cameroons at difficult crises of our Colonial history, I think his name will be most connected with Uganda and Nyasaland during his service as special commissioner in regions in those days almost unknown and unexplored. On many occasions there he displayed that quick resource and quiet resolution which have certainly characterized our "Empire Builders," and also that sense of justice and hatred of oppression which we should like to think of as characterizing them too. But throughout the book one is frequently reminded that the author is no ordinary imperialist, but is endowed with a sensitive feeling for other interests besides territory and commerce.

Sir Harry described his visit to Cape Town in 1893, and the rapid degeneracy he detected in Cecil Rhodes at that time, together with his observation of "the extent of drunkenness in South Africa in those days, unbelievable by the modern generation." I hope it is unbelievable, but I can vouch for the degeneracy and the drunkenness that only six years later were to bring such woes upon South Africa and the people concerned, whether British or Boer.

HENRY W. NEVINSON

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Michael Pupin

THE WORLD CRISIS 1915

By the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill

"Its subject and its literary quality make this record equally certain to be ranked as an enduring possession. — Was there ever such a succession of tragic blunders bringing to naught one project after another when within an ace of success. The verdict of nine readers out of ten must be that Mr. Churchill's self-vindication is complete."—The Nation.
With maps $6.50

Winston S. Churchill

FROM IMMIGRANT TO INVENTOR

By Michael Pupin

"A good autobiography, when it is good, is about the best thing in all literature. This is a good autobiography. More than that, it is a great book, worthy to rank, in style and spirit, among the best that the twentieth century has so far produced."—Edwin E. Slosson, in the New York Evening Post. Third printing. Illustrated. $4.00

MANKIND AT THE CROSSROADS

By Prof. E. M. East

"I find Prof. East's book admirable in every way. A broad, eminently judicious and far-sighted discussion of a topic that excels in importance all others. It is to my mind the most important work in the field of sociology published for many years past. There are few if any books in this field so little open to adverse criticism."—William McDougall, Professor of Psychology, Harvard University.
With maps. $3.50

REFLECTIONS ON THE NAPOLEONIC LEGEND

By Albert L. Guérard

Professor at the Rice Institute, Texas

A brilliant book, written with truly Voltorian irony and wit, by one who is far from a worshipper of Napoleon the Great. Much of his vast reputation is traced by the author to Napoleon's talent for advertising and to the work of other men for which Napoleon received the credit. $3.75

HISTORY OF ASSYRIA By Prof. A. T. Olmstead

"A noteworthy work, encyclopaedic in scope, scholarly in authority, opulent in illustrations; worthy to rank among the best recent contributions to ancient history."—The North American Review.

This is a companion volume to Prof. J. H. Breasted's "A History of Egypt." Profusely illustrated. $7.50

AN INTIMATE PORTRAIT OF R L S

By his stepson, Lloyd Osbourne

From 1876 to 1894 Robert Louis Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne lived and worked together. No one now living knew Stevenson more intimately. If this book contained nothing more than the pictures of the last hours of Stevenson on earth and of his burial on the top of Vaea, it would be warmly welcomed. Published February 15. $1.50

MY MUSICAL LIFE

By Walter Damrosch

"'My Musical Life,' leaves the reader in the plight of Oliver Twist, begging for more. . . . One suspects that in the present volume Mr. Damrosch makes only a small, though highly entertaining, draft on an inexhaustible store."—Pitts Sanborn in The Nation.
Illustrated. $4.00

THE THREE FOUNTAINS

By Stark Young

These colorful sketches, studies and essays by the author of "The Flower in Drama" have for the most part an Italian setting. They combine to form a book of rare beauty, like no other in substance or quality. $2.00

Notable Books of the SeasonTHE COMPLETE POEMS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

With portrait. $4.00

THE SHORT STORIES OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

$2.50

VENTURES IN BOOK COLLECTING

By Wm. Harris Arnold. $3.50

AMERICAN ARTISTS

By Royal Cortissoz. $3.00

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION

By Frederick Jesup Stimson. $2.50

HOLLAND UNDER QUEEN WILHELMINA By Prof. A. J. Barnouw.

$3.00

BUILDING THE AMERICAN NATION By Nicholas Murray Butler.

$2.50

AS I LIKE IT

By Wm. Lyon Phelps. $2.00

REMBRANDT AND HIS SCHOOL

By Prof. John C. Van Dyke. $12.00

Important Books
Forthcoming*The Price of Freedom

By

Calvin Coolidge
*President of the United States of AmericaPlans for World Peace

A volume containing the most interesting and important of the plans submitted for the American Peace Award, with an introduction and analysis by Esther Everett Lape, Member in Charge of the Policy Committee.

Important Books
Recently Published*Doomsland

By Shane Leslie

In this romantic novel, Mr. Leslie paints a large picture of the Irish scene during the twenty or thirty years which ended with the recent revolution. $2.50

The School of Poetry

By Alice Meynell

An anthology chosen by Mrs. Meynell for young readers; it includes more than 140 poems, from Shakespeare to the present day. $2.50

THE INTERPRETER'S HOUSE

By Struthers Burt

Published February 15

The interest and originality of Struthers Burt's short stories, the clarity and beauty of his poetry, have roused great expectations for this, his first full novel—expectations which the book will amply justify. $2.00

Plain and Colored

The Color of a Great City. By Theodore Dreiser. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

Nowhere Else in the World. By Jay William Hudson. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

THE labor which goes to the making of one of Dreiser's books is not concealed in art. All his dogged determination to conquer his inarticulateness and all his struggles with a craft for which he has none of the superficial fitnesses are painfully evident, but one must not complain too much about that, because his virtues as well as his vices are in a large part due to the fortunate fact that he was born not an artist but an honest man.

Whereas most writers begin with a love of words—with the desire to say something rather than with something which they desire to say—the reverse was true with him. Life interested, puzzled, and shocked him so intensely that he could think of no way of unburdening himself of his emotion save by setting it down, and he set it down in so clumsy and unlicked a form that only those whose love of truth was great enough to overcome their aesthetic sensibilities could stomach him. "A barbarian who never learned to write" was the judgment passed some years ago by Stuart Sherman, and as far as it went it was right, but it did not obviate the fact that Dreiser is infinitely more worth reading than scores of cultivated gentlemen who before their twenties could write better than he will ever learn to do. The most important fact about him is that facility and glibness have never betrayed him for the sufficient reason that he is incapable of either, so that when he is not sincere and painstaking he can not be anything at all.

To some he is merely coarse and repulsive, but to others, as to me, there is not a little of the pathetic about his personality and the way in which he has wandered up and down America, insinuating himself into all sorts of milieus—from Mills Hotels and East Side tenements to the studios of the sophisticated illuminati whom he so dumbly admires—and then turning away greatly troubled by his inability to comprehend what any of the things he has seen signify or how he can reconcile the bewildering diversity of men's fates and characters with any conceivable scheme of religion, ethics, or philosophy.

The sketches of low life in New York between 1900 and 1915 which were written at various times and here collected are interesting, if for no other reason, for the evidence which they afford of the persistent curiosity which is both the mother and the father of his muse. He will, for instance, interrogate a dozen inhabitants of an East Side quarter in order to find out why the ward boss is considered a great man, or he will, quite without any excuse, follow a push-cart peddler into his tenement home to ask him how much he earns per day. As a result of years of this sort of slow-moving curiosity he has a grasp of the actualities in the lives of his people which few writers can equal. The newspaper offices in which he was trained are not, I presume, very good schools in which to cultivate either a very idealistic view of human life or the graces of English style, but it so happened that American literature, before his time at least, had rather more than it needed of these two commodities and was at the same time rather short on the sense of actuality which certainly can be cultivated there. He enlarged its field as no other contemporary writer has done. It may be that the materialistic pessimism and moral anarchy which were the only lessons he could read in events are, when stated abstractly, commonplace and unsatisfactory enough, but he dragged into the field of literary consciousness characters, situations, and states of mind which politer writers preferred to ignore, and he challenged easy optimistic generalities with facts which subsequent interpreters have not been able to pass over. He has faced, as he himself once expressed it, the comfortable generalities of editorial writers with the facts of the news columns and, accordingly, though he may be no true literary god he has at least shown how pitiful the half gods are.

If anyone wishes to realize how successful Dreiser's sketches are, in spite of all their crudities, in catching the color of a city, he should compare them with "Nowhere Else in the World." Mr. Hudson once wrote a rather impressive romantic novel, but he now presents us with a very feeble realistic one. With a certain glib competence he tells a sensible story of a young American who was so enamored of Paris that he was convinced that he could never be satisfied anywhere else and then discovered that his real home was in Chicago. But the difficulty is that Mr. Hudson does not convince one that he has ever come to grips with the realities of either city. A facile, guide-book view of Paris gives way to a glib Carl Sandburg Chicago, so that one romantic illusion is replaced by another and the reader has the uncomfortable conviction that if the hero were to fall in with, let us say, the works of Mr. Frederic O'Brien he would be off for the South Seas and fully convinced that something or other absolutely necessary to the proper development of the soul is to be found nowhere else in the world except in Tahiti. The story is rapid and not without a certain narrative interest, but it is precisely not what it is supposed to be—an awakening to the realities of life—because when the hero, with a fine show of manly vigor, rolls up his sleeves to begin the work of the world, one is perfectly convinced that he is not plunging into actuality but merely preparing another book.

J. W. KRUTCH

A Man Out of His Time

Life and Confessions of a Psychologist. By G. Stanley Hall. D. Appleton and Company. $5.

THE reading of this book leaves one a trifle depressed. It is a pathetic life-epic in a minor key. It might even be called an apology for failure. Hall, essentially a poet-dreamer, decidedly subjective in temperament, is touched by hard, materialistic science and everywhere its dehumanized hand has either made his work abortive or else left him with a feeling of incompleteness. To overcome this insufficiency he resorted to a new form of religious tenancy. Even in the author's most interesting self-revelations one senses the conflict between his introversion and his cloak of critical and unbiased analysis. Born to be a poet and a mystic the man has attempted to be a scientist and a leader of empirical thought.

Brought up under the influence of a mother preeminently religious in nature with a belief in the sort of God whose presence one may feel and on whom one may cast his burdens, Hall was thrown by the winds of chance into the maelstrom of modern biology, anthropology, and psychology just as these young sciences were engaged in their first struggles against theological obscurantism. Darwinism was in the initial swing of its influence during Hall's student days. The author, torn asunder in his old faith by his contact with modern thought, finds in evolution a new nexus with his deep religious tendencies. Catching the Hegelian sweep of the idea of Evolution, he makes it his god and Recapitulation, as its modus operandi, becomes for him its prophet. Like all gods, man-made as they are, this one bears the mark of its author's wish-fulfilment. With evolution replacing Jehovah, Recapitulation gives the laws of the new deity with the same fervor and finality as the Old Testament's "Thus saith the prophet."

Had Hall followed his first inclination toward the ministry, he might have become a prominent exponent of a deeper faith built upon a new psychology, or had he lived a generation earlier he might have associated himself with the Concord group of transcendentalists. As it is, throughout all his life, he has been a man out of place and his dominant isolation is a reflection, in part, of this fact.

Moreover, in all his work he never escaped a deep desire for a teleological universe. For him there are forces in the individual, in the folk, and in the cosmos moving toward some final beneficent end. Thus the religious pattern of his early life remains with him throughout. It is simply the province of science to help man find his place in this cosmic evolution

BRIMMER

"The Able McLaughlins" said "Ann's An Idiot" Which

A FIRST NOVEL

A FIRST NOVEL

Created "Confusion" in The "Wife of the Centaur"

A FIRST NOVEL

A FIRST NOVEL

BRIMMER

CONFUSION

by

JAMES GOULD COZZENS

THIS story deals with the education and training of a girl who is the daughter of a French father and an English mother. It opens in Algiers, shifts to Southern France and, for last half of the book, to America. The novel develops, in the course of its narrative, an idea in relation to the processes of the feminine intellect and character that will stimulate wide discussion.

JAMES GOULD COZZENS

Author of

CONFUSION

A Masterly Novel by a Harvard Undergraduate

MR. COZZENS is a thinker as well as an artist and storyteller. He paints the "younger set" in New York but transforms its inner consciousness with the disturbing and fascinating temperament of Cerise D'Atrée. If at nineteen Mr. Cozzens has written a novel as impressive as "Confusion," within ten years his position will be as famous as Hergesheimer's, Galsworthy's, Conrad's, and Arnold Bennett's. 404 pages, distinctively printed, end leaves of D'Atrée stag. $2.00

BY SANCTION OF LAW

By JOSHUA HENRY JONES, JR.

A novel of the Race Problem full of thrilling action. The story begins against the university background of a Northern city and shifts to South Carolina where it ends on a highly dramatic note. The author is a well-known Boston newspaper man. 414 pages. Price $2.00

ANTHOLOGY OF MAGAZINE VERSE

FOR 1923

and Year Book of American Poetry

Edited by WILLIAM
STANLEY BRAITHWAITE

The eleventh annual volume of this standard work on current poetry. Price $3.00

LIGE GOLDEN, THE MAN WHO TWINKLED

By WILLIAM W. HARVEY

This story is full of the Vermont air President Coolidge breathed forty years ago. An absorbingly new kind of psychological novel of a boy's interpretation of a modern Man of Sorrows whose eyes twinkled like "bubbles of light in a dark fountain." Illustrated by Thomas Hunt. Price $2.00

THE LOG of A FORTY-NINER

By RICHARD LUNT HALE

The first personal narrative to be published of a Gold-Rusher. Illustrated. Price $4.00

GENTLEMEN ALL AND MERRY COMPANIONS

By RALPH BERGENGREN

A volume of pirate tales growing in popularity. Illustrated by John Sloan. $2.00

BACKROADS: MAINE NARRATIVES—With Lyrics

By WINIFRED VIRGINIA JACKSON

An exceptional book of poems with an Introduction by W. S. Braithwaite. $2.00

POEMS OF SEUMAS O'SULLIVAN

with an Introduction by PADRAIC COLUM

First adequate American edition of this notable Irish poet. $2.50

COLONIAL LIGHTING

By ARTHUR H. HAYWARD

Illustrated with 114 half-tone plates showing 400 specimens of lighting devices.

The first book on the history of Lighting in America. Of practical value to interior decorators, designers, architects, period furnishers and antique collectors. Price $7.50

THE PROCESSION OF MASKS

By HERBERT S. GORMAN

A stimulating volume of essays by one of the younger critics. $2.00

THE FUNNY HOUSE

By LOUISE HUBERT GUYOL

A story for girls with steadily increasing sales. Illustrated. $2.00

EDWARD LOOMIS DAVENPORT

By EDWIN FRANCIS EDGETT

An important biography of the famous American actor. Fully illustrated. $5.00

THE HOUR OF JUDGMENT

By VIOLA WHITE

A radical poet voices the world in revolt. With Introduction by John Haynes Holmes. $1.50

384 BOYLSTON STREET B. J. BRIMMER COMPANY, Publishers

BOSTON, MASS.

more adequately. If Recapitulation is the prophet of the God, Evolution, then the Research Magnificent is the ritual which brings the Scientist, as High Priest, into the Holy of Holies where he glimpses God, the Creative Spirit, at work.

This may be an agreeable picture for poet-mystics but for the ordinary run of tough-minded men of science it is the veriest Träumerei. Thus Hall's constant injection of his teleology into his scientific writings was met not only with ridicule but with scorn. To Hall, on the other hand, there is nothing more futile, nay, even foolish, than a science which is not applicable to human life. Thus we note that the man is not only a poetic dreamer and a teleologist; he bears the additional badge of his kind, he is a moralist and a reformer. Things must change and change for the "better." Science is merely to lead the way. For him there is no more damning indictment of science than the assertion, by some scientists, that their work has nothing to do with practical human affairs.

When one maintains, therefore, that a sense of failure is the key-note of this book one is not far amiss. From the beginning of his life to the present, every significant thing Hall has stood for has been buffeted and storm-blown until he feels that little remains. His years of eclectic preparation in Germany, where he touched more sources of modern thought than any of his American student contemporaries, brought slow returns in teaching opportunities here. His high hopes for Hopkins were transferred, enhanced, to Clark University only to meet the colossal disappointment due to Jonas Clark's stubborn ignorance of what a university is or might be. Recapitulation, as an explanation-principle in biology and psychology, is long since passé. Child study, so earnestly begun, was taken over by other hands and carried into other channels. Psychoanalysis, brought to the temple of psychology, was rejected by the builders to become, with some satisfaction to Hall, no doubt, the chief corner of modern psychiatry in this country. His contribution to religious psychology, with its alleged scientific basis for faith and religion, finds little sympathy in modern Christendom and no support among his experimental co-workers. And now, although this last disappointment is unmentioned in his autobiography, he sits across the way and watches, a sad but silent spectator, the final scene of one of the academic tragedies of America, the destruction of a small but true university which he had rescued from the broken promises of its founder. Clark University has gone—the one lasting contribution he felt he had made. But the outsider viewing his life as a whole can not agree fully with the self-analysis which depicts him so peculiarly a failure.

Hall's trenchant but not bitter criticism of the present economic order and its effects upon our education is a pertinent asset in our culture history. Like Henry Adams, he felt the first compressions of the rising industrial system in this country with its mechanization of life, its quantity production, and its rampant commercialism. Hall, believing in individualism and in a great variety of methods and materials of instruction, and feeling, further, that pedagogy was taking its cues from the sordid economic order, viewed with disgust the increasing standardization of American education. Particularly through the example of Clark University, though gravely handicapped by lack of funds, he was able somewhat to influence this country in the interests of higher education. He got around him a small but earnest group of men and women concerned with study untrammelled by the usual academic machinery. Research to them became "nothing less than a religion." It was his belief that a "university ought to be the freest spot on earth, where human nature in its most variegated and acuminated types can blossom and bear fruit. The factory type of efficiency has no place here." Of the college and university deans, who have come to assume such obvious power today over both students and faculties, he writes: "It is they largely who have broken up knowledge into standardized units of hours, weeks, terms, credits, blocking every short cut for superior minds and making a bureaucracy which represses personal initiative and legitimate ambition."

Hall has never been a careful, systematic writer. His style is discursive, uneven in merit, and at times heavy. The book lacks the free and easy way of Bok, the finish of Lewisoohn, and the sustained, well-phrased pessimism of Henry Adams. It is, nevertheless, an important autobiography, and one can only regret that the author's persistent timidity and reticence restrain him from exposing those inner phases of his life which would prove most instructive for others.

KIMBALL YOUNG

Economic Vitamin

The Theory of Social Economy. By Gustav Cassel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

Essays in Economic Theory. By Simon Nelson Patten. Edited by Rexford Guy Tugwell. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

IN the realm of economic theory we praise a man for consistency when he has one idea and sticks to it like grim death. That praise Gustav Cassel deserves. His big and important book is built around one idea, namely, that through the mechanism of price the supply of scarce things and the demand for them are adjusted in such wise as to effect the best satisfaction of wants possible under the circumstances. The primary function of price is to check demand, thus keeping it within the limits of the supply of scarce goods and services (and only scarce things, of course, command a price). Mr. Cassel is an unflinching price economist. A special theory of value, he declares, is at least "quite unnecessary," and theory must be "essentially a theory of the fixing of prices." For the Austrian subjective school, with their elaborate paraphernalia of marginal utility, he has scant respect—a judgment shared by many of us who in our younger days were the victims of that misdirected adventure of intellectual ingenuity. Mr. Cassel, however, has little more patience with cost theories as historically worked out.

According to his view, in the continuous process of production there is a continuous process of pricing which continuously determines costs at the same time that it holds demand within the limits set by the available supply of goods and services. It likewise automatically determines the pay of labor, the interest of capital, and the profits of enterprise. The whole traditional theory of value and distribution thus becomes simply a theory of price. By means of a system of equations Mr. Cassel shows that neither the "marginal utility" nor the "cost of production" is determinate until the price is fixed, which is, being interpreted, that the price of things depends on how scarce they are and how much people want them, not on some mysterious hocus-pocus comprehensible only to the initiated. This is all quite comforting to the ignorant, but infuriating, needless to say, to the economic Ph.D.

Mr. Cassel's theory of interest, enunciated twenty years ago, is that interest is the price of "capital-disposal," that is, the price one must pay to get command of the means of production over a certain period. The theory is not based on the "productivity" of capital or on the "preference for present over future goods" so dear to the Austrians, but solely on the scarcity of capital essential in the unceasing process of production. Interest, then, is not that antique fiction of Karl Marx's, unpaid labor, but is a plain unavoidable fact of the exchange economy, resting on the disagreeable further fact that capital is not abundant enough for the production of everything men want, and that therefore it must command a price—a conclusion plain as a pikestaff. Who owns the capital has nothing to do with the fact of interest, which would still exist under a socialist economy provided the consumer were still accorded freedom of consumption within the limits of his income. Capital ownership, of course, decides who gets interest. The rate of interest depends chiefly on the increase of population, technical progress, and the length of human life. Until life is lengthened, Mr. Cassel believes, it is impossible for the rate of

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & COMPANY

AN OUTLAW'S DIARY: II. The Commune

By Cécile Tormay

A further account of the experiences of this famous novelist during the Hungarian revolution. Bela Kun and his fellow communists are pictured with a merciless pen. The book is an amazing and bitterly partisan account of one of the darkest chapters in recent European history. Volume I, Revolution. Volume II, The Commune. Each illustrated. Postage extra. $3 net

LETTERS OF THE TSARINA TO THE TSAR—1914-1916

With an introduction by Sir Bernard Pares

The very remarkable letters contained in this volume were written in English by the Tsarina to the Tsar during the tragic years from the beginning of the war to the downfall of the Russian Empire. They are historic documents of the first importance, but, more than that, they are among the warmest and most intimate expressions of a woman's love and gratitude that have ever been printed. 8vo. Illustrated. Postage extra. $5 net

MODERN FOREIGN EXCHANGE

By H. C. Walter

A book for business men and for students of banking, commerce and economics which describes the present day workings of the exchange and explains post-war fluctuations. Postage extra. $2 net

SONNETS AND VERSE

By H. Belloc

Mr. Belloc has here collected all the poems he wishes to preserve with the exception of the humorous rhymes included in "A Bad Child's Book of Beasts," etc.

8vo. Postage extra. $2.75 net

Also an edition on hand-made paper, limited to 500 for England and America. $6.00 net

THE LURE OF THE RIVIERA

THE LURE OF FRENCH CHATEAUX

By Frances M. Gostling

Two books describing in an informal and thoroughly charming fashion the most appealing aspects of the Riviera and the chateau country respectively. Each illustrated. Postage extra. $2 net

TOGETHER

By Norman Douglas

A fascinating picture of a summer in the Tyrol.

"Mr. Douglas has added another finely fashioned volume of self-revelation to his small but delightful shelf of works."—New York Times.

Illustrated. $2.50 net

THE HIGH PLACE By James Branch Cabell

Critical opinion is almost unanimous in acclaiming this book as a masterpiece, a book as great as Jurgen. "Cabell is the greatest imaginative genius of our day. . . . His newest book is among his best, and the conclusion of The High Place is to my mind perhaps his greatest artistic triumph. . . . Superbly brilliant, mellow, beautiful and satisfactory."—Burton Rascoe in the N. Y. Tribune. "A bigger book than Penguin Island. . . . My present feeling is that no greater book of its kind has been written for many years."—George W. Douglas in the Philadelphia Evening Ledger. 4th large printing. Postage extra. $2.50 net

At all Bookstores or from the Publishers

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & COMPANY

7 West 16th Street

New York

HARPER & BROTHERS

Publishers Since 1817

49 EAST 33rd STREET, NEW YORK

In the Footsteps of the Lincolns

By Ida M. Tarbell

THE story of Abraham Lincoln really begins in 1637, when the first Lincoln set foot on American soil.

Miss Tarbell disproves forever the common tradition that our great president was descended from rail-splitter, poor-white stock; and in her story of the seven generations of his courageous, industrious pioneer ancestors, and of Lincoln's own early manhood, has written one of the most fascinating chapters in American biography. $4.00

Grover Cleveland:

The Man and the Statesman

By Robert McElroy

Edwards Professor of History, Princeton University

With an Introduction by Elihu Root

"A DISTINCT contribution to the political history of America. These two volumes are among the most notable of a year."—Philadelphia Public Ledger. Two Volumes, Boxed, $10.00

Lummox

By Fannie Hurst

"FANNIE HURST takes her place with 'Lummox' in the first ranks of our contemporary novelists. Her theme is a vast one, and she handles it with a dignity that is adequate and wholly impressive."—Boston Herald. $2.00

The Poetry and Plays of Edna St. Vincent Millay

THE following volumes of the work of America's leading young poet are now issued in a new uniform edition:

The Harp Weaver and Other Poems	$2.00	The Lamp and the Bell	$1.50
---------------------------------	--------	-----------------------	--------

A Few Figs from Thistles	$1.50	Aria da Capo (Ready March 4)	$2.00
--------------------------	--------	------------------------------	--------

interest to fall much below the 3 to 5 per cent level that it has maintained throughout modern times. His speculations on this point are interesting and ingenious, if not wholly convincing. His whole book is one of the most important and suggestive of recent works in economic theory.

"Theories," once wrote Simon Patten, beloved teacher of a generation of American economists, "have too much vitality to be stoned to death by facts"—a fact, the irreverent critic might well enough remark, of which many of Mr. Patten's theories furnish unexcelled illustration. He was no man of one idea; he gloried in being an "economic pluralist," always searching for the new thing that would help set men free in their thinking and their acting. The most original and daring of American economists, and in some ways the most reckless in his use of facts, he had a veritable genius for picking up facts overlooked by others and discovering in them meanings hidden except from restless, inquiring minds like his own. A man lonely, almost solitary in life and thought, yet friendly, interested, and helpful without limit, angular withal, independent to a degree, suggestive and stimulating beyond all other men of his generation, he was a great thinker, a great teacher, a great American. For, like Henry George, and like his fellow-Illinoisan Abraham Lincoln, Simon Patten could have been produced nowhere but in America.

In collecting for book publication these articles and monographic writings, Mr. Tugwell has done a great service to students of economic theory, but he has done more than that. He has produced a volume that will serve as a powerful stimulus to thought in every live-minded reader, particularly if he be an American. To trace over a period of thirty years the development of this mind of many facets, forever flashing new light on some dark corner of our economic and social relations, is a fascinating study. As one reads essay after essay, filled with statements and conceptions utterly contradictory of all received doctrine, often apparently self-contradictory, yet consistent when seen in the full light of Mr. Patten's thought and faith, one wonders at the bold crudity of his thinking; one marvels at the endless flashes of insight by which he arrived at conclusions to which others attained, sometimes only decades later, by painful toil; one is grateful for the ripe wisdom, the gentle spirit, the unfailing youth, that radiate from the writings of the last years, the years when men's hearts and minds were tried as by fire. No review can give any idea of the ingenuity and richness of these essays. A few scattered quotations must suffice. "That conduct is, in the objective sense, the most moral which enables us to exercise all our faculties on the least land." Who but Simon Patten could have thought or said that? And in 1912, a decade before our recent statistical studies, he was asserting: "I would say industrial capital arises from the undivided profits of newly exploited industries." Economics, in his view, "treats of the production, distribution, control, and consumption of wealth." Dealing with social struggles and the class conflict that he loathed: "The first axiom of social advance is: never take the chance of conflict when compromise is open. From this simple creed all social progress comes." And in those last fiery days of world war, an utterance that came from an American Gethsemane:

Peace without force means a yielding of the strong, not a submission of the weak. . . . Can we yield to a nation in the wrong and yet promote world justice? This is the test of a peace without victory, of a world not coerced by force. . . . Nations are often unruly, emotional, and stubborn, but they need forgiveness more than punishment. In local affairs we may let the majority dictate, but liberty should be our guide in world decisions. Toleration is more moral than right, more luminous than truth, a sounder principle than justice, and more divine than retribution. Without it no democracy can exist. Its basis is a peace that endures because it is loved. Battleships and machine-guns cannot do what simpler forces do through the radiating influence of comradeship and goodwill.

With mind of crystal and heart of gold, he has gone out into the silence, best-loved of American teachers, but in this volume he being dead yet speaketh. As we reverently turn its pages, we thank God and take courage.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Mr. Frank Looks at His World

An American Looks at His World. By Glenn Frank. The University of Delaware Press. $3.

GLENN FRANK is editor of the Century Magazine. He writes about the press, the church, the state, the arts, the music of the spheres. Personally I should be willing to read him on William Jennings Bryan, foreign missions, and the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen. He is a good hand at finding some fresh point of view even in dead-tired themes.

Mr. Frank is definitely liberal in what he says and feels. He is definitely an evangelist. He has an eye for fun and beauty: but fun is best when it means getting people started, and beauty is essentially an attribute of a more noble social scene. Mr. Frank tours the provinces several months of every year, on the lecture platform, and likes to talk to crowds. The essays in this book are evidence that he has a message for them. But the crowds give something in return. That is a style.

Echoes from the forum remain in Mr. Frank's writings. Generalities like this, for instance: "Labor and capital must join in a high resolve that both shall strive in consonance with the spirit of peace and tolerance, to think less in terms of the battlefield and more in terms of the council chamber." A text like that, with no application of the case method to interpret it, can stand the test of lecture-hall acoustics better than the laboratory tube. Mr. Frank, no doubt, knows what he means, but doesn't take the time to say it.

Then, in what he writes, there is something of the platform speaker's willingness to slay the dragon while you wait. "Are we in the grip of blind forces carrying modern civilization to destruction?" "Is the efficiency of autocracy really efficient?" "How is a rich man to provide for the continuous functioning of his fortune after his death?"—those are three of a good many dozen questions Mr. Frank asks himself, and hustles off to answer in a page or two. You must remember that the crowd is waiting and does not care for splitting hairs. You must make the ultimate your goal and do your best to get there.

Again, the platform teaches you to reason with your fingers in the air. Point one. Point two. Point three. Point four. You find Mr. Frank engaged in this in most of the themes he handles. The five right modern ways of dealing with disease. The four factors that limit teachers' freedom in the schools. The five qualities a public speaker ought to have. The eleven reasons why young men no longer flock into the church. The three world movements that may together put our prostrate culture on its feet. There are critics who object to "four" and "five" and "six" and "three." Why not "thirteen," "thirty-two," and "forty"? But this man instinctively starts counting when he talks, and starts talking when he writes. His audience is sitting on the wooden seats before him.

Here is an eager mind, never tired of speculating, never tired of asking questions. Suppose the scientists should close their laboratories and declare a general strike until humanity began to use their new inventions socially? What would happen if the clergy forgot, some Sunday morning, its theology and thought-insulating jargon? Would Christ have escaped crucifixion, or been crucified all the sooner, if Jerusalem had had a modern press? There is a little essay in this book on doctors, four thousand words or so, that shows as well as any other chapter how keenly Mr. Frank pursues ideas. It is called The Politics of Health, and starts off by asserting that "One of the serious social needs of our time is a statesmanlike organization is a problem that has resolved itself into a few simple elements, that astute publishers have learned and apply.

Selling Books in Chicago

* * *

The first factor in book selling in this amazingly concentrated and prosperous market is to make the book known to the Chicago book consumers through their accustomed medium of literary information—"The Book Page" of The Chicago Daily News.

It is a fact important for authors, publishers and readers to bear in mind that The Wednesday Book Page of The Daily News practically revolutionized the business of literary criticism as theretofore conducted by American newspapers.

Readers were quick to appreciate this new and lively force in literary affairs—and the publishers have not been slow to follow the readers, as the following comparative table of book advertising for the year 1923 will show, figures which but repeat the record of preceding years:

LINEAGE OF BOOK ADVERTISING IN CHICAGO NEWSPAPERS

Jan. 1st to Dec. 31st, 1923

	Agate Lines	Comparison Agate Lines
The Chicago Daily News.....	176,859	176,859
The Daily Tribune	127,429	127,429
The Post	100,532
The Daily Herald-Examiner....	15,673
The American	5,589
The Journal	1,441

Sunday Papers

The Sunday Herald-Examiner .	27,381
The Sunday Tribune	9,303
The Daily News' excess over the next highest score, that of The Daily Tribune		49,430

The Chicago Daily News

First in Chicago

Figures supplied by the Advertising Record Co., an independent audit service maintained by all the Chicago newspapers.

JAN — FEB — MAR SIT-BY-THE-FIRE BOOKS

The Dark Swan By Ernest Pascal

Here is a powerful American novel, the scene of which is not laid in the Middle West. A plain woman's competition with more comely rivals is depicted with a strength and poignancy that will insure an enthusiastic audience. $2.00

Prunello

By S. P. B. Mais

For those discriminating readers who deplore the lack of technique prevalent in the modern novel, we recommend S. P. B. Mais, whose fine craftsmanship lends further beauty to an enchanting tale. $2.00

The Life of Cesare Borgia

By Rafael Sabatini

Everyone is reading Sabatini's exciting biography of the Borgia; but we feel obliged to bring it to the attention of those few who may have not yet come across it. It is stranger and more gripping than fiction. Illustrated, $4.50

Our American Theatre

By Oliver M. Saylor

Author of "The Russian Theatre," etc.

With 25 Illustrations by Lucie R. Saylor

Stimulating, suggestive, illuminating, informative and provocative,

OUR AMERICAN THEATRE is the season's only comprehensive book on the drama. $4.00

Edited by Mr. Saylor

Max Reinhardt & His Theatre

Max Reinhardt, although much in the public eye, is to most people a mysterious worker of magic, rather than a real person. Mr. Saylor, who has been constantly in the great producer's company for the past six months, has prepared here the only authoritative work on Reinhardt, the man. Profusely illustrated, $7.50

From a Terrace in Prague

By Granville T. Baker

This is a story of "Golden Prague," as seen from a terrace. The author holds, for a moment, the fragments of stirring history, legends and scenes from the daily life of the people of Prague, and notes them down with pen and pencil. Illustrated in line and water color by the author. $4.50

Germany, France and England

By Maximilian Harden

Translated and edited by William C. Lawton

This is, without question, the most arresting book that has come out of Germany since the war. Harden discusses the chances for future peace in Europe, taking into consideration the individual viewpoint of each of the three leading nations involved. The book is of the greatest importance to everyone interested in world affairs. $2.50

AT ALL

BOOKSTORES

[If you are interested in worthwhile books, send five cents postage for Brentano's attractive Spring Catalog.]

Publishers BRENTANO'S New York

of the medical service of the nation." That text is a large one; with four thousand words available, most editors might feel content to sketch a point of view. Not Mr. Frank. He admits that this is a risky subject for a writer who wants to preserve a reputation for his sanity. But nothing ventured, nothing gained. Fingers in the air, he starts counting off the points. First we ought to have a truthful critique of doctors and their code, their fee system, and their training. Second, we ought to zone the country to keep doctors from locating as tailors locate, exclusively where the trade is best. Third, we've got to hold industry responsible for its workmen's health as strictly as the workmen are held responsible for output. Fourth, we ought to tax the state for the means to institute an adequate health program instead of permitting an enterprise like that to rest upon funds that can be wheedled from private pockets into endowment funds. Fifth, sixth, seventh—before you finish these four thousand words Mr. Frank has given you a vest-pocket program some of which you may approve, some disapprove, but all of which will challenge you to think.

And that, I take it, is the contribution Mr. Frank is making with his pen and his lectures. He is not afraid of the specific when he attacks the general—and to the specific he brings a clear mind and a wealth of eager interest. He writes honestly, keeps an open mind, goes back continually to reevaluate his own ideas. To his trade he is an asset, and to the rest of us a useful neighbor, in a day when the building of a better balanced social order is by no means an idle dream.

CHARLES MERZ

A Gaelic Romance

Deirdre. By James Stephens. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

MR. STEPHENS might have made use of one or another of the accepted ways of rendering the elements of Gaelic romance into English—Standish Hayes O'Grady's way, or Campbell of Islay's way, or Whitley Stokes's way, or Douglas Hyde's way. But he takes up none of these conventions. He does not even use those approximations to Gaelic locutions that make the writing in his "Irish Fairy Tales" so distinctive and so delightful. His style in "Deirdre" is as personal as his style in "Here Are Ladies." Indeed I feel like using the word "wilful" in speaking of the writing in a book that is the retelling of the most famous of Irish romances.

I have no doubt that those who have been taught to look back upon Ireland of the heroic age as a place of brave and blameless champions and blameless and beautiful ladies will be repelled by episodes and utterances in "Deirdre." There are many people who still expect a Tennysonian smoothness in any re-creation of the Ireland that was the only survival of barbaric Europe, forgetful of the fact that it is quite some time now since J. M. Synge took farewell of the accepted heroines now demi-gods of Celtdom:

Adieu, sweet Angus, Maeve, and Fand,
Ye plumed yet skinny Shee,
That poets danced with hand in hand,
To learn their ecstasy.

We'll stretch in Red Dan Sally's ditch,
And drink at Tubber fair,
And hunt with Red Dan Philly's bitch
The badger and the hare.

James Stephens's Conachur and Maeve, his Naoise and Deirdre, his Fergus and Lavarcham will be perfectly recognizable by those who have gone the ways that Synge spoke of.

It does not require any special knowledge of the Irish tradition to enjoy "Deirdre." James Stephens's is a tragical love story the scene of which is laid in the Ireland of victorious champions and hard-fighting kings, of poets and magicians. How different that world is from the world of medieval romance is shown in Maeve's speech, a speech that Mr. Stephens gives not without warrant:

"My husband," she said, "must be free from cowardice, and free from avarice, and free from jealousy; for I am brave in battle and combats, and it would be a discredit to my husband if I were braver than he. I am generous and a great giver of gifts, and it would be a disgrace to my husband if he were less generous than I am. And," she continued, "it would not suit me at all if he were jealous, for I have never denied myself the man I took a fancy to, and I never shall whatever husband I have or may have hereafter."

Conachur, king of Ulster, is married to Maeve, who is destined to be the leader of the invasion that brings his kingdom to ruin, when Mr. Stephens's story opens. So far, no story-teller has had the hardihood to bring into the same story the two heroines Maeve and Deirdre. The story-tellers have shown us a Maeve with Deirdre out of the saga and a Deirdre with Maeve not yet in it. Mr. Stephens dares to give us both Deirdre and Maeve, both Helen and Clytemnestra. And he dares set up the girl of the woods against the queen who can say "No other queen shall waggle her toes in my draperies, nor enjoy what is proper for my enjoyment alone." He gains power through having Maeve in Conachur's palace while Deirdre is growing up as his ward in the woods. Maeve deserts Conachur, leaving him a baffled and thwarted man. And it is this baffled and thwarted man who sees Deirdre in the beauty of her girlhood and then becomes as one who has a new life before him. Deirdre deserts him too; she runs off with the youth Naoise, and thereafter the destruction of all that Conachur has built up becomes inevitable by the act of treachery that the king's passion drives him to. To get Deirdre back and to kill the man who took her from him becomes the end of Conachur's policy; his treason sets his great champions against him and makes a breach in the heroic companionship that has guarded Ulster. And yet that treachery is inevitable given the Conachur that Mr. Stephens projects:

Love is told in this way and that way, but it is not told of as it is. . . . It is a savagery in the blood, and pain in the bone, and greed and despair in the mind. It is to be thirsty in the night and unslaked in the day. It is to carry memory like a thorn in the heart.

So Conachur speaks to Lavarcham on the day before he gives his word that Deirdre and the sons of Uisneach can return to Ireland unjudged and undoomed.

The episode of Deirdre's elopement and the episode of the return from Scotland are told with all of a story-teller's art. Mr. Stephens makes no situation out of the first meeting of Deirdre and Naoise—it is simply the discovery of youth by youth. It just happens. The girl goes and sits by the camp-fire and listens to the talk of the youth Naoise and his young brothers, held in spite of her shyness. But before she looks upon the king for the first time she has been back to the camp-fire, and this time Deirdre and Naoise know each other and there is passion between them. Then when Conachur looks upon her, and speaks of his delight in her beauty, she is remote from him, and there is no way of bringing him near to her.

The return of Deirdre with Naoise and his brothers, turning as it does on the observance of geasa, or taboo, is difficult for a modern story-teller to make convincing. Fergus, who is to protect them, is under geasa regarding a feast offered him: he can never refuse one. Conachur arranges to have Borach offer him a feast as soon as he arrives in Ireland with Deirdre and the sons of Uisneach. After that the company has to go forward without their great protector. It is difficult for a dramatist or a story-teller of our day to make the observance of the geasa an adequate incident: Mr. Stephens does not succeed in making it deeply convincing, but at least he makes a situation out of it.

The men and women in "Deirdre" stand up with humor, shrewdness, poetry, and adventure in them: they are no pale reflections of people in a saga. And they are very Irish. They are such people as existed within the four seas of Ireland in

Putnam Announcements for the Spring

Frank Tannenbaum reveals some sensational facts in his latest book—

Darker Phases of the South

He discusses frankly the results of his tour of inquiry through the Southern States. $2.00

A biography of Archbishop Benson of Canterbury

The Trefoil

Wellington, Lincoln and Truro

A. C. Benson offers a sympathetic and intimate study of his father, the head of the famous Benson family. $4.50

Is God an idea or a personality? In

The Revelation of God in Nature

The Rev. C. G. Shebbeare and Joseph McCabe debate the question so important in modern thinking. $2.00

Galapagos: World's End

William Beebe's fascinating account of the Williams Expedition to this strange corner of the earth and the remarkable discoveries made there. Profusely illustrated in half tone and color. A beautiful book. $9.00

By Elizabeth Bibesco

The Fir and the Palm

A writer famous for her short stories presents her first novel—a picture of English society life. $2.00

The famous Editor of The Outline of Science, I. Arthur Thomson, discusses

What is Man?

Throwing light upon the nature of man, his evolution, his relation to society. $2.00

George Hazen Putnam's Memoirs

Some Memories of the Civil War

Reminiscences of the Civil War period and its great men, and an appreciation of the Revolutionary War leader, Major-General Israel Putnam. $2.00

By A. Maude Royden

Beauty in Religion and The Friendship of God

Miss Royden's essays on the relation of religion to everyday life—a field peculiarly her own.

Each, $1.25

The Joyous Adventurer

Ada Barnett tells a charming tale of a delightfully unconventional Professor and the extraordinary infant he finds in a wood. $2.00

At All Booksellers

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

: 2 West 45th Street

: NEW YORK

ROBERT FROST'S New Hampshire

A Poem with Notes and Grace Notes

The Atlantic Monthly says:—"The consistent culmination of a series of books which give their author an entirely distinctive place in American letters. Truly indigenous. . . unquestionably poetic."

With woodcuts by J. J. Lankes. $2.50

Europe Since 1815

By Charles Downer Hazen

Revised Edition brought down to 1923

About one-third of the present edition is new material, forming the fullest treatment of Europe since 1918 available. 2 vols., octavo. $8.50

Samuel Adams

By Ralph Volney Harlow

A study of this Revolutionary Patriot so iconoclastic that the Boston Public Library has removed it from its shelves. $2.75

Abraham Lincoln

By Lord Charnwood

The standard biography of Lincoln. $3.00

Henry Holt and Company, Publishers

19 West 44th Street

New York

MRS. J. BORDEN HARRIMAN'S MEMOIRS From Pinafores to Politics

"She went everywhere and saw everybody. Life at both ends and life on all sides. What a book it all is! What vivacity, what energy, what aplomb!"—N. Y. Times.

$5.00

The Innocence of G. K. Chesterton

By Gerald Bullett

A stimulating and witty analysis of G. K. C. and his views on divorce, evolution, marriage, morality, humbug, etc. $2.25

The Elephant Man and Other Reminiscences

By Sir Frederick Treves

An English surgeon's revelation of the elemental passions and emotions of humanity. $2.25

ROSITA FORBES

One of the best known women explorers in the world has written her most dramatic book,

The Sultan of the Mountains

The life story of Raisuli, famous bandit chief of Morocco, for which Rosita Forbes went right into his mountain stronghold.

Illustrated. $3.50

Modern Thinkers and Present Problems

By Edgar A. Singer, Jr.

A remarkable series of papers on Bruno, Spinoza, Hume, Kant, Nietzsche, Pragmatism, etc. $2.50

American Social History

As Recorded by British Travelers

A significant compilation by Allan Nevins, of the papers on America by Dickens, Mrs. Trollope, Fanny Kemble, Herbert Spencer, Lord Bryce, W. L. George, and others. $3.50 the times of the chariot-using chieftains, and they are such people as exist there still. Ask the British Intelligence Service if they have ever met a MacRoth within the past few years and they will probably answer that they have had a glimpse of such a person:

MacRoth had her frightened, and could have cowed her any time he wished. In her own craft he was her master, for, after all, she was only a household spy, but he was a—spy. She could glean from the kitchen or the Sunny Chamber everything that was there; but she must have walls about her and work behind those; while MacRoth did not mind whether he was in a room or in a forest; he would spy in a bee-hive; he would spy on the horned end of the moon; he would spy in the middle of the sea, and he would know which wave it was that drowned him, and which wave it was that urged it on.

The writing in the book is, as I have said, wilful; it is a wilfulness that carries the writer into unexpected beauties, startling humors and extravagances.

PADRAIC COLUM

For Students of Art Criticism

Western Art and the New Era. By Katherine S. Dreier. Brentano's. $7.

American Artists. By Royal Cortissoz. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THE student of art criticism in America will find these books invaluable; they should be read together. Miss Dreier, though she begins with Assyria and Egypt and traverses European painting, is focused upon the experimental work of today. She traces the vital chain of Western art from Byzantium to post-impressionism, developing her thesis that painting is expressive of life, that art is always in the making, and that, being an expression of different people in different times and places, art must always find new forms. From this benevolence toward modern art Mr. Cortissoz is distinctly aloof. He hates modernists. He hates experiment. "There should be no tolerance for inimical influences." He believes in fundamental principles which "art has recognized"; and he is ready to force those principles even upon nature. Thus, he says of Albert P. Ryder: "His apocalyptic skies are flatly incredible as skies in the ordinary understanding of the word, skies filled with an authentic blue and relieved by accurately modeled cloud forms." Not only the painter but heaven too, it seems, must furnish this critic with "authentic" blue and "accurately modeled" clouds.

Here then are two critics: Miss Dreier sounding a tucket for the experimenters; and Mr. Cortissoz assuring us that their work and what he calls Ellis Island art are beneath notice. Mr. Cortissoz names no living specimens of the modernist species but handsomely concedes that Cézanne, Van Gogh, and Gauguin, all dead, "retained just enough contact with the normal conventions of art for their subversive tendencies to be overlooked to a certain extent."

For merest acquaintance, therefore, with the dearest aversions of Mr. Cortissoz, we must turn to Miss Dreier.

Sharing as I do Miss Dreier's admiration for one of the most significant of these men, Marcel Duchamp, in the truest sense a genial and leading spirit, I regret her misconception of the effect produced by his painting, Nude Descending the Stairs:

Never in the history of American art has any picture taken such hold of the common people—the gate receipts rose into the tens of thousands and the prophecy which Apollinaire, the French critic, had made years before, about Duchamp being the one to enthral the public as Cimabue had done in Florence in the thirteenth century, when his picture was carried in triumph through the streets of Florence, came true in a modern form in New York in 1913.

Alas! Duchamp's renown was of another sort. The painting, because of its title, achieved a notoriety absolutely foreign to Duchamp's intention; created a huge scandal which was the basis of the Armory Show's large attendance; and is still mentioned, not with the respect and admiration it deserves, but in terms of uninformed derision. Possibly this very painting was one of the "cubistic fantasticalities" which Mr. Cortissoz reports had upon Mr. Kenyon Cox "the effect of a vulgar affront." One never knows and Mr. Cortissoz doesn't tell.

A number of other inaccuracies in Miss Dreier's book are the more regrettable in that she undertakes to be an apologist for modern painting. On page 76 she says "no expression reached us until 1913," meaning that modern European work was first shown in the Armory Exhibition of that year. On page 123 she contradicts her own statement when she refers to "'291,' the first gallery to introduce the spirit of Modern Art in New York." The Photo-Secession, later "291," had been functioning for seven years before the Armory Show of 1913—not to mention London's introduction to modern art through Mr. Roger Fry in 1912—and 291, in an uncommercial series of demonstrations, had introduced the entire range of European expression to America, from Cézanne to Picasso and Braque, from African Negro sculpture to Matisse and Brancusi, including most of the important contemporary Americans. In fact, it is doubtful if, without the pioneering of 291 and the London exhibition of 1912, the Armory Show would ever have been held.

Miss Dreier's book suffers, too, from a number of gross omissions. Where, in her list of contemporary painters, is MacDonald Wright? How about Demuth? Among women painters why is there no mention of Marie Laurencin, the Frenchwoman? And how about Georgia O'Keeffe, the American? Miss Dreier does not mention Berthe Morisot and Mary Cassatt, though even Mr. Cortissoz writes of them. Surely the Misses Katherine S. and Dorothea Dreier are not the only women painters—though theirs are the only names of women painters to appear in the index of Miss Dreier's book.

For one so consistently enthusiastic about contemporary expression Miss Dreier indulges one strange foible. Though she deplores the dominance of the machine in our civilization, yet she repudiates the one complete mastery of the machine, in photography. She asserts that photography can never "rival" art, and says no lens has ever been invented that can "emphasize certain forms or eliminate others, or which can give accurate reproductions of the proper proportions of one given object to another." But these statements contradict the experience not only of the general public, and of painters who have learned from photographs; they also contradict the affirmations of scientists and of persons like Maurice Maeterlinck, G. B. Shaw, Auguste Rodin, Matisse, Steinlen, Roland Rood, Picasso, De Zayas, and a host of others.

However, with all its faults, and they are exceeding plentiful, Miss Dreier's book nevertheless holds some germ of feeling for the humanity whose expression in all ages is related. And she does name men and movements, futurism, vorticism, dadaism, which have had no adequate historian as yet, though she often fails to get her facts about them straight: dadaism, for example, was not, as Miss Dreier says, started by Tzara and taken up by Picabia; it was an offshoot of Picabia's magazine 391, which in its turn had been derived from the American 291. This force coming in contact with Tzara undoubtedly played its part in the development of dadaism. The failure to give Americans credit for things originated through their work reminds one of D. H. Lawrence's remark, that while European moderns were trying to be extreme, the Americans just were it. Lawrence made the statement about literature. It is fully as true of the arts, where Americans are always the last to recognize and give credit for the pioneer achievements of their countrymen.

To turn from the sometimes hazy enthusiasm of Miss Dreier to Mr. Cortissoz is to enter the realm of authentic blue skies and accurately modeled clouds. He knows how to write English and, within the rigid limits he prescribes for himself, gives a panoramic view of American painters and sculptors accepted in conservative circles. His personal acquaintance with painters and architects as well as with collectors and especially with art dealers embraced outstanding figures like Stanford White and Mc-

New Oxford Books

THE NOVELS OF JANE AUSTEN

Edited by R. W. CHAPMAN.

Net $35.00

With notes, indexes, and illustrations from contemporary sources. Large paper edition, limited to 1,000 sets, of which 950 are for sale. Five volumes, with 7 colotypes (6 in colour), 38 half-tone plates, and several illustrations in the text.

Vol. 1—Sense and Sensibility, 1811.

Vol. 2—Pride and Prejudice, 1813.

Vol. 3—Mansfield Park, 1814 (with Lover's Vows).

Vol. 4—Emma, 1816.

Vol. 5—Northanger Abbey, 1818; Persuasion.

The illustrations and the binding of marbled boards, with cloth backs and paper labels, are in the style of the Regency.

THE NEWSPAPER AND AUTHORITY

By LUCY MAYNARD SALMON.

Net $7.50

The second work by Miss Salmon, dealing with the press, shows how far the restrictions placed on the newspaper press by external authority have limited its serviceableness for the historian in his attempt to reconstruct the past. The first volume, The Newspaper and the Historian, was recently published.

CITIZENSHIP

By W. H. HADOW.

Net $2.00

A book of first importance on a subject that is perhaps the most pressing of all that demand thought at the present time.

SOURCES AND DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATING THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

1764-1788 and the Formation of the Federal Constitution.

Selected and edited by S. E. MORISON.

Net $3.00

Including (a) all the essential documents, such as the Declaration of Independence and the Federal Constitution; (b) the more important acts, resolves, state constitutions, royal instructions, etc., not easily obtainable elsewhere; (c) samples of the more human varieties of source material, such as debates, letters, etc., which illustrate and often influenced public opinion.

THE ENGLISH SECRET and OTHER ESSAYS

By BASIL de SÉLINCOURT.

Net $3.50

Contents: The English Secret. A French Romantic. The Challenge to Poetry. An Aristocracy of Service. Reconstruction. An Aspect of the League of Nations. Town Housing. The Revolution in the Mind. Lord Grey and the Prelude. Poetry and the Intuition of Immortality. The Evolution of World Peace. Industry and Humanity. Spiritual Democracy. Meeting the Megatherium.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

American Branch

35 West 32nd Street

New York City

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY'S

Distinctive Recent Publications

VINDICATION

By STEPHEN McKENNA

Writing in a mood deftly satirical, with ample insight and urbanity of temper, the author of "Sonia" presents in this new novel an ever-changing picture of English social life today—a world where the post-war sensationalists pose in luxury against the best Town and Country House backgrounds, while impoverished blue blood desperately clings to outworn ideals of honor and womanhood. "Vindication" is perhaps Mr. McKenna's finest and bitterest social study, a vividly moving story of the glitter, the feverishness, the sensuality and the color of this not wholly pleasant world of today. Second printing. $2.00

THE INVERTED PYRAMID

By BERTRAND W. SINCLAIR

Finance, love, the lure of power, the call of adventure—what life brought to the three Norquay brothers, with family traditions making each one's acts react on the others. $2.00

BROKEN BUTTERFLIES

By HENRY WALSWORTH KINNEY

Japan, and especially its women, seen through the eyes of an American newspaperman; a novel that is both entertaining and enlightening. $2.00

A CONQUEROR PASSES

By LARRY BARRETTO

A post-war story, showing the reactions in business and social life of the returned soldier, restless, discontented, missing the excitement and tension of war. $2.00

THREE GENERATIONS

By MAUD HOWE ELLIOTT

The Springfield Republican says of this charming book of reminiscences by the daughter of Julia Ward Howe, covering the life and events of the past six decades: "Mrs. Elliott writes delightfully. Every word of 'Three Generations' holds the attention, not only of those to whom the whole narration is new, but particularly of those who already know their Boston and Chicago and Rome well." Illustrated. Fifth printing. $4.00

THE LAST FRONTIER

By COURTNEY RYLEY COOPER

A dramatic love story played against an intensely thrilling background of the building of the Kansas-Pacific Railway in 1867—the last national barricade between savagery and civilization which ended for all time the supremacy of the Red Man over the State of Kansas—in which "Buffalo Bill" Cody and General Custer played a prominent part. $2.00

REMEMBERED YESTERDAYS

By ROBERT UNDERWOOD JOHNSON

Charles Hanson Towne in The New York Tribune says: "It must be said of Mr. Johnson's looking backward that he does so with amazing intelligence and with clear vision. He has remembered much and forgotten little. He has done so much, both as a high-spirited American and as an editor and poet, that he deserves the wide recognition he has won; and thousands of us will be grateful to him for having set down, so amiably and beautifully, this shining chronicle of happy and well spent years." Illustrated. Third printing. $5.00

THE TERMS OF CONQUEST

By HOWARD VINCENT O'BRIEN

The New York Times says: "'The Terms of Conquest' is distinctly significant. The point of view is always interesting, the book as a whole a fair-minded, thoughtful, careful study of certain phases of American life." $2.00

ESSAYS OF TODAY

Edited by F. H. PRITCHARD

Thirty-four essays by twentieth-century English writers, including Belloc, Chesterton, Hewlett, Lucas, Conrad and Birrell, with thumbnail biographies of the authors represented. $2.00

THE PIONEER WEST: Narratives of the Westward March of Empire.

Selected and Edited by JOSEPH LEWIS FRENCH

The Argonaut, San Francisco, says: "Mr. French has rendered lasting service to his countrymen, east as well as west, in gathering into one volume the history of the trailmakers of the West. He has preserved for coming generations of readers what might have soon become inaccessible to the majority." Illustrated in color by Remington Schuyler. $2.50

THE BOOK OF BLANCHE

By DOROTHY RICHARDSON

The love story, half earthly, half spiritual, of a beautiful violinist and a hospital surgeon; unique for its word pictures of the psychic phenomena of anesthesia, and revealing a brilliant new American novelist. $2.00

These books are for sale at all Booksellers

Boston - LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY - Publishers

Kim, La Farge, Abbey, Abbott H. Thayer, Duveneck, Chase, Kenyon Cox, and Charles Freer. He has assembled many respectable if hardly thrilling facts about the bygone sedate age of American painting. But it is unfortunate that in a book named "American Artists" he could not persuade himself to name one of the greatest living water colorists, John Marin; or Marsden Hartley, distinguished for his "Adventures in the Arts" and his poems as well as for his sensitive painting. There is one more than strange chapter on New York as an Art Center, wherein the purchases and sales of paintings, often inferior in merit and since depreciated in value, are cited as phenomena that "spell an astounding play of taste, of judgment, of genuine artistic wisdom." When Mr. Cortissoz speaks of the prices in New York's picture mart as constituting effective insurance against "subversive modernism," one rubs one's eyes. How about the thousands of dollars paid for work of Matisse, Picasso, and Cézanne, at recent sales and auctions—of the Kelekian collection for example—not to mention Brancusi and even Seurat, and the constantly rising prices of other modern work? These dollar standards have nothing to do with American artists, though they seem to concern Mr. Cortissoz intimately. Is there not, in this point of view, more than a little adulation of dealers and of "super-collectors like Morgan, Altman, Frick, and Widener," and the late Charles Freer? Are there not some who would question the assertion that art dealers on and near upper Fifth Avenue "have kept pace with every phase of our aesthetic experience"? At least these statements are invaluable for the student of art criticism in America, for whom, it may be repeated, this book of Mr. Cortissoz, together with that of Miss Dreier, constitutes a veritable treasure trove.

HERBERT J. SELIGMANN

Uplift and Understanding

From Pinafores to Politics. By Mrs. J. Borden Harriman. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

Three Generations. By Maud Howe Elliott. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

THOSE who have despaired of finding intimate and unknown details in autobiographies will find Mrs. J. Borden Harriman's "From Pinafores to Politics" a pleasant surprise. I, and perhaps others, had always thought that the Democratic Party slipped into power in 1912 through the broken ranks of the Republican Party. It is bewildering to realize that Mr. Wilson was elected because Mrs. Harriman gave him a dinner at the Colony Club. As for the Colony Club itself, that august body came into existence so that Mrs. Harriman could have a place in which to sleep when she came down from her summer house and her town house was undergoing repairs—"Bordie" not wanting his wife to stay alone at the Waldorf.

People on this side of the ocean when Germany invaded Belgium strained their meager imaginations to picture the chaos of frenzied Europe. Mrs. Harriman, who was there collecting reports on labor problems, tells us all about it: "It makes me realize now that . . . the next war, too, will come to most of us out of the sky, catch us laughing again at garden parties." And from her diary, August 15, 1914:

The Ambassador is too wonderful. . . . Dear Mrs. Delia Field is at the Ritz lending money to everyone who wants to find lost relatives in Belgium, giving Ethel and me long suede gloves to cover our nakedness until our trunks are found and generally being a good angel to all stranded Americans. She always makes more people happier than anyone I know.

On the labor problem she meditates: "Queer how philanthropy and a real adjustment between capital and labor don't quite mix." And, later, reporting the conation of our troops in France to President Wilson, she becomes really emphatic with: "The want of food in Europe is dreadful. Even I was hungry the last days in London."

A realist of the highest order, Mrs. Harriman spares her horrified reader no detail of the discomfort she has undergone for the sake of "the public" whom she "really did represent, I believe." If it was cold motoring back from a labor hearing she never forgets to mention the fact, and in war-time France she had to wear her fur coat indoors to keep warm. Our sympathy is aroused when she tells how hot she became driving her ambulance in Washington before she could deposit her patient and go to a drug-store for a cool drink, and with what difficulty she and her orderly persuaded a patient to refrain from being "seasick" and "spoil" "our new ambulance" that "was our pride and our joy."

To those Americans who thought the G. H. Q. of the A. E. F. was at Chaumont it will be interesting to learn that, though it was nominally stationed there, it was really at the Ritz in Paris, as were also the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. Mrs. Harriman leaves no room for doubt: "I say in my diary that everybody was at the Ritz the winter of 1918-1919. And not the least noticeable of everybody was Elinor Glyn." "I only know that to the populace it [President Wilson's coming] was the greatest of good news. My manicure at the Ritz chattered for days about his arrival."

And of the author herself we have a definite impression long before the book is finished. She confides to us that during certain trying times "my sense of humor tided me over." That a member of our present-day civilization could actually come in contact with so much suffering, could know personally so many prominent individuals, could hold such important political positions, and still come through it all as blithely untroubled and effervescently self-assured as Mrs. Harriman does certainly necessitates some remarkable quality. Doubtless, it is the "sense of humor" of which she speaks.

The ridiculous has its place in the world as a foil for the sublime and thus it is that "From Pinafores to Politics" becomes interesting when compared with "Three Generations." For, though Mrs. Elliott's book may not attain to absolute sublimity or Mrs. Harriman's to the completely ridiculous, the step from Mrs. Harriman's carefully selected list of political dinner guests to a breakfast in the home of Julia Ward Howe is the stride of seven-league boots. From over-impulsive lobbyings and easy money one's mind catapults back to a real balance of values as it is reassured that there have been famous names in the world not intimately associated with diplomatic and political intrigue—as senators and generals give place to Henry and William James, Bret Harte, Francis Marion Crawford, Edward Sothorn, William Dean Howells, Richard Mansfield, Henry Adams, Queen Margherita of Italy as a patron of the arts, John Sargent, and many others.

A few quotations will point the comparison: August 15, 1914, in her diary, Mrs. Harriman worried about long suede gloves. August 9, 1914, Mrs. Elliott wrote in her journal: "The papers are too full of the small discomforts of these travelers. Millionaires are coming home in the steerage; this may improve the conditions in the steerage for future emigrants." And September 24:

The worst of it is, the mildest people are turned into furies, even by the faint and distant echoes of the passions that are destroying Europe and England. I feel a savage exaltation when I hear of so many Germans killed or wounded. Then comes remorse for the hateful feeling, the remembrance that those men are inspired by a passionate patriotism, that their wives and mothers love them as much as English wives and mothers love their men; but the ugly feeling was there, was uppermost before reflection seized and tried to down it.

Where Mrs. Harriman sat in uplifting patronage at labor hearings, Mrs. Elliott, as a child, accompanied her father on his inspections of public institutions. "I have slept in almost every poorhouse and insane asylum in the State [Massachusetts]." While Mrs. Harriman stumped for Wilson in 1912, Mrs. Elliott, in the interests of woman suffrage, whole-heartedly backed Roosevelt. She says: "Could I hope to be remembered at all, it would be as one of the founders of the Progressive Party."

Artist life in Rome, travels through Greece, Egypt, and the Holy Land with her mother, Julia Ward Howe, the Art Association of Newport are all described with a simple dignity and rare insight. If the book is somewhat too religious for certain readers, if its characters are so universally beautiful and lacking in malice that one wonders where all the mean people are in the world, for myself I can put that down to the gentle and sincere nature of Maud Howe Elliott herself, and overlook its unreality in my gratification that an intelligent woman of seventy can still look with sweet tolerance upon the world about her. Her book is a real addition to the memoirs of the last three decades.

KATHLEEN MILLAY

Passionate Cooperation

Cooperative Democracy. By James Peter Warbasse. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THIS book makes me a little dizzy. The same in the face of the fact that I have just laid down Mr. Veblen's "Absentee Ownership"—supposed to be as turbid a pot of the King's English as ever was brewed. But Veblen, for all his alarums and fanfaronades, sticks pretty relentlessly to his point:

Christendom is governed in recent times by three several systems of use and wont, sovereign action-patterns induced by the run of past habituation: (a) the mechanical system of industry, (b) the price (and credit) system, (c) the conception of national integrity. The existing industrial system is dominated by the technology of physics and chemistry. The price system is dominated by absentee ownership. The nation, considered as a habit of thought, is a residual form of the predatory dynastic state of early modern times, with some superficial alterations due to a suffusion of democratic and parliamentary institutions.

Under the adjectives and the adverbs, Mr. Veblen strips the economic structure of its last garment until it stands naked, clear, and insolent against the sky. There is little use of capitals and no indignation, but we have here such an indictment as no professed agitator has ever written.

Mr. Warbasse tends to follow the older school. He is generous with his capitals. He gets righteously indignant. He views with alarm. For 376 pages, with Cooperation firmly clutched in one hand and a battle-ax in the other, he hews his way into a forest of Capitalists, Profiteers, Farmers, Trade Unions, State Socialism, Guild Socialism, Anarchism, Syndicalism, Communism, Democracy, the Tariff, the Producer, the Consumer (I never have been able to get these latter two gentlemen properly pulled apart), Service, New Ethics, and Translating the Finite into the Infinite. As I say, it leaves me impressed, but a little dizzy.

Mr. Warbasse has a good cause and a good case. He produces arguments—telling arguments—as to the possibilities of the cooperative movement ameliorating the three key systems of use and wont which Veblen sketches. Cooperation does use modern technology for satisfying the needs of the consumer, rather than for private profit. (Witness the great research laboratories of the European cooperatives.) Cooperation does tend to break down the evils of absentee ownership. Cooperation does move—slowly to be sure—across national frontiers.

Perhaps the trouble is that my habit-patterns are such that it seems to verge on the immoral for cooperation to produce a prophet as passionate and as logical as, say, a socialist, a single-taxer, or a birth controller. Cooperation takes an incurably pedestrian gait in my mind. Here is a movement that has been steadily sawing wood for half a century, while all the other movements have been tearing their beards. Somehow it does not seem quite proper for so respectable, so tan-

Twenty Million German Workers Sentenced to Death

The German people are fed according to the class they belong in.

Based on statistics gathered by the Chicago Tribune, the following table was compiled:

In all of Germany—63,000,000 people. They are divided into four classes:

CLASS 1—numbers TWENTY-THREE MILLION. Represents agricultural and allied professions. Composes 36.5% of the population and will consume 55.1% of the food available for all of Germany in one year.

CLASS 2—numbers SEVEN MILLION. Represents industrialists, traders, high executives. Composes 11.1% of the population and will consume 16.8% of the food available for all of Germany in one year.

CLASS 3—numbers THIRTEEN MILLION. Represents skilled workmen and small shopkeepers. Composes 20.6% of the population and will consume 20.7% of the food available for all of Germany in one year.

CLASS 4—numbers TWENTY MILLION. Represents the war-injured, dependent pensioners, paupers, professionals, unemployed and unskilled workers. Composes 31.8% of the population and will consume 7.4% of the food available for all of Germany in one year.

HELP

ESTABLISH AN AMERICAN SOUP KITCHEN for the TWENTY MILLION in Class Four.

They get only 7.4% of the food supply.

FRIENDS OF SOVIET RUSSIA AND WORKERS' GERMANY.
32 South Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Illinois.
Enclosed find $..... to help open an AMERICAN SOUP KITCHEN in Germany as an expression of International Solidarity with the STARVING WORKERS, THEIR WIVES AND CHILDREN. I pledge myself to sell meal coupons at 10c each weekly for the maintenance of the Kitchen. Send me a meal couponbook (Yes or No?)
NAME
ADDRESS
Trade or Profession

Committee for International Workers' Aid

gible, and so formidable an organization to stoop to the Brotherhood of Man, Adventurous Youth, and Restitution and Forgiveness. It is like a copy of the Liberator on a banker's desk. And yet I must confess that when Mr. Warbasse tells of what the Flemish cooperatives have done for sculpture, I come near to shouting.

The last part of the book is less upsetting and more seemly according to the dictates of my upbringing. It comprises a very able and interesting summary of where consumers' cooperation stands today in the various countries of the world, together with the types of industries handled, and an outline of cooperative history. With its thirty million members, the movement does a very considerable fraction of the world's business, and perhaps, as Mr. Warbasse intimates, it is the only force which can keep Europe together in the tumultuous years ahead. Consumers' cooperation in the United States has languished, and continues to languish.

Finally, here is one thought which gives me particular pause:

Cooperative organization begins with the people as consumers and represents the individual as an absorber and user of the things that have been produced. This means that its first concern is for the human being in the enjoyment of things. It begins with the home and the family rather than with the workshop and the worker.

And when you come to think of it, why isn't this the place to begin? The current phrase, and current business practice, runs "supply and demand"—fit the market to the goods. Cooperation would make it, "demand and supply"—fit the goods to human needs.

STUART CHASE

Blunt the Rebel

Gordon at Khartoum. By Wilfrid Scawen Blunt. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

TEN years ago I read Blunt's book, and I then thought that my unfortunate association with bank wreckers and railroad grafters had not a little to do with my fury of admiration for the author. But now, having read it a second time amid a kind of arcadian quiet, I find it no less thrilling. Reading, you rub your eyes and wonder, for it seems that no one has presented a more faithful reflection of his contemporary world than Blunt. No, not even old Samuel Pepys, frankest of chroniclers. For Pepys had something of the sycophant in him, and, again, he was at a handicap in writing of a circle of which he was no part. Blunt, the man of affairs and gentleman of wealth and leisure, was able to write from the inside, making use of his intimate knowledge of nineteenth-century political society, setting down everything as it was, sparing none and caring for none, giving pictures of those met, and in the pictures recording expressed and discovered prejudices; penning the motives of men as they stood revealed in a thousand conversations; indicating always personal ambitions, hopes, ideals. Perhaps he discovered the men behind their masks by antagonizing them, by angering them, by putting them on the defensive. Often, it is clear, he prodded them into self-revelation, and most certainly he himself always stood in the light of a challenger. A challenger, I say, because as you read you visualize a man standing four-square, a most uncompromising enemy of what is called "civilizing imperialism," a denouncer of absurd alliances, and a laughter at flamboyant boasters. You imagine him transferred to America to stand, a fervent denouncer of dreams of national glory as being utterly incompatible with the ideals of Lincoln, of Jefferson, of Washington. The attitude explains much. It explains, for instance, his ex-coriolation in his "Diary" of Roosevelt, who, the aggressive soul of him alive, characteristically plunging into matters he understood not at all, taking snap judgment, played his part of political rhetorician. "The Egyptian papers have been full of Roosevelt's adventures at Cairo, and the speech he made to university students in praise of British rule. He is a buffoon of the lowest American type and roused the fury of young Egypt to the boiling-point, and it is probable that if he had not cleared out of the country there would have been mischief." Or this about his friend General Gordon: "Much as I liked Gordon personally, I considered him to be in the wrong and the others in the right, and I would rather see him perish than cause the death of one of his opponents" (p. 221).

For Blunt was all for Egypt and all against England in its occupancy of the Nile country. More than that, he held that Crown colonies are, after all, nothing but slave communities in disguise. In Egypt and in India England stood as an invader, as he saw it, and the life of the invader is never sacred. He went further still: he felt that all the talk about civilization and the white man's burden, all the babble about spreading the gospel among the heathen and teaching others to govern themselves was pernicious claptrap and pinchbeck oratory, and that the paramount aim behind all was a kind of industrial slavery. Seeing so-called enlightened nations at works of conquest, of extermination, burning, killing, bombarding, and subjugating the weak, Blunt finds them not Christians at all, but plunderers filled with the mere lust of conquest, full of ideas about trade gains, hungry for lands to be won and profits to be snatched by fraud. And in the mealy-mouthed protestation of politicians masquerading as statesmen, in all sanctimonious professions of higher motives he finds nothing but mere pretenses to cover the nakedness of bare spoliation. As for the heaven-inspired missions of nations and the extra-mundane intelligence planning all things for an ultimate good, "I am," he writes, "too little believing in the divine government of the world."

This, too, is important. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt most thoroughly understood the trend of things and realized that the acts of his government must inevitably bring upon the world something of that malaise from which we suffer today. There's golden merit in the book, for while it relates the true story of foreign occupancy of a protesting land and of a series of campaigns between 1882 and 1886, it is also a signpost and a danger signal if like causes produce like results. For it cannot be doubted that the path upon which England entered in India and in Egypt is not at all dissimilar to the path which some would have the United States government tread in Mexico; and it is most certainly the path that Spain trod in the days of her madness when her buccaneer chiefs destroyed, most wantonly, civilizations superior to those which she imposed.

Obviously, such a man would give the sentimentalists short shrift, would be enfent terrible to the platitudinists who talked about the "thin red line of heroes" and those who "bled for their country." And bearing that in mind, small wonder that old parliamentary hands foamed at the mouth and discussed the famous entry of June 22, at Westminster. But what Blunt's heart felt and what Blunt's mind thought, that would Blunt's hand set down for weal or woe. So:

News of the battle of Abu Klea—Burnaby killed, as it serves him right, for he was a mere butcher. . . . These English soldiers are mere murderers, and I confess I would rather see them in perdition than that a single Arab more should die. . . . A mongrel scum of thieves . . . commanded by young fellows whose ideal is the greenroom of the Gaiety—without beliefs, without traditions, without other principle of action than just to get their promotion and have a little fun. On the other side men with the memory of a thousand years of freedom, with chivalry inherited from the Saracens, the noblest of ancestors, with a creed the purest the world ever knew, worshiping God and serving him in arms like the heroes of the ancient world they are. . . . Gladstone! Great God, is there no vengeance for this pitiful man of blood, who has not even the courage to be a man of iron? What is he that he should have cost the world a single life? A pedant, a babbler, an impotent old fool. . . .

A tremendous book indeed, this; a book written by a man with a clear, definite idea; a book most pregnant upon politics, history, religion, and world affairs. CHARLES J. FINGER

On Some New Music

By PITTS SANBORN

THE autumn was uncommonly rich in its harvest of new music. Or, to speak with a more meticulous approach to exactitude, it made known to New York audiences more than the usual amount of unfamiliar music. Some of it was already familiar elsewhere. Stravinsky's "Chant du rossignol" dates in its original form as opera from 1914, in its revised form as symphonic poem (thus Walter Damrosch introduced it to us at the concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra on November 1) from 1917. Stravinsky's "Renard," which the International Composers' Guild brought forward in December, was produced first in 1922. These two pieces, I think, are the main contributions of a harvest copious, varied, and in large part of genuine interest, but both were already known to the public of Paris and of other European cities. The newness of the rest of the "new" music ranged from the "world première" of Ernest Bloch's quarter-tone quintet for piano and strings to some anonymous English Christmas carols of the fifteenth century!

Even so brief and fragmentary a glance at a general situation as this demonstrates immediately the efficacy of guilds and leagues. The International Composers' Guild, the League of Composers (they once were one, but now are twain), the American Music Guild, and the Franco-American Musical Society (a recent entry in the field) are our official and active modernists. Except for their ministrations, our concert rooms would have no choice but to depend on the established instrumental and choral organizations, and on a few such tireless individual gospellers of the new as Mme Gauthier, Mme Leginska, and Mr. Ornstein (at least, as he used to be) for knowledge of the latest developments of musical art. Perhaps the truth of the matter is that the established bodies feel the lash of competition, but in any case it is a fact, and a very healthful and gratifying fact, that where they might go on diffusing Tchaikovsky to the crack of doom and their audiences would never say them nay, they do take some cognizance of the creative ferment in the world about them.

Mr. Monteux, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been an intrepid producer of modern music (Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" is his latest discovery), even though he has hardly courted popularity thereby with the Boston Symphony following in New York. Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphians once dared bring us, though very late in the day, the notorious "Five Pieces" of Arnold Schönberg. Perhaps the expostulations of their New York patrons over that artistic "outrage" persuaded them subsequently to keep the Stravinsky "Sacre du printemps" for Philadelphia consumption only. If so, they served New York jolly well right! The Philharmonic Society's programs for this season are rather surprisingly poor in unfamiliar compositions, though the Stravinsky "Sacre" does appear on Mr. Mengelberg's provisional list.

Mr. Stransky, always eager to do his part for the new, promises to maintain his praiseworthy record in the ministrations of his recently organized State Symphony, and as earnest of good faith found early opportunity for the performance of Frank Bridge's "Sea" suite. Walter Damrosch, whose New York Symphony programs are proverbially catholic in selection and spiced with novelty, went further this autumn than is even his custom by not only giving New York its first hearing of Stravinsky's "Chant du rossignol" (the American "première" had occurred a few days before in Philadelphia under the leadership of Mr. Stokowski), but by repeating the work twice in quick succession. As it happened, Mr. Damrosch's courage was rewarded with the heartiest sort of approval by his applauding audiences and even by the press.

Kurt Schindler, of course, is always quite amazing in the extent and interest of the discoveries that he lavishes on the

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents
FAY Bainter in "THE OTHER ROSE"
with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 46th Street
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

BELMONT
4th St. E. of Bway
Eva. 8:30. Mats.
Thur. & Sat. 2:30
tarnish
4th Month
"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."—Ludwig Lewisohn, THE NATION.

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!
DAVID BELASCO Presents
LIONEL BARRYMORE
with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Evs. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Thea., 41st St., W. of Broadway, Evs., 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

"One play in a thousand"
Alexander Woolcott in the Herald
Outward Bound
with a Distinguished Cast at the
RITZ THEATRE
West 48 St. Evs. 8:30.
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

PRINCESS THEATRE 89th Street
East of Broadway. Evs., 8:45. Matinees
Thurs. and Sat., 2:45.
SUN UP With
LUCILLE LA VERNE
By LULA VOLLMER

YIDDISH ART THEATRE 27th St. and
Madison Ave.
Maurice Swartz, Director
Abraham Goldfaden's classic comedy revival
"THE TWO KOONY LAMMELS"
Friday, 8:30
Also Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30

Courses
RAND SCHOOL
7 East 14th Street
Write for Bulletin
Feb. 9, 11 A.M. and 3:15 P.M. Scott Nearing
"Social Values" "Social Revolution"
Feb. 14, 8:40 P.M. Herman Epstein
"Meaning of Music"
Feb. 16, 2:00 P.M. A. A. Goldenweiser
"Psychological Sidelights"
Feb. 20, 8:40 P.M. Morris Hillquit
"New Problems for Radicals"
Feb. 20, 8:40 P.M. Willy Pogany
"Lectures on Art"

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL 239 East 14th Street
First Sessions Free
Course 14. Evolution of Violin Music. David Sapiro and Maximilian Rose. 5 Tues., 8:30, beginning Feb. 12. Fee $2.00.
Course 17. Practical Sociology. Prof. Jerome Davis of Dartmouth. 5 Thur., at 7:30, beginning Feb. 14. Fee $1.50.
Course 19. Recent Advances in Medical Science. Dr. A. Stone. 5 Thur., at 8:30, beginning Feb. 14. Fee $1.50.

programs of the Schola Cantorum. His Christmas concert of this season was one of the richest in novel and important matter that even he has ever sponsored. Mr. Schindler's "new" music began with an archaic group consisting of the early English carols before mentioned and other antiques hitherto unperformed here, by Senfl, Sweelinck, Eccard, and Praetorius, and it reached on down to Bela Bartok and Ildebrando Pizzetti! But, alas, the admirably notable concerts of the Schola Cantorum occur only twice a year!

The Society of the Friends of Music introduced to America in October that mastodonic cantata, "Von deutscher Seele," by that singular Munich composer Hans Pfitzner. Pfitzner's music (which is conservative in manner and of inspiration mortally scant) may have some domestic import, but it surely isn't matter for export. The Friends devoted to the performing of it intelligent, skilful, and unsparing effort that might have been expended much better on something else.

Stravinsky, as I have said, was the feature of the autumn harvest. His symphonic "Chant du rossignol," scored with a ravishing sense of timbre and color for an astonishingly small orchestra, draws its inspiration from the farthest East. The particular nightingale—a human soprano in the opera, a flute in the symphonic version—is of the Chinese species, and to the delighted senses of the Emperor of China he sings until the arrival of a mechanical nightingale (clarinet accompanied by piano and harp), a gift from the crafty Emperor of Japan, offends him so sorely that he disappears. But when thus deserted the Chinese monarch lies at the point of death, the bird relents and works a marvelous cure by "singing so alluringly of the Garden of the Dead that Death, impatient to return to his own realm, relinquishes his claim upon the emperor and retires." From this quaint kernel of story Stravinsky's music rises like a spell of magical and jeweled tone which for a moment glistens against the background of silence and, like the offended nightingale, is gone.

For the other Stravinsky, the "Renard," we are indebted to the International Composers' Guild. It was done at their December concert by a group of players from the Philadelphia Orchestra, led by Mr. Stokowski, and by four singers astutely chosen for their tasks. In the small auditorium of the Vanderbilt Theater, without scenery and with no more of miming than pertinent glances exchanged among the men who sang the Fox, the Cat, the Goat, and the Rooster, this "little 'parade' for a fair," with its naive story of a cat and a goat that between them save the life of chanticler, seemed a veritable masterpiece of musical gaiety and irony.

This was the important autumn contribution of the International Composers' Guild. The kindred, but more restricted, American Music Guild offered at the Town Hall in December a program of works that an American committee selected for presentation at the Salzburg festival of modern chamber music last August. The presentation did not come off as planned, and for that there need be no sorrowing. The program would hardly have added to the prestige of American music on the continent of Europe. On the other hand, the League of Composers started its career at the Klaw Theater in November with a novelty that cannot be neglected, because in it Ernest Bloch, the up-to-the-minute man of music, boldly essays the use of quarter tones.

Alois Haba's quarter-tone quartet proved one of the most discussed of all the pieces done at the aforesaid Salzburg festival. Perhaps Mr. Bloch was too hasty in following so fast on its heels with his quintet for piano and strings. Aside from the quarter-tone innovation, this quintet sounded commonplace and uninspired—distinctly one of the lesser compositions of Mr. Bloch, who has written impressive music. Its only claim to distinction lay in the use of quarter tones, and they sounded as if lugged in from without, not as if part and parcel of the harmonic fabric. Perhaps in time Mr. Bloch, if he persists, will evolve a quarter-tone procedure that assumes the inevitability of real art. To date he hasn't. And so the autumn honors were to Stravinsky without serious dispute.

Drama

Max Reinhardt

ABOUT Reinhardt there is something of the pure visionary. He is a little aloof from the earth and its cares. Through a magnificent career he has preserved a great simplicity and through the direst catastrophe in modern history the freshness of his ardor. No one could have done that who dwelt less wholly in the realm of the imagination and more in that of the concrete. Nothing has laden with dross the vision that he pursues. The future historian of the various arts will note this fact and, as a consequence of it, that "The Miracle," the most astonishing and astonishingly beautiful thing in the entire art of the theater, is built around a legend that has no reality as either fact or symbol. Its medievalism is the constant mark of pure romanticism, of the flight from reality into an easier world of accident and wonder.

Yes, Reinhardt is a romanticist as all the artists of the new theater are. To him and to them the theater is not an art of expression but an art of flight. They do not know it, but what they seek is a refuge, an island of beauty and serenity amid the clashing of the steely waves. Thus Reinhardt produces "The Miracle," and the famous third studio of Moscow produces "Phèdre" and takes pride in the morbidly exquisite grotesquerie of the costumes. And those addicted to this species of art—art as a pure anodyne—will ask you to turn from the stage that portrays the acting and suffering spirit of man to these "divine manikins." Art as an anodyne—that is the pure doctrine of Schopenhauer, of romanticists, and neo-romanticists, and our contemporary artists of the theater do not know that merely because they do not know much about the history of the arts anyhow.

I do not wish it thought that I yield to anyone in my admiration for Max Reinhardt. I have spoken of him here before, of the creative impulse by which he turned a profession into an art, of the variety and power and literally epoch-making character of his achievement. What I am trying to do is to define, to clarify, to understand. There is too much "amazement and blank awe" in our critical reception of even the greatest things; there is too little understanding and far too little integration of them into the intelligible scheme of things.

The Reinhardt of "The Miracle" is of course not the whole artist or the whole man. He himself does not overvalue the stupendous. He told me that he was returning to Vienna in order to establish a small but very perfect repertory theater, the only kind of theater, he added, that has any permanent value or significance. To begin with it would need a subsidy and such a subsidy he has succeeded in procuring. A greater difficulty, he feared, would be met in the matter of gathering an excellent company, since all good German actors have been driven by imminent or actual want into working for the films. Would it not be admirable if Mr. Gest might later bring to us for at least one season what will without doubt be an exemplary theater?

I must return for just another moment to Reinhardt's personality and the spirit that it breathes. He is not only a great artist, but a very practical man of the theater. A theater costs money. There is no affectation about him, no pretense that the practical soils. But there is in him so simple and passionate an understanding of the fact that all this is ancillary or only a means to an end that he can be quite frank and quite severe about it. To Reinhardt art is the reason for his existence and the existence of the theater and almost of the world. If it costs money, then the money must be raised, shall be raised, and, since people are probably not utter fools, will be raised. That spirit of his cannot be taught. It is a pity that Reinhardt is so shy about speaking English that more of the men of our theater could not get at least a glimpse of it from him.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1924

No. 3059

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	191
EDITORIALS:
The Call for Borah and La Follette	194
A French-Congress Treaty	195
Mr. Albee Meets Mr. Jefferson	196
Is Labor a Lost Cause?	197
HOW POINCARÉ PREPARED FOR WAR. By Lewis S. Gannett	197
A PARABLE OF PARADISE. By Genevieve Taggard	198
REFINED PRODUCTS OF OIL. By William Hard	199
THE JEW MEDITATES. By Ludwig Lewisohn	200
WITHIN THE LAW OF TOOTH AND CLAW. By Webb Waldron	202
LONG BEACH, CALIFORNIA: FARMER'S REST. By Don Ryan	205
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	206
CORRESPONDENCE	207
BOOKS:
Certain British Tendencies. By Charles Nagel	209
The Monroe Doctrine: Its Use and Abuse. By Dexter Perkins	210
The Hungry Heart. By Mark Van Doren	211
Imponderable Valuers. By J. W. Krutch	212
Books in Brief	212
GITTA GRADOVA. By Henrietta Straus	212
DRAMA:
Past and Present. By Ludwig Lewisohn	213
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Saving Hungary. By Emil Lengyel	214
South Africa Declares Economic Independence	215
A Fascist Labor Program	215

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY

IRITA VAN DOREN

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE

JOHN A. HOBSON

NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK

H. L. MENCKEN

CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

GENERAL DAWES and his fellow-experts have been digging through piles of statistics with magnificent energy. They have already reached certain obviously wise decisions. They have made it clear that the estimates of German capital abroad have been enormously exaggerated—that far less German capital is invested abroad today than before the war—and that what is there cannot be reached for reparations except by building up Germany in such fashion that capital will be attracted homeward. This disposes of one futile suggestion. The correspondents have cabled too few details of the proposed gold bank under international control to make judgment of its significance possible. One dangerous hint has crept into the dispatches. "Instead of closeting themselves as 'practical business men,'" says Mr. James of the New York Times, "they will keep in close touch with members of the Reparation Commission . . . who are in close touch with the political aspects of the situation." If they attempt to double their role of economic experts with that of political fixers their usefulness will be at an end.

RAMSAY MACDONALD continues serenely to plow the soil of diplomacy in new patterns. He is demanding that France permit Germany to be elected a member of the League, suggesting that the United States join Great Britain in a new conference to limit armament, and persistently treating M. Poincaré as a human being and a friend. The British press is skeptical of the efficacy of this latter policy, but it seems to be bearing some fruit. An agreement regarding the Cologne railways has at last been reached, and apparently the French have agreed to abandon their support of the Separatist movement in the Palatinate. This policy of friendship with the man most responsible for the present state of Europe is dangerous, but Ramsay MacDonald is unlikely to slip into compromises without being aware of them.

EUROPEAN POWERS one after another recognize Soviet Russia just as if Mr. Hughes did not exist. Italy signed a commercial treaty in the week which followed Ramsay MacDonald's unconditional recognition of the Power which Mr. Hughes still refuses to see. The Little Entente nations, Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, and Rumania, announce their readiness to follow suit, and France, despite her record of relentless hostility, is obviously maneuvering for position in Russia. Russia still has its difficulties with China over the South Manchuria Railroad, and the negotiations with Japan drag. But if Mr. Coolidge does not get a new Secretary of State we may wake up some fine morning to discover that instead of leaving Russia out we have been left out ourselves.

FOR BLIND UNMITIGATED IDIOCY the refusal of the German Embassy in Washington to go through the form of displaying a flag at half-mast in respect to the memory of a dead President might seem beyond rivalry. But the action of the young men who arose in the night and under cover of darkness tacked an American flag to the porte-cochère of the Embassy was, if anything, even more idiotic than the German refusal to pay a formal tribute to a man whom they could not, at heart, mourn. Just what the Germans expected to achieve is hard to conceive; probably the chief effect of the action will be to check the American campaign for the relief of German children. Just how the Americans thought they honored Wilson or America in dodging the police at night and nailing a flag where it was not wanted is as obscure.

DAVID LLOYD GEORGE can hardly add to his own reputation by attacking Woodrow Wilson for surrendering to the French in Paris. It is ridiculous to claim in 1924 that he knew nothing in 1919 of the agreement between Wilson and Clemenceau upon which were based the peace-treaty clauses fixing the occupation of the Rhine. Yet American newspapers are hasty in assuming that there is nothing at all behind Mr. Lloyd George's sensational charge. Mr. Harold Spender, who wrote the famous interview, is Mr. Lloyd George's biographer and close friend, and there is little likelihood that the interview was a freak. Mr. Lloyd George charged that Mr. Wilson made "a secret compact" permitting the French to occupy the Rhineland. This much truth there is in it: When Lloyd George returned to England on April 13, 1919, the Rhine frontier was left unsettled, to be the main topic of discussion in the following week, as is evidenced by the Associated Press dispatch of that date, which presumably was based on statements by the American commissioners. Ray Stannard

Baker, Mr. Wilson's faithful man Friday, says, in his official defense of the President, that "the agreement regarding the left bank of the Rhine was completed on April 16 by the consent of Wilson and Lloyd George to an occupation for fifteen years." Obviously Mr. Baker is wrong, for Lloyd George was mending his political fences in London on that date; the surrender was made by President Wilson when Mr. Lloyd George was in London. But why should Lloyd George, who is responsible for the inclusion of pensions under reparations, care to raise the question of responsibility for this or that clause of the treaty?

THE BACKBONE of the Mexican rebellion seems to have been broken. The rebels' greatest asset, control of Vera Cruz, the country's largest port, terminal of four railways, has passed to the Federals. De la Huerta's headquarters from now on will be wherever he hangs his sombrero. Guerrilla bands may hold out a long time, but the stability of the Obregon Government now seems assured, and a peaceful election and transmission of the presidency through political forms likely. De la Huerta's attempt to substitute force failed, but he wrought terrific destruction in a country struggling to recuperate from ten years of civil war. Miles of railroad torn up, bridges and tunnels dynamited, commerce paralyzed—the material cost alone has in two months run into many millions. The spiritual damage, when an era of constructive peace seemed at last to have dawned, is perhaps even more serious. And irreparable in Mexico, where conscientious and capable leaders are rare, is the loss of Felipe Carrillo, Yucatan's governor and reformer. The lessons of the rebellion should be taken to heart. The professional army which made it possible should be scrapped. The army has always been a drain on Mexico's treasury, a focus of corruption, and a permanent menace to order and stability. Although half of it remained loyal, Obregon's victory is chiefly due to the rallying of city and country workers who realized that their newly won economic emancipation, slight though it is, was at stake. And it is upon just such a volunteer militia that the revolutionary governments of Mexico will have to depend in the future whenever treason and reaction strike hands.

HAITI'S CONSTITUTION, drawn up under the American Occupation by the then Assistant Secretary of the Navy of the United States, provides for the holding of national elections in even years. But our regime of military occupation has as little respect for a constitution drafted in Washington as for laws passed by Haitians. By agreement with the so-called President of Haiti (who was not elected by the people but was installed by the Marines) it proclaimed that in 1924, as in 1922, 1920, and 1918, there would be no election of the legislature. The Haitians, however, weary of existence without a parliamentary body, determined to comply with their constitution at any cost. Candidates were named, and campaigns conducted. The clerks of the courts, by order of the Government, refused to accept their declarations of candidacy, but the people paid little attention to this. On January 10, despite the fact that gendarmes under the order of the United States marines watched the polls, thousands of Haitians wrote in on the ballots provided for the communal elections the names of their candidates for the two houses of the Legislature. Many deputies and a majority of the Senate were accordingly elected. Of course the Government declared these elections null and void. How long will the people of the United States permit such tyranny to continue in its name and under the protection of its flag?

IN THE TWENTY-NINE YEARS from 1889 to 1918 3,224 lynchings—an average of 111 each year—were officially recorded in the United States. In 1919 the number had shrunk to 83, in 1920 to 65, in 1922 to 52, and in 1923 there were only 28 instances of this particular form of primitive brutality. An unprejudiced judge would hardly call twenty-eight lynchings a record to be proud of, but it does mark a steady decline in the activities of our own American anarchists. If the South is undergoing a change of heart the reasons are perhaps not far to seek: the migration of the Negroes to other regions is one; the publicity which the Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill has received is indubitably another. Since 1919 the bill has twice been reported favorably in the House, and in 1922 it passed the House by a vote of 230 to 119. Its rejection by the Senate was chiefly due to a Southern filibuster. Senator Borah and others doubted its constitutionality, though the bulk of competent legal opinion seems to hold otherwise. There will be ample time and opportunity to determine this question after the bill has been passed; and meanwhile the advertising which the crime of lynching receives from the able campaign of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in behalf of the bill can only result in a more widespread disgust with the practice.

MORE MONEY IS NEEDED by the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee. The New England Civil Liberties Union has issued a pamphlet setting forth the outstanding features of the Sacco-Vanzetti case and explaining the demand on the part of the defense for a new trial. Witnesses in the first trial have sworn that they were coerced. William H. Proctor, firearms expert, testified with great effect that the "mortal bullet" had marks "consistent with being fired by that [Sacco's] pistol." He has since made affidavit that before the trial he repeatedly explained to the district attorney that he did not believe the "mortal bullet" had come from the Sacco pistol; that the form of his answer at the trial was made necessary by the form of the question put to him; and that the district attorney knew at that time that in his opinion that particular bullet had not been fired by Sacco's pistol. In confirmation of Captain Proctor's expert opinion the defense can now produce photographs of the pistols and bullets concerned, taken under a compound microscope, equipped with a micrometer registering one hundred-thousandth of an inch. The comparison of the photographs of the "mortal bullet" and of those of test bullets known to have been fired from Sacco's pistol shows by the difference in their markings that the so-called "mortal bullet" did not come from that pistol. It is on such evidence that the demand for a retrial is based, and it is for this new trial or, failing that, for an appeal to a higher court that money is needed. Contributions should be sent to the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, 256 Hanover Street, P. O. Box 93, Boston, Mass.

THE INNUMERABLE TRAGEDIES and comedies at Ellis Island seem at last to have made a very slight dent in the sensibilities of the House Committee on Immigration, now engaged in amending Representative Johnson's latest bill. The committee still holds that if immigration were not closely restricted the entire population of Europe, Asia, and Africa would descend upon these peaceful shores in a body and put all the honest, God-fearing Nordics out of their jobs, but at least it is disposed to better the plight of the unfortunate immigrant who comes to Ellis Island not knowing whether or not he may be shipped back on the same boat in which he came, merely because the quota is full. The proposed immigration bill provides that certificates shall be issued abroad by the American consuls to persons desirous of entering the United States, the possession of a certificate indicating that its holder will come within the quota for a given period. The trend of the bill is to prevent overcrowding and uncertainty at Ellis Island, and to lay the burden of counting applicants for entry on the other side of the Atlantic. The most obnoxious feature of the bill, providing for a quota of only 2 per cent based on the census of 1890, apparently will be scotched because of fear of the political effect of such a drastic change in a presidential year.

THE DAILY WORKER, born and published in Chicago, may live and prosper after many another labor paper is forgotten, for it has several sources of strength that many of its ill-fated contemporaries have lacked. It is the organ of a cohesive and highly disciplined organization whose members will support it as a matter of party loyalty. It is a propaganda sheet; its news and its editorials are frankly "colored"—and their color is red. It makes no effort to please various factions, no pretense at being a "general" newspaper. It is the voice of the members of the Workers Party, and its money and its readers will presumably be drawn from that group. Such are the sources of the Worker's strength; they are also the sources of its weakness. In so far as it refuses to cater to the non-Communist workers, it will also fail to win them. We so need a labor daily in these days of high journalistic mortality and low journalistic standards that we welcome the existence of the Worker and admire its straightforward vigor; but we hope that it will yield to the human demand for general and non-partisan news with propaganda relegated to the editorial pages.

WHEN THE FEDERAL Department of Labor investigates conditions in sweated industries we admire it unreservedly. Unfortunately, it also attempts the school-teaching business. Its newly published "Federal Citizenship Textbook," for use in the public schools, offers our children such advice as the following:

We must respect those above us. It pays.

Be loyal to your employer. Don't be fooled by wrong talk. . . . Speak well of your bosses to other workmen.

America has been made by hard-working people. All have helped together—some with their hands, some with their brains, some with their money. . . . All these people are needed. All are workers.

Especially if your boss is an oil operator you must speak well of him to your fellow-workers while he is toiling away at Paris or Palm Beach. The "Federal Citizenship Textbook" tells you he is helping to build America.

STATISTICS OF EUROPEAN BOOK PRODUCTION which tell again the story of the last ten years are contained in the December 15 issue of Le Droit d'Auteur. In 1922 (the figures for 1923 are not yet complete) Germany with 35,859 books led the world as she has long done in the publishing of books; Great Britain followed with 10,842; France brought out 9,432, the United States 8,638, and Italy 6,336. These totals are appalling; the world would be much better off with fewer books. But if book production is an indication of the cultural activity of a country there is matter for speculation in some of these figures. Of all the European countries only Germany and Great Britain have reached their pre-war book production—and they only in 1922. France, that in 1913 was publishing 11,460 books, is still 2,000 short, and Italy lacks 5,000 of the 11,100 she produced before the war. For England, Germany, and Italy the low production mark was in 1918. France, with little concern for anything except the catastrophe of that first war year, reached her low production mark in 1915, bettered the mark a little in 1916 and 1917, only to fall again in a depression shared by all in 1918.

FICTION CARRIES OFF THE HONORS in every country except Italy. In Italy the social sciences lead. In France and Germany books on sociology and economics have second place, but in Great Britain and the United States they fall to fourth place. Religion is almost as popular as fiction in the United States, while in Great Britain juvenile literature, which before the war occupied the seventh and lowest position on her classified list, is now second only to general fiction. The book situation in Germany, despite its apparent recovery, has from the German point of view an almost wholly tragic aspect. The greatest book-producing and book-reading country in the world now produces its books to be read by others. Handsome editions of German classics are being brought out, translations of every sort, and thousands of books on the fine arts, beautiful examples of printing and color work—for foreign consumption. The German who buys books today is that rare person who, finding himself possessed of more marks than he needs for his day's living and knowing that his marks will be worth nothing tomorrow, invests them in books as representing a more permanent value.

Three men who have risen from the ranks of the workers are assigned to the British Royal Household by the Labor Government. John Parkinson, who began work in the coal-pits at ten years of age, is Controller of the Royal Household; John Davidson, whose career started in a boot-shop, is the Vice-Chamberlain of the Household, and Thomas Griffiths, a former half-timer at fourpence a day in a tin-plate works, becomes Treasurer of the King's Household. Their duties will be largely nominal.—Press dispatch.

THOMAS GRIFFITHS

WHEN I was a young lad I worked on tin
And fourpence a day was all that I took in.
But now I am grown and a lord of the land
And I rule all the tin that the king can command.

JOHN DAVIDSON

When boots and shoes were my trade and my life
Then labor was my mother and weariness my wife,
But the Vice-Chamberlain of the Royal House
Has honor for his dam and ease for his spouse.

JOHN PARKINSON

I worked in the coal-pits along of my betters
When I ought to have been home a-learning of my letters,
But now, lord love me, what does learning mean?
Of a sudden I'm Controller of the King and the Queen.

The Call for Borah and La Follette

WASHINGTON is in such a turmoil as it has hardly known since its foundation. The nation, aroused by the foulness in its capital, looks on anxiously waiting rather helplessly for some constructive rallying cry, for some man or group of men who will lead it out of the dismal wilderness of a "business" administration. No answer comes. Senator Walsh steadily digs away at the mess of corruption, but apart from his sturdy pick-work there is no response to the country's need. Mr. Coolidge refuses to lead; he is struggling only to keep his own skirts clean, while the politicians of both parties scurry about hunting for one of their own kind who has not yet been smirched by the smell of oil. They plead piteously that men must earn a living, and lawyers must accept retainers from big business. Yet they know that the country is sick of big business and its acquisitive ethics, and yearns for men of another type. There is a groundswell such as in 1912 forced the politicians unwillingly to turn to a college president, and again they are looking about for a clean man unsoiled by Washington's unclean ways.

The dearth of men of real caliber in our political life today is pathetic. There are, however, two men in Washington, either one of whom could, if he would, put himself at the head of a movement to drive both the existing parties out of business and to give the public a new and a square deal. To Senator Borah and to Senator La Follette these scandals come as real tests of their statesmanship, their unselfishness, and their independence of petty party considerations. If Senator La Follette should announce his candidacy the standpat Republican managers would be appalled; they would be compelled to admit the loss of perhaps eight States. Senator La Follette, running on a third ticket, might not carry all eight, but his candidacy would put into the Democratic column those States which he did not win. His tremendous prestige in Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Montana, Washington, Iowa, and Nebraska gives him the whip hand. He cannot much longer put off the decision as to whether he will head the third party for which the hour calls.

Or—Mr. Borah. If he really is through with both the old parties and if he is ready to put his powerful mind and shining uprightness at the service of his fellow-citizens, for him, too, opportunity is ripe. His plea for Denby, however, is disappointing. If he delays longer, there will inevitably be suspicion that he is waiting in the hope, perhaps, that as the Republican convention nears and the danger of a standpat candidate becomes clearer, the party will turn to him as a progressive less radical than Senator La Follette.

Hanging back is emphatically not the need of the hour. That man will command the scene who comes forward now with a ringing declaration and specific pledges. Nor will it be enough to purge the parties and the cabinet-room in the White House; government by and for the big industrialists must be ended. Such a leader ought to give the country a definite and far-reaching program of reform. He should be ready to move for government ownership of the railroads and nationalization of the mines and oil reserves; he should urge a constitutional convention to give our organic law a thoroughgoing revision. Congressional government is breaking down; as the House is now organized talent is practically barred from it. Senator Couzens has moved in the right direction in presenting a bill to give cabinet members seats in one of the houses where they could be cross-questioned daily as to the conduct of their business and the policies they sponsor. Had Secretary Fall been compelled to come to such a question-hour it is probable that he would not have dared to give away the naval oil reserves. A man as stupid and as lacking in ability as Secretary Denby would certainly not hold office long if he had to defend his official course against congressional attacks made in his presence. Those who know the House of Commons realize that there is no more important feature of the British method of carrying on governmental business than this give-and-take by direct personal contact between the executive and the legislative branches of the government.

Nationalization of the railroads and federal control of our natural resources are necessary if we are ever to take out of the hands of the big interests that supreme power against which Roosevelt orated and Wilson pleaded so eloquently. The fact that we are no further along than we were ten or fifteen years ago in winning the government back to the people is proof that more drastic remedies than have heretofore been attempted are essential. Somehow or other we must find a way to get a new type of man to the front. When one sees how easy it was for Ramsay MacDonald to put together a Cabinet of remarkable talent, men of the administrative and scholarly ability of Sidney Webb, Ponsonby, Trevelyan, Olivier, Snowden, Buxton, and Haldane, it is distressingly plain that the present American system provides scant opportunity for men of similar talent and ability to enter political life. There are men in America who measure up to the standards of the MacDonald Cabinet, but they are not getting political training.

Certainly more is needed than to turn out one set of rascals, to rehabilitate one party or the other, to put into conspicuous office a few clean and honorable men like Senator La Follette or Senator Borah. A party organized about an individual cannot endure—that was the lesson of the Progressive crusade; but an individual may galvanize into national unity a movement which already exists. Progressivism in the Northwest is no mushroom growth; it has its roots in the generous enthusiasm that was wasted on Populism and Free Silver; it has tested itself through Republican insurgentism, through the eras of the Progressive Party and of the Nonpartisan League, and has been finding itself under the leadership of Robert La Follette. But it lacks, at present, the broad perspective and the body of competent officers which a national movement needs.

All this reinforces the opportunity and the duty before Senator La Follette or Senator Borah—there is no reason why there should not be competition for the honor of leading in this hour. If neither leads, then both will be condemned as having been tried and found wanting in a most critical hour. The faith of the American people in its institutions cannot be much longer preserved if the sordid and selfish interests in our business life continue to control, if in the face of scandals crying for redress no leader comes forward to say that these things shall cease and that the conditions which make them possible shall be ended.

A General Turns Pacifist

GENERAL PERCIN was one of the French artillery officers most concerned in perfecting the famous 75-millimeter field gun. When the war broke out in 1914 he was in command of the Lille area, but after a few weeks he was removed from his post and then placed on the retired list, on the alleged ground that his mistakes had been responsible for the loss of Lille. It was generally believed, however, that his dismissal was due to his political opinions rather than to any incompetence. The general defended himself vigorously in a book entitled "Lille, 1914." Recently he created something of a sensation by announcing his conversion to pacifism. His "confession of faith," which appeared in L'Ordre Naturel, a French pacifist review, is so extraordinary a document that we print it here in full:

I was brought up as an ardent militarist, not to say jingo, and in 1865 entered the army as a professional soldier. I was twice wounded in the war of 1870, and for the next forty years detested the Germans and ardently prepared for a war of revenge. Now, at the age of 77, I have become an uncompromising pacifist, a keen internationalist, and a strong partisan of a Franco-German rapprochement.

The war of 1914-1918 showed me the fallacy of believing that war is an unavoidable evil, the only method of settling international disputes. I now see that war no longer pays; it does not even secure peace, but only breeds immorality and opens the door to political reaction. Victory is no longer the reward of bravery, of ardor in a just cause; it is but the result partly of superiority in mechanical resources, partly of purely fortuitous circumstances, so that the wrong side is as likely to win as the right. War is not only a ruinous, barbarous, and inhuman way of settling international disputes, but an extremely stupid way as well, and must be replaced by something rational and effective. That method is the arbitration of the League of Nations—but of a real league, from which no one is excluded, not even Germany.

The fundamental error of the Treaty of Versailles was to negotiate without Germany, to extort from her a confession of guilt, and to make her solely responsible for war damages. There can be no solution to the problem of reparations as long as the responsibility of each belligerent in the World War has not been defined by a tribunal in which France will not be simultaneously judge and plaintiff. That tribunal must be the League of Nations.

Before the League can be, however, a true international body, it must be controlled by men with a true international outlook, not by delegates primarily charged with the defense of their own country's interests. What then are the practical steps to be taken toward this end?

First, the creation of an international mind by the suppression of barriers such as customs and passports.

Secondly, the destruction of the war-time mind by educating peoples to the fallacy of old traditions concerning the alleged glory of war and the supremacy of so-called national interests; by inculcating into children the idea that there is nothing more "noble" about the profession of arms than about that of a scavenger; by remolding our teaching of history; by no longer giving soldiers or weapons as toys; by refusing to perpetuate in street names either battles or soldiers, replacing such names by those of real benefactors of humanity—in a word, by making pacifism as fashionable as "bellicisme" has been hitherto.

Thirdly, the suppression of the chief cause of war, by the internationalization of the wealth of the sub-soil, such as the coal of the Ruhr, the iron ore of Lorraine, the oil of Mosul.

It is to that triple reform that the League of Nations should now direct its energies.

Mr. Albee, Meet Mr. Jefferson

EDWARD F. ALBEE, national chairman of the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, announces in the Washington Post a campaign to make of Jefferson's home, Monticello, "an active agency of relentless war against the dangerous radicalisms of our time, when the teachings of Jefferson are needed as never before in the history of our country." Mr. Albee should begin by buying a set of the works of Thomas Jefferson, and discovering what his teachings were. He might be frightened into resignation.

"God forbid that we should ever be twenty years without such a rebellion," Thomas Jefferson wrote when he heard that the farmers of western Massachusetts had taken their guns in hand and marched forth to protest taxes they did not like. "What country can preserve its liberties if its rulers are not warned from time to time that this people preserve the spirit of resistance? Let them take arms. The remedy is to set them right as to facts, pardon, and pacify them. What signify a few lives lost in a century or two? The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants. It is a natural manure."

No, the fathers of this country were not the thin-spirited souls who make up the Sons of the Revolution, the memorial funds, and the patriotic societies today. They liked nothing better than a rebellious spirit. Thomas Jefferson did not forget that he had been a revolutionary himself. "If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union or to change its republican form," he said in his First Inaugural Address, "let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." Nor did tenure of office spoil his spirit: after two terms in the Presidency he could still write of "the tardy will of governments, who are always, in their stock of information, a century or two behind the intelligent part of mankind." A man of that spirit could be used in the State Department today. And it might be well to discover a candidate for the Presidency who would write, as Jefferson did in 1799: "I am not for a standing army in time of peace, which may overawe the public sentiment; nor for a navy which, by its own expenses and the eternal wars in which it will implicate us, will grind us with public burthens and sink us under them."

No, Jefferson would not get on today. We might even arrest him as an anarchist. "I hold it that a little rebellion now and then is a good thing," he said; and when the Alien and Sedition Acts were passed, he "discharged every person under punishment or prosecution under the sedition law, because I considered, and now consider, that law to be a nullity, as absolute and as palpable as if Congress had ordered us to fall down and worship a golden image, and that it was my duty to arrest its execution at every stage." Debs could not be more defiant. Men were jailed in the late war for less than Jefferson's remark: "As for France and England . . . the one is a den of robbers and the other of pirates."

Make Jefferson's home "an active agency of relentless war" against "radicalism"? As soon dedicate the Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania, birthplace of A. Mitchell Palmer as a Temple of Tolerance or make Mr. Fall's ranch at Three Rivers, New Mexico, a Shrine of Self-Sacrifice.

Is Labor a Lost Hope?

THE last convention of the United Mine Workers was one of the stormiest in its stormy history. Of late years many union conventions have had melodramatic clashes between the platform and the floor. In no other union, however, is the rank and file so openly and yet so helplessly rebellious against a domineering leadership. When well-nigh the entire convention raised bedlam for over an hour against what seemed a too bold steal of their votes, President John L. Lewis contemptuously thundered above the din that they "could shout until they met in hell." Mr. Lewis's policy of appointing instead of electing organizers and field workers lost on a viva voce and then on a rising vote, but miraculously won on a roll call. The officers of the "red" Nova Scotia district were not reinstated; neither were Alexander Howat and the tried leaders of the Kansas miners. Today Mr. Lewis controls four "provisional" districts in which every official is his appointee. An old-time delegate expressed the feelings of very many of his fellows when he dubiously shook his head upon leaving the convention and said: "I don't care how strong the administration seems. If they must resort to such tactics . . . then our union will soon begin to disintegrate."

The publicity given to this fight within the United Mine Workers forces a reconsideration of the significance of the labor movement in American life. The time has come when its friends must speak frankly. Throughout the world in the last decades the young and forward-looking have been turning eagerly to labor as the most hopeful avenue of escape from a civilization brutalized by machinery and dominated by the lust for profit and power. Yet labor, particularly in America, is increasingly accepting the ethical standards and practices of our acquisitive society.

There is in the American labor movement today sadly little social enthusiasm or constructive energy for the struggle against war and waste. The Plumb Plan is in a sleep that looks like death, leaving behind no better claimant to the loyalty of the railway unions. The miners' resolution in favor of the nationalization of coal has been put on a high shelf by President Lewis. The decline in the membership of the American Federation of Labor continues, yet no dramatic or effective drive is made to organize the millions of America's unorganized workers. The militant membership of the unions is absorbed in factional fights carried on with a contemptuous disregard for standards of fair play. The energy of many labor leaders is exhausted in hanging on to their jobs—a task in which they are aided in many of the international unions by as clever devices for political manipulation and as flagrant a system of pocket boroughs as ever an old English aristocracy or a modern political boss could imagine. The natural result is a widely diffused cynicism among the rank and file, coming to the surface in such outlaw strikes as broke out among the shoe workers of Brockton, Massachusetts, and the pressmen of New York City, directed as much against their own officers as against the employers.

We are not here attempting a balanced presentation of the present state of organized labor; our readers know our belief that the labor movement of today, despite its faults, is the chief present agency of social progress. Too many great movements have faltered as they approached their goal, and the American labor movement seems to us to show dangerous symptoms of decay. Some observers point cheerfully to the rapid development of labor banks in this country. But if there is behind the labor banks today a reasoned theory and plan of social amelioration to be wrought by labor through the control of its own financial resources and credit the leaders hesitate to admit it. Nor is there much reflection upon the possible effects of adding the psychology of the bank director to the psychology of the trade-union official. Neither the lust for power nor the thirst for profit is likely to be seriously endangered by the advent of trade-union capitalism.

In fact, the establishment of four labor banks in rapid succession in New York City emphasizes the disunion and factionalism of the labor movement. There may be room for more than four labor banks in New York City; more than four might have developed in time as the pioneers achieved success. But four were established within a few months without consultation, and they were sure to come into sharp rivalry. Mutual recrimination has already begun. The line of division is in the first instance between the two banks owned by members of the American Federation of Labor and the two outside the Federation. An effective labor movement would care more for labor as a whole than for accidental organization lines. Instead, one bank is bitterly denouncing the others. Plainly labor banking has brought with it no balm to heal the internal sores which give the employing class so great an advantage in the labor struggle.

But it is not the fact that there are divisions between unions or sharp factional struggles within unions which is most disquieting. It is the spirit in which these combats are carried on. It is a spirit devoid of fairness. "Only liberals and fools talk about fairness in a fight like this" was the recent expression of one of the factional warriors. We have neither the space nor the heart to illustrate the matter at length. The perfect example was that extraordinary attack on "Reds" issued by Ellis Searles with the approval of the officers of the United Mine Workers. The principal "investigator" for Mr. Searles, there is reason to believe, had been an agent for the most virulent anti-union employers. The report was more mendacious, absurd, libelous than the best efforts of W. J. Burns. Few capitalist newspapers would have published it save for the authority of a powerful union. And that is but one illustration of many which warrant the statement that the political struggle within certain unions is today carried on more ruthlessly than on the political battlefield of the nation.

For all this there is no mechanical remedy, certainly no remedy that can be applied from without. The situation requires a new ethical sense and a new social vision within the unions themselves. Will labor education perhaps lift enough of the workers above the noise and dust of the strife of trade unions for advantage and of factions for power, and enable them to see what must be done for the sake of that future of which labor should be the chief builder? Will a better leadership arise from the ranks of the workers, a leadership which will make it possible for labor to play its part in the coming national crisis? We do not know, but we hope. And while the present outlook is dark, the record of labor's long struggle justifies hope.

How Poincaré Prepared for War

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

"Your French colleague (M. Poincaré) is annoyed by the campaign of the Radical Socialists which consists in saying: 'We will not permit a war to grow out of Eastern affairs, particularly out of the relations between Serbia and Austria.' To paralyze this campaign in the press some money is needed . . ."

THUS M. Arthur Raffalovich, the Czar's secret agent in Paris, reported to the Russian Prime Minister in December, 1912. The Second Balkan War was drawing to its close as a triumph for the Balkan Allies, and Austria and Serbia were at swords' points over the questions raised by it. Europe was on the verge of a war. A few papers in Paris were warning France of the imminent catastrophe. M. Poincaré, Prime Minister of France and Minister of Foreign Affairs, was "annoyed" (the French word is ennuyé), and he turned to his Russian ally for money with which to silence them. He got it; but despite his success in buying off the pacifist press* the war was averted—postponed for two years.

This particular Russian press campaign in Paris is particularly significant because it sheds an unholy light on M. Poincaré's state of mind in the days when the World War was brewing. These bribes bore no relation to the Russian loans placed in Paris; they related to the attitude of the Paris press toward the question of peace or war in Europe. As will be seen, the money was used to stifle peace sentiment in Paris and to help force the provocative three-year military-service law on France.

It was in October, 1912, in the midst of the Balkan war, that the Russian ambassador in Paris, Izvolski, came to feel the need of a subsidized press campaign. The possibility of Austrian, then of Russian intervention, followed by just such a European conflagration as burst out in 1914, loomed large. M. Izvolski wrote to his chief in Russia, suggesting the allocation of a sum of 300,000 francs, to be distributed to Paris newspapers through M. Lenoir, who had managed the largesse of 1904-1905. Izvolski had, of course, consulted Poincaré. (As he put it, "the French statesmen are very familiar with affairs of this kind.") M. Poincaré approved the subsidies and offered to suggest the "most opportune" method of distributing them. The men at the helm in St. Petersburg, however, were loath to spend so much money on the Paris newspapers; the experience of 1904-1905 had convinced them that Paris editors had insatiable financial appetites and did not "stay bought."

M. Poincaré and M. Klotz, his Minister of Finance, however, were not to be stopped. They were engaged in the campaign to force a three-year military-service law in France, where a peace party was objecting that France should not let Russia drag her into a war. They needed help. They pressed the matter in October, and again in December. On December 2, 1912, Raffalovich wrote to the Russian premier: "M. Lenoir called to ask if anything had been turned over for the press affair, for which you and I have an equal repugnance." "But," Raffalovich added, "our feeling should yield to the indications of M. Poincaré and M. Klotz." St. Petersburg still hesitated. Ten days later he reported that M. Izvolski "considers the situation grave, and foresees occupation of the Serbian capital by the Austrians"—in other words, a European war. Under these conditions, he added, "the ambassador believes that we should not haggle about the 100,000 francs that M. Klotz wants for the period to the end of January. . . ." This fragment is also significant:

I complimented M. Izvolski on the new attitude of the Temps; in its last-minute news I had read dispatches dated from St. Petersburg, which he had dictated [in Paris]. He told me that he exercised a certain influence upon four daily newspapers, including the Eclair. As he had spoken of giving money to certain individuals I asked their names so as to have Lenoir pay them. He replied that it was impossible to name them, that he had to pay them in cash, hand to hand. . . . It amounted to about 30,000 francs.

St. Petersburg agreed to advance the 100,000 francs.

One hundred thousand francs, however, did not satisfy the French Minister of Finance. He wanted the full 300,000 suggested in October. The Russians had virtually promised that in the course of time they would turn over the larger sum. Poincaré was elected President in January, 1913. First Briand and then Barthou succeeded him as Prime Minister, but Klotz remained in charge of the Treasury, and the policy of the succeeding cabinets hardly changed. The Chamber was in constant turmoil as the governments pressed the three-year military-service bill. Klotz insistently demanded the money of Raffalovich.

Klotz was frank enough. "He insists upon the necessity of spending a large sum on the press because of the possibility of a campaign against the new military law, and also in connection with the general difficult situation of the French Cabinet," the Russian Minister of Finance wrote, in asking Sazonov's advice on June 4, 1913. Apparently Klotz and Poincaré felt it unsafe to use the regular French government propaganda funds on their own press, and turned to the Czar to help them force on France a law which the French people did not want. Raffalovich and Izvolski argued that Russian interests also should be safeguarded, but M. Klotz felt that a good ally should ask no questions. Sazonov finally decided that Klotz should get another 100,000 francs, but "on condition that the subventioned press supports our interests primarily, for instance in Balkan questions, and also supports the policy of the French Cabinet and realization of the French law for three-year military service." Raffalovich had a hard time explaining this to M. Klotz, who, on receiving news of the conditions, was very angry and said that he would complain to M. Poincaré! Apparently, however, the Russian insistence bore small fruit, for the entire 100,000 francs was spent in bribing Radical Socialist papers which were opposing the Poincaré-Klotz-Barthou military law. Raffalovich forwarded the checks in November, 1913—42,000 francs to the Lanterne, 17,000 to the Aurore, 11,000 to the Événement, 9,000 to the

* Mr. Gannett's article, The Secret Corruption of the French Press, which appeared in The Nation for February 6, summarized revelations, from the Soviet archives, of the systematic bribery of the Paris and London press by Czarist gold, from 1914 to the eve of the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917. A few American papers in referring to these revelations have spoken of "alleged" documents, but in Paris, where the documents have been published in the Humanité and the Quotidien, their authenticity is accepted. M. Poincaré evaded discussion of them in the Chamber, and the Temps, the mouthpiece of the Foreign Office, accused of accepting 150,000 francs a year from a foreign government, has not breathed a word of denial.

Action, 11,000 to the France, 7,000 to the Rappel, 2,000 to the Gil Blas, and 1,000 to the Paris-Journal. The fateful three-year military-service law had been passed on August 7—just one year before the war.

This may seem a detailed bit of ancient history. It is important because it reveals the manner in which the French people were inveigled into bellicose measures by Poincaré and other militarist leaders. Poincaré actually induced a foreign government to give him money with which to bribe his own press—to that was democracy in France reduced.

The existence of the Franco-Russian Alliance (which Russian newspaper bribes had helped to buy) kept Russian eyes on the French but the documents also reveal smaller payments to the Kölnische Zeitung, the Berliner Börsen Zeitung, and other German papers—listed apparently as “advertising.” The Amsterdam Telegraaf and the London Times were liberally paid in war time for publishing Russian supplements similar to those of the Paris Temps—the Telegraaf 60,000 florins a year and the Times £14,400—though no such abject contracts as Charles Rivet made for the Temps have yet been revealed. Indeed an American, “Mr. J. D. Welpley,” appears on the list as receiving $2,500 a year from 1913 to 1917 “for inserting articles in the American press.” Has anything changed since 1917?

A Parable of Paradise

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

There'll be a glassy paradise
Where all will have their crowns of ice,
And all will wear their robes of snow;
And the trees will bow and the winds will blow—
And men will falter to and fro.

Men will prowl like timid beasts
Hungry after a hundred feasts
And break the bracken down in the woods,
Crash and fret and gaze and spy—
And look for nothing, low and high.

Then they will shiver, and go to sleep . . .

To sleep, to sleep, and toss and sigh—
Sprawled they will mutter where they lie,
And sit up rigid, and wonder why.

They seem to stretch and never wake:
There is a glaze they cannot break
To the world outside or the inner eye;
Oh, how they retch and cannot ache,
Oh, how they try and cannot weep—
And there's nothing to do but shiver and sleep.

This weight of nothingness is more
Than any planet stood before.
Shades and empty clouds will gather
Tons of fret in weight of weather,
Till under the burden of this lack Obeisant earth will warp and crack,
Open a wound to bleed them terror.

Lava, lava. Slow and thick
Earth oozes, shudders, and is sick.

How they will gape at the molten stone,
Take earth's illness for their own,
And groan . . .

There they will stand, stormed by pain,
The obscene flood, the lewd stain.

Across the glassy zones of ice
Comes the long writhe and the slow hiss,
Sluggish red, the fire's kiss—
Snaky mark in paradise.

And who is this delivers them?
The serpent, yea, the very same
Who was their doom and shame.

Cast down your haughty diadem,
Your paradisaal diadem,
Into the lava flame.

Now all the pent-up rivers run
In head-long silence under sun;
And miracle, oh, miracle,
The silver fluid in their veins
Is moving in a miracle:

In them their own volcanoes seethe,
And their bright bodies breathe . . .

And fixedly as in a spell
They watch the serpent writhe, and wreath
Over the earth, and on to smite
The glassy sea—and the marble, white
Stone sea uplifts a mist of light.

Oh, what marvels they behold:
The mountains settling, fold on fold,
Cliffs that melt, and rivers gold,
And mists like angels rising slowly,
Singing holy, holy, holy.

They are not souls, but flesh at last,
And the rent earth, under the ice,
Dearer than any paradise—
Into the sea their crowns they cast,
Into the air go up their cries,
With joy they rend their snowy guise,
And now they wait, transfixed with awe,
By the white sea—by the red flaw. . . .

For the poem printed above Miss Taggard has been awarded second prize in The Nation's Poetry Contest. The winning poem, "Jezebel," by Scudder Middleton, was published in last week's issue; and the poem receiving honorable mention, "Advice to a Clam Digger," by Wilbert Snow, will appear next week.

Refined Products of Oil

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

HOW old is Ralston? That is the question that began incessantly to circulate among Democrats as soon as McAdoo was accused by Doheny of having been his lawyer. Friends of Underwood, friends of Smith, friends of Cox, friends of Davis all claimed, it is true, that McAdoo's alleged political demise would benefit their favorites in the Democratic nomination race. It soon appeared, however, that the McAdoo following, if it left McAdoo, would find it difficult to go to Smith, because of Smith's being wet; would find it difficult to go to Cox, because of old enmities; and would find it difficult to go to Underwood or to Davis, because of their being regarded as conservatives.

Therefore little by little, in every group of Democratic political confabulators, the talk would return to the question: How old is Ralston?

There is of course no doubt whatsoever that from the standpoint of national political experience and of long acquaintance with the problems of the national government the most qualified Democratic running candidate for the nomination for the Presidency is Underwood. He served ten terms in the House of Representatives. He was the immediate author of a distinguished tariff law. He is serving his second term in the Senate. He was one of the four American delegates at the Washington Arms Conference. He is a man of a personal disposition gentle and kindly and considerate of others. He is a man of a public record notable for careful attentiveness to his duty as he sees it and for the personal regard which he has gathered to himself from his colleagues.

Thus the Democratic Party finds itself in the position of wanting to look progressive this year and of discovering nevertheless that its most qualified potential candidate is a conservative and a Southerner.

It also has the pain to discover that its new political star, Senator Walsh of Montana, is a Catholic. It fears that if it should nominate Cox there will be voters who will remember that this is the man who ran in 1920. It regrets the Catholicism and the bottomless wetness of Smith. It deplores the legal services rendered by Davis to dark New York interests known on the prairies as "the Morgans" and the "Sugar Trust."

The progressive part of the Democratic Party, surveying this scene, had fixed its affections centrally on McAdoo, who, next to Underwood, is undoubtedly better acquainted with the national government and with its problems than any other Democratic presidential contestant.

McAdoo, it is true, has never been elected to any office. His total public life seems to have consisted of being at one time a deputy clerk in a federal court in Tennessee and then of being Secretary of the Treasury and Director General of Railroads during the war. He nevertheless did gain during the war a quite deep knowledge of many major national economic and political situations, and it is impossible to converse with him without realizing that ever since his retirement from office he has given his mind most actively and intently to studies of this country's principal economic and political issues, both national and international. Without Underwood's length of experience and depth of accumulated political second nature, McAdoo, like Underwood, is a national public man.

Davis's contacts with national legislation and administration have consisted of two terms in the House of Representatives, of five years of service as Solicitor General in the Department of Justice, and then of a sojourn in London as American ambassador. Manifestly this round of experience leaves Davis inferior to both Underwood and McAdoo as a tried national public man.

Cox was a member of the federal House of Representatives for two terms during the Presidency of William Howard Taft and since that time has had nothing to do with Washington except to run for the Presidency.

Smith never at any time has had anything to do with the federal government. Nor has Ralston, except during the period which has elapsed since December 3 last and which has seen him in Washington as United States Senator from Indiana. Ralston was never in the lower house. He was never a member of the Cabinet. He was never a subordinate official in any federal department. By the time the Democratic convention meets he will have had an experience of about seven months as Senator. This is perhaps the only country in the world in which men can get chosen to head the national government without any previous important national experience and achievement.

Ralston indeed, according to all available testimony, was an excellent Governor of Indiana. He also has had a continuous interest in politics since his early manhood. He has been a convinced consistent low-tariff old-fashioned Jeffersonian party Democrat year after year in Indiana. He is a man for whose personal character the whole State of Indiana seems to have a profound esteem and for whose work as Governor his fellow-Indianans have both esteem and gratitude. He runs for office always reluctantly. He refused to try to succeed himself as Governor. He was induced to run for United States Senator only after the most vigorous pressure upon him by local Democratic leaders who finally told him that he would be an ingrate to the party if he refused to run. Moved by that taunt, he did run and managed to beat the distinguished Republican Albert J. Beveridge.

Progressives cannot convict Ralston of being a reactionary, nor conservatives of being a radical. If McAdoo by the magic which often lies in a display of courage succeeds in breaking through the insinuations leveled against him because of his employment as a lawyer by Doheny, the question now to the front about Ralston may begin to die away.

The answer to it is that Ralston is sixty-six years old. The Democratic donkey, finding some reason for shying away from each of its prospective riders, pokes its ears suspiciously forward toward that alarming figure sixty-six. It begins to be thought, however, that if Ralston will rest on his record and will abstain from all the exhaustions of politics and will hire a couple of doctors and a physical trainer and spend all his time on a golf links and go to the convention ruddy and abounding in obvious health, he may very well by that course of conduct find himself running with great speed toward the White House.

The Jew Meditates

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

IN 1918 a very distinguished gentleman of German name and birth came to a Jewish friend of his and said: "I now know what it is like to be a Jew. Wherever I go there is a moral atmosphere that forces upon me a moral decision. I must connive at the concealment of my origin or proclaim it; I must risk the imputation of cowardice or effrontery. People are cold to me and I wince; they are kind to me and I also wince. In their coldness is disdain, in their kindness an unescapable tinge of pity or patronage. The psychological fabric of my social behavior is in shreds. I know exactly now why you and your people are accused of bad manners. How can one's manners be 'good' when all agreements and social certainties are lacking? Whatever one does will be considered an excess. And indeed it is always an excess, a sinking below or reaching above a norm. But the reason is that the norm is shifting, is unstable. I never know where I am. So my behavior is apt to be blind. Can you blame me if, for comfort, for self-respect, for inner peace, I am more and more inclined to associate only with my cultural and racial kinsmen? They may bore me sometimes and surfeit me. But I cannot always be living on a knife's edge. So I am beginning to understand the voluntary and yet involuntary segregation of Jewry——"

"The Ghetto habit," the Jew put in. "Yes, we even build our houses in the same neighborhood. We are always, you see, in difficulties. If there is a new Gentile neighbor we don't know whether to call or not. If we do we risk an affront; yet if we do not we risk being discourteous to, perhaps, charming and liberal people. The wonder is that under such pressure we have not hardened into indifference. Our sons and daughters at school and college are tossed from horn to horn of the same dilemma. And the worst of it is that we are all super-sensitive because we are neurasthenic. We might as well be frank with others and with ourselves about that. Whether it is the millennial burden of cultural life or the millennial burden of persecution doesn't matter. We are a people with abnormally and morbidly acute nerves and appetites and sensibilities. Our physical stamina seems boundless; our nervous systems are smashed. There is scarcely a Jewish family in which there isn't either madness or genius. Commonly both."

The German nodded. "I think I grasp the situation perfectly. My remote descendants in America will be like you if the present situation lasts. But"—he straightened himself—"it won't."

"No," the Jew agreed. "The historical accident or fatality that has placed you in your present situation is temporary in its effects; the fatality that has placed me in mine is eternal."

With that they parted. But in the five years that have elapsed the Jew has observed his German friend. Something of ease and comfort and simplicity of conduct has never wholly come back to this man. The marks of persecution are hidden, but they are deep.

In the present year an American friend came to the Jew and said: "This wave of anti-Semitism is un-American; it is damnable. What are we going to do about it?"

The American was enormously sincere and well-meaning.

His mind was efficient and his fists doubled for a righteous fray. The Jew smiled a crooked smile.

"You can't really do anything about it."

The American braced himself cheerily. "Nonsense! That's rank pessimism."

The Jew said: "Listen to me a little. Remember that Jew-baiting has nothing to do with Jewish characteristics or rather, I should say, with the quality of Jewish characteristics. We are hated for our wealth and for our poverty, for our plutocrats and for our Reds, for display and for stealth, for hard-headedness and warm-heartedness, for arrogance and servility, for pushingness and reserve, for speech and silence, for political participation and non-participation. If we desire assimilation you drive us out of your universities by chicanery and insult; if we do not strive after assimilation you say we ought to go where we came from. If we make shoddy moving pictures you blame us; but if we create and support more than half of the art life of the country, in the theater, in literature, in music, you blame us no less. You flunk sincerely to our great financiers, and perhaps the only thing that might conceivably reconcile you to us is a preponderance of mere power. We haven't it; we can never have it; we don't want it. Our highest expressions of material power are always second rate. The greatest bankers, the biggest merchants, the most powerful oligarchs are not Jews. The greatest fiddlers are Jews; some of the greatest living poets and scientists are Jews. Does that reconcile you? It isn't, you see, so easy."

The American was crestfallen. His kindly energy had gone out of him. He was desperately uncomfortable in the face of a situation where something ought to be done—something righteous and American and immediate—and where something gray and futile and eternal seemed, wraith-like yet impenetrable, to block all paths.

He fidgeted. Then he blurted out. "Then why don't you assimilate in the literal sense; why don't you intermarry?"

The Jew shrugged his shoulders. . . . There was a time when he had shrugged his shoulders innocently and naturally. Then had come years in which he didn't shrug his shoulders at all. He had wanted to be an American gentleman. Now it was a point of honor with him to shrug his shoulders whenever the impulse came to him—to shrug them neither defiantly nor surreptitiously, but just simply. By an elaborate psychological process he usually succeeded now in a perfect imitation of himself. . . . He said: "Just as there is a will to persist, that is, to affirm its identity, in the individual organism, so there is in those larger and looser organisms known as racial and cultural groups. This will isn't conscious by nature. But it is very strong. Among us, moreover, it has been forced into consciousness and has become implicated with our human honor. You are what you are by blood, descent, inheritance. If the world misprizes what you are, it misprizes the father that begot and the mother who bore you. To merge yourself with those who persecute you and deny your worth is to repudiate yourself and your ancestors even to the remotest. It is to give in, to fling away your people and yourself, to admit all accusations, shoulder all guilt, and invite for it the penalty of extinction. It cannot be done. The children of mixed marriages usually marry Jews again and return to Jewry, and the more high-minded and sensitive and unworldly they are the surer is this process of reassimilation. It is not that we do not love Gentiles or are not loved by them in return. On the contrary. Love alone seems to transcend these ancient divisions. But deep-rooted pieties and points of honor intervene to give us pause. Not until the last vestige of anti-Semitism has been eradicated from the world will literal assimilation be possible. And then, perhaps, it will not be desired."

"Then," said the American, "have you no solution to offer?"

"Solution?" asked the Jew. "To your mind there is a Wrong here for which you want to substitute a Right. I do very truly appreciate that impulse in you. But it's an impulse out of touch with realities. The world is far too intricate for what you call a 'solution' of a given difficulty, certainly of any difficulty as ancient and persistent and troublesome as this. I do not deny that things are better. In most countries, just as heretics are no longer burned, neither are we. As Europe recovers from the war actual pogroms will, no doubt, cease again. And in each generation decent and liberal people like yourself have contributed to this end and have, in so far, deserved the gratitude not only of Israel but of mankind. The deep, fundamental difficulty remains. Only manners and modes of operation change. The Jews will remain a minority, an ever more highly intellectualized minority, therefore always outcasts and martyrs and, by virtue of their high sensitiveness and high power of expressiveness through the arts, protesting outcasts and articulate martyrs."

"Then what, then what are you driving at?"

"People like yourself will help us," the Jew said. "And you are bound to help us for the sake of your own inner integrity. But our salvation must come from within. It must come from our acceptance—not of flagrant injustice or the harsher forms of exclusion—but of our essential fate."

"A great Jew has said that we are still, all of us, obscurely conscious of election. It is true. Well, election to what? To restoring Palestine or rebuilding the Temple of Solomon? Without wholly sharing the Zionist ideology, I am anxious and eager to see the Palestinian colonies flourish. And I am much more in sympathy with the mystical Zionists than with the bourgeoisie which repudiates Zionism in favor of hundred-per-cent Americanism or Britishism or Germanism. God protect us from the gentlemen who, because they have money and comfort, sign the blank checks of any state that has them in its power. The superstition of absolute sovereignties and allegiances, as Albrecht Mendelssohn-Bartholdy has so magnificently proved, must be eradicated if the world, including Jewry, is to be saved at all. The Jews were great patriots in the World War. No field but was soaked with their blood. I do not ask: What has it availed them? I ask: What has it availed mankind? But suppose that, like Albert Einstein, they had followed their own greatest—had followed Jesus and Spinoza, had written upon banners of love and protest their immemorial motto 'Israel's Mission is Peace'? They would have been martyred, you say? They are martyred now. But now their martyrdom is without a meaning. That is the tragedy—that, only that!

"They must give meaning to their martyrdom. As individuals they do. No battle is fought for human freedom but Jews are there; no prison where men are held for the sake of conscience but Jews are there. Look into the garrets where artists starve for the integrity of their art. Jews are there. And not only are they there, but they are there in such numbers, in proportion to their whole number, as to show the instinctive striving to be worthy of that obscure feeling of election that is in them. And likewise if you seek here or in other countries, but especially in America, for those who support the causes of art and tolerance and peace you will find so many Jews that, without them, those causes would often be in great danger. I do not say that, as some Jews do, in pride. I say it with humility and almost with shame. For the deep instincts that teach them to be what they are and do what they do seem never to rise into their minds. With their minds they are always seeking to escape their fate—in patriotism and in all those things of which the world is weary, in all those things which are at the root of the deadly sickness of the world. They are martyred and they do not know to what.

"They must embrace their fate. Their history and their character teaches them what that fate and that mission and that salvation is. A friend tells me of a young Jew at West Point who, suffering from the alleged physical timidity of his folk, made himself the best boxer of his class. That poor lad illustrates all the shame and futility of the doctrine of escape. He had no business at West Point; he had no business with war nor with gentility. There is too much boxing and ambition for boxing in the world. There is too much gentility. His place was with conscientious objectors; his place was in prisons with outcasts, in hospitals with the sick and wounded. If he wanted to show that his body was not afraid, his place was on platforms and street corners facing infuriated mobs in the cause of peace and international good-will and freedom. He abandoned the mission of Israel. And yet I dare swear that he found promotion in a Christian army all but impossible and social equality grudgingly granted. He helped neither himself nor his Gentile fellow-men. He was a martyr and his martyrdom had no meaning. He saved neither himself nor others."

"Yes, I have left out religion. I have been told that before. I cannot help it. Neither Jew nor Gentile can be saved by rituals or metaphysical assumptions. It has been tried. It has failed. By all means let there be temples and rabbis. When your Christian neighbor preaches war, do you, rabbi, preach peace; when he preaches nationalism, preach internationalism. When he preaches the suppression of art and vital impulse, do you preach reason and tolerance and liberation. If your temples are stoned, let them not be stoned for some ridiculous superstition, such as that the Jews killed Christ or conspired for power. Let them be stoned because your temples are the dwelling-places of peace and of reason where every new truth is first received and proclaimed, where there is first uttered the heresy which is the faith of tomorrow and the blasphemy that is the truth of tomorrow. Then, perhaps, a day will come when of those stones will be built a temple wherein the nations will gather to acknowledge Israel's gift and mission of peace."

[This is the tenth in a series of articles on The Jew in America which have been appearing in The Nation for the past twelve months.]

Within the Law of Tooth and Claw

By WEBB WALDRON

(This story is true. A few names of persons and places have been changed, but every detail is supported by the sworn statements of the Von Intens and of their business manager, James C. Sherman.)

THE scene is the Upper Peninsula of Michigan. It is a region which, to the eye, preserves many of the characteristics of the frontier. For hours you ride through forest, then pass a clearing, a log-cabin or a tar-papered shack, a nondescript barn, a few fields of potatoes or oats struggling through blackened stumps, then again the interminable stretches of forest. Most of this has been lumbered over once, but to the untrained eye it has a virgin look. There is the iron region, Ishpeming and Negaunee, red shaft houses, red dumps, rudded files of miners coming and going, red roads, red everywhere. There is the copper country, Red Jacket, Laurium, Calumet, sprawling on the barren ridges of the Keweenaw Peninsula. There is Marquette, built of ox-blood sandstone, looking down on her deep blue bay—the metropolis of the Upper Peninsula and its one city of charm. The population is Swedish and Norwegian in the farming sections, Irish often in the towns, French Canadian in outlying settlements, and in the mining towns every race out of Europe. Since the wealth of this region is largely in iron, copper, and lumber, its development has come for the most part through large corporations, and these corporations control it industrially, socially, and journalistically.

The principal character is a man named Karl von Inten. Several generations ago a Von Inten ancestor migrated from Germany to Sweden, and married into an aristocratic Swedish family. Though his descendants became essentially Swedish, they retained the German "von." Karl von Inten's grandfather, a physician, came to America about the time of our Civil War. He practiced in New York, later in Virginia, then adventured into the woods of northern Michigan where a small Swedish settlement, Westervik, had begun on the shore of Huron Bay. There William von Inten, the son, grew up, married, became a well-known timber-looker. He had a family of eight children. The two older sons, Karl and Emerik, were sent to the medical school of the University of Michigan. When Karl graduated in 1900, he began practice in the town of L'Anse.

Inevitably the family's thoughts were on the forest. Though the white pine has been lumbered out of the Upper Peninsula, there are still in the sections away from the railroads large areas of hemlock and hardwood. Karl was a good doctor, a tireless worker. As his practice grew, he began to put his savings into timberland around Huron Bay. Much of this land was bought from Swedish and Norwegian homesteaders and, contrary to a common practice of land buyers to beat the owners down to the lowest possible price, the Von Intens always paid fairly for land.

The only outlet of this Huron Bay district is by water. And the Westervik sawmill and dock are exactly in the most strategic position to serve the whole district. The harbor is deep and well protected from lake storms, the dock exceptionally well arranged for loading at minimum expense. In 1905 Karl bought a three-fourths interest in the mill. By sawing his own logs and marketing the lumber, he would be able to realize the maximum on his investment. The mill at this time was on lease to one Krebs. Karl had not accumulated enough land to begin sawing on a large scale, therefore he renewed Krebs's lease for five years more. At the end of the five years, Krebs pleaded that he must have more time to clean up his lands. Reluctantly Karl extended the lease two years. Reluctantly, for Krebs was treating the mill badly. Karl's reluctance was justified, for in the next two years Krebs virtually ran the mill into the ground and Karl had to lay out several thousand dollars to get it in shape.

In 1912, then, Karl was ready to begin logging and sawing on his own account. He had moved from L'Anse to Marquette, and there won a really distinguished success as a physician. His brother Emerik remained in L'Anse and the two—familiarily and affectionately known to hundreds of people in Upper Michigan as Dr. Karl and Dr. Emerik—cooperated constantly in their practice. Karl had accumulated 3,500 acres of virgin timber land; his father and his two younger brothers, Volmar and Axel, were experienced in lumbering; he had a mill; wealth apparently was within his grasp. Unfortunately he had put all his savings into land. To begin lumbering he must ask for a loan. He approached several banks. Finally the Manitou Bank of Ishpeming agreed to give a line of credit. As security, the bank required a mortgage on the land to be logged as well as on the logs—an unusual provision. And there was a stipulation—that Karl engage a certain McCartney of Marquette as selling agent. "You're not in the clique," the bank told Karl. "Unless you hire McCartney, you won't be able to sell a foot of lumber."

The history of the next two years was a gradual realization by Dr. Karl of what this clique was, its power and ramifications, the tactics to which it would descend.

Hired trouble-makers appeared in the Von Inten logging camps. Every detail had to be watched constantly. One common trick was short-cutting. Hemlock is graded in 14, 16, 18, 20-foot lengths. Any length between 18 and 20 feet, for example, is called 18 feet. Therefore in cutting hemlock the aim is to make the logs slightly over the nearest standard length, so that there will be as little waste as possible. But Volmar von Inten, in charge of the camps, continually found logs cut slightly under the standard lengths, 17 feet 11 inches, for instance, which meant a loss of almost two feet of log and perhaps 20 board feet of lumber on that log alone. One set of mischief-makers fired, another would appear in the guise of innocents seeking a job. When the mill started up, trouble came there, too. The belt would be cut, the engine tampered with, the saw ruined by spikes driven into logs. On one occasion Krebs rushed Seltzer, vice-president of the Manitou Bank, out to Westervik post-haste on the promise that he could prove the Von Intens were running the mill so badly that their credit at the bank ought to be cut off. Krebs had good reason to expect a crippled mill that day; the bearings had been especially well treated with emery-dust. But Volmar, discovering the trick, and hearing that the bank official was coming, but having no time to stop and clean journal-boxes, rushed ice from the ice-house and tied up a large cake to each hot bearing. When Seltzer arrived, he found the mill sawing 75,000 feet a day instead of the normal 50,000!

Soon McCartney, the selling agent whom the bank had required Dr. Karl to engage, began to market the lumber in Detroit and Chicago. The prices received were far under the market. McCartney explained that these were the best prices that could be obtained. Not only did Dr. Karl receive less than the market prices: he was convinced that he was being persistently cheated in scaling. There is an association of so-called National Inspectors, employed by the lumber companies to load, estimate, and grade lumber. When Karl protested to McCartney at the under-scaling, McCartney told him that if he questioned the figures of an inspector he couldn't sell lumber anywhere.

At the end of two years, in spite of the fact that he had logged and sawed almost 8,000,000 feet of lumber of high grade, Dr. Karl had barely enough margin to pay off his obligations at the Manitou Bank.

About this time Saul S. Grabow, a wholesale hardware dealer of Houghton, suggested to Karl that the Iron and Copper Bank of Houghton, of which he was a director, would be glad to make a loan for logging and sawing. A line of credit was opened, Karl agreeing in return to buy the equipment for his camps from Grabow. Also, he reluctantly accepted Grabow's suggestion that he continue McCartney as selling-agent. But McCartney's tactics—sales at outrageously low prices or no sales at all—continued, and finally Dr. Karl, exasperated, discharged him.

By this time it had become evident to the doctor that the object of rival companies was not only to ruin him but to get his lands. Jim Boland, manager of the Boland Lumber Company, asserted at a lumbermen's meeting in Chicago that "it was the duty of everyone to unite and put the Von Intens out of business." The buyer of the Negus Lumber Company of Chicago advised Karl to sell out before he was forced out; like hints came from other sources.

January, 1916, found Dr. Karl with 5,500,000 feet of lumber on the Westervik dock unsold, a $25,000 debt to the bank which was pressing for payment, and no cash on hand. Karl and his brother Axel set out to try to make a sale themselves. Their adventures resembled a farce machine-made for Broadway. Word had evidently passed pretty generally among buyers that the Von Intens were fair prey whom, as Jim Boland said, it was a duty to trick. As the brothers were shunted back and forth among lumber dealers in Detroit, Toledo, and Cleveland, the telephone warned of their coming, fake telegrams were used to try to beat them down to impossible prices, vague threats were made of this and that, and when a dealer was found willing to give a fair price he always got a warning that broke off the deal before it was closed. Yet there was finally an exception. Within a few days of the date on which the bank had threatened to foreclose its mortgages, Karl sold his hemlock at the market price to the Williams-Wagstaff Lumber Company of Buffalo. At Karl's request, the company sent its $35,000 check direct to the bank to meet the mortgage. The bank returned the check to Karl at Marquette, stating that it could not be accepted because it was more than the face of the mortgage. Evidently the bank hoped to make a further delay so that the mortgage could be foreclosed. Karl rushed back to Buffalo and three days later astonished the bank official by reappearing with a check for the exact amount of the obligation, which the bank could not refuse to accept.

Karl's struggle was constantly intensified by other factors. There was professional jealousy. Other doctors of the region resented the hold that Karl and Emerik had on the people of the small towns and farmlands through their knowledge of Swedish, their second mother-tongue. There was the enmity of the iron mining companies. A large number of the doctors of the Upper Peninsula were "company doctors" on the pay roll of these mining companies. When a man has a leg crushed at a mine and is examined by a company doctor, the latter's testimony is not likely to be to the detriment of the company when it comes to the application for compensation. But Karl was not a company doctor, and was one of the only doctors of the region who always fought for full and fair compensation for men injured in the mines. There was politics. Political conditions in the towns of the Upper Peninsula were sordid and the two brother doctors often fought a rather lone fight for clean elections.

Threats came to Dr. Karl to get in line or there would be consequences. Tricks began. Late at night a phone call hurried him to a distant part of town "to save a woman dying of heart trouble." Arriving at a dark house, he knocked. No answer. He pushed in. A woman, very slightly clad, glided from the shadows and threw her arms around him, whispering that she was alone and that . . . He flung her off, switched on the light, found a man crouching in the corner. Over and over that trick was tried in various forms. And there were others.

Women, obviously hirelings, came to his office and begged him to perform illegal operations, fake dope-fiends stopped him on the street and begged for morphine or cocaine. Women were hired to follow him on his business trips, to take rooms next to his at hotels, to try to entice him into compromising situations. Some of these attempts were diabolic in their ingenuity. Several times there were efforts to wreck his automobile on lonely roads. Shots were fired at him from the dark. During his absences in Detroit and Chicago in efforts to sell his lumber, a story was spread industriously among his patients in Marquette that he had been placed in a private insane asylum near Detroit. But Karl's luck and his wit, and above all his honesty, saved him from these stratagems and lies. The sum laid out on spies, private detectives, fake patients, and gunmen must have been considerable. Out of whose pockets did it come?

When war came in 1917 it was easy of course to attach the charge of pro-Germanism to a man with a "von." Friends urged him to change the "von" to "van." He refused. The climax of this campaign of personal abuse came after the war was over. Though it is out of the chronology of this story it should be mentioned here. A year ago last Decoration Day there was an American Legion parade in L'Anse. On a fake charge that the Von Intens brothers had refused to salute the flag, a certain Dr. Welsh Cronkhite of L'Anse, who for years had been insanely jealous of Dr. Emerik, gathered a gang of drunken legionnaires and attacked the Von Intens on Main Street, L'Anse, with the plain intent to kill. Emerik was knocked senseless with a club at the door of his office. Karl and Volmar fought off twenty assailants and put to flight those they didn't knock down. That night a delegation of the decent citizens of L'Anse came to Dr. Karl and offered to lynch Cronkhite if Karl said the word. Of course he refused.

The summer of 1917 found Karl von Inten still in his old desperate position—millions of feet of lumber unsold, debts to the bank unpaid, no cash on hand. The manager of the Williams-Wagstaff Company of Buffalo told Karl that he would like to buy more, but he did not dare. Karl found another Buffalo concern, the Krumbine Lumber Company, willing to take the hardwood, 2,300,000 feet, and Brewster, the manager, drew up a contract which he agreed to sign as soon as he had inspected the lumber. Brewster took a train for the North. Returning, a few days later, he met Karl in Detroit with a refusal to sign. Why? Because the lumber was unsatisfactory? No, it was O. K., but Brewster had dropped in at the bank before his return and the bank told him, he said, that he needn't sign any contract. Just give Von Inten an order and pay any time.

Simultaneously came a wire from the bank ordering Karl to sell to Brewster or his mortgages would be foreclosed. But a sale to Brewster meant no immediate cash. And cash he must have to meet the mortgages. He was in a trap.

At this juncture Axel slipped away from the private detectives who were shadowing the two brothers in Detroit day and night, got to Port Huron, and thence across to Sarnia, Ontario, and by a stroke of luck sold the Von Inten hemlock to the Landis Lumber Company. But before closing the deal the Landis manager, Whitney, unfortunately felt it necessary to wire to the Bolands for a verification of the Von Inten statements. The Boland Company wired back: "Don't buy Von Inten lumber. Sawed from small, rotten, knotty logs."

Whitney came to Detroit. He said to Karl, "Look here, I know that you are honest and your lumber is what you say it is. But if I close this deal after getting such a wire from an old powerful customer, I'll lose my job."

"I'll sell at cull prices," said Karl, desperate.

"All right."

And so the 2,700,000 feet of hemlock of the first quality, scaled down to 1,400,000 feet by the inspectors whose figures Von Inten was forced to accept, was sold at $19 a thousand. With this, and the sale of the hardwood to the Houston Lumber Company of Chicago, Karl met his obligations to the bank—barely.

He was no further ahead than when he started lumbering five years before. Indeed worse off, for he had taken millions of feet of high-grade logs off his lands. Its sale had just paid the cost of logging and sawing. He was still in his position of dependence on the banks.

Early in 1918, on the advice of Grabow, the wholesale hardware dealer of Houghton who had originally suggested the connection with the Houghton bank, Karl went over to another bank, the Pioneer Trust of Red Jacket. Grabow was a powerful director in this bank, too. Here at last, said Grabow, was a bank that would give unlimited credit, a bank you could trust.

What an idiot this Dr. Karl is, the reader will exclaim, to dream of trusting Grabow further! But Karl had never been sure of Grabow's part in the treatment he had received from the Houghton bank. He preferred to believe in Grabow's good faith. Dr. Karl is a curious mixture of shrewdness and naivete in business matters.

The season was so far advanced that only 800,000 feet of logs were taken out that year.

"Too few to saw," said Grabow. "Sell them and next year we'll let you start early and saw a tremendous lot." The Von Intens protested. But they had to yield to Grabow's insistence, and sold the logs for less than the market.

In the fall of 1918, Sherman, the Von Inten manager, started work early. The bank told him to go strong. By spring he had cut over 4,000,000 feet. Then, just at the end of the logging season, the bank cut short its credit. Only after Sherman's special pleading would it advance money to pay off the final labor claims.

And then, though the plain intent of the contract with the bank was that the loans were to cover both logging and sawing, though Grabow, a director, and Dresser, the bank president, had many times assured Sherman and Karl that full credit would be extended to log and saw all the logs that could be got out, now they suddenly asserted that the contract did not apply to sawing at all, that no more credit could be given, that the logs must be sold! What could Karl do? He had no money to fight the matter in the courts.

"Why didn't you take the story to a newspaper?" I asked.

"There isn't a newspaper up here that would handle it," said Karl emphatically. "They're all controlled by the banks and the big companies."

After months of protest and struggle, of vain attempt to stave off the inevitable, Dr. Karl was forced to yield. And in a particularly humiliating manner. Though the Liberty Lumber Company of White Bay had offered him from $30 to $37 a thousand for the logs, the bank ordered them sold to the Bolands and the Keweenaw Lumber Company—the very concerns that had worked especially for Karl's ruin—at $17.50 a thousand. And it had cost from $20 to $28 a thousand to log that year.

Not necessary to scale the logs, said the bank. Only estimate them. The estimate by the inspectors of the 5,000,000 feet was 2,900,000. The entire Von Inten output of logs turned over at less than the price of logging, and two million feet thrown in free of charge!

By this stroke most men would, perhaps, have given up the fight. But Dr. Karl was far from owning himself beaten. The following year he got a contract with the B. Z. Bernard Lumber Company by which he was to be given a credit of $50,000 a year for two years for logging and sawing. It soon appeared that the Bernard Company shared the view of other lumber buyers that the Von Intens were legitimate prey. When less than half of the first year's amount had been advanced, the Bernards suddenly stopped credit. They sent boats to Westervik and took away more than enough lumber to satisfy their claims, even at the outrageous underscaling by the inspectors in charge, then broke off relations, refusing to surrender the mortgages on the Von Inten lands. These they still hold. Thus Karl is prevented from getting further loans. He is helpless—for the time being. But he is working hard and saving money for a new struggle.

"It's hard to beat a professional man," one of his enemies said ruefully, a few months ago. "Now if Karl von Inten had been only a lumberman, he'd have been down and out long ago. But whenever he's checked, he goes back to his doctor's practice, makes some more money, and gets back into the fight."

Karl will get back into the fight. And he may win. Who knows?

Long Beach, California: Farmer's Rest

By DON RYAN

ON a warm, hazy afternoon when the heathen sea calls mankind to her wanton embrace, Long Beach sits under a latticed pergola in front of the municipal bandstand and knits. And chews. The men are engaged with mouthfuls of plug and scrap, the women with "wax." Talk rears up sturdily, without apology. It is strong and brittle like the cornstalks of Iowa, and cast in the slow, rasping cadence of the Middle West.

The "Pike" is the midway of this transplanted cornfield; alive with a fluttering contingent of youth on a holiday. Youth is forever making holiday in Long Beach and age, getting a later start, is trying heroically and rather pathetically to follow.

So there are many wheel-chairs rolling along the Pike. They are not the wheel-chairs of Atlantic City in which the able-bodied ride at slothful ease. The able-bodied youth of Long Beach would scorn such relaxation of their sturdy limbs. These chairs contain thin, wrinkled old women who are pushed along by others only a shade plumper, only a line less wrinkled.

Between the wheel-chairs dodge occasional bathers from the beach, all properly swathed in bathrobes or raincoats. It is unlawful to appear on the Pike with the human form revealed and on the beach it is unlawful for two persons of the opposite sex, attired in bathing suits, to touch each other.

They may have been man and wife for twenty years. It may be that one is the infant offspring of the other and is in need of manual attention at the moment. It may be that one is battling frantically with the surf—there is a strong undertow—and the other's brawny arms could pull her ashore. Well, ding it, there's a life-saver for that! The law's the law.

The Pike is like other midways—its ancestors of the world's fair days. Hot-dog stands, merry-go-rounds, side-shows, the Old Cider Mill, the Jackrabbit, Madam Mary LaVerne—gifted clairvoyant, and the Penny Arcade.

The Penny Arcade is popular. For a penny beach nymphs may be glimpsed without the enshrouding bathrobe. And for a penny one may purchase snappy stories hot off the griddle, each printed on a little card. The contents of the cards may be memorized and the cards torn up or burned so that one will not run the danger of being found dead with a snappy story in one's pocket.

At the end of the Pike the wealthy patrons of the Hotel Virginia parade in their close. At their feet tosses the gay, pagan sea, covering the sand with frivolous white foam.

Far out the sea is calm and seems like porphyry. Great battleships of the Pacific Fleet squat there, dim and gray, as if they were painted on a theater back drop.

One of the local newspaper men defined Long Beach as a superstructure of modernism evoked by oil discoveries and harbor industries, imposed on a solid concrete base of Middle Western traditions. The base is the strongest part of the structure. The Middle Western element, locally known as the "Horseshoe Throwers," is the strongest and most influential part of the population.

This fact was demonstrated when the younger generation in politics attempted to pass an ordinance that would have eliminated the public "horseshoe links" in Lincoln Park. The Horseshoe Throwers simply told the progressives that if they took away their links the Horseshoe Throwers would take their money out of the Long Beach banks. The horseshoe links are still there.

Just as climate was the most important factor in the life of Long Beach a few years ago, so is oil today. Those who went to live at the beach because their friends had written them about the climate remained to grow unexpectedly rich in oil.

Signal Hill, where oil was found, was formerly used once a year for outdoor Easter services to which motorists flocked by thousands. Two years ago it was announced that the oil wells were so thick on Signal Hill that the Easter services would have to be abandoned. There was no room left for the crowds.

No deacon raised a voice in protest. There are many hills where Easter services may be held; few where the flowing gold, as Western writers are fond of calling it, flows so freely from the benignant earth.

The oil wells on Signal Hill produce a revenue of $200,000 a day. Of this sum Long Beach gets $1,200,000 next year as a return from city-owned land on the hill. Anticipating that the Horseshoe Throwers would demand this sum to be applied to cut the tax rate, the newspapers of Long Beach launched a campaign to have the money used for public improvements. The campaign carried, owing its success, largely it is believed, to the support of Miss Myrtelle Gunsul, the only woman city auditor in America, and proud of it.

The progressives have also succeeded in repealing the "Peekaboo" ordinance, passed when William M. Peek was public safety commissioner. Safety Commissioner Peek, formerly of Oelwein, Iowa, believed that bathing suits without skirts or sleeves were a menace to the public safety. But the ordinance was erased from the books when the progressives convinced the town that it subjected Long Beach to ridicule.

It is natural enough for this asylum to continue the aspects of the cornfields so familiar to the working years of diligent farmers and worthy wives who have retired there to rest. The older inhabitants of Long Beach are indeed like a crop of late corn—grotesque, withered ears, dry and stunted. Pathetically seeking the youth which evaded them in their long, toilsome years. Quick to accept modern mechanical comforts and quick to reject modern modes of thought.

Sometimes they are outraged by an interloper. Only last summer Eugene V. Debs penetrated their fastness. This dangerous chinch-bug slipped in under the hard, dry husks and was about to speak at the Municipal Auditorium—one of the city's prides. The American Legion found it out and sounded the tocsin. The cornfield element rallied to a man. The city council refused the use of the Auditorium.

Mrs. Fannie Bixby Spencer, a wealthy Tolstoian, whose father gave Bixby Park to the city, humbly sought permission for Debs to speak in this public playground. But the city council was all ready for her.

No siree, Mrs. Spencer. Even if your pa did give us the park. Guess he never reckoned he'd have a daughter like you. We always got along without any Bolsheviki in Long Beach, and we guess we can still get along without any. Good-day, Mrs. Spencer.

Nevertheless the other element is seeping in—the element that is making tiny punctures in the conservatism of the cornfields with daggers of thought. The next generation will hear Eugene V. Debs or whoever happens to be the equivalent of Eugene V. Debs for the next generation. But the thoughtful minority is still the minority in Long Beach.

There is yet another element in Long Beach, growing more numerous as the oil industry develops. When the whistle blows at the end of a shift long lines of workers in greasy overalls file down from the crest of Signal Hill. With clean faces they emerge from the dressing-rooms and in street clothes climb into waiting automobiles.

A flurry of dust as the automobiles of the oil workers scatter down the avenues that lead to shaded bungalows, redolent with the smell of the coming meal. Wives and children wait to greet them. The children have brought home their school tasks to do. And in a few years these children, who are entirely outside the traditions of the cornfields, will have something to say about the future of Long Beach.

The sleepy sun drowns over the corner of the park where the musical clink of horseshoes is the only sound. Long shadows from the eucalyptus trees protect the gray figures in bright shirt-sleeves who toss the horseshoes with carefully calculated movements of the arms.

Canes, wheel-chairs, and pipes. Benches full of spectators. Ten different ranges constitute the horseshoe links; a low fence to protect the spectators from rebounding metal; a scoreboard; a rack on which the players may hang their coats; a large box where the horseshoes are ranged evenly, row upon row, for the players to make their selections.

It is the barnyard of their boyhood in Oelwein, glorified beyond conception. A horseshoe links de luxe. The sort of a horseshoe links that might be expected in heaven—if we didn't know that such frivolous contraptions would not be tolerated by the Almighty.

A man with a dyed black mustache that droops over his chin, a celluloid collar, and sleeveholders that match his pink suspenders, squints thoughtfully along the nearest range. He takes down a long-handled shovel from the proper rack and carefully works up the earth which had become packed too hard about the stakes. Pipe and panama, yellow face and prominent eyes that snap when he throws a ringer.

His opponent has the same face with mild watery eyes and a cap. They are trying to settle the rivalry that began forty years ago in a barnyard at Clay Center.

Clink, clink! The horseshoes sail and strike as the pitchers throw them with careful attention to stance and form. Clink, clink! Two ringers apiece. The old men chuckle in cracked voices. The championship is still undecided.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has never concealed his interest in antiquities. Old books, old chairs, old ideas have seemed pleasant in his sight. When he reads in a sixteenth-century manual of a farmer and his wife who for rent of their small patch of land paid to their lord in England one red rose, his mind opens up a dozen doors of fancy and historical fact; when he enters the Virginia House of Delegates, as lately he did, and hears the members being sworn not to take part in a duel either as a principal or a second he has happy food for many hours' thought. Yet it is not the age of these customs that makes them attractive, but their strangeness. Without change, the antiquarians would have not even the old-clothes business with which to console—and feed—themselves. For example, take those far-away people, the Lapps. There are obviously no Lapp antiquarians, for the simple reason that Lapp life now is almost exactly the same as it was when the Northern Europeans began to growl over the bone of their poor country—nine hundred years ago.

* * * * *

AS far as the Drifter can discover, the only new custom which has been introduced into Lapland since the tenth century is the drinking of coffee. Aside from that not very radical departure from ancient ritual, the Laplander pursues his quiet and undeviating way. In the summer, when for two months the sun does not set, he hastily plants his grain and waits breathlessly for it to ripen before the long winter comes—or perhaps, being a Lapp, he does not do anything breathlessly. His food and clothing and articles of household use are reindeer: when the mosquitoes are thick in summer, as they usually are, he bells a reindeer, sets him to walking in the forest, and captures as many members of the herd that will flock to the bell seeking relief from the insects by rubbing up against a companion, as he needs to last until the next mosquito season. He lives in a small hut without windows; if he is the father of a family he has complete authority over his women and children. The Drifter does not know what a Laplander thinks about, unless it is of the good old days before coffee-drinking became the fad. Yet to make up for the lack of variety, the Lapp system has its advantages after all. No matter how much the Drifter might yearn to pay his rent with a rose, he is confident that his landlord would greet the idea with contumely and possibly violence; the Laplander's pastoral but not idyllic existence may not be the most arresting in the world, but if by chance he ever had hit upon a pretty custom, it would still be the rule.

* * * * *

THE Lapps are fortunate in still another way: they pay no income tax. Neither, to any appreciable extent, does the Drifter, yet he was interested when he heard that the tax on certain articles would disappear along with one-quarter of the tax on incomes. He was interested, that is, until he saw the list of articles: "The tax," he read, "on knives, dirks, livery, hunting garments, yachts, and fans is to be repealed." Since none of these things has ever seemed to be essential in a Spartan life like his own, the Drifter is bound to say that he would not give a mosquito-eaten reindeer-skin for such tax reduction. Let those who have yachts or dirks rejoice.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence Against Christianity

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There are few men in the world who can write the perfect English that is in Dr. Crapsey's article in your issue of January 16. Certainly he melted words in the crucible of righteous emotional indignation and produced a gem of literature. And yet what he says leaves me cold, just as the recent discussion in the papers leaves me cold. What Dr. Crapsey says is true—the bishop and the rector either should live their faith or get out, and the Sermon on the Mount is unquestionably the essence of the religion of Jesus Christ. I have never heard any discussion of that Sermon except in terms of praise, but after having read it innumerable times in the past twenty-odd years I am totally unable to see anything but bad religion in it. What Dr. Crapsey said was undoubtedly true, but it ought not to be true. The meek, the poor in spirit, and the persecuted have increasingly inherited the earth to the eternal detriment of the world. The Sermon on the Mount is the religion of slaves, not the religion of free men. And though that type of conduct is a way to individual happiness it is not socially or racially a desirable attitude. The religion of Jesus Christ, like the religion of Buddha, Confucius, and Lao-tsze, is still valuable as an individual moral code and as a record of what the wisest men in the past have thought upon the subject of man's relation to his neighbors. It was socially desirable in the day it was uttered and was valuable for many centuries thereafter, but this modern world has problems undreamed of in an earlier age, world problems, problems of racial friction, overpopulation, moron control of government in democracy—things that are partly the result of scientific enlightenment and partly problems that can be solved by science and right thinking.

What the world needs is not more Christianity but a new religion.

Tulsa, Oklahoma, January 16

CLARENCE R. LONG

Poisoning Peace by Poisoning the News

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Once more you have overcome the conspiracy of silence on the part of American newspapers. Mr. Gannett's article on The Secret Corruption of the French Press is the kind of news for which we have come to depend exclusively upon The Nation.

The influence of the Imperial Russian Government was not limited to the Paris press alone. In the spring of 1903 a British newspaper campaign, apparently inspired by Russian influences, wrecked a plan for the internationalization of the Bagdad Railway and was a potent influence in the rise of anti-German feeling in England. Perhaps a few of the facts will be of interest to your readers.

Early in 1903 a conference was held in London to arrange for placing the Bagdad Railway, throughout its entire length, from the Bosphorus to the Persian Gulf, under international control. An agreement was reached between Mr. Balfour, Prime Minister, and Lord Lansdowne, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, representing His Majesty's Government; Dr. von Gwinner, representing French and German interests in the Bagdad Railway Company; and Lord Revelstoke and Lord Mount Stephen, representing a group of British financiers, under the terms of which equal participation in construction, administration, and management of the German railways in Turkey was to be awarded German, French, and British interests. The potentialities of some such arrangement in avoiding international rivalries in the Near East cannot be overestimated, as Mr. Balfour stated so eloquently in the House of Commons.

Just as success seemed assured a bitter attack was launched on the Government by the Times and the National Review, which led to the repudiation of the aforementioned agreement. Sir Clinton Dawkins, one of the British bankers interested in the project, wrote Dr. von Gwinner on April 23, 1903: "Who instigated these papers, from whence they derived their information, is a matter upon which I cannot speak with certainty. My own impression is that the instigation proceeded from Russian sources. The clamor raised by these two organs was immediately taken up by practically the whole of the English press, London having really gone into a frenzy on the matter owing to the newspaper campaign, which it would have been quite impossible to counteract or influence."

During the summer of 1922 I obtained from both English and German sources considerable evidence that the Russian Embassy in Paris was responsible, as Sir Clinton Dawkins suspected. In fact, I was given the name of the attaché, who was charged with seeing that the proposed internationalization of the Bagdad Railway should be sabotaged. Whether funds passed between the Russian Government and the representatives of any London paper is a matter of comparative indifference. The news was poisoned, and it was poisoned under orders from Petrograd.

New York, February 6

EDWARD MEAD EARLE

From One of Our Martyrs

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation of January 16 contains a letter from Mr. Gilson Gardner in appreciation of the work of the Pennsylvania Committee for Political Prisoners.

May I, using The Nation as a medium, offer my thanks and appreciation to Mr. Gardner and the members and workers connected with the Pennsylvania committee? It was this group of Philadelphians, together with Mr. Gardner and others, who, from first to last, devoted their time, money, and energy to this cause. Others of us in the struggle might have lost our faith and enthusiasm and dropped limply back on the side-lines, but, from Wilson to Coolidge, this courageous group have, with good humor and determination, continued to do their bit toward keeping the pennants of sanity and justice fluttering in the land.

Life in a federal penitentiary is a drab and sordid affair at the best of times, and I happen to be one of those who, in the language of Leavenworth, "does time hard," but I rather think that a few years behind the bars is not such a great price to pay for the privilege of having known a few Americans whose souls have not been requisitioned by the Department of Justice.

New York, January 17

JAMES MANNING

Birth Control Clinics and the Law

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The editorial in The Nation of February 6 on birth-control clinics may be misleading because of this statement: "In various parts of the country the birth-control movement is adopting the simple course of challenging the law and then if necessary testing it in court." Then followed the main facts about the clinics in Chicago and New York. As a matter of fact, the clinics in both these cities are not infringing either State or federal law, so their establishment can hardly be called a challenge.

Illinois is one of the so-called twenty-four "free" States where contraceptive information is not included among the prohibitions of the obscenity laws. Suppression of a clinic is possible therefore only by police action, claiming justification because of the precedent of the federal law, which does class contraceptive information with the obscenities. (Twenty-four States do likewise.) When Health Commissioner Bundensen attempted to hold up the establishment of the clinic by refusing it a license he quoted the federal precedent as a reason, saying that Congress had established a standard under which the giving of contraceptive information is "contrary to public policy." Judge Fisher, who issued the mandamus in behalf of the clinic license, maintained that in the absence of specific State legislation the clinic should proceed unhindered.

The New York clinic is operating legally under the statute of 1881, which permits the giving of contraceptive prescriptions by physicians to those who are ill or threatened with disease. This statute (Section 1145 of the Penal Code) partially mitigates the sweeping prohibition of the obscenity statute (Section 1142) which penalizes the giving of contraceptive information in any way whatever. The permissive statute is wondrously worded as follows:

An article or instrument used or applied by physicians lawfully practicing, or by their direction or prescription, for the cure or prevention of disease, is not an article of indecent or immoral nature or use, within this article. The supplying of such articles to physicians or by their direction or prescription, is not an offense under this article.

There has been, so far as I know, only one clinic in this country which has attempted to operate in defiance of the laws, namely, Margaret Sanger's clinic in Brownsville, which lasted for ten days in 1916. The contraceptive instructions given there were not given by physicians nor limited to the diseased. The instructions given in the present New York clinic are under these two limitations, and are therefore within the present laws.

New York, February 6

MARY WARE DENNETT,

Director of the Voluntary Parenthood League

Compensation for Wrongdoing

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On the principle that one subjected to outrage and wrong is entitled to compensation from the wrongdoer all drafted men have valid claims against the Government. They were forced against their will to leave their homes and were kept for months in virtual slavery.

Not all the casualties of war were suffered by the sick, wounded, and dead. Many who returned in sound physical condition owe to their military experience disabilities less tangible but none the less serious. It is not mere caprice that causes many employers to refuse to take on ex-service men if they can avoid doing so. Experience has given them the impression that more competent employees can be obtained from non-military ranks. Unquestioning obedience is not an admirable trait in business where ability and readiness to use one's brains independently is needed to make one really useful. And the man who has been trained to "obey and don't think" is apt to become aggrieved and sullen when impatiently informed that something better is expected from him.

For such injuries no compensation is provided. The bonus demanded is, in fact, inadequate.

To grant the bonus would touch the pocket nerve of the militarists and tend to make war less desirable from a profiteering viewpoint. This alone may not be a valid argument, but it makes it less hard to heed the demand for justice to the victims of conscription.

Baltimore, January 25

SAMUEL DANZIGER

Contributors to This Issue

WEBB WALDRON, formerly of Collier's Weekly, is the author of "The Road to the World."

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD is the author of a much-appreciated volume of verse, "For Eager Lovers."

DON RYAN is on the staff of the Los Angeles Record.

CHARLES NAGEL was Secretary of Commerce in the Taft Administration.

Books

Certain British Tendencies

The Triumph of Unarmed Forces. By Rear Admiral M. W. P. Consett. London: Williams & Norgate.

NO one who reads this volume can entertain further doubt that the shipment of foodstuffs from Great Britain to neutral countries during the war assumed large proportions and greatly exceeded similar shipments prior to the war. About the motive which prompted the Government in permitting these shipments to be made there may, however, be some question. The ground which would no doubt be alleged, and which indeed Admiral Consett seems disposed to accept, was policy. It is his contention that but for this mistaken policy the war would have ended several years earlier, and the calamitous consequences to the victor nations would have been avoided.

Although Admiral Consett does not distinctly raise the question, it is not so easy to dispose of the suspicion that something more than policy was at work. Indeed, even he is prepared to belittle the idea that Great Britain had substantial reason to fear the Scandinavian countries. He admits that a policy favoring British shipments and interfering with American traders for neutral markets was unfair and gave the United States just ground for complaint. We are to believe that Scandinavian countries were feared more than the United States. It is not easy to accept the idea that a desire to avoid displeasure and threat of war from Scandinavian countries furnished the sole explanation for a policy which took American ships into British ports for examination, and permitted British ships to carry increased cargoes of foodstuffs to these countries.

Admiral Consett's attitude in discussing the issues of the war is delightfully frank. He is not as ruthlessly British as Lord Fisher; neither is he adroitly plausible like Lloyd George. His argument is based upon the very broad proposition that Great Britain can do no wrong because, isolated as the nation is upon a small island, the rule of her necessity must be the guide for her, and therefore for the rest of the world as well. Wherever supremacy of her navy is necessary, international law must yield, because otherwise England might starve. There is no corresponding allowance for the supremacy of arms for encircled nations of the Continent, because forsooth their fate does not involve England or Great Britain. While he unhesitatingly denounces Germany's breach of Belgian neutrality, he frankly adds:

Sea-power, with its adjunct air-power, cannot be bartered for the illusory advantages of paper security—those "rotten parchment bonds."

Discussing the right of visit and search Admiral Consett says:

The only modification suffered by this rule during the war was that, for safety's sake, the search was carried out in harbor instead of at sea. This innovation was challenged, but unsuccessfully, by America.

After quoting the provision in the Declaration of Paris that the neutral flag covers enemy's merchandise with the exception of contraband of war, he continues:

The immunity given by this article to the general bulk of sea-borne merchandise struck a blow at the very heart of our sea-power. It is true that the protection which this declaration gave to enemy commerce was given also to British; but this protection, being already provided for in our case by our fleet, extended only to the commerce of our enemies, and struck a vital blow at our sea-power.

The ease with which inconvenient rules of this sort were overcome is well expressed:

For these reasons, therefore, the Reprisals Order did not profess to declare a blockade; its object was to intercept enemy commerce by an adaptation of the law of blockade.

And again:

The order seems to be admittedly illegal, for Mr. Asquith stated that it was not intended that our efforts should be "strangled in a network of juridical niceties"; an expression which, without such illegal meaning being assigned to it, can have no meaning whatever.

To the objection of the United States to such curtailment of neutral rights, the British Government answered:

But although these measures may have been provoked by the illegal conduct of the enemy, they do not, in reality, conflict with any general principle of international law, of humanity, or civilization; they are enforced with consideration against neutral countries, and are therefore juridically sound and valid.

Simply delicious is the Admiral's comment on the exchange of notes between Great Britain and the United States, p. 60:

The paragraph quoted above shows that the American summary had evidently been very carefully examined by H. M. Government, who could make neither head nor tail of it. It suffers from the bad defect of vagueness; a weakness (very noticeable in the American utterances) which H. M. Government are not slow to detect. . . .

It must not be supposed that this correspondence contains many oversights due to the haste with which it was conducted; the present reply of H. M. Government, 24th April, 1916, referred to an American dispatch of 5th November, 1915. In any case, even if America had chosen to cable back a message, she must have seen the utter futility of such a proceeding; and, indeed, the futility of any measure which could possibly prevent H. M. Government from placing its own construction upon anything America might choose to say. America had got her neck fairly into a noose, and had no more chance of getting it out than she had of avoiding getting it in. In this diplomatic battle, as in maritime law, we searched for "principles": and here was one worth the finding. Possibly this discovery may have caused America to resign, for no further dispatches are published.

Just at present our Government again "does not understand . . . that it is intended to deny to the United States the enjoyment of the rights and advantages to which the United States is justly and equally entitled as a participant in the common victory . . ." and "is confident that it is not the purpose of the other Allied and Associated Powers to attempt to discriminate against it."

Since there seems to be some confusion as to just what the Allied governments are prepared or willing to "understand" or to put over on us, it might be well for the framers of these notes to read these particular passages in this particular book. Indeed, it would unquestionably benefit all Americans because, without in any manner detracting from our natural admiration for a real Englishman, this volume discloses certain British tendencies which it may be well even for an American to keep in mind.

CHARLES NAGEL

The Monroe Doctrine: Its Use and Abuse

One Hundred Years of the Monroe Doctrine. By David Y. Thomas. The Macmillan Company. $4.

Diplomatic Portraits: Europe and the Monroe Doctrine One Hundred Years Ago. By W. P. Cresson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

THE message which President Monroe sent to Congress almost exactly a hundred years ago, and which is the source of the Monroe Doctrine, was only in the most restricted sense meant to be a declaration of principles. That part of it which referred to the controversy with Russia as to the Northwest coast did lay down a general maxim that the American continents were no longer to be subject to European colonization. But the paragraphs which related to South America were meant to meet what the President conceived as a definite, immediate danger. They were never meant to provide the basis for our foreign policy for generations to come. Their author would have been surprised, indeed, if he could have foreseen all the direct and indirect consequences of his pronouncement.

When one considers, however, the vast significance of the declaration of 1823, the story of its origins, though told and retold, is still worth a new telling. Mr. Cresson's work performs this service. Much of the book, it is true, deals with other matters, and centers on European personalities and European problems. But those parts which relate themselves to the Monroe message are especially interesting and well worth while. The vivid personality of Adams is admirably pictured; and the role of the President himself, often too much belittled, is made to appear as important as it really was. There is an interesting, and in some respects a novel, account of the development of that Anglo-Saxon understanding which produced the doctrine. Mr. Cresson does well to point out that the beginnings of this rapprochement are not to be found, as is so often assumed, in the Rush-Canning interviews, but in the earlier conversations of Adams and Stratford Canning at Washington. He may reasonably claim to bring a fresh point of view to an old subject.

Mr. Thomas's volume has a different purpose. The historical origins of the doctrine he treats briefly, conventionally, and not always accurately, obviously without first-hand knowledge. His interest lies very clearly in the developments to which the President's message has given rise.

Perhaps the most striking of these developments is that by which a doctrine of non-interference by Europe in the affairs of the New World has become a doctrine of interference by the United States. The process is not difficult to trace. From forbidding Europe to reconquer America by force, we pass by an easy transition to a prohibition against any use of force whatsoever by European Powers in this hemisphere. And such a prohibition, to some minds, makes it necessary for us to assume the responsibility of keeping the smaller states of the New World under our thumbs that there may be no excuse for action by other Powers. Thus a formula aimed against imperialism in the Old World becomes the servant of imperialism in the New.

The best part of Mr. Thomas's book is that in which he describes this process. The chapters in which he outlines the intervention of the United States in Haiti, in Santo Domingo, in Central America, and, to a less extent, in Mexico, are full of facts brought together nowhere else in such convenient form. There is perhaps a tendency to over-mass details, but there is none the less a very useful discussion. There is also a point of view. Why, asks Mr. Thomas, should we intervene as we have done? Why not leave to investors the risks of their enterprises? And why, in the face of debt repudiations in certain of the States of the Union, have we the right to compel the small nations of the Caribbean to a rigid financial honesty?

Linked with the development of American imperialism under the Monroe Doctrine is another chain of circumstance, that which involves the growth of Pan-Americanism. In 1823 the assumption of a protecting attitude by the United States might have had some justification. It was largely bluff, it is true, for on the occasions when Monroe's and Adams's administrations were asked to transform the language of the message into a definite pledge, there was a notable tendency to retreat to positions prepared in the rear, and to take shelter behind the independence of the legislative power. But the pose of the protecting great nation was not then entirely unreasonable. Today, in the case of the greater nations, it has become absurd, and not only absurd, but offensive. Has not the time come to substitute understanding for patronage, common association for an assumption of superiority? Is it not possible to hope for the growth of Pan-American solidarity? On these questions Mr. Thomas has brought together a useful body of facts, but his discussion is far less original and thorough than on the matters treated above.

A third phase of development which Mr. Thomas treats seems hardly logical. He would apparently maintain that the Monroe Doctrine has necessarily implied non-interference in Europe. James Monroe, when he penned his message, was, in a sense, laying down a theory of two spheres of activity, one on each side of the Atlantic. But practically he was thinking only of keeping Europe out of America, not of keeping America out of Europe. The latter notion is of older origins, and, as hardly needs to be insisted, comes from a different source. The two ought not to be confused. The message of 1823 ought not to have to carry the burden of that particular variety of national egotism which would bar us from all helpfulness across seas. It is the Farewell Address and Jefferson's First Inaugural which our isolationist politicians invoke to keep us out of Europe.

DEXTER PERKINS

The Hungry Heart

The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems. By Edna St. Vincent Millay. Harper and Brothers. $2.

My heart, being hungry, feeds on food
The fat of heart despise.
Beauty where beauty never stood,
And sweet where no sweet lies
I gather to my querulous need,
Having a growing heart to feed.

It may be, when my heart is dull,
Having attained its girth,
I shall not find so beautiful
The meager shapes of earth,
Nor linger in the rain to mark
The smell of tansy through the dark.

MISS MILLAY'S new volume of beautiful verse begins with this poem, which perfectly expresses what some of her readers hope is a phase now finished. For it is adolescents chiefly who feed on air, who feel life in its limitation, who achieve consciousness by learning what it is to be lonely. Miss Millay has made as fine poetry out of all this as has ever perhaps been made, but she cannot go on forever, and doubtless she knows it. One's heart does after all grow up and begin to nourish itself on more solid—fatter—food; if one can make no poetry out of that, one was not born a big poet. Miss Millay, it seems, can be anything, and there are signs already that she has outlived her longing for starved and tiny moods wherein it appears that no wine is "so wonderful as thirst," that no fruit is "so wonderful as want."

The final section of this very book shows her abandoning the field of abstract emotion and rarefied, subjective thought in which she has made so many brilliant researches. The seventeen Sonnets from an Ungrafted Tree are written in the third person; they tell a story, more or less; they are rich with objective detail. Miss Millay no longer strains her eyes in half-light to make things out which in the end may be only metaphors; she opens her gaze frankly—and of course still passionately—upon that universe of fact to which the best poetry must sooner or later come home. It is an inexhaustible world, and one takes pleasure in speculating on the various things which Miss Millay will do there. Meanwhile she has written seventeen sonnets like the following:

She filled her arms with wood, and set her chin
Forward, to hold the highest stick in place,
No less afraid than she had always been
Of spiders up her arms and on her face,
But too impatient for a careful search
Or a less heavy loading, from the heap
Selecting hastily small sticks of birch,
For their curled bark, that instantly will leap
Into a blaze, nor thinking to return
Some day, distracted, as of old, to find
Smooth, heavy, round, green logs with a wet, gray rind
Only, and knotty chunks that will not burn,
(That day when dust is on the wood-box floor,
And some old catalogue, and a brown, shriveled apple core).

Many of the remaining poems in the volume were famous already, or now deserve to be. The lovely Ballad of the Harp-Weaver circulated separately in slender dress, and eight of the superb sonnets in part four appeared in the American Miscellany for 1922. There are, as usual, a few ironic pieces in Miss Millay's own nervous ballad stanza: The Return from Town, Keen, The Betrothal, and The Pond are great and perfect in their kind. A few poems are in a freer kind of verse than the author has usually employed, and it cannot be said that they are satisfactory, although Hyacinth rather takes the breath in the third and fourth lines:

I am in love with him to whom a hyacinth is dearer
Than I shall ever be dear.
On nights when the field-mice are abroad he cannot sleep:
He hears their narrow teeth at the bulbs of his hyacinths.
But the gnawing at my heart he does not hear.

In general this is the maturest and most impressive volume which Miss Millay has published. Her thought still sings, and her skill is if anything more marvelous. It would be an injustice to her to imply that all of the poems here are of the first rank. Certain of them could have been turned off by any one of a dozen competent contemporaries. But the proportion of unexceptionable pieces is great, and the book leaves its creator permanently settled in her very high place.

MARK VAN DOREN

Imponderable Values

The Doves' Nest and Other Stories. By Katherine Mansfield. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IN these impassioned days when even fiction is largely polemic the critic gets so much into the hortatory and expostulative vein that he is a little embarrassed when confronted with a work of pure literature like one of Miss Mansfield's volumes in which he finds all of the values imponderable and artistic. Whereas even the jackets of most recent publications inform the reader exactly what the ensuing work is intended to "devastate," Miss Mansfield herself was never quite able to say exactly what effect she was aiming at, but, on the contrary, was tortured by her inability to state in words what she wanted to do and filled her journal with morbid fears that she had failed to express herself or had been betrayed by some facile trick into obscuring her deepest meaning. Unsatisfied though she was she did succeed in communicating admirably so many and such subtle things that one may risk the statement that her fears were groundless and her feeling the result, not of any failure, but of the fact that her stories were too perfect to be translated into any other terms, and that only they could say what she wanted said.

More than half of "The Doves' Nest" consists of fragments of unfinished stories, and to read it is to discover one of the most significant things about Miss Mansfield's art. Though many of her stories have very simple clear-cut plots which make excellent anecdotes when retold in a few lines, yet her greatness is almost independent of these plots, for though none of the fragments goes far enough to give any definite indication of the story to be told each is nearly as impressive as a finished story. The ironic twists which she affected in her plots are interesting in themselves and significant as revealing her conviction that life is constantly and unexpectedly cruel, but the most important things which she has to say cannot be reduced to a "point" or expressed in either a simple situation or a phrase, for they are moods and sentiments so subtle as to be captured only in a complicated mesh of words and situations and they escape as soon as one tampers with the net.

Take for example the story called The Fly. In it an old man, lost in meditation before a photograph of his dead son, shakes successive drops of ink from his pen upon a struggling fly and marvels at its persistent courage in rescuing and cleaning itself. Exulting at the lesson which it is giving him in fortitude he loses consciousness of all except the drama before him until, having played God once too often, he kills the fly and a terrible despair which he can hardly understand settles upon him. The point is clear enough. "As flies to wanton boys" is in itself a tremendous moral but it is only one aspect. A deeper meaning dawns as one realizes that the old man is cruel not for the sake of cruelty, but in order to give himself courage, and that the death of the fly reverberates in his mind as the death knell of his own hope. He sees that there is an end even to the perfect fortitude of instinct and that neither man nor God always restrains his blows when the utmost limits of endurance have been reached. This analysis, however, does nothing like justice to the story, for though it touches upon Miss Mansfield's intellectual penetration it gives no idea of her equally remarkable power of communicating emotion. She broods upon a situation as the old man in the story brooded upon the fly, until it fills the universe and nothing else exists; she hypnotizes the reader into something like her own trance, and when the story is finished one awakes to hear the clock ticking strangely on the wall and the familiar furniture not quite real.

The secret of Miss Mansfield's power lies in her possession of that poetic vision which is close to mysticism. Her sensibility illuminates everything with a light more intense than the light of common day and, though she is concerned more with society than nature, there is a suggestion in all of her work of that "imagination" which Wordsworth never succeeded in defining but which he was not unable to exemplify. "I look at mountains and I see nothing but mountains," she wrote in one of the characteristically self-condemnatory passages of her journal, yet the fascination of her best stories lies just in the fact that she does seem to see behind actualities and to catch hints of some mystic meanings which are terribly intense without being quite graspable. She broods upon some ordinary event such as a breakfast-table conversation or the morning farewell of a husband off to work, until, by that familiar psychological process which makes a too oft repeated word strange and fantastic or a too intensely regarded friend a stranger, she seems to catch glimpses of the tremendous reality which to the bewitched eye of the mystic lies behind every actuality and to glow through it, illuminating perfectly familiar objects with a strange unearthly light. She raises, temporarily at least, our own sensibilities to the height of hers and induces that hypnosis which poetry achieves and which has caused primitive peoples to endow the poet with powers not quite of this earth. If, as it seems to me, we ask of fiction chiefly that, when existence has become too dully habitual, it shall awake in us a renewed sense of life as a vivid and passionate thing, then Miss Mansfield's stories reach a very high level.

J. W. KRUTCH

Books in Brief

Index to Short Stories. Second edition. Compiled by Ina Ten Eyck Firkins. H. W. Wilson Company. $12.

Standard Catalog: Fiction Section. Compiled by Corinne Bacon. H. W. Wilson Company. $1.

It is hard, in brief space, to do more than marvel at the usefulness of Miss Firkins's index, which lists 17,288 short stories by 808 writers who have done their work in English or who have been translated into English from twenty-four other languages. The compilation is so systematic and so catholic that to question it with regard to specific items seems carping, but one wonders why, when stories as long as Stevenson's "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" and Stephen Crane's "Maggie" have been listed, Peacock's "Nightmare Abbey" and Stockton's "The Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine" should not also have been—to mention only two titles which promptly come to mind of stories too short to be called novels in the ordinary sense of the term.

Why should Sherwood Anderson be represented by only one story, Henry van Dyke by fifty-eight, and Arthur Guy Empey by eleven? Miss Bacon, listing "about 2,350 of the best novels for the average public library," permits herself and her collaborators more editorial comment than Miss Firkins employs. In the subject index "such general headings as Love, Marriage, Sin have not been used. . . . Special attention has been paid to Historical novels and to novels classifying under such popular headings as: Cheerful stories, mystery and detective stories, school and college life, sea stories, etc." A place on the list is denied Fielding's "Joseph Andrews" and "Amelia," Johnson's "Rasselas," Swift's "Gulliver's Travels," Voltaire's "Candide," among the elder classics; and among the newer, Mark Twain's "The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg," Cabell's "Jurgen" of course, Anatole France's "Thais." As the preface says, "this is not a list of the best 2,350 novels, judged as literature, but a list of 2,350 of the best novels for public library use." Librarians must decide.

Studies in Evolution and Genetics. By S. J. Holmes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

This volume contains some sixteen unrelated chapters on various biological topics such as evolution, natural selection, heredity, eugenics, race mixtures, and the Negro, many of which have appeared in magazines previously. The author says in the preface that "the present volume makes no claim to unity of treatment; the topics chosen for discussion represent some of the peculiar interests of the writer which have grown out of several years of occupation with the fields of heredity, evolution, and eugenics."

Colonial Lighting. By Arthur H. Hayward. B. J. Brimmer Company. $7.50.

It is striking evidence of the progress made in native anti-quarianism that an elaborate monograph, fully illustrated with photographs and drawings, should have been devoted solely to the various methods by which American houses were illuminated before 1800. Though the text of Mr. Hayward's book is without distinction, his pictures will move every collector to fresh activity.

Jane—Our Stranger. By Mary Borden. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A study of contrasts in temperament marked by excellent writing and shrewd delineation, although not quite as well-knit a narrative as "The Romantic Woman." Mrs. Borden knows her milieu; her development of her theme—an international marriage—is civilized and sharply projected.

Folk-Lore in the Old Testament. Studies in Comparative Religion, Legend, and Law. By Sir James George Frazer. Abridged Edition. The Macmillan Company. $5.

This volume, following close upon a similar volume abridging "The Golden Bough," encourages the hope that Frazer is about to render all of his monumental works in anthropology accessible to a wide public. No greater service to civilization could be performed by this superb man of letters and historian of the mind of man.

Justice of the Peace. By Frederick Niven. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

One should be a painter, writer, etcher, and wholesale merchant, all in one, to extract the full flavor from this fine novel—so crowded with human values and artistic insight. Mr. Niven's accuracy, his sense of the subtle interplay of emotions, and his ability to project life in three dimensions are emphatically attested in these pages. The conflict which arises between mother and son of antagonistic temperaments has been handled here with discrimination and sincerity; the result is a novel of genuine achievement.

"Racundra's" First Cruise. By Arthur Ransome. B. W. Huebsch. $2.50.

"The desire to build a house," declares Mr. Ransome, "is the tired wish of a man content thenceforward with a single anchorage. The desire to build a boat is the desire of youth, unwilling yet to accept the idea of a final resting-place." As with all generalizations, there is doubtless a leak somewhere in this dogmatism, but one is quite willing to let it pass, particularly if the holding of such sentiments takes the form of a cruise such as the Racundra's. This book is the log of five weeks of unhurried adventure among the islands of the Eastern Baltic—a corner of the globe which appears filled with attractions for the seeing eye and sea-faring spirit. The craft which carried Mr. Ransome upon this loosely charted excursion was a sturdy ketch, which boasted the luxury of a power motor never used. It was manned by a cook, an "ancient mariner," and the "master and owner." These last, according to Mr. Ransome, are the words which, in moments of humiliation, he addresses to himself; they restore him to his full stature. Considering what a small vessel the Racundra is and how limited its crew, one marvels at the amount of pleasure and comfort he provides—in these pages—for the passengers.

Over the Hills of Ruthenia. By Henry Baerlein. London: Leonard Parsons. 7/6.

Ruthenia—one of the least polished jewels in the historic crown of St. Stephen, as the author says—finds a sympathetic interpreter in Mr. Baerlein. His study of the smallest of the Slav peoples and of their country is an adroit blend of history and anecdote; it has plenty of first-hand information spiced with occasional pinches of first-hand prejudice. These pages have a freshness derived from the consideration of scenes which have not been rendered shopworn by the historians, or trite by the globe-trotters.

Silbermann. By Jacques de Lacretelle. Boni and Liveright. $2.

This novel—which was awarded the Prix Femina-Vie Heureuse—is a sinewy, unsentimental narrative in which the antagonism between a French schoolboy and his Jewish associate is unfolded with dramatic directness. In a style quite free of affectations, the story is developed, with sympathy which keeps within the bounds of restraint and with an understanding which enables one to see both sides of the prejudice.

The Story of Man's Mind. By George Humphrey. Small, Maynard and Company. $3.

This is an intelligible treatment of the growth of the powers of the mind, written for the lay reader. It is as clear as a magazine short story, and more interesting than most. The book appears superficial, so successfully has the author laid aside the technical vocabulary and used the language of everyday speech; but there is nothing superficial in the material set forth. Even the slight treatment of psychoanalysis is illuminating to the uninitiated. The volume may be cordially recommended as a clear book upon an important and cloudy subject.

Trobar Clus. By Ramon Guthrie. Northampton, Massachusetts: Norman Fitts. $2.

Very able poems conceived in Ezra Pound's two veins—Provençal and enfant terrible. There are engaging translations from Bertran de Born, and there is effective satire in the more modern portions.

The Terms of Conquest. By Howard Vincent O'Brien. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

This is a novel about a man who is as hard as nails, but there's about as much variety in a volume of him as there is in a keg of them. The driving power of business needs to be transformed if it is to be made the motive force in a work of fiction; Mr. O'Brien has used it pretty much in its original state, with a consequent sacrifice of subtlety and imaginative insight.

Gitta Gradova

By HENRIETTA STRAUS

ONE'S musical adventures in the concert halls are not always crowned by personal encounter afterwards in the green-room. But Gitta Gradova is one of those rare musicians in whom the miracle of the artist is repeated in the human being. Whether one meets her as a pianist, or as a girl still in her teens, she challenges one's heart and one's brains. For hers is not that wandering genius that comes and goes at will, like a stranger at a hostelry, but that permanent, all-embracing kind, the fine flowering of a race. One feels that back of her dominant musical personality lies another even more powerful—the combined heritage of a supremely intellectual, emotional, philosophical, and mystical ancestry. We find it taking outlet in Bach, an intellectual and a mystic, and the father of modern harmony; in Franck, the apostle of modern Catholicism; in Chopin, the founder of modern piano music, and the emotional forerunner of Scriabin; and, finally, in Scriabin himself, that burning devotee of occultism, who tried to translate his creed into music. And in Gitta Gradova we find it renewing its strength in the most profound introspection.

The result is extraordinary. Her Scriabin has all the myriad dynamics that every pianist seeks, and at the same time she does for him what no other pianist has yet been able to do—she pierces those outer wrappings that make their appeal solely to the nerves and reveals the flame that was the man himself. For the first time, we hear not only the poet who drank in the world through his senses, but the philosopher who tried to give it back again through his soul—the true Scriabin. And for the first time, too, with her, we hear the true César Franck. For she makes us lose the gentle dreamer and the mystic in the humanitarianism of the man, until we listen as though we were listening in a cathedral. There is a certain inevitability in the way she thus lays bare stratum upon stratum of emotion, so that each becomes in turn an outer garment. She does it to Ravel, and reveals wells of tenderness beneath his formal classicism. Her Bach I have not yet heard; but Chopin she strips, on the one hand, of all the sickly sentimentalism of the salon, and, on the other, of all the clogging traditions of the concert platform, until we finally meet a fiery, revolutionary spirit, suffering, poetic, melancholy, but always vibrant.

Yet in spite of the astonishing resources of her personality, she has apparently been drawing upon them only for the last four years. Before then she had glittered as a Wunderkind, at the usual expense of the Wunderkind in childhood and education. Then came the teacher who rescued her from this devastating exploitation and who opened up for her new worlds of vision and life—the worlds of art, philosophy, and literature. Many other teachers have claimed her, of course, but she herself claims only one—this woman who finally awakened her. Until then the mystic in her had lain dormant. Scriabin, for instance, she hated. Yet it was through Scriabin that she first found herself. And this psychic kinship with the Russian mystic still forms the basis of her musical philosophy.

There is something curiously moving in the sincerity which she brings to life, and in the passion with which she proclaims it, for at the same time she also trumpets her extreme youth. Yet, with this, youth in her seems to end. From the moment when she walks out on the platform until she walks back one realizes that here is an artist of perfect poise who knows exactly what she wants to say and how to say it. Here are no hesitant impulses, no faltering fingers, but a tremendous musical mentality guiding an equally tremendous technic, and controlling an unsurpassed variety of tonal color. Indeed, in the final summing up of Gitta Gradova, one must rank her not only as one of the great artists of today, but also as the foremost woman pianist now before the public.

Drama

Past and Present

A DISTINGUISHED American novelist depicting two people in an unusual social and moral situation lets these two people search within themselves for all the emotions which, under the circumstances, tradition and precept had taught them that they were bound to experience. With some surprise and more relief they discover that they are wholly innocent of the psychical processes expected. In this distinction, which has never been sufficiently emphasized, lies the real difference between the literature of, roughly, the past half century and the literature—saving the greatest—of the entire past. For observation without antecedent theory—that, as far as human experience goes, and that alone, has some chance of saving us.

This may seem an intolerably pedantic introduction to some remarks on the Provincetown Players' altogether charming revival of "Fashion" by Anna Cora Mowatt, an American comedy which, in the year 1845, was declared to be the "first attempt to exhibit on the American stage a picture of American society and manners," had a run that, for those days, was of phenomenal duration, and is still held by historians to be the first memorable play of native origin. Poe, to be sure, saw through it. He spoke of its "total deficiency in verisimilitude." But even Poe hedged. London, moreover, was as well pleased as New York. Mrs. Mowatt was compared to Garrick, Colman, and Sheridan and was declared to have proved that "a strictly American drama can be called into existence."

Well, the comparison was not so very absurd. "Fashion" and "The School for Scandal" are related as are the ox-cart and the stage-coach. Both are frozen patterns of preconceived notions as to how people felt and acted. A gleam of any bit of genuine observation surprises and delights us equally in both. That the independent farmer was a model of all the virtues, especially the democratic ones, was an assumption of a certain type of early nineteenth-century idealism. Hence Mrs. Mowatt's deus ex machina and raisonneur is an independent farmer, and a ditty is sung in his praise. That is assumption number one. Assumption number two is that the pedantic, pale, and uncomfortable virtues which he proclaims are both useful and agreeable. Mrs. Mowatt envisaged neither her farmer nor the virtues he proclaims. Her own life seems to have been rich, gay, bold, and vivid. But so soon as her pen touched paper she ceased to think, to let herself feel, to reason from experience.

I am betrayed into this discourse by a remark of Mr. Kenneth Macgowan, who is responsible, I believe, for this quaint, delightful, and hilarious revival. "The thing," I said, "didn't have to be burlesqued; it burlesques itself." "Wait and see," he retorted, "how our stuff will seem in a hundred years." And this is what I deny. We observe; we record. The difference between, say, "Tarnish" and "Fashion" is a difference almost in kind. Observation has almost awakened new senses. Consider an Elizabethan anthology and a modern one. The former may have more music and superficial charm. It tells us nothing. All its conceptions are preconceptions. The latter opens worlds—of nature, of the inconceivably intricate soul of man.

You may see "Fashion" without any such burdensome observations. It is exquisitely done. It is of an adorable innocence. I wanted the intermissions to be longer so that I could linger over a marvelous reproduction of the original curtain. All the properties are idyllic in their American early Victorianism. The acting is delicious; the contemporary songs, especially the ditty entitled "Call me pet names, dear; call me a bird," are beyond price. As a subject for intelligent, for almost kulturhistorisch laughter, I commend "Fashion" with enthusiasm. I have seen it once; I plan to go again.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents
FAY Bainter in
"THE OTHER ROSE"
with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 46th Street
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

BELMONT
49 St. E. of Bway
Evs. 8:30. Mats.
Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

4th
Month

tarnish

"Admirable and moving play, superbly cast and acted."—Ludwig Lewisohn,
THE NATION.

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!
DAVID BELASCO Presents
LIONEL BARRYMORE
with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Evs. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Theat., 41st St., W. of Broadway, Evs., 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander
Woollcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

"One play
in a thousand"

Alexander Woollcott
in the Herald

Outward Bound with a Distinguished Cast
at the
RITZ THEATRE
West 48 St. Evs. 8:30.
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

PRINCESS THEATRE 39th Street
East of Broadway. Evs.
Thurs. and Sat., 2:45. Matinees
8:45.

SUN UP With
LUCILLE LA VERNE
By LULA VOLLMER

YIDDISH ART THEATRE 27th St. and
Madison Ave.
Maurice Swartz, Director
Abraham Goldfaden's classic comedy revival
"THE TWO KOONY LAMMELS"
Friday, 8:30
Also Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30

Courses

RAND SCHOOL
7 East 15th Street

Feb. 14, 8:40 P.M. Herman Epstein
"Meaning of Music"

Feb. 16, 2:00 P.M. A. A. Goldenweiser
"Psychological Sidelights"

Feb. 20, 8:40 P.M. Morris Hillquitt
"New Problems for Radicals"

Feb. 20, 8:40 P.M. Willy Pogany
"Lectures on Art"

Write for Bulletin

International Relations Section

Saving Hungary

By EMIL LENGYEL

THE Hungarian loan which, according to plans elaborated by the financial experts of the League of Nations, will be offered for subscription simultaneously in New York, London, and Paris is the second financial experiment of the League. The object of the first international loan negotiated under its auspices was to rehabilitate the finances of Austria. It is considered as one of its main results that Austria has today the only stabilized currency in Europe. The era of prosperity, ushered in by the process of stabilization, following a long period of economic depression in Austria, verified the contention of those who held that it was not the depreciation of the Austrian currency which was the cause of the breakdown of her fiscal system but its fluctuation, which made its role illusory as a standard of values.

It was with an eye upon the example of the stabilizing process in Austria that Count Stephen Bethlen, Prime Minister of Hungary, applied to the League of Nations for a Hungarian loan. Unlike Austria, Hungary has experienced a series of economical crises during the last year. The Hungarian currency joined the rank of those continental European exchanges whose value has been dwindling to microscopic dimensions. Subsequently resort was taken to the printing presses, whose feverish activity was followed by the familiar signs of an economic collapse. As a shortcut to more normal economic conditions the help of the League of Nations was invoked. A financial delegation appointed by the League went to Budapest last November in order to obtain first-hand information concerning Hungarian conditions. The granting of the loan was recommended and preliminary arrangements were made.

It soon developed, however, that the difficulties in the way of a Hungarian loan were much greater than those with which the advocates of the loan for Austria had had to contend.

When the case of the Austrian loan came up for consideration by the League there was practically no opposition to it. Financially it was desirable not only for Austria but also for the surrounding countries that the Austrian Federal Republic should be put on its feet again. Vienna, the capital of Austria, has never ceased to be the natural trade center of most of Central and Eastern Europe. Its location as well as its traditions of long standing secured for it a privileged position as the commercial and financial clearing-house of the Danube basin. Whatever fate, therefore, overtook Vienna was bound to react on the welfare of all the nations whose business interests were interlocked with those of the Austrian capital. It was conceded that without a prosperous Vienna a prosperous Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, or Rumania was a dream. And as the prosperity of Vienna could not be dissociated from a prosperous Austria, the financial rehabilitation of the Alpine republic was decided upon.

Politically, Austria occupied an equally advantageous position. Ever since the end of the hostilities it has been considered the "good boy" among the defeated nations. Never for a moment was Austria in danger of a monarchist restoration. The provisions of the Treaty of Saint Germain were complied with to the letter. Compulsory military service was abolished without the intervention of more than a nominal control by the Allies.

Thus, the Powers were assured that by supporting the request of Austria for an international loan they would not go counter to their own interests, and at the same time they could assure themselves that, desperate as was the financial situation of Austria, there could be no hope of collecting any reparation payments. The problem was, therefore, to secure for Austria an international loan which should be unencumbered with dues accruing on her reparation account. The revenues of the Austrian customs duties and of her tobacco monopoly were designated as collateral of a loan of 650 million gold crowns which was raised subsequently. To make the proposition more attractive Great Britain, France, Italy, Czecho-Slovakia, and Belgium guaranteed the loan.

Quite different is the case of Hungary. Ever since the downfall of the government of Count Karolyi in 1919 political conditions have been chaotic in the land of the Magyars. In addition to two attempts at monarchist restoration a number of political murders have been committed and a reign of terror carried on. The military provisions of the Treaty of the Trianon were quite openly violated. The war of revenge was continually preached even by responsible statesmen. The anemic attempts of a few liberal newspapers to make popular a policy of reconciliation toward the neighboring nations were mercilessly suppressed, while the most inflammatory articles of reactionary publications against the "rapacious vultures who have benefited from the dismemberment of Hungary" were passed unnoticed by an otherwise watchful censorship. The so-called irredentist societies were tolerated, while a political party which tried to propagate republicanism was dissolved.

When, therefore, the request of the Hungarian Government for an international loan was submitted to the League of Nations the countries adjoining Hungary, and more particularly the member states of the Little Entente, announced their wish to participate in the elaboration of the plan of reconstruction. Their chief aim was to prevent Hungary from spending the proceeds of the prospective loan for military purposes. On the other hand, the Hungarian Government expressed its suspicion that the Little Entente might find this a favorable moment to interfere with the home affairs of Hungary or to infringe upon her sovereignty. In order to dispel the apprehensions of both parties a preliminary diplomatic protocol was drawn up which is known as Protocol I. This document, as published by the Hungarian Government, is in the following terms:

PROTOCOL I

The Government of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, the Government of the French Republic, the Government of His Majesty the King of Italy, the Government of His Majesty the King of Rumania, the Government of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, and the Government of the Czecho-Slovak Republic,

While expressing their desire to cooperate in the work of the financial and economic rehabilitation of Hungary,

Acting exclusively in the interest of Hungary, of universal peace, and in accordance with those duties which they have taken upon themselves as members of the League of Nations,

Hereby declare solemnly:

That they will respect the political independence, the territorial integrity, and the sovereignty of Hungary.

That they are not and will not engage in procuring for themselves any advantages or privileges which may, directly or indirectly, endanger the independence of Hungary.

That they will refrain from such activities as are contradictory to the spirit of the agreement that is to be concluded between the interested Powers with a view to the economic and financial rehabilitation of Hungary and from such activities as may endanger those guaranties which the underwriting Powers will select in an effort to safeguard the interests of the lenders.

And that, in order to make it certain that these principles shall be respected by all nations, they will apply in controversial cases to the League of Nations either individually or collectively, in accordance with the Covenant of the League of Nations, by whose award they will abide.

On the other hand, the Government of Hungary:

Undertakes to fulfil loyally the obligations imposed upon it by the Treaty of the Trianon, more eminently those of a military character,

And declares:

That it will refrain from such activities as are contradictory to the spirit of the agreement that is to be concluded between the interested Powers with a view to the economic and financial rehabilitation of Hungary and from such activities as may endanger those guaranties which the underwriting Powers will select in an effort to safeguard the interest of the lenders.

Within the limits set by the provisions of the Treaty of the Trianon Hungary is free to determine the schedule of customs duties, to conclude commercial and financial agreements, and to settle such questions as affect her economic and commercial connections with foreign countries. However, Hungary must not endanger her economic independence by establishing such relations with other states as would be likely to become a menace to her sovereignty.

The present protocol is open for signature to all Powers.

The financial provisions of the international agreement concerning the loan differ considerably from those which were adopted in the case of Austria. The loan amounts only to 250 million gold crowns, whose refund, unlike the Austrian loan, is not guaranteed by the Powers. For the service of interest and amortization the revenues of the customs duties, of the tobacco, sugar, and salt taxes will be set aside. As a preliminary requirement of the financial salvaging of Hungary the raising of an internal loan of 50 million gold crowns was agreed upon. If this amount cannot be raised by voluntary subscription compulsion will be resorted to, which will take the form of a capital levy. According to present arrangements, the money printing presses will be stopped by the end of March. Simultaneously, a new bank of issue will be set up possessing an initial capital of 30 million gold crowns.

One of the most important deviations from the Austrian plan is that part of the proceeds of the loan will be set aside to cover reparations payments. From the month of June, 1926, Hungary will have to pay annually 10 million gold crowns on account of reparations.

The main details of the loan are embodied in the so-called Protocol II, which according to the Budapest newspaper Vilag contains the following provisions:

The Hungarian Government is obliged to find ways and means to increase national revenues and to cut down expenses. The national budget will have to be prepared every six months. The League of Nations will appoint a commissioner whom the Hungarian Government is obliged to assist by every means at its disposal. The decisions of the commissioner can be appealed to the Council of the League of Nations. A committee will be appointed by the Reparation Commission to see that Hungary complies with the reparation provisions of the agreement. The amortization of the loan will be effected during a period of twenty years. The Hungarian Parliament is required to confer upon the Government full power to represent it in all dealings with the financial section of the League of Nations.

In addition to the contractual obligations the Hungarian Government was advised by the Powers to establish "friendly relations with the neighboring states and to eliminate those artificial obstacles which are in the way of an unhampered intercourse among the nations." As one of the first measures along these lines the Hungarian Government made it known recently that the import and export restrictions will be abolished "unless their maintenance is warranted by the vital interests of home industries."

As could have been foreseen, the action of the League of Nations encountered considerable opposition in Hungary itself. Members of the hypertrophied Hungarian national army are concerned over a possible stricter control of the military affairs of Hungary. The extremists, whose power is much more real than that of the Government, are puzzled over the potential "outside interference," by which they understand the possibility of energetic representations on the part of the commissioner of the League to prevent terrorism involving the loss of life, property, and foreign goodwill, which may affect unfavorably the prospects of a successful execution of the reconstruction scheme. In order to demonstrate their opposition to the action of the League of Nations the Hungarian reactionary societies adopted a policy of increased intimidation. The recent outrageous bomb attack of reactionaries at the Jewish women's charity ball in Csongrád, in the course of which many lives were lost, was apparently calculated to discredit the Hungarian Government.

Despite the violent opposition of the extreme right it is assumed that the Government will have a parliamentary majority sufficient to have the protocols ratified. For Europe, this second experiment of salvaging a country is all the more important because it affords opportunity to study at a close range the execution of a plan in which not only the financial rehabilitation of a country, as in the case of Austria, but also the solution of the reparation problem is attempted. Hungary's case, on a smaller scale, applies to the problem of Germany.

South Africa Declares Economic Independence

1. A CHALLENGE FROM GENERAL SMUTS

"IMPERIAL PREFERENCES" are the central theme of present British overseas commercial policy—a method of securing raw materials from the dominions and of marketing manufactured products in the dominions. Britain is prepared to carry out her part of the bargain, but there seems to be great difficulty in keeping the dominions in line.

The latest declaration of dominion independence comes from South Africa, and it is voiced by no less a person than General Smuts. Writing in the Manchester Guardian Commercial for October 4, 1923, on the subject of South Africa as a Dominion Opportunity for British Capital, General Smuts comments at length on the new spirit which has arisen among South African business men. He writes:

It is significant from the British manufacturer's point of view that a number of local industries in the Union today are being bolstered up at the expense of the imported article, which in a number of cases cannot hope to compete with the local product on account of the prohibitive import duties. This has proved to be particularly the case in regard to foot-wear.

2. BOOTS AND SHOES

An official publication, the South African Journal of Industries for November, 1923, contains some additional information concerning South African boot and shoe competition with the British manufacturers. Boot and shoe imports into the Union of South Africa are valued at about 5 million dollars a year. At the same time, this publication notes:

South Africa is a very large producer and exporter of hides and skins of good quality, and nearly 10 million dollars' worth were exported in 1922.

Thus the value of raw materials exported is double the value of foot-wear imported. The Journal continues:

It is only in recent years, however, that these materials have been utilized locally for the production of manufactured leather goods. At the present time much attention is being devoted to the boot and shoe industry, and the industry has been assisted by an increase in the duty on boots and shoes from 20 per cent to 30 per cent ad valorem.

3. THE PREFERENCES

The preferences given by South Africa to products of the United Kingdom may be important in theory. In practice they are comparatively insignificant. Thus, the Manchester Guardian Commercial for October 4 notes that the total imports into the Union of South Africa from the United Kingdom in 1921 were valued at 27.1 million pounds sterling, while the amount of the preferential rebate on these goods was only 751 thousand pounds sterling.

4. GENERAL INDUSTRIAL GROWTH

"Statistics of Production," an official publication of the Union of South Africa, in its 1922 edition, reports the total number of industrial establishments as follows:

1916.....	3,998	1919.....	5,968
1917.....	5,305	1920.....	6,890
1918.....	5,918	1921.....	7,005

The greatest increase occurred during the war, but since 1919 each year records a steady growth.

This industrial growth is quite generally distributed. Thus, the number of metal, engineering, machinery, and cutlery works was reported as 486 in 1916, 753 in 1919, and 897 in 1921; the number of factories engaged in the production of clothing increased from 421 in 1916 to 668 in 1921; vehicle factories numbered 311 in 1916 and 888 in 1921; there were 131 leather and leather-ware factories in 1916 and 263 in 1921. All of these productive activities compete with those of Great Britain, and all of them have continued to grow since the war.

5. WHAT SOUTH AFRICA PROPOSES TO DO

The policy that South African business men must pursue under these circumstances is very plain. The South African Journal of Industries, already referred to, takes up the wool industry as typical:

The abnormal conditions brought about by the war, and the enormous increase in the cost of freight, and the higher rate of wages caused by labor trouble overseas have given South Africa a splendid opportunity of establishing a woolen industry on a sound basis.

These conditions, together with the fact that "the abundance of native labor and the proximity of the supplies of raw materials are great advantages," make it inevitable that the active business interests in South Africa should do their own wool manufacturing.

Not only that, but "the scouring of wool for export is also to be carried on, and this will lead to a saving of freight and railage on the price landed at the port of shipment." In addition, the valuable by-products, such as wool-grease, will be retained in South Africa, where they will find a ready market.

Heretofore "almost the whole Union wool-clip has been shipped overseas, there to be manufactured into goods which are brought back to South Africa." From this time forward, however, South African policy is to undergo a decided change and with the greatest possible expedition wool is to be manufactured from home raw materials and the product sold in the home market.

A Fascist Labor Program

THE manager of the press office of the Fascist labor federation has sent us a copy of the program of the federation, from which we take the following passages:

Organization of society on a syndical basis; representation of the interests of all sections and classes in the syndical organization. So, syndicalism is no longer, as formerly, a specific expression of classes' and workers' sectional interests but . . . it becomes a constitutional manifestation of the people at large; in other words, it identifies itself with the nation.

The interest and the duty of all classes is a progressive and intense production, proportionate to the ever-growing needs of the nation; such interest consists in a struggle against the wasting of riches as well as against parasitism. . . .

Fascist syndicalism affirms that the development of production implies the increase of invested capital in ever more perfected forms of production—an increase which ought to happen not at the expense of salaries.

The increase of productive activities means an expansion of riches and an enlargement of the middle class. It becomes essential, then, to give the elite of the working class a chance for the direct acquisition and management of the instruments and means of production.

We have no objection to any form . . . of organization of labor, provided that it really represents technical capacity and intelligence . . . and provided that it remains on a basis of free competition, without interference on the part of the state organs. We are firmly convinced that all classes are necessary, so far as they are able to fulfil a function inherent in the hierarchical division of capacities, a thing indispensable to a scientific organization of production.

However, the specific principle of Fascist syndicalism does not admit the organization of labor along class lines with the purpose of disrupting production; it cannot admit either general strikes embracing all the industries, or a strike of a single industry covering the whole national territory.

On the contrary, the "struggle for capacities" admits the practice of factional struggle, with an eventual implication of the right to strike, although such strikes ought to be localized, or called against groups obnoxious to the general interests of labor and national production; otherwise the struggle would become of a political character. . . .

At present the Confederation numbers fourteen sections: agriculture, industry, intellectual professions, theater, clerks, sanitary workers, harbor workers, hotel workers, artistic trades, cinema, food, aeronautics, state industries, transportation and communications.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1924

No. 3060

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	217
EDITORIALS:
"A Business Administration"	220
Europe's Sea-Power Bloc	221
Prisons for Minds	221
Greeks, Girls, and 1914	222
DENBY'S "LOST" LETTER. By Oswald Garrison Villard	223
PROGRESSIVISM AT ST. LOUIS. By Norman Thomas	224
ADVICE TO A CLAM-DIGGER: AN AMERICAN GEORGIC. By Wilbert Snow	224
THESE UNITED STATES—XLV. RHODE ISLAND: A LIVELY EXPERIMENT. By Robert Cloutman Dexter	226
JACQUES LOEB. By Eduard Uhlenhuth	229
NIGHT THOUGHTS. By W. L. Werner	230
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	230
CORRESPONDENCE	231
BOOKS:
Available Religion. By E. S. Martin	233
O Pirates! By Arthur Warner	234
Feminine Epicures. By Henry T. Finck	234
Science or Propaganda. By Joseph Jastrow	235
"Past Tenses." By Lisle Bell	235
Wanted: The Spirit of Peace. By William MacDonald	236
Resurrecting the Ancient East. By E. G. H. Kraeling	236
Your Little Boy. By Ernest Gruening	237
Books in Brief	237
DRAMA:
Inferno. By Ludwig Lewisohn	238
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The "Inexperience" of British Labor. By Herbert W. Horwill	240
The Franco-Czech Alliance	241
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER
LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY	IRITA VAN DOREN
MANAGING EDITOR	LITERARY EDITOR
ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
ANATOLE FRANCE	JOHN A. HOESON
ROBERT HERRICK	H. L. MENCKEN
	NORMAN THOMAS
	CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

AFTER WHISPERING "I will ne'er consent" to his resignation, Edwin Denby consented. He would never, never resign under fire, and yet he resigned. President Coolidge would never, never act upon the Senate's demand that he call for Mr. Denby's resignation; he would never, never act until "special counsel can advise me as to the legality of these leases and assemble for me the pertinent facts in the various transactions"—but he acted upon Secretary Denby's resignation without waiting for advice or assembling of facts. It is a good beginning and Mr. Denby was well advised to quit. His real reason is probably not yet public, but may be apparent before this issue reaches our readers. So may other altogether startling facts. If Edward McLean is granted immunity and turns state's evidence, the true inwardness of things will begin to appear, and many another political reputation will suffer. Meanwhile, Denby is finished; he will neither annex the North Pole to the United States nor continue to voice as an official his demand for huge armaments; an equally dull and stupid man can never succeed him. On February 6 The Nation called for the retirement from public life of Denby, Daugherty, Roosevelt, and Coolidge. Denby has gone; Daugherty and Roosevelt are going, and we predict that Mr. Coolidge will retire to private life March 4, 1925, by which time Albert B. Fall ought to be facing a criminal sentence.

"SOME MEN leave public office to practice law. Mr. McAdoo left to practice son-in-law." To this bon mot, which Washington attributes to Senator James Reed, little needs to be added after the perusal of Mr. McAdoo's testimony before the Lenroot Committee. He accepted a huge retainer to go to Mexico for the oil interests; it is impossible to believe that he could actually separate William G. McAdoo, the lawyer, from William G. McAdoo, the son-in-law, or William G. McAdoo, ex-cabinet member. There was nothing criminal in this; it was his right to so act. But unfair as it may seem to him, it eliminates Mr. McAdoo from the presidential race. So does this: He took, on quitting the Cabinet, a $50,000 fee from the Virginia Shipbuilding Corporation, a Charles W. Morse concern, and $50,000 from the similarly owned Groton Iron Company. Next he represented Charles W. Morse's United States Transport Company, and for that ex-criminal and this company Mr. McAdoo sold, to French and Italian merchants—just after he had been in close financial relations with their governments as war-time head of the United States Treasury—at least 800,000 tons of coal on which his firm was paid one dollar a ton. It will be recalled that Mr. Doheny stated that he "needed the services of this [Mr. McAdoo's] firm before the Shipping Board." Finally, Mr. McAdoo's firm opposed claims against Morse's concern although there is a law that officials who resign may not prosecute before, or resist claims against, their former departments for two years after resignation. Legally Mr. McAdoo did not come under this law; morally it applied to him. No; Mr. McAdoo is not available for the Presidency whatever his cohorts think.

"FORTUNATELY AMERICAN NEWSPAPERS, with whatever faults and defects they may be charged," said the New York Times on February 10, 1924, "are not open to the accusation of venality." Mr. Adolph Ochs, owner of the Times, had made the same statement a week earlier in replying publicly to The Nation's revelations of the venality of the French press. Unfortunately, the day before Mr. Ochs's editorial appeared, Frederick Bonfils, owner of the Denver Post, testified in Washington that he had obtained $250,000 from Mr. Sinclair after attacking Mr. Sinclair and his oil policies in his paper. It was hinted by Senator Dill that the payment partook of the nature of blackmail. The Times still had faith. "We are safe in saying," it proclaimed the next day, "that these Denver performances are altogether exceptional and that such things would not be found and if found would not be tolerated in any respectable newspaper office in the United States." A little depends upon the definition of the words "respectable newspaper office"; Mr. Ochs and The Nation might define them differently. At any rate Mr. John C. Shaffer, owner of the Chicago Evening Post, the Indianapolis Star, the Muncie Star, the Terre Haute Star, the Rocky Mountain News, and the Denver Times, followed Mr. Bonfils on the witness-stand and testified that he had received $92,500 from Mr. Sinclair, without rendering any service whatever in return. The senators rather rudely implied that Mr. Shaffer got less than Mr. Bonfils only because the circulation of his Denver paper was less. Carl C.

Magee, former owner of the Albuquerque Journal, also appeared to testify that after his paper had attacked the Fall-Sinclair oil policies it had been bought, through a Chicago bank affiliated with Standard Oil interests. Mr. Ochs chose a poor moment to eulogize the American press.

WE HAVE OUR OIL SCANDAL; France has her reconstruction. Only a portion of the claims for war damages entered and paid have been reexamined; but already frauds and overpayments totaling more than 5 billion francs lie uncovered. M. Reibel, the Minister for the Devastated Regions, appears to have done everything in his power to obstruct the investigation now under way, and none of M. Poincaré's Cabinet has shown any more enthusiasm for publishing the truth than, say, have members of Mr. Coolidge's Cabinet in the United States. There is another parallel; M. Loucheur, who had come to regard himself as heir presumptive to M. Poincaré, has been so tarred in the course of the revelations that his chance of future office seems slight. Opposition speakers freely assert that a full quarter of the 80 billion francs paid out as compensation to inhabitants of the devastated districts has been absorbed in sheer graft. The humble creditors, the peasants, shopkeepers, and small townsmen, have got literally nothing. It has been the deliberate policy of the French Government ever since 1919 to compensate the factory owners first and trust to fate to save the individuals who lost all. While these poor men were waiting for ready money speculators with an "inside track" have bought up their claims at bargain rates. The crime is worse because the French Government has sought to justify its international piracy by proclaiming the need of these its victims.

THE PASSIVE RESISTANCE IN THE RUHR ceased in September, nearly six months ago, but in the Rhineland there are still 564 political prisoners in French prisons, in Hesse 271, in the Palatinate 368, and in the Ruhr no less than 1,122. Altogether, there are 2,335 German prisoners behind French bars, nearly all of whom are there simply and solely because they obeyed the orders of their government rather than those of their conquerors. Many of these men were officials of the highest standing, who committed no personal act of wrongdoing—burgomasters, assistant burgomasters, and officials of all ranks. The French have amnestied only about 150 of these political prisoners. More than that, many Germans have been deported to France under long sentences. If this were being done in any other country by any other people, the heavens would ring with the outrage. And yet French people express their wonder that German hearts were never so full of hatred for France as today, and complain because many Germans are beginning to believe that no matter what the damage done by their troops in France and Belgium, a country which can behave like France today is entitled to no reparations whatever. The French are clearly bent upon proving once more that two wrongs do not make a right, and that they do not wish to live on good terms with their eastern neighbors.

THE BRITISH LABOR GOVERNMENT seemed to have set sail under a fair following breeze; the opposition was mild and respectful; the Prime Minister's first speech, though it contained references to "sound socialist doctrine," was tempered to the formidable majority against him; an air of equable agreement seemed to pervade the political scene. Then, quite suddenly, a few puffs came out of Labor's own quarter of the compass and the ship jibed with much uncomfortable lurching and confusion. First Poplar arose out of the past to confuse the new ministers—the poverty-stricken borough of Poplar, which in 1921, faced with the impossible obligation of paying doles to its thousands of unemployed and rates to the London County Council and the Asylum Board, chose to help the workless and let the rates go. Mr. MacDonald's Minister of Health remitted the surcharges imposed by the last Government upon the Poplar Guardians for excess expenditures of borough funds for relief; and, although these surcharges were never collected and admittedly never could be collected, the new Government is facing bitter attack for its action. And on the heels of this cross-wind of opposition came the dock workers' strike: 120,000 men out, with possible resulting unemployment of a million more, and the Labor Government's Minister of Labor, Tom Shaw, unable to bring about a settlement. It would be a bitter irony if the first Labor Government should meet defeat on its own issues of unemployment and the rights of labor.

SENATOR MEDILL McCORMICK has introduced a resolution calling for the abolition of martial law in Haiti. It declares that the liability of Haitian citizens which has existed for nine years "to trial before military tribunals of the United States is undemocratic, unrepugnant, and contrary to American ideals and the policies of Warren G. Harding." It is pleasing to note that the senior Senator from Illinois has progressed, even an inch. He it was who as chairman of the Senate committee two years ago refused to grant the Haitians' plea that martial law be lifted even during the brief period of senatorial inquiry in Haiti. And it was his committee which not only whitewashed the entire occupation but tightened the economic stranglehold on Haiti which had been obtained by military force and chicane. The Nation of course agrees that the martial law under which three Haitian editors are now imprisoned, while in no sense contrary to the policy practiced by Warren G. Harding, is certainly contrary to American ideals. But equally so is the whole crime against Haiti from start to finish. We hope that Senator McCormick will go further, and that political wisdom at least, in the face of his coming campaign for reelection, will lead him to reverse his previous course and to call for the prompt restoration of complete Haitian independence.

GROVER BERGDOLL was no conscientious objector facing the music for conviction's sake; he was just a shirker seeking to slip out of trouble. But that must not keep us from voicing our emphatic protest against the public reception of Lieutenant Hooven Griffis, the reserve army officer who sat comfortably in his automobile two blocks from the German hotel from which two of his confederates sought to kidnap Bergdoll, one of them paying for his efforts with his life. This is a peculiarly outrageous bit of American lawlessness—the invasion of a friendly country to kidnap Bergdoll. One has only to consider what the uproar would have been had the conditions been reversed—had Germans sought to free one of their compatriots interned in this country—to realize the enormity of this crime. That it had semi-official sanction has never been denied—it was an official automobile which Lieutenant Griffiths used to commit his crime. But Lieutenant Griffiths comes back under the aegis and with the approval of the Hearst papers and is given an official reception by the Tammany Acting Mayor of New York City. Lieutenant Griffiths was guilty of a deliberate crime, but the War Department has taken no action in regard to it. Its attitude in this is in striking contrast to its effort to punish and intimidate another reserve officer, Captain Paxton Hibben, merely because he dared to have an opinion about Russia different from Mr. Hughes's.

OUR IMMIGRATION POLICY will, of course, be determined by our own interest. If Italy is obliged to find other outlets for her emigrants or if industrial conditions in other countries are disturbed, that is an incidental misfortune which may be regretted but hardly prevented. We have a responsibility, however, to our national honor and our friendly relations with other countries to assure ourselves that all nations shall be treated equally and that there shall be no discrimination against particular races and religions. This cannot be said, as we have pointed out before, of the bill favored by Representative Johnson and the Committee on Immigration of the House. This measure, setting back the basis of national quotas from the census of 1910, as at present, to that of 1890, is an obvious attempt to cut off almost entirely Italians, Russians, Poles, Hungarians, Greeks, and other elements of the "new immigration" which began about thirty years ago; it is a direct slap in the face to Roman Catholics and Jews, brutally inconsistent with our long-cherished ideals and boasts of America as a land of racial and religious liberty. Several years ago such a bill would have been too impossible of passage to justify alarm, but with Ku Kluxism rampant in the South and West, and most members of Congress subject to great pressure from bigoted and prejudiced constituents, the measure presents a grave danger to American ideals.

THERE IS ANOTHER dangerous aspect of this proposed immigration legislation which had received comparatively little attention until Secretary Hughes pointed out that it did away with the "gentlemen's agreement" with Japan, cutting off immigrants from that country altogether by the clause which forbids the entry of persons not eligible to citizenship. It is certainly both unnecessary and mischievous to meddle with the existing status of Japanese immigration. What is known as the "Japanese question" is almost the most delicate in our entire field of foreign relations, and there is great danger to our peace through foolish jingoism in that regard. The "gentlemen's agreement" has been scrupulously observed by Japan, and has admittedly been satisfactory to the United States. By it we actually control both the amount and the kind of Japanese immigration. The National Committee on American Japanese Relations points out that since the inauguration of this policy—from 1909 to 1923—22,737 more Japanese men left the United States (including Hawaii) than entered it; that the net increase by immigration of Japanese into the continental United States during those fifteen years was 8,681, consisting of women and children. If there are minor defects in the "gentlemen's agreement," they can easily be remedied by diplomatic action. It would be the height of folly for Congress to overthrow an international treaty, without notice to or consultation with the country concerned, in order to attain an object which can be better arrived at in another way.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE COLLEGE has dropped from its rolls Lloyd Dieffenbacher, a student preparing for the ministry, because he refused to participate longer in military drill. Mr. Dieffenbacher offered to take extra studies without credit to make up for dropping drill, but "the plea was ignored due to the clause in the college's contract with the War Department binding it to maintain a two years' compulsory course in military training." Thirty-eight Northwestern University students have gone on record that they will refuse to participate in another war. A larger conference of Northwestern students unanimously urged education to "develop international thinking" and by a vote of more than four to one favored the "complete intermingling of the races, including social." A majority objected to "endowment by great accumulations of capital, when such accumulations have resulted from exploitation of wage workers." The Daily Worker points out that this recalcitrance must cause some tension at a university that has received $4,000,000 from the widow of a late mail-order magnate and $250,000 from the widow of a lawyer who "drew large fees from the liquor interests and spent considerable effort in a vain attempt to break down the university's four-mile dry zone in the days before national prohibition." This Northwestern student conference was an echo of the stirring convention of the International Student Volunteer Movement at Indianapolis in January, when 400 of the 6,000 students present broke the official guiding-strings and asserted their determined opposition to all war. Can it be that the goose-step will be ended by the students themselves?

MR. J. P. MORGAN'S GIFT to the public of his father's glorious library together with an adequate sum for its endowment adds another to the long list of generous benefactions by New Yorkers of large wealth, such as his own father's bequests, the Tilden foundation, and the noble Frick picture gallery. This is but just; to the public and the State, from which these men have drawn their great means, they surely owe much. As for the Morgan library, its worth cannot be measured by the value put upon it, nor have the glowing press accounts exaggerated the extraordinary treasures in which it abounds. Only the collections of the nabobs of the Middle Ages are to be compared with it. One of the best features is its housing in the exquisite building of which the late Charles F. McKim was the rarely gifted designer. That the library is now, by Mr. Morgan's generosity, to be opened to all students and scholars will cause rejoicing throughout the learned world.

THE DEATH OF HENRY BACON is a blow to American architecture and art. A man of extraordinary skill and ability, he has raised more than one monument to himself, but of these none will redound more to his glory than the Lincoln Memorial in Washington. So great were his talents that, it is related of him, he never entered a competition without winning it. But he was so modest, so unassuming, so little desirous of advertising himself that the great public knew all too little about him. Indeed, his were the simplicity and modesty of true greatness. His loss, at the age of only fifty-seven, to the profession which he honored and uplifted is beyond measuring.

“A Business Administration”

WHATEVER else comes out of the oil scandals—we are only at the beginning of the revelations—it must be perfectly plain that we are getting a delightful picture of what a business government really is and exactly what Mr. Harding had in mind when he declared for a return to “normalcy.” “Get the government out of private business,” was another slogan, and so from the very outset there was a mad rush to dispose of the property of the American people to speculators, get-rich-quick men, and others of this ilk. That this was the plan from the very outset is shown by the testimony of John C. Shaffer, owner of six of our incomparable dailies. Early in March, 1921, before Secretary Fall had had time properly to warm his office chair, he was in negotiations with Mr. Shaffer to give him a slice of the Teapot Dome. Merely because he had applied for such a lease Mr. Shaffer got $92,500—virtue is sometimes generously rewarded—from the Pioneer Oil Company when it got some of the Sinclair swag. Who shall say that that was not good business—for Mr. Shaffer, at least—by a business administration?

But this is only one happening. We have now learned that the Navy Department abandoned its rich coal mines in Alaska to buy coal from private concerns. The War Department seems to have been buying powder of private manufacturers while its own plants remained idle. It is even declared that the War Department has turned over a highly profitable property to certain individuals for a long term of years. Besides the Teapot Dome reserve of 52,000 acres Secretary Fall turned over 176,000 other oil acres to private persons under the oil-leasing act. In Mexico the State Department became claim agent and attorney for the oil interests, making recognition of the Obregon Government depend upon how good the Government was to Sinclair, Doheny, and their associates. The Colombian treaty reeks with oil; Secretary Fall urged its passage on the ground that it would aid American oil concessionnaires. The policy of the Shipping Board was similarly to get the government out of private business. In brief, the whole Harding-Fall idea was, first, to turn over to their friends all the pickings possible, and, secondly, to make of their “business government” a bond servant of big business generally.

Now we are well aware that business men will rise here to insist that the Fall-Doheny type of morals is not of their standard; that only the black sheep in business life favor $100,000 cash “loans” to cabinet officers in black bags, or $1,000,000 slush funds. We are asked to forget all the revelations of “Frenzied Finance,” all the insurance scandals, the story of the New Haven Railroad and of the Rock Island road—these, too, were merely the exceptions that prove the rule. So, too, the wholesale grafting and profiteering on government contracts during the war by so many of our most devoted patriots were “purely sporadic.” Well, let us accept this theory precisely as we should like to believe that the Bonfils-Shaffer type of journalist is exceptional. The fact still remains that wherever business touches government, as it has touched it in every Republican and most Democratic administrations, corruption is inevitable. The whole tariff system is nothing but corruption of government and of public morals—the sale of government favors to the highest bidder. The business man who shrieks with anger at the possibility of socialism or at the very suggestion that there be price-fixing on behalf of the farmers or stock raisers sees no harm whatever in auctioning off tariff rates—that is, prices of manufactures—to the highest contributors to the campaign funds.

There is but one safe rule for a Washington Administration and that is the one Woodrow Wilson made when he first entered the White House—to keep business at arm's length and to deal with it in the open. But that is never the conception of a Harry Daugherty or a Warren Harding. These political plants are nurtured in a different soil. Theirs is the practical politics of the small town with its give and take of a quiet room in a local newspaper office or the Elks Club; theirs is the conception of public service of the usual sordid State Capitol—that politicians are there to help their friends and supporters, to see that these get good opportunities to make money and to help them out when they run into trouble. But back of it all is the supreme error and fallacy that government is primarily here to bring prosperity to us, to keep the dinner-pail full, in some magic way to compel good times. The voters have been trained by the politicians themselves to vent their anger upon the party in power if things go wrong, if the times are bad. The politicians' stock in trade is their promise that by doing this or by not doing that they will fill everybody's pockets. By some legislation or other they are to conjure up rich crops, fine prices for manufacturers, good wages for labor.

This was the ideal of the Harding Government; this was its ideal of “normalcy”; this was the reason why it deliberately set back the hands of time in an effort to reproduce the conditions of the McKinley Administration. This was why a “practical business-man's lawyer,” so familiar in the corridors of the State Capitol at Columbus, became Attorney General; this was why a rich and successful Boston banker became Secretary of War; this was why Secretary Mellon borrowed at from 4 to 4¾ per cent in 1923, this high rate being chiefly in the interest of the great banks with their endless millions in search of safe, short-term investments. It is just because of this theory of government that we are witnessing the present scandals. It does not do to say that they came because Fall was a bad lot and Daugherty and Denby negligent in their duties. Any group of cheap politicians put into office upon this theory and with this purpose must in the long run inevitably be corrupted.

As to the scandals, we believe that the origin of the whole mess can be traced back to that room in the Blackstone Hotel in Chicago in which on June 10, 1920, Warren Harding was nominated for the Presidency by the handful of insiders who were the real convention—the delegates as usual being merely camouflage. The Teapot Dome was given away then, and the Alaska coal mines closed down, and all the rest. Then the conspirators went out and announced to all the world that Warren Harding when elected would take the government out of business. What they really meant was that Warren Harding would put the government into business; that it would become the ally and partner of the get-rich-quick men, the speculators, and the promoters who crowd to Washington.

Europe's Sea Power Bloc

DIPLOMACY, in post-war as in pre-war days, carries on under cover, and published treaties only record what the diplomats are ready to tell. The Franco-Czech alliance, printed in this week's International Relations Section of The Nation, registers little new in its explicit terms; its implications are more important than the phrasing of its clauses. After all, England had an even less explicit agreement with France and Russia in 1914; yet she felt morally bound to follow them into war. And her army was not, like the Czech army, "a child of the French army, with a French general at the top of its general staff, so that the unity of spirit and method assures common action in the face of a common danger"—as the Petit Parisien puts it.

Explicitly, France and Czecho-Slovakia agree to "discuss in common" what action they should take if their "security is threatened" (fine old wheel-horse phrases of diplomacy!) and to arbitrate their differences; and specifically, to prevent the restoration of the Hohenzollerns in Germany or of the Hapsburgs in Austria or Hungary, or the annexation of German Austria to the German Reich. It is, of course, no real business of France's or of Czecho-Slovakia's what form of government or what ruler the Germans, Austrians, or Hungarians may prefer; but the decisions here reaffirmed are decisions long ago made by the Conference of Ambassadors. The new factor, and the significant one, is that France and Czecho-Slovakia herewith serve warning that, like Italy in the Corfu dispute, they will act as they please, and not wait upon England or the League. They—no larger group—will decide what constitutes a threat of restoration or a menace to security, and will act, if they choose, as arbitrarily as France has acted in the Ruhr. It is only fair to add that when M. Poincaré urged a definite military alliance upon President Masaryk the Czech statesman refused it; it is also true, however, that without the form of words the alliance in germ exists, in the thousand French officers training the Czech army, and in the diplomatic dependence of the Czechs upon the French Foreign Office.

France already had an alliance with Poland; and Yugoslavia and Rumania were allied with Czecho-Slovakia. This treaty must have seemed to seal French hegemony in Central Europe. With Austria already a vassal of international finance and Hungary about to accept the same yoke French Mitteleuropa seemed achieved. Yet no sooner had this new alliance been signed than the rottenness in the edifice began to manifest itself. M. Benes, the able Czech foreign minister, who has steered his country's foreign policy since the armistice, went to the Belgrade Conference of the Little Entente, hoping to induce Yugoslavia and Poland to seal the structure with similar alliances, and to give the group a continental solidity by recognizing Russia and bringing her into the alliance. His plan fell flat; the other Powers disapproved his isolated action; Rumania, still at odds with Russia over Bessarabia, and indignant at the French protests against her oil-nationalization law and the consequent refusal of the French loan, stood sullenly aloof; England, rapidly followed by Italy, made peace with Russia while France wavered; and Yugoslavia suddenly, in the midst of the conference, announced agreement upon the Fiume question with Italy.

To face France's Continental Bloc a Sea-Power Bloc is arising; England and Italy are acting together; French domination at Tangier has driven Italy and Spain into each other's arms; Yugoslavia is turning to this group and away from the Little Entente; Turkey is settling her disputes with England more rapidly than those with France; and England has won the prestige of priority in recognizing Russia. France is left with Poland and Czecho-Slovakia (neither very friendly to the other) as allies, and with a disorganized Ruhr and an angry Rhineland on her hands, her hope of a Separatist movement dissolving in fearful massacres. The rapprochement of England, Italy, and Spain means, in time of crisis, a knife cutting France from her other great dream—her African Empire. French plans for a railroad across the Sahara are not mere romance; they should be read in connection with the introduction of conscription among the black peoples of Africa. French statesmen admittedly hope to more than compensate for their own low birth-rate by introducing Africa into Europe. But the Mediterranean lies between Africa and Europe, and England, Spain, and Italy dominate the Mediterranean.

All this, of course, is written in terms of the old diplomacy. Those are the terms in which Europe is thinking. There was a period, before the horror of the peace treaties was realized, when Europe was feeling its way toward a new diplomacy. Today again there is a new hope—in the presence of Ramsay MacDonald in the British Foreign Office. He sees clearly that barring a right-about-face Europe is headed for the abyss. The first necessity, of course, is to abandon the practice of alliances and oppositions, but no effective step has yet been taken toward that end. Until the League admits Soviet Russia and Germany on equal terms with France and England to its Council and Assembly it can only be an illusion and an impediment.

Prisons for the Mind

THOSE who are given to setting forth facts in the form of charts or graphs would find an interesting study in curves and angles in tracing the course of the movement to restrict freedom of thought and speech since the World War. There would be fluctuations and changes quite as remarkable as in lines showing the movement of, say, foreign immigration or the French exchange rate.

Immediately after the armistice the forces of restriction were directed toward suppressing any new political or economic theories. There was a general attack upon radicalism in political or labor organizations, led by Attorney General Palmer, the American Legion, chambers of commerce, and rotary clubs. The leadership and the animus obviously came from government circles and from big business. The federal Government prevented the impending coal strike by intimidating in the courts the officers of the United Mine Workers; the Department of Justice reveled in an orgy of illegal raids upon Reds and wholesale deportation of aliens; the States tumbled over each others' heels in passing "anti-sedition" and "anti-syndicalism" laws more drastic than anything during the war itself.

Then came a lessening of this pressure and a sudden turn of illiberalism into the field of morals and education. A passion developed to censor motion pictures and to suppress plays or books that dealt with the facts of life in anything but the conventional way. At the same time in privately supported schools and colleges a mania appeared to restrict freedom of teaching and even of student expression; Clark University was disrupted and Dr. Meiklejohn was forced out of the presidency of Amherst.

Finally we have reached a stage of intense activity among pseudo-religious and patriotic societies to stifle by law the quest of truth and the guaranty of tolerance in our public schools and State universities. Most enlightened Americans regarded it as a huge joke when last winter the Kentucky Legislature came within an ace of prohibiting the teaching of evolution. That it was far from a joke is evident from the fact that within recent weeks, as noted in these columns, the Board of Education of North Carolina has pronounced against the use in public schools of biologies that intimate "an origin of the human race other than that contained in the Bible." Texas has a law prohibiting the teaching of evolution "as a fact," while the board of regents of the University of Texas has decreed that no "infidel, atheist, or agnostic" shall be employed in any capacity. Along with this recrudescence of religious bigotry and obscurantism is an attempt to sap the integrity of scholarship and research by laws to prevent the use of books that are "unpatriotic" or tend to upset traditions in regard to any of our national "heroes." Several such laws have been passed, and New Jersey now has before it an especially absurd and dangerous bill for that purpose which, we note with pleasure, the faculty of Princeton University is undertaking to combat.

The most discouraging aspect of this assault upon scientific and religious freedom is the quarter from which it comes. This campaign, unlike that against political and economic freedom, does not spring from big business or privilege. Its source is not Wall Street but the "great open spaces" of the West and South. Its proponents are of "Nordic" stock—"original Americans." We find a progressive like Governor Blaine willing nevertheless to sign a bill denaturing the school histories in Wisconsin. This hysteria is an enslavement of the "plain people" by themselves—a black hand of ignorance and superstition trying to close the light to future generations.

The situation was well stated at the recent annual meeting of the American Historical Association as follows:

Be it Resolved, by the American Historical Association, upon the recommendation of its committee on history teaching in the schools and of its executive council, that genuine and intelligent patriotism, no less than the requirements of honesty and sound scholarship, demand that textbook writers and teachers should strive to present a truthful picture of past and present, with due regard to the different purposes and possibilities of elementary, secondary, and advanced instruction; that criticism of history textbooks should therefore be based not upon grounds of patriotism but only upon grounds of faithfulness to fact as determined by specialists or tested by consideration of the evidence; that the cultivation in pupils of a scientific temper in history and the related social sciences, of a spirit of inquiry and a willingness to face unpleasant facts, are far more important objectives than the teaching of special interpretations of particular events; . . . and

Be it Further Resolved, That in the opinion of this association the clearly implied charges that many of our leading scholars are engaged in treasonable propaganda and that tens of thousands of American school teachers and officials are so stupid or disloyal as to place treasonable textbooks in the hands of children is inherently and obviously absurd; and,

Be it Further Resolved, That the successful continuance of such an agitation must inevitably bring about a serious deterioration both of textbooks and of teaching, since self-respecting scholars and teachers will not stoop to the methods advocated.

Greeks, Girls, and 1944

THE Greeks of the fifth and fourth centuries before Christ were not feminists. Their Olympic games were severely masculine. Women could neither be competitors nor spectators. They were not even allowed to cross the Alpheus or approach the plain of Olympia while the games were in progress. The winners of the contests were honored by the proud communities from which they came; at Athens they were supported for life at public expense. Neither the honor nor the chance to live without labor was within the reach of women. The ancient Olympic games died out in the fourth century A. D. and were not revived until 1896 when the modern international Olympics were instituted at Athens. Each fourth year since then, with the exception of 1916, the Olympic games have been held in different cities. Women are now admitted both as spectators and as contestants in women's events, but their fame is of a mild luster in spite of their popularity in the Sunday picture supplements.

Now suddenly a new question arises; a woman has appeared who can outclass all the women in her field and all the men as well. She has done what no woman has done in all history: she has broken a world's record held by a man. No man in all the annals of sport has finished the quarter-mile back-stroke swim within five seconds of Miss Sybil Bauer's time, and naturally Miss Bauer wants to enter the regular event in the games. But on the other hand, no woman has ever been permitted to compete with men in the Olympic games. Shall Greek tradition be allowed so disastrously to lapse? After 2,500 womanless years, shall a girl suddenly precipitate herself into a contest of men—and then, conceivably, thrash them? Would not great Zeus himself rumble and groan on Olympus if his games were thus finally profaned?

Sybil Bauer's, after all, is a modest invasion of men's rights, but it invites interesting speculations. The women of Athens never had a chance to discover their skill or their muscles. The women of today have had only a few years of participation in sport, and even now an insignificant number of girls go into athletics as a vocation or even as a serious side-issue. The tradition of the girl athlete is not yet established. But if events move as fast for twenty years as they have in the twenty just past, who can say what the Olympic games will be like or how many world's records will hang at the belts of girl swimmers or hurdlers? It is not hard to imagine the New York Times of July 10, 1944, discussing the subject editorially. "Sports in general," it will say, "and especially swimming, are fundamentally feminine pastimes, and thus it is natural that most of the prizes in the contests just concluded at Moscow should have gone to women. After all, the exercise of speed and mere unthinking physical strength are not qualities that men should either desire or seek to develop. None the less, we are gratified to note that in this feminine field of endeavor our American girls have so clearly outclassed, etc." But perhaps, in 1944, the New York Times editorial will be written by a woman, in which case it may be different.

Denby's "Lost" Letter

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

EX-SECRETARY DENBY on October 25, 1923, handed to the committee which is investigating the oil scandals a letter covering the transfer of the oil lands, which purported to have been sent by Mr. Denby to the President on May 26, 1921. That letter was never actually sent or delivered—such, at least, is the startling deduction which results from a study of the testimony given by the ex-Secretary of the Navy and others.

Senator La Follette in his speech on the resolution demanding the resignation of ex-Secretary Denby declared that "the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation, which broke the back of the Taft Administration, did not proceed upon more damning evidence than is at hand bearing upon the leasing of these naval oil reserves." There is indeed a striking similarity between these two great scandals in the history of two Republican administrations. It will be remembered that to oblige President Taft his Attorney General, George W. Wickersham, antedated an official memorandum so as to make it appear that President Taft had that memorandum before him when he took a certain official action. The question now arises in the Fall-Denby case whether ex-Secretary Denby, or someone else, has placed a document in the records which does not belong there, in order to throw the blame on President Harding and mislead the public.

The document in question was handed to the committee immediately after ex-Secretary Denby took the stand on October 25, 1923. It was dated May 26, 1921. Leaving out the unessential parts, the document reads as follows:

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Some time ago I suggested that the Department of the Interior was the proper department to protect and conserve the naval oil reserves of the United States. . . . In a brief conversation in your office between yourself, Secretary Fall, and myself, it was agreed that you would issue an Executive order transferring the custody of the naval oil reserve from the Navy Department to the Department of the Interior. In candor and in justice to the officials of the Navy Department, having charge of this particular matter, I must admit that the suggestion met with considerable resistance from them. I, however, proceed upon the theory, which I know to be the policy of the Administration, that governmental activities properly pertaining to one department and are operated by another shall be allocated to the department under which they belong, and I cannot avoid a conclusion that the custody of oil lands is the proper province of the Department of the Interior. . . . In consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, an Executive order has been drawn that is satisfactory to him and to me, copy of which I inclose herewith for your consideration. In conversation with the Secretary of the Interior, I have been personally reassured that he approves of this transfer and the form of the Executive order inclosed herein, and further, that he will give his best efforts to the conserving underground as much oil as possible for emergency purposes, and that he will also preserve, as far as may be, the navy's proportion of any oil that may be taken out under lease by private parties. He also states that in the development of any large policies concerning these lands he will not proceed without consultation with the Navy Department.

I submit the matter to you for your consideration, and recommend that the inclosed Executive order, or one similar to it in form, be promulgated. If you care to hear from the officers of the navy who are directly concerned and who may desire to lay before you their views in regard to this transfer, I shall direct them to report to you at your convenience. I inclose herein a memorandum upon this subject drafted by Rear Admiral Griffin, chief of the Bureau of Engineering, in which the navy's position heretofore mentioned is set forth.

I beg that this matter may receive early attention, as bids were recently called for for the drilling of offset wells. These bids have been received but not opened. If this transfer to the Department of the Interior shall take place, I shall place them together with other papers in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior for such disposition as he may deem best. If the transfer is not to take place, I must at once proceed to open the bids and salvage as much oil as may be saved from drainage through private wells outside the naval reserves.

Very respectfully,

EDWIN DENBY

May 26, 1921

THE PRESIDENT,
THE WHITE HOUSE

Now the interesting thing about this document is that it exists only in the copy submitted by ex-Secretary Denby to the committee in such a hurry at the very beginning of his testimony. Senator Walsh made the most vigorous efforts to get the original of this letter, which was drawn to make out a clever case for Mr. Denby if it was not original. Vital as it is to his case, there is no copy of it in the files of the Navy Department, nor in the files of the Interior Department, nor in the files of the State Department (where the executive order is to be found), and what is more important, the original letter cannot be found in the files of the White House. Mr. Latta, in charge of the White House correspondence, reported that a careful search of the files had been made—in vain. So did Mr. Reichard on behalf of the Department of the Interior; neither was the Bureau of Mines able to produce such a letter. Although it was such an apparently complete statement of the way the naval reserves were transferred to Secretary Fall, it was not thought of sufficient importance, apparently, to be worth recording in the Executive Mansion or in three other important bureaus or departments of the Government at Washington.

Not only do the records of these several departments contain no trace of this remarkable letter of ex-Secretary Denby, but there is no proof that it ever reached the President, either in the form submitted by ex-Secretary Denby or in any subsequent revision. Assistant Secretary Roosevelt has testified that he personally took the executive order to the President on May 31 and obtained Mr. Harding's signature. Under oath he testified when asked whether he took a letter from ex-Secretary Denby to the President: "No; I do not think I took any letter. I think I took nothing but the executive order with me." More than that, Mr. Ogle, who is in charge of the Navy Department's records, has corroborated Mr. Roosevelt's statement by reporting that the records "disclose no submission of the said letter to the President." Now the alleged Denby letter bears date of May 26 and asks for immediate consideration by the President. Mr. Roosevelt swears that he did not go to the President until May 31, five days after the day which ex-Secretary Denby wanted the committee to believe was the one on which he had sent to the President the letter in question, which letter Mr. Harding plainly never saw in any form whatsoever.

Indeed, the question now arises whether the whole letter was not a fake drawn up to make a record where a record did not exist. Curiously enough, ex-Secretary Denby, as Representative from Michigan, was one of the members of the Congressional Committee which inquired into the Ballinger charges and was, therefore, entirely familiar with the predating of the Wickersham memorandum to make it appear that President Taft had read it when he took his official action, when as a matter of fact he had not done so, the memorandum not even being in existence at the time. It is a special crime under the federal statute to alter the date or text of a public document for purposes of deception.

Returning once more to the Denby letter, the committee had the greatest difficulty in tracing the Griffin inclosure which Mr. Denby's letter said was transmitted therewith. Not until repeated demands had been made was Admiral Griffin's memorandum found. Even Rear Admiral Griffin when called to the witness stand was very vague in his recollection of it. At one point in his testimony he declared that he had made no written report but only a verbal one to the ex-Secretary.

Ex-Secretary Denby first declared: "I do not know whether Admiral Griffin wrote a letter to the President protesting against the transfer or not." His memory being refreshed by a quotation from the letter under scrutiny, he said, "Well, we shall certainly look up a letter if we can find it and will transmit it." Later ex-Secretary Denby's secretary testified: "The memorandum that you speak of has been searched for and not found." Subsequently, in some mysterious way, the memorandum was discovered—only to have it appear that it is dated May 27 or a day after the Denby letter of May 26 which purported to inclose it! It was important enough to be referred to in the alleged letter to the President, but was not important enough to keep in the Navy files or to find a place in either the White House files or in the Admiral's memory. Is it possible that the fact that seven officers of the Navy Department, who protested against the transfer of the naval oil reserves, were all relieved from their duties and sent to sea or remote stations, may have had something to do with the failure of the Rear Admiral's memory?

Under the circumstances it is perfectly obvious that the committee ought to lose no time in probing further into this record. If the files of the State Department, the White House, the Navy Department, and the Interior Department are kept in a negligent and careless fashion and ex-Secretary Denby is the victim of this negligence, the country ought to know it. Ex-Secretary Denby ought to have the privilege of again explaining on the stand the history of this interesting letter and of producing before the committee the Navy Department stenographer who took that letter at his dictation, or some one else's, and presumably initialed it and numbered it. It would be particularly interesting to find out whether the fact that the letter was signed "Very respectfully" instead of "Respectfully yours"—the usual official form—was due to haste at the time it was alleged to have been written or at some subsequent time.

Progressivism at St. Louis

By NORMAN THOMAS

IF within the next few months an effective third party emerges in the United States we shall know whom to thank. Our portrait gallery—I shall not say of founding fathers but of pioneers—will include pictures of Messrs. Doheny, Sinclair, Fall, McAdoo—and Ramsay MacDonald.

That this is a sober statement of fact and not of fancy is the chief impression that I brought back from the recent meeting at St. Louis of the National Conference for Progressive Political Action. Two months ago it was generally assumed that the St. Louis Conference would mark the end of a once promising experiment in bringing together progressive unions, farmers' organizations, and other groups.

Since its convention in Cleveland in December, 1922, the Conference had been rather quiescent. Some State conferences had been formed, one of which—New York—had celebrated the spirit of fraternity by excluding the Socialist Party and the more or less socialistic trade unions of New York City. It then proceeded to make itself a tail to the Democratic kite. It looked as if leading spirits in the National Committee of the Conference for Progressive Political Action meant to do the same sort of thing for the national Democracy though by less high-handed measures. Mr. McAdoo's flourishing candidacy gave the railroad unions and to a less extent some farmers' organizations a chance to pay back a debt they felt they owed to the former Director General of Railroads. His general liberalism and his fair and friendly attitude to labor greatly commended him. Even his repudiation of government ownership, to which most of the railroad labor unions were committed—at least on paper—and the alleged friendship of the Ku Klux Klan did not affect his popularity with the organization which had called the Conference into being. The skids were greased for indorsing McAdoo or leaving the way open for the National Committee to indorse him even if that meant the secession of the radicals and the end of one more attempt to unite progressive forces.

And then two things happened: The British Labor victory greatly stimulated in the rank and file a new confidence in the idea of independent political action, and the oil scandals more greatly stimulated disgust with both old parties as the tools of special privilege. More particularly they made Mr. McAdoo unavailable—to the intense regret, as I observed at St. Louis, of some of the railroad men.

In consequence the Conference assembled with a new spirit of hope and a new desire to get things done. The more conservative members of the National Committee were themselves persuaded to recommend another convention on July 4. They adopted a program far in advance of last year's utterance. "Why," said an old Socialist warhorse, "if this keeps up we'll have to sit on these boys to keep them from getting too radical." The Conference itself adopted these recommendations of the National Committee without much change or much wrangling.

Yet it would be wrong to exaggerate the temporary harmony. The ghost of the Workers Party was at the banquet. Or to be more literal, Mr. Ruthenberg was there. He did not demand admission but sat silent through the sessions. Two or three delegates of labor organizations were supposed to take orders from him and all their motions looking to definite commitment to a third party were promptly and enthusiastically rejected by delegates who, as far as I recall, never said "Workers Party" out loud but whispered it about continuously. This irritation, distrust, fear—call it what you will—felt by all the labor leaders for the Workers Party has a wonderfully conservatizing effect upon them.

Now the center of interest shifts to Cleveland and July 4. Even before that comes the question of what will be done at the St. Paul third-party conference called by the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party and other groups for May 30. The zealous Mr. Mahoney, of the Minnesota party, will, he said, try to arrange that that conference be merged with, or held simultaneously with, the Cleveland Conference.

Between now and July 4 much may happen. The attitude of the Conference may be in part affected by the degree of success of the British Labor Cabinet. It certainly will be affected by the attitude of the old parties—especially should one of them nominate a reasonably untainted liberal. It will be greatly affected by what Senator La Follette may do. His was the one name on men's lips at the St. Louis Conference. There are, as readers of The Nation know, factors within both farmers' organizations and the labor movement, as well as external difficulties inherent in the American situation, which make prediction difficult.

And after sitting through the St. Louis Conference one cannot but have fresh hope. It is a great gain to find important progressive groups united on a program of radical change—a program calling for the nationalization and democratic management of the railroads, public ownership of water-power and a public superpower system, the rigid public control of natural resources, including oil and coal; the adoption of the Sinclair-Norris bill for the marketing of farm products, together with legal changes to establish trial by jury for alleged contempt of court, and to limit the use of injunctions in industrial disputes. The Conference also stands opposed to war and imperialism; and in almost all of these matters it has advanced many leagues beyond its vague and cautious utterances of a year ago.

Advice to a Clam-Digger

An American Georgic

By WILBERT SNOW

Go when the friendly moon permits the tides
To drop far out at early morn or eve;
When eel-grass lies in windrows on the flats,
And rockweed lays its khaki counterpanes
On barnacles that cling to sunken ledges;
Seek out a place where mud-enameled sand
Looks like a colander whose holes emit
Little salt water geysers when you step;
Then, facing shoreward, dig till you become
A lame and muddy partner of the cove.

Marvels undreamed of suddenly unfold
The secrets they have kept concealed so long:
The rancid mud-clams whose white shells betray
A worthlessness within, like beggar's gold,
Or empty conkles farther up the beach;
The iridescent clam-worms blue and green
With esculating red and yellow fringes,
Like Chinese dragons whose soft tentacles

Expand, contract, and writhe in oozy slime;
Long buried whore's-eggs; razor-fish with shells
Brown as old ivory and smooth as glass;
Or soggy timbers from a derelict
Who left her oaken bones upon a ledge
In some northeaster forty years ago.

You soon discover that the best returns
Lie nestled near the rocks that dot the cove:
Dig slowly there, lest you should break their shells,
For at a single forkful three or four
Will lay white buttocks bare before your eyes.
Protruding heads that keep a passage clear,
Aware of you, will scramble for their homes,
Spraying your eyes and face with stinging brine,
Engendering illusion that the shells
Are burrowing a fathom deep in mud.
Their flight is aided by the tousling in
Of saucy waters playing hide-and-seek
In every drain and crevice of the flats,
Laughing at your attempts to keep them out,
And salvaging rich treasure for the sea.

Your roller full, haul up your rubber boots
And wade into the green and golden cove
Where little flounders flit beneath your feet.
Pull bits of rockweed, Mother Ocean's facecloths,
And wash the thick-accumulated mud
From off your hoe handle; then souse your hod
And watch the white and blue intensify:
The sparkling freshness on the dripping shells
Which disappears as suddenly as dew
From violets or daisies in the sun,
Will teach you why the Indian long ago
Used these fair shells for ornaments and wampum,
And piled them in the self-same spot for years,
Until his heaped-up mounds were monuments
Where all spring wanderers might come and camp.

Fail not before you leave to glance around
And view the low-tide pageant of the shore:
The apprehensive manner of a gull
Who sits with white breast bulging to the breeze,
And flashes right and left his sulphur bill;
The slower movements of the pearl-gray crane
Who stands in eel-grass on a single leg,
Surveys the fishing prospects, then moves on,
To light again, survey, and move once more,
Till he has sounded out the channel's length;
The yellow bubbles on the flood tide making
A creamy dressing for the green sea-lettuce;
The dignity of rusty-iron rocks
Studded with bands of sharp white barnacles;
The breakers, if the wind blows hard off shore,
That chase each other on the sunken reefs,
And spout like white whales on an Arctic sea;
Or, if the earth be hushed to twilight calm,
The violet, dark-wine, and purple tints
That crown the flowing surface of the tide.

This poem received the only honorable mention in The Nation's Poetry Contest for 1924. First and second prizes were awarded respectively to Scudder Middleton and Genevieve Taggard, whose poems appeared in the issues of February 20 and 27.

These United States—XLV*

RHODE ISLAND: A Lively Experiment

By ROBERT CLOUTMAN DEXTER

HER people and her politics are the distinguishing features of Rhode Island. Deeply chiseled over the granite portal of the magnificent State Capitol in Providence are these words, taken from the charter of 1663: "to hold forth a livelie experiment that a most flourishing civill state may stand . . . with a full liberty in religious concerns." The experiment began as a rebellion against the religious intolerance of a Puritan theocracy, but it has continued to furnish a lively experiment of one kind or another ever since. Not that the smallest State in the Union is barren of other distinctions. Rhode Island clam chowders have been imitated, but never equaled; and the white cornmeal of the South County surpasses in texture, flavor, and color the commoner yellow meal of Dixie. Despite these contributions to our national cuisine, however, the significance of Rhode Island lies in its social developments.

Geographically, Rhode Island can scarcely be called independent. Massachusetts on the east and north and Connecticut on the west have both felt that this upstart with its peculiar ideas and its desirable waterfront, ought to belong to them. When, to quote a local ballad,

In sixteen hundred thirty-six
Roger Williams got into a fix
By saucing the governor of Massachusetts
And skedaddled away to Rhode Island

Roger and his followers had no rights which the Chosen of Massachusetts were bound to respect. It took all the faith and courage of Williams, all his well-deserved popularity with the Indians, and all his political sagacity to maintain his foothold. Even after Rhode Island had a royal charter Massachusetts and Connecticut did not hesitate to exercise jurisdiction whenever possible.

Well-grounded fear of her more powerful neighbors, and the resulting jealousy to preserve her own rights and privileges as a sovereign State, have colored all Rhode Island's development. Rhode Island is separatism personified. Separatism in religion, separatism in politics, separatism in personal life: these have been the key-notes of her history. Her daring formulation of Williams's doctrine of soul liberty in the face of bitter opposition from without and lack of unity within transmitted this strong emphasis on individualism. It is hardly an accident that until quite recently Rhode Island, the smallest State in the Union, was the only one which had two capitals. The tradition of separatism explains, also, why each of the thirty-nine towns in the State has one State senator, so that West Greenwich, with 367 inhabitants, is as potent in the upper house as Providence, with a population of 237,595. This rotten-borough system has been one of the factors in the half-century of political degradation from which Rhode Island is now trying to emerge. The old-line Rhode Islander will cite with justice the national Senate as analogous to his local situation; but neither Nevada nor New Shoreham (another of the Rhode Island pocket boroughs) has legislative records that prove the wisdom of this particularistic democracy.

Of greater importance even than its historical separatism, for an understanding of present-day Rhode Island, is its preeminent industrialization. Politics and people both are quite literally the "fruit of the loom." It is true that the rotten boroughs furnish the possibility for corrupt politics, but it has been the manufacturers of Rhode Island who have taken advantage of these possibilities.

It is the mill-owners, also, who for their own purposes have diluted the colonial stock of the original settlers, first with English mill-hands, later with Irish, and then with French-Canadians, Poles, Italians, and Portuguese (black and white), until a Saturday afternoon stroll along Westminster Street, Providence, leaves one with the conviction that Rhode Island is not one of "these United States" at all. One looks in vain for "tall, blond Nordics." Main Street, Pawtucket, speaks every language but English, while in Woonsocket the writer spent an hour recently in the City Hall without hearing a word of English spoken, by visitors or officials, except that addressed to him. Rhode Island is not only the most densely populated State in the Union; it is also the first in the proportion of foreign-born. Largely because of this immigration Rhode Island holds the lowest position regarding illiteracy of any Northeastern State.

We of the North are apt to think that the harrowing tales of child labor belong wholly to the past, or at least to the far-away South. Rhode Island, however, has met Southern competition during the last decade by augmenting the number of her laboring children, while every other State in the Union, even North Carolina, the bete noire of industrial reformers, has shown a decrease. Child labor in the United States during the last decade fell off 47 per cent; in Rhode Island it increased 6 per cent. Thirteen and four-tenths per cent of all the children in the State between ten and fifteen years of age are gainfully employed. What is to be this "fruit of the loom"? What of the future citizens of Woonsocket, with the highest percentage of child labor—18.7 per cent—of any city in the United States, or of Pawtucket, with 17.3 per cent? In the South, at least, only about half the employed children are cooped up in mills and factories; in Rhode Island, four-fifths of the 8,569 working children spend their days in the damp, hot, lint-saturated atmosphere of the spinning-room. Furthermore, Rhode Island has the unenviable distinction not only of having the highest percentage of employed girls between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one of any State in the Union, but also of employing over two thousand women nightly in its mills. Is it strange that there was opposition at the State Capitol last year strong enough to defeat a forty-eight-hour law; or that bills abolishing night work do not pass? The legislature, if not controlled directly, is frequently intimidated by the mill-owners' threat to go South, where they can do as they like—and consequently they do as they like in Rhode Island.

The heart of Rhode Island is not Providence; Providence is simply its market-place. Rhode Island owes its prosperity to two rivers, the brawling Blackstone, which turns more spindles than any river in the world, and the winding Pawtuxet. It is along these rivers that the mills are located, and along these rivers that the mill operatives live. In these days of the motor-car, the owner lives in Providence on the East Side or, in more and more cases, in New York or Boston. What have the mills given the workers for homes? The ordinary mill village presents little that is attractive. The mill is the center of the picture. Around it are grouped the mill tenements huddled together along one or two streets. Frequently these tenements are white, freshly painted, with well-kept palings in front. There is none of the hideous ugliness of the coal or iron town; the chief aesthetic defect of the mill town is its uniformity and its lack of space. The houses are built in long rows closely adjoining one another like city blocks, while all around are the undulating hillsides, winding rivers, and shining lakes. The town turns its back on these, however, and faces its master, the mill. In addition to the mill and the mill houses there are a store and a church—sometimes two churches, the larger and more pretentious topped by a gilded cross, and the smaller, generally a mere chapel, weather-beaten and in need of repairs. The latter too often supports only a visiting minister; the former is served by one or two priests, usually conducts its services in an alien tongue, and is frequently flanked on the one side by a parochial school, partly financed by company donations, and on the other by the tightly shuttered residence of the teaching sisterhood. Almost a hundred such villages exist in Rhode Island, utterly independent of town or county lines, and consequently having no political unity.

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1924, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

Jewelry is another potent industry in Rhode Island affairs. Providence is the largest jewelry center in the United States if not in the entire world; everything from Gorham's silver to Woolworth's hair ornaments comes from the city of Roger Williams. The jewelry industry contributes to the child-labor problem a unique element. During the brief time in which the federal child-labor law was in operation the Department of Labor discovered a system of home-work for children which has been in existence from the earliest days of the industry in the State. The Federal Department, in contrast to State departments, was shocked at the extent of child employment, and made a study of the problem in the three cities of Providence, Pawtucket, and Central Falls. Its report, recently published, showed 4,933 children, or 7.6 per cent of all school children examined, doing "home work." Such work consisted of carding snaps, stringing tags, setting stones in various types of jewelry, and wiring and stringing rosary beads. What a commentary on our commercialization, even of religion, that the very rosaries on which the faithful count their prayers in the name of Him who loved little children should be made by these little ones in poorly lighted tenements in the long evenings after school hours! The federal investigation revealed the fact that in some of these homes in which the rosaries which were to be kissed by the faithful were being made, members of the family were afflicted with tuberculosis, influenza, and even more loathsome diseases. Two-fifths of the child "home workers" were of Italian parentage and one-fifth French-Canadian.

The industrial picture that Rhode Island presents is not encouraging. True, it produces excellent textiles, first-class tires, admirable lathes, as well as mountains of ten-cent-store brilliants, but its industries and its politics alike have been managed with little consideration for the human element. Unstinted immigration from Europe so long as that was possible, supplemented now by "habitants" from Quebec; long hours of labor for men, women, and children under conditions detrimental to health and happiness; the exploitation of children; the grouping of foreigners in mill villages barren of genuine American influences either in education or recreation—these are not the most hopeful ingredients out of which to make a commonwealth.

Fortunately there are more promising aspects of present-day Rhode Island. The power in the Pawtuxet Valley prior to 1919 had been the B. B. & R. Knight Company, a family concern, which had commenced with the Pontiac Mills in the eighteen-forties and gradually grown until it controlled over a score of mills. The Knights were notoriously unprogressive; in their own offices a typewriter was a rarity; oil lamps had been sufficient for lighting when they took over the mills: they were sufficient when they finally relinquished them. A Knight mill tenement had a reputation that was unsavory in more senses than one. Despite their antiquated methods they managed to secure maximum profits. In 1919 Robert Knight's sons sold their mills at boom prices to a New York corporation. But the company soon found that conditions in 1921 were not the same as in the years 1916-1919, and in order to pay dividends on their excess capitalization they ordered a 20 per cent reduction in wages with a continuation of the fifty-four-hour schedule. The result was an immediate and complete tie-up of every mill in the valley. Not only did the workers strike, but they organized for a protracted resistance. Local men at first headed the strike, but soon the leaders of the Amalgamated Textile Workers were called in, and thorough and complete organization was effected. The food supply was arranged for, dietitians and nurses were employed by the strikers, food kitchens were opened, and sufficient funds secured to fight it out if it took all summer. And fight it out they did from January until the autumn, when the wage cut was rescinded and the strikers went back to the mills victorious. There was little violence in the valley, although deputies and State troops were stationed there, and the result of the strike has been an immediate and definite change in attitude on the part of both workers and owners. Both sides admit that the workers are now in control, and while this presents difficulty to the owners, especially in view of their attempt to pay dividends on an overcapitalized investment, it is distinctly a sign of a better day. And finally, the children were found better nourished and healthier at the end of the strike than at its beginning. The day of feudal overlordship in the Pawtuxet Valley has disappeared: in its place we have corporate responsibility on the one side and well-organized labor on the other.

Lincoln Steffens wrote an article in McClure's Magazine in 1905—Rhode Island, a State for Sale—in which he proved beyond doubt his initial thesis that "the political situation of Rhode Island is notorious, acknowledged, and shameful." Then Nelson W. Aldrich was "the boss of the United States Senate" and at the same time the head and fount of Rhode Island's political corruption. Aldrich and his associates exercised their power through General Brayton, the famous blind boss of Rhode Island. So absolute was Brayton's power that the story is told that coming into his office one morning he inquired for a certain State senator. Being informed that he was in the Senate, Brayton replied, "Bring him here; I want him to lead me out to (let us say for politeness' sake) get a drink." Brayton was "of counsel" for the New Haven Road, and Aldrich was especially interested in the Rhode Island Company. The New Haven as a factor in New England politics has passed away, and the poor Rhode Island Company is still struggling to pay off the indebtedness which Aldrich, Brayton, et al. fastened on its stockholders. Aldrich, Brayton, and their associates died politically intestate. The Republican Party machine in Rhode Island is now "in commission," and a weak commission at that. This decadence of the bosses is one of the most auspicious omens on the political horizon of the State. The Democratic Party has always been a party of the disinherited and discontented, and it has been particularly lacking in unity. A Rhode Islander was asked a few years ago which party he was going to support in the forthcoming election; he replied "I don't know; I feel like a jackass between two bales of excelsior." Twenty years ago the Republican Party was known to be corrupt but powerful; the Democrats were less corrupt but impotent. A change has come about in Democratic policy. No one conversant with Rhode Island politics will maintain that the Democrats are a unit, but at any rate they are more united than they were, and they still are the party of the disinherited and consequently of the progressives. I say disinherited, despite the fact that they hold the governor's chair, one of the two United States senators, and the presiding officer of the State Senate. But they are still of the disinherited; they do not represent the textile interests, or the metal trades, or the jewelry manufacturers. The Democrats have leaders: Flynn, the Governor; Toupin, the erratic Lieutenant Governor, and George Hurley, the present assistant attorney general and former chairman of the State Committee. Hurley is easily the most interesting figure in Rhode Island today: a Providence boy of Irish extraction, a brilliant student at Brown, a Rhodes scholar of distinction, an able young lawyer, and a resourceful politician. Hurley has always stood for cleanness in politics and in public and private life, and at his own request was given the position of assistant attorney general because he wanted to clean up the gambling-hells at Narragansett Pier, Johnston, Cranston, North Providence, and elsewhere that for years past had made Rhode Island a Mecca for sporting gentry and had furnished an easy living for politicians and local officials. Clean them up he did. The story of Hurley's fight single-handed is too long for this article, but it should be written. Quiet, gentle-mannered, with a pleasant Irish smile, and an altogether juvenile expression, he has cleaned up practically every gambling house in Rhode Island within the last year. He made no distinction between high and low. A few months since he summoned into court a philanthropic Rhode Island millionaire and eight or ten social leaders from New York to tell the grand jury what they were doing at a certain Pier resort. They told. The consequence was that the resort is closed, and some local politicians are now working for a living.

With the Republicans disorganized, the textile workers conscious of the value of organization and the ballot, and the Democratic Party in the hands of men like Hurley, it can be said with truth that Rhode Island is no longer a State for sale.

Rhode Island cannot be dismissed without mention of Brown University, which dominates the intellectual life of the State to a much greater extent than do either Harvard or Yale their respective commonwealths. Under E. Benjamin Andrews, Brown gathered to itself some of the brightest minds in America, and many of the political leaders of the younger generation are practicing the precepts taught in Brunonia's halls. But "Benny" offended the industrial magnates in Providence by daring to have an opinion on political issues, and was dismissed. Andrews left to his successor some splendid youngish men, but one by one the Meiklejohns, the George Grafton Wilsons, and their kind have slipped away to positions of influence elsewhere. Brown is the poorer by their loss.

A typical Rhode Island institution is the Dexter Donation—six thousand feet of wall which incloses many acres of the best residential part of the city of Providence for an aristocratic poor farm—a poor farm with a property qualification. A century ago Ebenezer Knight Dexter left his native town sixty thousand dollars to ameliorate the condition of the poor, and he picked out the best site in the town for his benefaction. He requested that "a good permanent stone wall at least three feet thick at the bottom and at least eight feet high . . . and sunk two feet in the ground" be placed around his farm. There it stands today, despite efforts to have the land sold and the proceeds used to erect a more modern institution elsewhere. It affords care only for residents of Providence whose fathers or grandfathers have owned property; and it has no waiting list. The institution at Cranston for the poor who were not so fortunate is generally overcrowded.

In the face of such solid conservatism it is difficult to be optimistic. However, Rhode Island has been despaired of many times, particularly by her neighbors. Whether it is the protecting shade of Roger Williams or the healing waters of the Bay, the "lively experiment" still continues, and slowly, but nevertheless surely, changes come. Rhode Island was excluded from the New England Confederation, whose self-righteous members referred to their neighbor as "that sewer," principally because she consistently refused to exclude the sectaries persecuted by the "lord brethren." Her conduct during the period of paper money was scandalous, and yet it was during that same agitation that in Trevett vs. Weeden the dictum was established that the courts were competent to find illegal acts of the legislature contrary to the common law. Rhode Island's privateering was little short of piracy, and yet it is on this basis that the American merchant marine of the early nineteenth century developed. Rhode Island was the first to declare her freedom from Great Britain, but the last to adopt the Constitution. It took an armed rebellion in 1848 to establish manhood suffrage, but the rebellion came. Twenty years ago Rhode Island was literally and absolutely controlled by its feudal mill-owners and their political henchmen; now that situation has changed. Although Roger Williams would find it difficult to make his way about the Providence Union Station built where in his time was a shallow cove, and would stare aghast at the new Biltmore, we can be sure that the stirring aspirations of the mill-workers, the movements for the abolition of child labor, the striving of the disinherited for political power and freedom, the demands of the modernists in the church and state would enlist the sympathy of this first and greatest of American radicals. He kept his faith in the lively experiment in the face of adverse circumstances; may we not believe that enough of his spirit remains in the Commonwealth he founded at least to justify its motto, "Hope"?

Jacques Loeb

By EDUARD UHLENHUTH

ON the eleventh of February Jacques Loeb, since 1910 a member of the Rockefeller Institute and the outstanding figure in the biological sciences of the present time, passed away suddenly, still in the prime of his productivity, although almost sixty-five years of age.

A great man, like a common man, may live in one particular country, or in a metropolis of six millions, or in a small quiet village hidden away from the noisy roads of every-day traffic, or he may dwell in a cave on top of a mountain like Zarathustra and have as his only companions a snake and an eagle. But his ideas transcend these physical barriers; they have no home; they are not citizens of any country; they give birth to new ideas in other minds; they need no particular language to make themselves felt; they are friends even with the enemy.

The death of Dr. Jacques Loeb has brought us close to that truth. Thousands of persons in all countries are mourning the death of this man, and are united through him in a world which is still lacerated by national hatred. And of what nationality shall we say that he was? He was born in 1859 in Germany; he has lived since 1892 in the United States. He was a member of the Royal Institute of Great Britain, of the French Academy of Sciences, of academies and learned societies of Portugal, Russia, Poland, Argentina, and many other countries.

His work was as universal as his fame. There is no branch of the sciences of life which was not materially advanced by his work. Biology, medicine, psychology and philosophy, chemistry and physics, and even the technical sciences profited by his achievements. He published nearly 400 articles and nine books. Most men of science find it necessary to confine their work to a few problems of life. But in his hands biology remained the study of the mysteries of life in its entirety; problems touching on the very roots of life itself cropped out in almost every one of his papers. The study of animal tropisms dug down to the foundation of human behavior and psychology, the work in experimental morphology revealed the most fundamental laws of regeneration and growth. The discovery of the chemical fertilization of the sea-urchin egg revolutionized our ideas on reproduction and its most essential feature, the fertilization of the animal egg. The discovery of the antagonistic salt action led him to gain important insight into the phenomena of muscular action and of the ability of organisms to adapt themselves to environment. While studying the temperature coefficient of growth and development, he found occasion to formulate his ideas on the prolongation of life and the nature of death. Perhaps the culmination of his entire work was reached when he discovered the essential identity between the chemistry of colloidal and crystalline substances, making intelligible for the first time the chemical and physical behavior of the proteins, the chief components of living matter.

Those who were around him and knew his faculties and habits could readily see why he should have been enabled to rise to a position from which he could survey the entire realm of science. Aside from the creative genius which was born in him and continually inspired him to conceive new ideas, aside from the unshakable idealism that was at the foundation of his faith in human progress and made him believe that this progress must come through science, he possessed the gifts of a most astonishing memory, of an unceasing and inexhaustible working energy, and an unparalleled faculty for reading. He rarely took a holiday. He worked regularly on Sunday morning, and during the summer months, instead of taking a vacation, worked in the laboratory which the Rockefeller Institute had built for him at Woods Hole. I doubt whether there was a man among his contemporaries who was as widely read as he. Through this, he acquired a surprising ability to recognize at first glance whether or not an article or book contained new and important contributions to science. There was combined in him early in his life the knowledge of an animal and plant morphologist with that of a physiologist, chemist, and physicist. It was particularly this circumstance which enabled him to study comparatively the phenomena of life in the different groups of the animal kingdom and in plants and to apply the methods of chemistry and physics to the study of living matter.

At an early period of his activity he was forced to accept a mechanistic conception of life in his work. He recognized that metaphysics had arrived at a stage at which it no longer could widen our knowledge of life. In order to gain new insight into the nature of living organisms, it was necessary to find new facts; this task could only be accomplished by using the methods generally employed in chemistry and physics and applying them to the study of living matter. In the beginning it was difficult for most of his contemporaries to follow his rapid advances. Fortunately he lived to see his methods of research generally accepted. He chose a mechanistic attitude toward life not because of an intention to explain life by any particular speculative theory or because he preferred any particular theory to another one, but merely because he felt an ardent desire to dig further into the mysteries of life by searching for the truth and to find new facts that would throw light on the nature of life. It was his opinion that only a mechanistic view could furnish the tools needed to accomplish this end.

In recent years he came more and more to the realization that in the interpretation of the phenomena of life those facts are the most valuable and trustworthy which could be expressed in numbers. Although the study of growth and regeneration occupied his mind at an early period of his work and led to important discoveries at that time, the formulation of a mathematical expression of the laws of growth and regeneration occupied him more recently and formed one of the subjects of his work up to the last moments of life.

It was, of course, well for him that he was spared the physical ailments and other disabilities of old age which he dreaded. But he left behind many who will feel his sudden death a severe loss. He was a real and fatherly friend of the young generation of scientists in this country; he showed deep interest and sympathy with the struggling mind of the young man who, bewildered by the multitude of problems, starts out to take an active part in the work of science. He was a leader of the growing generation, and an inspiring educator. While he insisted that scientific research should be carried on at its highest level, he was able at the same time to show the path that led to this noble aim. Men from all over the world, young and old, came to visit him, to enjoy his conversation, to listen to his counsel, to receive his inspiration, to be pervaded by his enthusiasm.

Night Thoughts

By W. L. WERNER

IT is very gratifying to the average man—who rarely achieves a life term either in jail or in the legislature—to feel that he is sufficiently important to merit eternal punishment or reward hereafter.

Consider the sanctity of ciphers. The tenth wedding anniversary, the centennial memorial service, the thousandth Sunday-school scholar, the millionaire—here are reasons for celebration. . . . Clearly man is higher than the animals that have no decimal system.

As soon as thought is translated into action and objects, it loses its force; the actions and objects, with their own uses, morals, and results, take its place. So good intentions and bad are constantly being frustrated, and the world protects itself from the rule of the ideal.

Life is a tragedy in which a creature of habit struggles against a changing environment, a tragedy in which a social animal vainly seeks a perfect union. If the creature is sufficiently insignificant, life becomes a comedy.

Alas! Our schools and colleges are becoming so full nowadays that no one is getting an education.

"Genius is an infinite capacity for taking pains," and I suppose that the waiter who arranges my silverware three times a day is the greatest genius that I know.

It is a common but absurd belief that civilization is marching toward justice. The opposite is true. Civilization is constantly replacing the old eye-for-an-eye code with the current fashions in politeness, persuasion, toleration, remonstrance, and charity. When every other remedy fails, we take our troubles to court.

Man is an infinitely small creature, powerless by himself. The idea that a union of infinitesimals will be anything but infinitesimal is good religion and good politics, but bad mathematics.

The great gift of life is friendship. But for a sick man a doctor is more dependable than a friend; for a man seeking truth, an enemy is more reliable; for a criminal, a lawyer is more useful.

When a great artist first appears, he is appreciated only by a few who understand him. Later he is taken up by amateurs who ape his peculiarities but know him only superficially. Finally he is entertained by people who do not understand him at all, but who have a lot of money. Thus he is gradually reclaimed to the fold of mediocrity.

The first and only axiom of any system of ethics is: it is good to continue living. The only logical opposition to this is suicide; thus the opponent destroys himself and the axiom stands.

Time was when men discovered God in sticks and stones. Now we know that He does not reside there. Hence we are confident that there is no God. . . . "There are no children," said the landlord of a model apartment.

In the Driftway

READERS of this column were doubtless surprised, when the winner of the Bok peace prize was announced, to learn that it was not the Drifter. In fact the Drifter was mildly startled himself, and feels that he ought to offer a word of explanation. His failure to win the prize was not due to lack of a plan—his head is full of them—but to the fact that he is notoriously indolent and rarely gets around to putting on paper any of the numerous schemes for salvaging mankind that troop through his cranium. He was just getting ready to write out his peace plan when he noticed one morning that the prize had already been awarded. But in order that readers of this column may realize how superior the Drifter's plan is, he has decided to give it to the public free with this copy of The Nation. Listen, Mr. Bok, here it is:

* * * * *

SUPPOSING that next spring the Under-Secretary of Agriculture of Uruguay should meet on the terrace of the Café de la Paix in Paris the Keeper of the Privy Seal (or the official walrus) of Lapland, and pull his nose. That, it is well understood, would not constitute a private quarrel between the two men. It would be an affront by the cow punchers of Uruguay to the blubber hunters of Lapland, and the national honor of the latter would not be satisfied except by sending its sons off to the pampas to fight until the youth of both countries was under ground and the money of both nations in the vaults of the United States Steel Corporation and E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company.

* * * * *

NOW the Drifter's plan would avoid all that and yet satisfy as completely as Camel cigarettes—or is it soups? The Drifter would not attempt to outlaw war (it is far too stupid a thing for mankind to be willing to relinquish), but, like dueling, he would rob it of its dangers. He would organize war like a poker game. The first act after a mutual declaration of hostilities would be the appointment of the ruler of some neutral country as Grand Exalted Holder of the Jack-Pot. The aggrieved party—in this case Lapland—would make the first bid. Ten thousand blubber hunters from twenty to twenty-five years of age would be drafted by the state, kissed by their pride-filled sweethearts and mothers, and shipped off, not to the pampas of Uruguay, but to the Grand Exalted Holder of the Jack-Pot—say the Queen of the Netherlands. In order to stay in the war Uruguay would have to equip and pack off to the Hague an equal number of young cow punchers. Each country would be required to pay the board bill of its army monthly in advance, while it would be the duty of the Grand Exalted Holder of the Jack-Pot to see that the rival armies were well fed and housed and not allowed to be drowned by any inundation of the dykes. There would be no objection to letting the rival armies live in the same barracks and organize baseball games and dances while the old folks at home were hating each other at a distance.

* * * * *

THIS mutual levy of men would leave Lapland and Uruguay equal, with the former under the necessity of making the next bid. This time, let us say, Lapland would raise a foreign loan of $100,000, which would be cheerfully furnished in Wall Street at the moderate rate of 20 per cent and a lien upon the national blubber output for 999 years. The amount of the loan would be sent to Holland. Uruguay would then retaliate by furnishing a similar sum, which would perhaps be raised by a domestic loan, collected by the Daughters of the Pampas at no expense except for such tar and feathers as might be necessary to convince pacifists and pro-Lapps that liberty bonds were the safest, sanest, and soundest investment in the world, even if you had to mortgage your cyclone cellar to buy one. Then Lapland would get in the game again with a shipment of, say, 500 airplanes and Uruguay would have to match it or send a receipted bill for the cost of such an armada paid to grafting contractors or stolen by public officials. Thus the war would go on until one or the other of the belligerents was bled white of men and Wall Street could find no more suckers to buy its bonds. Then the Grand Exalted Holder of the Jack-Pot would award the war to the country with the highest stake, and would return to each all money and material and such young men as the thrifty Dutch girls had not meanwhile married and put to work. The honor of both countries would be satisfied, neither would be out anything except a moderate board bill, and the young men would have enjoyed the broadening influence of several years of foreign travel.

* * * * *

THIS, then, is the Drifter's peace plan. What about it, Mr. Bok? THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

How to Outlaw War

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I enthusiastically applaud The Nation's "own peace program" with its four main points: outlawry of war, world court with compulsory jurisdiction, complete disarmament, and a parliament of nations. "None of these plans can be carried without careful planning and long-continued effort under sincere leadership." May I suggest a method of effecting the outlawry of war?

When Chief Justice Taft was President—to his everlasting honor be it remembered—he advocated the settlement of all disputes between nations by peaceful means. He said: "I do not see any more reason why questions of 'national honor' should not be referred to a court of arbitration than matters of property or matters of national proprietorship." In accordance with this view President Taft's great Secretary of State, John Hay, negotiated a treaty with Great Britain definitely agreeing to settle all controversies without exception that might arise between the two countries by judicial or arbitral process. That was the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty which unfortunately died in the Senate.

It is high time that another such treaty should be negotiated. That the Senate would again reject it is hardly possible. This would be the outlawry of war as between the contracting parties. Eventually all nations should be thus mutually pledged, but there is no need to wait for a universal agreement. Any two reciprocating nations may at once outlaw war as far as their relations with each other are concerned. For our country this would not be a long step beyond the Bryan treaties which require a year's delay before a declaration of war. If delay is possible for a year, it is possible for two years, or ten, or fifty.

Brookline, Mass., January 26 HENRY W. PINKHAM,
Secretary, The Association to Abolish War

The Cart Before the Horse

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your peace program published in the issue of January 30 seems to me to put the cart before the horse and then to disembowel the horse. The only way to make war or anything else a crime is by law, and to make a law against war there is needed a law-making body with the requisite powers. Thus in any scheme such as you contemplate the law-making body must come first. You have put it last and then by implication have denied it the power to outlaw war. How do you propose to make war a crime?

Your peace program too is a very warlike one. There is a large element of compulsion in it. Now who or what is to do the compelling? The court can't do it until it has a law to enforce and an international police to enforce it. This, however, is the most ticklish part of the whole business, as you must know. You must give up the compulsory features of your scheme or provide for enforcing bodies and their control.

The Nation seems to me to be divided in its allegiance. Politically it is liberal in the true sense of laissez faire. In economic matters it inclines to the extension of government control. When this conflict is carried over into international affairs it results as above in a demand for compulsion and the outlawry of war and a repudiation of the machinery necessary to carry out such a program. "The outlawry of war" sounds well but it means an international parliament, a law against war, a world court with compulsory jurisdiction and an international police.

Louisville, Kentucky, February 1

N. J. WARE

The Levermore Plan and The Nation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Of course it is not true—though you are "much advertised by your loving friends" to that effect—that The Nation is governed by the spirit that evermore denies. Your generous appreciation of the winner of the Bok peace award in a recent number gives the lie to that slander. That you should have qualified your appreciation by a repudiation of the plan submitted by Dr. Levermore was, of course, inevitable. The Nation will favor no plan that it believes "inadequate in the light of a world in chaos." It will have no half-measures.

I wonder how many of your readers would subscribe to your policy of everything or nothing. Certainly a world redeemed from the insanity and the bestiality of war is their desire as well as yours. Why not try a referendum of The Nation's readers to learn how many of them agree with you in rejecting the plan of a world helped as a first step toward the blessed consummation of a world redeemed?

It is here and here only, in his more realistic approach to the problem of world peace, that Dr. Levermore parts company with The Nation. He too has his eyes fixed on "that far-off, divine event," to which, we must believe, the world moves. He, too, would abolish war by fiat if he believed that it could by any such simple process be done away with. He has publicly declared his belief in the outlawry of war, in the general abolition of armaments, in practically every article of the faith that The Nation has so eloquently set forth. If in the scheme submitted by him for the American peace award he has failed to incorporate these elements of the peace-maker's creed, it is only because he believes that in the present state of political and public feeling they do not belong in a "practicable plan by which the United States may cooperate with other nations to achieve and preserve the peace of the world."

Levermore is an historian, a life-long student of international affairs, who combines with an intimate knowledge of the racial, religious, economic, and political factors that enter into the war system an equally wide acquaintance with domestic politics. His immediate task was not to paint on the sky an apocalyptic vision of the world that is to be, but to mark out the first indispensable steps of the path in which the groping, blundering world that is must walk toward its far-away goal. The sureness and deftness with which he performed this task is sufficient evidence of the qualities of scholarship, insight, and understanding that made him the man for the job.

The Nation has "looked with an unfavorable eye upon the plan itself" because of its inadequacy as a means of insuring peace. Will it not now give its invaluable support to the Levermore plan, not to insure peace but to bring the nations together in united counsel to devise measures for the promotion of peace?

New York, February 16

GEORGE W. KIRCHWEY

The Next Step or the Horizon

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your "own peace program" is evidently meant as a substitute for the Bok plan, as if the two were mutually exclusive. Permit me to suggest that the two are not exclusive but supplementary. Your program offers a series of objectives. It is related to the Bok plan as an end is related to the means thereto. Granted that the four points of your program are of cardinal importance, how shall we attain them? Take as an example a world court with compulsory jurisdiction. To say as you do that "the development of the World Court into one with compulsory jurisdiction was prevented by the League of Nations which eliminated the compulsory clauses" is to give scarcely a hint of the real difficulty. President Coolidge undoubtedly expressed average sentiment when he referred to a court "to which we could go, but to which we could not be brought." We are morally unready for compulsory jurisdiction, and among the strong reasons for this unreadiness are fear and suspicion. The way to remove fear and suspicion is by establishing helpful contacts, and that is precisely what the Bok plan aims to do. Its outstanding feature is that it starts from right where we are, and takes steps. Please do not think that we who believe in taking steps cannot lift up our eyes to the horizon.

Clinton, New York, February 1

EDWARD FITCH

A Wet Blanket for Warriors

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I submit my peace plan to your candid judgment and that of your readers:

1. Repudiate all war debts. This would discourage lending money for future wars; and no great war could be carried on if money could not be borrowed for it. Money for the enormous cost of war can be got only from those who have it—the rich and the well-to-do. They do not object to exchanging their money for tax-free government bonds. They would strenuously resist giving it to the tax collector, in the sums that a great war consumes. Their patriotic enthusiasm for war would evaporate if they were called on to pay for it currently in taxes—or if they thought it likely they would be left to whistle for payment of their tax-free bonds. And, since the rich and the well-to-do control the shapers of public opinion—the schools, the pulpit, and the press—and by one means and another control all governments, no great war could be carried on without their consent.

2. Provide that the fighting ranks shall be filled exclusively with persons who have voted for war, or have otherwise expressed a desire for it; and that among such persons there shall be no exemption for age, sex, or occupation. This would dampen the enthusiasm of the old men, the women, and the clergymen, who were telling us six years ago how beautiful our war was—what a source of spiritual regeneration. "Old men make wars; young men fight them." The old men would make war less light-heartedly, the women and the clergymen would find less spiritual exaltation in it, if they had a vision of their own legs in the mud of the trenches, of their own bodies hung on barbed-wire entanglements.

Ithaca, New York, January 29

CHARLES E. EDGERTON

A Pledge for Statesmen

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It has long since been apparent to all serious, unprejudiced folk that the famous Bok peace plan is nothing but a rehash of previous League of Nations proposals that were overwhelmingly rejected in the "Solemn Referendum" of 1920.

This writer who aspires to justify the self-given title of "practical idealist" has a plan of his own which can be put into effect without involving any European conferences, foreign entanglements, or other strings tied to any part of Uncle Sam's accoutrements, including his pockets. Briefly it is this:

The statesmen of all nations upon taking office of any kind, especially secretaries and ministers of state and foreign affairs, must pledge themselves, i.e., incorporate such pledge in their oath of office, not to encroach upon the rights and the liberty of a neighboring or other state, nor to seek any unfair advantage at the expense of such other state, country, people, or nation.

Coupled with this the writer would outlaw aggressive warfare first, to be followed in due course by the outlawing of all warfare. The United States of America should take the lead. A joint resolution by Congress, signed by the President, and its counterpart signed by prominent citizens outside the political arena, would constitute a new declaration rivaling in importance the Declaration of Independence. The world would heed it as it heeded its predecessor, and once again the opinion of mankind would become conscious of a step in advance toward the ultimate goal—the universal recognition that the ethical standards and moral conduct of an upright, honorable private individual must be made the rule in dealings of state.

New York, February 5

JUSTUS

Contributors to This Issue

NORMAN THOMAS, formerly an associate editor of The Nation, is now director of the League for Industrial Democracy.

WILBERT SNOW is assistant professor of English at Wesleyan University and the author of a book of poems, "Maine Coast."

ROBERT CLOUTMAN DEXTER, formerly of the department of social and political science at Clark University, is now professor of sociology at Skidmore College.

EDUARD UHLENHUTH is a member of the staff of the Rockefeller Institute.

E. S. MARTIN is an essayist, an editor of Life, and conductor of the Editor's Easy Chair in Harper's Magazine.

JOSEPH JASTROW is professor of psychology at the University of Wisconsin.

WILLIAM MACDONALD, formerly of the Nation staff, has recently accepted an appointment to give courses in history at Yale University next year.

E. G. H. KRAELING is lecturer in Assyriology at Columbia University.

International Relations

SPECIAL COURSE OF

FRIDAY NIGHT LECTURES

Under the auspices of the Students Co-operative Association
At the NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH, 465 West 23d St.,
New York

17 Authorities—expert opinion—on international problems that concern America.

- Feb. 22—WILLIAM C. DREHER—How Does the Reparations Muddle Look Today?
Feb. 29—ALFRED P. DENNIS—Foreign Policies of Soviet Russia
March 7—EDWIN M. BORCHARD—Economic Factors in International Relations
March 14—EDWARD M. EARLE—The Near East—Its Economic and Strategic Importance
March 21—EDWARD M. EARLE—Problems of Raw Materials and Foreign Investments
March 28—COL. LAWRENCE MARTIN—Territorial Problems of the Peace Conference
April 4—GEORGE HUBBARD BLAKESLEE—The Pacific and the Far East
April 11—JAMES G. McDONALD—Recent Relations Between the United States and Mexico
April 25—J. A. N. deSANCHEZ—Reparations, French View
May 2—LINDSAY ROGERS—Foreign Policy and Domestic Politics
May 9—LINDSAY ROGERS—Secret Diplomacy and Democratic Control
May 16—CARLTON J. H. HAYES—Historical Background of the League of Nations
May 23—ALVIN JOHNSON—Can the League Prevent War?
May 30—JOSEPH P. CHAMBERLAIN—Existing International Administration
June 6—WALTER LIPPMANN—Present Policies of the Great Powers
June 13—STEPHEN P. DUGGAN—Possible International Organization
June 20—ALEXANDER C. FLICK—The Old Diplomacy and the New

Complete Course only $15. Single Admission $1.25.

SATURDAY NIGHT LECTURES

Admission only 50c

- Feb. 23—DR. BERNARD GLUECK—Some Problems in Ethics
March 1—DR. VERNON KELLOGG—The Human Future
March 8—DR. E. G. CONKLIN—The Revolt Against Darwinism
March 15—MR. FRANK VANDERLIP—Recent Economic Changes in Europe and Their Meaning for the United States
March 22—MR. BERNARD M. BARUCH—(Subject to be announced)
March 29—MR. S. K. RATCLIFFE—Britain Under the Labor Government
April 5—MR. BERTRAND RUSSELL—Chinese and Western Ideals of Life

STUDENTS CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION

New School for Social Research, 465 W. 23d St., New York

Books Available Religion

More Twice-Born Men. By Harold Begbie. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

FIFTEEN or twenty years ago there came out "Twice-Born Men," by Harold Begbie, a remarkable book of which one is told that half a million copies have been sold. It was a record of work done by the Salvation Army in making over men—putting new wills and desires into them, putting indeed new men into old bodies which showed the marks and characteristics of the lives their unregenerate former occupants had lived. It is a very remarkable book of which William James is quoted as saying that his "Varieties of Religious Experience" might well be called a postscript to it. It used to be said that one effective way of curing drunkards was by an old-fashioned Methodist conversion. It is true that that would cure them. By that process they gained a new will and a new purpose. No doubt, conversion of that sort still survives and does its work; no doubt such a work has been done by the Salvation Army and perhaps by Billy Sunday, but Mr. Begbie's motive in putting out his latest book, "More Twice-Born Men," is based on the feeling that religion is losing ground and materialism is gaining ground "chiefly because the power of religion to change the lives of men is now almost wholly unknown, or, if known, is regarded as an example of mere emotionalism working on weak intellects." This is the account of a man—a teacher—who can change men—not such men as "Twice-Born Men" dealt with, whom Begbie calls "the broken earthenware of our discordant civilization," but "young men, some brilliant in scholarship, others splendid in athletics, and all of them without one exception modest and gloriously honest."

The name of the teacher is not given. He figures as F. B. It is not difficult to identify him, but it is not necessary. Mr. Begbie speaks of his activities as a strange work that has been going on for two or three years among undergraduates of many universities in England and all over the world. It is a work, he says, of which the general public knows nothing at all and of which the religious authorities so far as he can gather have never heard. Impressed by what he heard about F. B. and by what he was accomplishing, Begbie went to see him. He was not charmed with him. He disapproved of some of his theological opinions. He disliked some of his ways and phrases. But he was won by the inward qualities of the man and by the extraordinary things that he had been able to accomplish.

The story of his exploits as Begbie tells it must be interesting to anyone who is interested in religious processes and possibilities. What F. B. seems able to do is to unite the warring elements of the will and give them direction. The men he dealt with were nearly all of them already religious, but not satisfied with what they were or what they could do. His purpose with them was to give them understanding and power to impart what they had. He seemed to find them discordant fragments and to leave them whole. The energies of a divided mind are largely occupied with reconciling discord. The energies of a united mind can go ahead and do something. F. B. could unite divided minds and send them on their way.

The concluding chapter in the book is about immortality. Mr. Begbie quotes Cotterill as saying in his "History of Art" that "the one all-important doctrine of the Early Church was that of Eternal Life." Begbie would have the contemporary churches make more of this doctrine. "They are in evil plight," he thinks, "because they have no thesis of existence in their minds, no creative conception of the evolutionary thesis, only an inherited theology of which they begin to feel a little ashamed."

There is a lot of religion available, nowadays, for those who can get it, and an immense work for it to do. The evolutionary idea is new, and churches and Christians have not yet fully digested it. Some of them think that it is the enemy of faith, but the truth is that anyone who can believe in evolution can believe in anything. Anyone who believes that man came to his present powers and estate by processes of evolution extending over millions of years can surely set no limit to the distance he may still go or to the place at which he shall finally arrive. This is a book for psychologists, teachers, preachers—for him who thinks that what the world needs most is religion because of the power that is in it to change the minds of men.

E. S. MARTIN

O Pirateers!

In Quest of El Dorado. By Stephen Graham. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

In the Wake of the Buccaneers. By A. Hyatt Verrill. The Century Company. $4.

The Dark Frigate. By Charles Boardman Hawes. The Atlantic Monthly Press. $2.

Oh, my name was Captain Kidd
As I sailed!

Oh, my name was Captain Kidd
As I sailed!

Oh, my name was Captain Kidd.
And wickedly I did,
God's word I did forbid
As I sailed.

AFTER a surfeit of coral-fringed, lotos-eating islands of the equatorial Pacific it is good to turn to our own South Seas, especially to pages which describe not only the cobalt waters and the sun-splashed sands of the Caribbean today—with their easy, lazy life—but recall the roaring, gorgeous days of blood and gold, of pistols and pirates, when men risked all for a swallow of rum or a handful of pieces of eight. Mr. Graham sets out from Spain on the romantic errand of following the trail of her gold-hunting caravels to the New World; Mr. Verrill sails us around among the West Indies, entering all the famous old harbors of the buccaneers, comparing life in them today with what it was in the seventeenth century; Mr. Hawes has taken the Caribbean of this stirring period as a setting for a capital story of a pirate ship upon a pirate ocean.

A frank admiration for his black-hearted cutthroats is confessed by Mr. Verrill:

P perchance it is the fact that we all appreciate bravery—and, notwithstanding their multitude of sins, the buccaneers were brave beyond compare. Again, it may be that in all of us lurks a little of the gambling spirit and we admire those who can take a chance, even though we do not, and no greater gamblers ever lived than the buccaneers.

Many of these corsairs, too, left valuable data, like Esquemelling and Dampier. The latter made notes on natural history which, as he himself puts it, he kept in a joint of bamboo "stopt at the ends with wax to keep out water" when he plunged into the streams which he was "often forced to swim."

Mr. Graham, too, pays his tribute to piracy. In perhaps his best chapter he describes how he crossed the Isthmus of Panama in order to set eyes on the Pacific for the first time as Balboa did—from a peak in Darien.

It was icy cold and burning hot at the same time, dank and steaming; perspiration soaked even through the leather of one's knee boots, but small cold airs crept out of the profound green shadow on either hand, chilling for a moment the very marrow. Underfoot were innumerable water currents and mud and slime, and the giant trees above us dripped water all the while. A gravelike coldness crept about everywhere, and now and then a draught of air would lift my wet shirt and make it flap against the skin. Yet it was burning hot.

In a burst of admiration Mr. Graham adds:

The Spaniards plunged across the isthmus in chain mail; I was in my shirt, my guides were without even a shirt. How the Conquistadores did it in complete armor gives a measure of the physical endurance of these men.

Mr. Graham in his Odyssey saw what Mr. Verrill did not, or at least did not record: that the quest for El Dorado is still going on in the Caribbean, but that the stage settings and the actors have changed from galleons loaded with bearded men brandishing ugly cutlasses to steamships loaded with smooth-shaven Americans brandishing beautiful concessions. "The drive of events is making democratic America into an empire," he notes. Mr. Graham is an Englishman to whom imperialism is no treat and likewise no reproach. He accepts it as among the inevitabilities, and his imagination is more swayed by the stupendous accomplishment represented by the Panama Canal than is his conscience disturbed by what the twentieth-century gold-hunters are doing to the natives of the Caribbean or the ideals of their own country.

The Stars and Stripes at the Panama Canal has become the flag of empire. . . . It is more rousing and significant there than anywhere else at this time. It may droop at Washington; it may look ridiculous in the hands of Mr. Babbitt; but at Panama it is the flag of America's inevitable destiny, the flag of her sway and of the triumph of her language, her character, and her business. . . . The Panama Canal delivers Central and South America to Wall Street, to the American commercial commonwealth, to the American people.

Oh, my name was Captain Kidd
As I sailed!

Oh, my name was Captain Kidd
As I sailed!

Oh, my name was Captain Kidd.
And wickedly I did,
God's word I did forbid
As I sailed.

And still he sails—the eternal Captain Kidd, in galleon or steamship, brandishing cutlass or concession. O pirateers!

ARTHUR WARNER

Feminine Epicures

A Guide for the Greedy. By Elizabeth Robbins Pennell. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

The Borzoi Cook Book. By Princess Alexandre Gagarine. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

ELIZABETH ROBBINS PENNELL'S delightful book would not have had to wait twenty-seven years for its second edition had it not appeared under the puzzling title of "The Feasts of Autolycus." Which Autolycus, and who was he anyhow? are questions that would come to most persons; and so this little volume became a classic, somewhat after Mark Twain's definition of a book that many have heard of but few have read. It will be far more widely read under its new title, "A Guide for the Greedy," although that also is a little puzzling. Nay, more than a little if we happen to open it on the pages where the author says: "Gluttony is ranked with the deadly sins; it should be honored among the cardinal virtues." "Rejoice in the knowledge that gluttony is the best cosmetic"—"it deserves nothing but praise and encouragement."

It is needless to explain that she does not use "gluttony" in the dictionary sense of indulging to excess in food and drink. She means it simply in the sense of luxurious living, of gastronomic enjoyment. Gluttony as it is ordinarily understood she abhors; abhors the "men who ate and drank, until, replete and exhausted, they fell under the table"; abhors the American custom of featuring in menus quantity instead of quality; abhors also the glutton in another sense of the word: "the man who gallops through his pleasures in hot haste."

The new title seems born of a defiance of the old notion that a healthy appetite is a snare of the devil and that its gratification means eternal damnation. This notion has lingered longer among women than among men. To this day "women, as a rule, think all too little of the joys of eating"; and, when economy is called for, the purse strings are first drawn tight in the market-place and at the restaurant; which is all wrong.

If every woman in the land could be persuaded to read this book, what a change for the better there might be! For enthusiastic and poetic descriptions of the pleasures of the table equal to Mrs. Pennell's one has to go to epicures of the other sex like Brillat-Savarin or Dumas, whose gastronomic "Dictionnaire" is to her "more exciting and thrilling than his 'Monte Cristo' or 'Three Musketeers.'" It grieves the author that although for centuries the kitchen has been woman's appointed sphere of action, she has "allowed man to carry off the laurels. Vatel, Carême, Ude, Dumas, Gouffé, Etienne, these are some of the immortal cooks of history: the kitchen still waits its Sappho."

Beg pardon, madam. Sappho is here now! She arrived twenty-seven years ago with her message, but her contemporaries were, as is the usual thing, too obtuse to recognize her genius. Were she less modest she might have called her book Sappho in the Kitchen and Dining Room. There is true poetry in her glowing descriptions, her abundant recipes, her enthusiasm over the good things the Lord has provided for us. And like the Greek Sappho, Elizabeth Robbins Pennell orders her feasts "in sheer voluptuousness of spirit."

Just to read the chapter heads must make every one who likes good eating reach for his hat and overcoat and hurry to the nearest book-shop for a copy of the book. Here are a few samples: The Subtle Sandwich; Bouillabaisse: A Symphony in Gold; The Archangelic Bird; The Magnificent Mushroom; The Incomparable Onion; The Triumphant Tomato; Indispensable Cheese; A Dish of Sunshine; Enchanting Coffee.

Mrs. Pennell has traveled much, and her menus have international variety; but, like every genuine epicure, she puts France at the head of the procession, while bestowing on our own country the palm for fruit. "The French have given us most of the things that make life worth living, and among these things is the art of cookery in its perfection." Yet she enthuses over German delicatessen quite as ardently as over the French specialties in cheese and sweets, of which nearly every town has its own.

The Far North gets less attention from this Gastronomic Sappho; but no matter, for here comes, just in time, the Princess Gagarine's "Borzoï Cook Book," which specializes in Russian dishes, many of them most appetizing to read about; some, the Princess admits, do not tempt the non-Russian appetite. Never mind the names; Bortsch is nothing worse than soup, and there is nothing wrong about piroshkis and pancake pie, and vatronshkis with curds, and Koulebiaka, or meat pie, or aspasia of fish, and so on. The general directions at the beginning of each chapter prove the Princess to be an expert cook.

HENRY T. FINCK

Science or Propaganda

Constructive Conscious Control of the Individual. By F. Matthias Alexander. With an Introduction by Professor John Dewey. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

THIS volume is a sequel to "Man's Supreme Inheritance," a book that achieved a fair vogue through the laudatory introduction by John Dewey, who repeats the service in the present instance. Despite the confidence which the critical sense of the introducer commands, one cannot repress a considerable doubt whether in the present instance the commendation is warranted. One need not go so far as to recall the case of Bishop Berkeley as that of another eminent philosopher who staked his faith upon a remedy—the efficacy of tar-water—as a cure for human ills, while still expressing the suspicion that the demonstration of benefit received has operated to obscure the relations of theory and practice. Dewey explicitly informs us that this case is different; that it is not a fad or a knack for which a set of principles has been made to order, but that it is a real discovery of first consequence.

To skeptics the book conveys no such impression. To such the chapters read like an endlessly and thinly elaborated repetition of a few bits of phrases, not without meaning indeed, but still vaguely employed and bloated to an importance out of relation to their substance. A wholly speculative assertion that man has deteriorated from his primitive estate, has lost sensory appreciation, has a wrong psycho-physical attitude, is following a false trail by striving for ends instead of attending to means, consequently is full of bad postures whether in sitting, walking, playing the violin, or playing golf, and equally of unwholesome attitudes—hence unrest and unhappiness; and that a set of exercises and directions founded upon this discovery and capable of restoring primitive function to its due and natural expression has been devised by Mr. Alexander and administered to thousands with remarkable benefit: all this one may in part believe and half accept and yet question the validity of the thesis either of the "Supreme Inheritance" or the "Constructive Conscious Control." Instructions for "shortening" or "lengthening the spine" or for breathing properly seem more convincing when dissociated from their promised effect upon self-knowledge and happiness, though one does not question that within a liberally vague analogical orbit both are instances of proper "psycho-physical equilibrium."

The whole proceeds far more in the manner of a cult than of a scientific inquiry. The impression seems difficult to avoid that the elaborate repetitious verbal structure has been devised to give the setting of a psychological architecture for a technique that doubtless has both merit and foundation, but achieves its purpose by quite other and simpler means than those alleged. So far as this is the case, the program is but one of many that make a bid for scientific and philosophic sanction by a clever assumption of the formulae or the vocabulary without meeting the essential credentials for an accredited status in the guild. At their lowest, crudest levels such programs become pretentious schemes and even fakes; any such intimation would be grossly unjust in the present instance. There is a good deal of wisdom and quite sound psychological application scattered throughout this volume; but the leading tenor of its claims and their vindication is by no means free from the odium attaching to the propagandist in the unfavorable sense of that mission.

JOSEPH JASTROW

"Past Tenses"

Open All Night. By Paul Morand. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

LIKE one of his own creations, the winner of the Prix de la Renaissance is at his best "when thinking in capital letters and flying to extremes." The pattern of his writing is bizarre. His verbal pictures have the vivid colors and the sharp contrasts of posters; they are three-sheets of ironic impressionism. With the swiftest of strokes, he throws his figures up in front of the eye, juggles them at the end of a long brush, and slaps them into place like a bill poster, smearing them with the paste of disillusion. Viewed from the front, they are gay and tragic at once, and always fascinating—if one does not look behind and discover the rough boards, the bare scaffolding which supports the picture.

Five vivid studies of post-war Europe, each with a different setting but all in a harmonious key, are projected in this volume. They are glittering reflections of the desperate bewilderment into which life has been thrown in an age in which "men have become soldiers and women have gone mad and destiny has added her quota in a pretty series of catastrophes." Written with a trenchant irony, they dash back and forth across the hair-line which divides the romantic and the absurd. Sometimes the effect is genuine, as in the tightly drawn panorama of a six-day bicycle race; occasionally it is nothing but vaudeville: "Is she at all literary?" "No, I believe she's quite a good girl."

Morand sees the world like a platter turned upside down, with a well-browned, nicely basted aristocracy suddenly spilled upon the ground for beggars to snatch at. Nothing remains intact in this welter of disorder except the primitive passions of men and women, and even these are curiously diverted, in many instances, from their normal expression. Thus one finds Remedios, a "mermaid in the sea of Marxism," quoting sentimental Andalusian proverbs yet living with an intensity which belied them; and Anna, with her Russian pathos and her stoic resignation, talking with such a far-away intonation that "one came to fear that none of the things she said had ever happened to her." These, and the rest of the women in this sharply sensuous gallery of Morand's, are caught in their most feminine manifestations, filled with contradictions and shaken by the contrary winds of their emotional natures. They are externally real—and yet just a little incredible.

Perhaps it might be said that Morand's heroines partake of the qualities which he finds in the Russian tongue. "A disconcerting language," he says, "in which even the grammar sets words free instead of tying them down, and which contains several past tenses each more and more remote from reality, until one begins to doubt even the existence of yesterday." Yes, these ladies grow bewildering in their "past tenses"; Morand himself is not quite untouched by the mirage. As a matter of fact, these studies—for all their modernness of mood and of material—have curiously begun to "date." They might, were it not for their background, be a literary product contemporary with "A Rebours." The pen of Paul Morand has that same restlessness—and the same pallor.

LISLE BELL

Wanted: The Spirit of Peace

The Problem of Armaments. A Book for Every Citizen of Every Country. By Arthur Guy Enock. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

MR. ENOCK'S book is an arsenal of arguments for all who believe that war ought not to be, as well as for those who hold that the gains of war, however considerable they may appear on the surface, are rarely if ever commensurate with the cost. The carefully compiled statistical exhibits which are offered of the military and naval expenditures of the principal countries of the world from 1900 to 1920, and of the casualties and other losses of the World War, afford an unanswerable demonstration of the futility of attempting to settle international disputes by force of arms.

What is likely to cut most deeply into the consciousness of the reader, however, is Mr. Enock's exposition, first, of the extent to which a great war absorbs in all directions the economic life of a nation; second, of the extent to which indirect preparation for more and deadlier wars is being made through apparently peaceful scientific and industrial development; and, third, of the comparatively slight influence that appears to be exerted by any or all organized efforts for peace. Of the first of these points the account of the multiform activities of the British Ministry of Munitions during the World War is the outstanding confirmation, while the force of the second is seen in the conscious and deliberate development of the resources of chemical warfare. What, then, in the large, does the continued preparation for war mean? It means, to quote Mr. Enock, that "with the lessons of the past plain before them, leaders of men have failed to learn wisdom"; that notwithstanding repeated outbursts of war, "the lessons of history have been lost," and that men have preferred to use their immense accumulation of knowledge and experience to spread desolation and death rather than to enhance physical, intellectual, and moral well-being. In the twenty-one years covered by Mr. Enock's survey, fourteen nations have chosen to find for war purposes $61,500,000,000, "a sum which, with the pensionary burdens and the interest on debts incurred for armament in the past, has absorbed three-quarters of the productive energy of the peoples." In the presence of such colossal waste only a fool will insist that the problem of armaments is academic, or that paper agreements among governments which have administered and encouraged the orgy will ever accomplish any good. The only sure preventive of war is a new spirit in the minds and hearts of men, and for the cultivation of such a spirit Mr. Enock's book is an earnest plea.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Resurrecting the Ancient East

The Life of the Ancient East. By James Baikie. The Macmillan Company. $4.

History of Assyria. By A. T. Olmstead. Charles Scribner's Sons. $7.50.

THE tremendous march of events in the Near East, the world's "most dark and bloody ground," has awakened a new interest on the part of Western peoples in the lands of the Levant, and hence we greet with enthusiasm all fresh knowledge of their past. Renewed excavations have been inaugurated by universities and learned societies in many quarters, but nothing has so stimulated the imagination of the general public as the accidental discovery of Mr. Howard Carter's Arab workmen in the Valley of the Kings.

James Baikie's "The Life of the Ancient East" will give many just what they desire—a glimpse into the romance of archaeological discovery. Very naturally Egypt stands in the foreground. Abydos, the holy city, Thebes with its temples and tombs, Tut-ankh-Amen's sepulchre and treasures, pass in review before the reader and lend a vivid impression of Egypt's glory. But the most fascinating chapter is that which tells of Tell-el-Amarna, the capital of Akhenaten, the noblest of the Pharaohs, who lost an empire but won a place among the immortal leaders of religion as the first monotheist of history. Mr. Baikie, however, realizes that Egypt must not monopolize our attention and so leads us to that other great and wondrous land which has contributed more written records of its past than any other of antiquity—to Babylonia and Assyria. The old Sumerian city of Lagash is first described, as sample and symbol of the earliest culture in the land of the twin rivers. But the great capitals Babylon, Nineveh, and Ashur are also resurrected for us, and with awe we stand on the ground where Hammurapi codified his great corpus juris and from which the mightiest conquerors and soldiers of ancient history sallied forth to war. From Mesopotamia we journey westward to the lands of the Iliad and Odyssey and are told the most stirring chapter of all archaeological exploration, how Heinrich Schliemann unearthed Troy, Mycenae, and Tiryns from their grave of ages. Transferring his attention to Crete, Mr. Baikie tells of Sir Arthur Evans's discoveries at Knossos and of the sea kings who ruled the Aegean in the days before the Greeks made their appearance on the stage of history. And finally our pilgrimage ends in the Holy Land at the ruins of ancient Gezer, a city of the Canaanites. The diversity of themes discussed in this book prevents it from becoming in any way monotonous.

Of much greater importance, however, is the "History of Assyria" by A. T. Olmstead. Here at last is an up-to-date, beautifully bound monograph on this subject written not by a mere chronicler but by an historian of grasp and power. He has made use of the most recent material, such as the new historical texts from Ashur and the remarkable Nabopolassar Chronicle of the events of 616-609 B.C., just published by J. C. Gadd, which throw so much light on the beginning and end of Assyrian history. The great collection of Assyrian letters by Robert Francis Harper has also been utilized with profit. Perhaps Mr. Olmstead has dealt with matters pertaining to the sphere of Hebrew history at greater length than was necessary; also, the discussion of the Kings of Yadi (it is to be regretted that he paves the way for more confusion by erroneously calling this kingdom the northern "Judah") belongs rather to a history of the Aramaeans and has been abundantly dealt with elsewhere. In the concluding chapter he has yielded to the temptation to philosophize. He defends the Assyrian against the charge that he was merely a rapacious wolf, and finds that history often justifies the imperialist by making him the bearer of civilization. Some readers will doubtless lay aside his book comfortably reconciled to the French reign of terror in the Ruhr or the slaughter of millions of Oriental Christians by the Turk, believing that a future historian will write for the perpetrators such an epitaph as Mr. Olmstead has written for the Assyrian: "He was the shepherd dog of civilization and he died at his post." Others, to whom the relativities of history are insignificant beside the absolute categories of right and wrong, will see a brighter future for civilization when a few more of its shepherd dogs die. But perhaps we ought not to quarrel with the author of a great book about matters of detail such as these. Let us rather hope that his book will arouse such interest in Assyrian exploration that our knowledge of this people will be enriched still more. Thanks to the stimulus given by the late William Hayes Ward, an American School of Oriental Research has been opened at Bagdad. When we remember that even Nineveh has been only partially excavated and that other great Assyrian cities have never been touched by the spade, it seems to us that here is a vast opportunity for wealthy Americans to become great patrons of a science rich in romance and surprise. The 176 illustrations that Mr. Olmstead has selected for the adornment of his book should help to arouse many to the possibilities existing in this field.

E. G. H. KRAELING

Your Little Boy

One Little Boy. By Hugh de Sélincourt. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

THIS book is an expression in fiction of that modern spirit which values whatever is true in life and therefore approaches this truth with sympathy and interest. It is the story of a boy just past puberty confronted with the problems of his years, mysteries to him because of his parents' failure to teach him the essential facts about his body and the elementary truth about the propagation of life. The headmaster of the English "public school," where the scene is laid, detects the youngster in "the worst offense that boy can commit, an offense which defiles a community, which saps the roots of character. If I had not watched him with my own eyes," Headmaster Lake tells the assembled school after morning prayers, "I could not have believed him capable of such foulness. My own mind feels polluted by what I saw." And announcing his determination "to keep my school pure at whatever cost," he flogs the offender publicly in chapel and forbids his talking with other boys for the rest of the term. Mrs. Hullertson, the boy's widowed mother living nearby, greatly distressed by what has happened to her son, Graham, hurries to the school to learn from the headmaster that she has been an indulgent mother and that to save her son from wickedness she must not spare the rod. But both she and her son remain bewildered and unhappy. Their problem is solved by the entrance into the story of a very lovely girl, several years Graham's senior. Paula and her father, who comes to assume something of a father's part toward Graham, are fresh, spontaneous, and wholesome. And being what they are they supply the common sense lacking in Mrs. Hullertson and the stimulus that Graham needs.

If the ending appears rather vague and leaves the reader in doubt, the author's underlying purpose is unmistakable from the opening chapter. Being an artist Hugh de Sélincourt has deliberately avoided giving us a tract but instead has created a fragment, delicate and fragrant, gently ironical at times, and occasionally sentimental. The characters are on the whole well drawn. Yet one can but wonder at the striking disparity in the constant picturing of Graham as "a little boy" and what we know his age, for physiological reasons, must be.

"One Little Boy" is a significant book. It is a token of a very recent mental emancipation, a concession in process of being wrung from our civilization. Twenty years ago—perhaps fifteen or ten—it would not have been published, and its appearance is a symptom of a new and saner attitude in modern society toward personal life. And what is this attitude? It is a nascent rationalism which casts out the familiar devils of prudery that so often become pruriency; of ignorance that has been idealized as innocence; of hypocrisy that masks as rectitude; of self-imposed misery that is sublimated into virtuous chastening; of a spurious and artificial "morality" that may be "compensated" vice—of all the mental hobgoblins with which man has tortured himself and his fellows from time immemorial. "One Little Boy" touches one phase of the re-acceptance in the realm of love and life of the eternal axiom that the truth shall make us free.

ERNEST GRUENING

Books in Brief

A Reference Guide to Edmund Spenser. By Frederick Ives Carpenter. The University of Chicago Press. $3.50.

This bibliography it is easier to commend than to review. It is arranged logically in divisions and subdivisions. It is thorough to the point of being almost exhaustive; and the omissions which the present reviewer has noticed are of no consequence whatsoever. The most important problems in Spenser criticism, both solved and unsolved, are indicated and classified. In the study of few other poets does the serious investigator come across more varied or more baffling and intriguing questions. No future student of the poet can even begin to inquire into the problems as yet unsolved (a list of which is conveniently offered by Mr. Carpenter), without having this guide constantly at his elbow.

Europe and Elsewhere. By Mark Twain. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

No omnium gatherum of Mark Twain's hitherto uncollected pieces can be without some interest, for he rarely wrote anything that was either worthless or faultless and some light is cast upon his personality from even his least considered essays. The present collection is made up of odds and ends: records of travel, newspaper editorials, comments on matters of interest in their day, jeux d'esprit, political and social articles, and a fairly cohesive group of studies in the careers of Mark Twain's old friends, Satan, Adam, and Eve. The tone of the book, as a whole, is serious rather than humorous; and in the articles on lynching, on the Spanish-American War, on imperialism, and on the Chinese situation in 1900 a deeply felt and ardent indignation flames out. Such a collection can add nothing to so great a fame; but neither does it detract from it—and perhaps that is the best that can be expected from a posthumous volume of this sort.

After Disillusion. By Robert L. Wolf. Thomas Seltzer. $1.25.

Frank, original, and ingenious verse which, for some reason known only to the Muses, is never quite as interesting as it ought to be. The title suggests a unity which it is hard to find in the volume, and few of the poems, excellent as their ideas promise to be, end well. Yet pieces like The Supplanted, Messenger, and Prologue for the Modern Male guarantee a respectful reading of Mr. Wolf's next book.

The French Revolution, 1789-1815. By Shailer Mathews. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.

Mr. Mathews first published his "French Revolution" twenty-three years ago, telling the story up to 1795. Since that time much that was then unknown has come to light; new interpretations have been made of characters and events; the era itself has come to be regarded with increasing sympathy and understanding. In view of this, Mr. Mathews has now deemed it advisable to publish a revised edition of his work.

THE NEW ERA MAGAZINE

An International Review of Education.

Send $.60 for International Congress illustrated number.

Articles by the big men in Europe who are applying the New Psychology to education.

McDEVITT-WILSON'S, Inc.

30 CHURCH ST.—HUDSON TERMINAL

NEW DOLLAR ANNEX AT 54 DEY ST.

Up one flight.

ORIENTALIA

The Only Shop in America Dealing Exclusively in Books on the East

The following catalogues and lists may now had free on application:

Books on the Arts and Crafts of Asia

Books on China and Japan

Books on Mythology and Folklore

Books of Voyages and Travel to the East from Earliest Times

New Holiday list of books

List of Oriental art objects and textiles suitable for gifts

ORIENTALIA

32 West 58th Street New York City

GERMAN BOOKS

NEW and OLD

Large Representative Stock at

BEYER'S BOOKSHOP

207 FULTON STREET NEW YORK

Opp. Terminal, Upstairs

BOOKS
and where to buy them

STORIES from the EARLY WORLD

By R. M. Fleming

The authentic myths, brave stories of high deeds that have thrilled the people of twenty-four races from the earliest times, brilliantly retold for children. Illustrated. 8vo. $2.50

The Adventures of MAYA the BEE

By Waldemar Bonsels

Hugh Walpole—"A classic of modern literature for children." Beautifully illustrated in full colors by Homer Boss. 8vo. $3.00

Handsome booklet containing Hugh Walpole's article in the current International Book Review sent free on request.

THOMAS SELTZER, 5 W. 50th St., N.Y.

VILLAGE BOOK SHELVES

The Book Shop with a Fireplace.

CIRCULATING LIBRARY

Use the Mails to Obtain It

Latest Fiction, Humor, Essays, Travel and Biography.

New and Old books for rent or sale.

Send $1.00 Deposit. Moderate Rental.

Tell us the book you want.

144 MACDOUGAL STREET, N. Y. C.

The earlier pages have undergone some slight revision and almost two hundred pages have been added in order to bring the account to its more logical conclusion with the fall of Napoleon and the restoration of the Bourbons. It is therefore really a new book that the author has written. Mr. Mathews is inclined to sermonize, with the Revolution as his text, and to overemphasize moral decadence as a motivating force. He has added footnotes pointing out analogies between then and now that are not always felicitous and he is guilty of a number of surprising errors, such as that of representing Danton, Robespierre, and Marat as members of the Legislative Assembly. In spite of these shortcomings, the present volume is undoubtedly a better one than its ancestor was, although it is not the most complete or the most interesting short study of the years 1789-1815.

The Mother. By Grazia Deledda. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This story is as simple in outline as it is tragic in outcome—a young priest swayed from duty by the kindling of love, and his mother's swift intervention on the side of his churchly vows. Unfolded with an elemental intensity, it lays hold of the reader's imagination from the first page and moves forward to an inevitable catastrophe. The author writes in a style which is at once unadorned and poetic.

Against This Age. By Maxwell Bodenheim. Boni and Liveright. $1.75.

Mr. Bodenheim's fifth volume of verse, published five years after his first, leaves little to be said by any one who has discussed the former four. The charm of Mr. Bodenheim's difficult, sardonic poetry used to depend partly upon the fact that there was not much of it. If he keeps on at the present rate, there is danger that it will cease to be precious.

Drama Inferno

GEORGE S. KAUFMAN and Marc Connelly, whose delectable comedies "Dulcy" and "To the Ladies" struck one more through their reserve than through any expression of ironic vision, have let themselves go at last. To keep the mood of laughter vivid at every moment, however, they have fitted their extraordinarily inclusive and biting satire of the life about them into an imaginative framework that was ready to their hand. This framework was afforded them by Paul Apel's rich and delightful work "Hans Sonnenstössers Höllenfahrt" which, being interpreted, means "Johnny Sunstormer's Trip to Hell." In Apel's play, as in "Beggar on Horseback" (Broadhurst Theater), an idealistic young artist is tempted, in order to escape the curse of hackwork and save his creative powers, to marry into a family of the grossest Philistines. There, as here, he falls asleep and dreams that he has yielded to the temptation, and the play consists of the humorous and ironic exhausting of the resultant situation. Nothing could have been done by a direct use of Apel's text, since the German Philister, though own blood-brother to the American Babbitt, differs from the latter very radically in both mentality and manner. Thus Messrs. Kaufman and Connelly hit upon the happy notion of keeping Apel's scheme, imitating the scientific verisimilitude of his dream-technique, but making the satiric substance of the play entirely and perfectly American. The result is a dramatic work which, though wholly imitative in structure and method, is as wholly original in creative substance.

It is this substance that is both delightful and valuable. I doubt whether any of our professed realists of the theater have painted American life with such unerring strokes. Here, furthermore, as in "The Adding-Machine," the technique permitted speed and concentration, so that the picture is a wonderfully inclusive one and there is hardly a species of "bunk" that is not both accurately and hilariously exhibited. The Cady family reach a kind of greatness. Of course, we are dealing with satire and the figures are stripped of all but the essentials. These essentials, however, have been selected both with satiric insight and with scientific delicacy and precision, and Mr. and Mrs. Cady are portraits not unworthy of Hogarth. On an equally high plane are the satiric inventions by which the authors illustrate the scene and ethos on which their eyes are fixed. Chief amid these inventions are the factory for the efficient mass-production of literature, poetry, music, and the Freudian yet highly realistic dream trial scene. Throughout the delineation of these characters and the invention of these scenes the American idiom is used with a blending of actuality with symbolic driving force that is, I believe, unequaled elsewhere.

Finally I wish to praise the authors of "Beggar on Horseback" most heartily for this, that they laugh at fatuousness and gross materialism, at triviality of mind and soul, at stubborn stupidity and dishonor no longer conscious of itself, not as these qualities are contrasted with some specious moralistic idealism, but as they are contrasted with art, with the eternal creative spirit, with the quest of him who is driven despite himself to pursue that beauty which is also truth. This central motivation they found, of course, in the original of Paul Apel. But I am glad that they dared so fully and explicitly to keep it in their American version.

The production, like all the productions of Mr. Winthrop Ames, is graceful, imaginative, and exact. I am not especially impressed with the Pantomime, happily enough named and invented, the function of which is to oppose beauty to grossness and significance to triviality. It is a little slight for the purpose, and at variance with its slowness is the music of Mr. Deems Taylor which, skilful and not unimpressive, is so afraid of being less than almost of tomorrow that it will not let itself be either as lovely or as eloquent as it might well have been. But it is charming enough and the acting in the play itself, primarily of Mr. Roland Young but also of his numerous associates, is genuine and telling.

I must not neglect to mention the Morning-Evening, a four-page newspaper distributed to the audience during, at least, the early performances of "Beggar on Horseback." In this quite precious travesty of a contemporary yellow sheet, prepared exclusively for morons, the mentality of both the makers and the consumers of such printed matter is exhibited and excoriated with a touch that is among the best and most promising and most wholesome things in American letters.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents
FAY Bainter in
"THE OTHER ROSE"
with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 46th Street
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!
DAVID BELASCO Presents
LIONEL BARRYMORE
with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Evs. at 8:30
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance

NATIONAL Theat., 41st St., W. of Broadway, Evs., 8:00
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

"One play
in a thousand"

Alexander Woolcott
in the Herald

Outward Bound

with a Distinguished Cast
at the
RITZ THEATRE
West 48 St. Evs. 8:30.
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

PRINCESS THEATRE 39th Street
East of Broadway. Evs.
nings, 8:45. Matinees
Thurs. and Sat., 2:45.
SUN UP With
LUCILLE LAVERNE
By LULA VOLLMER

YIDDISH ART THEATRE 27th St. and
Madison Ave.
Maurice Swartz, Director
Abraham Goldfaden's classic comedy revival
"THE TWO KOONY LAMMELS"
Friday, 8:30
Also Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30

GREENWICH VILLAGE THEATRE Free Lectures on Theosophy by (Sheridan Square) B. P. WADIA
Sundays, 11 a. m. Feb. 24—Theology or Religion?
Mar. 2—World Politics
No seats reserved. No collection.

EDWIN M. BORCHARD, Ph.D., of Yale University SERIES OF LECTURES ON Economic and Political Factors in International Relations
THE COMMUNITY CHURCH, Park Avenue and 34th Street
Thursday Evenings, Feb. 28, March 6, 13, 20, 27. 8:00 P.M.
Course Ticket, $2.00. Admission, 50 cents.

BOSTON SCHOOL of SOCIAL SCIENCE, Former Hall,
Courses, Monday Evs., Feb. 25 Tremont Temple
Margaret Daniels, Ph.D.
PSYCHO-ANALYSIS AND THE UNCONSCIOUS
Wednesday Evs., Feb. 27; Mar. 5, 12
H. M. Wicks
AMERICAN HISTORY IN THE LIGHT OF ECONOMIC CHANGES
Monday Evs., March 3, 10, 17, 24
Scott Nearing
ECONOMIC CHAOS AND THE WAY OUT
Admission to each course $1.00. Single Admission 30c. For bulletin and tickets write to Secretary, Jacob Kassner, 21 Middlesex St., Boston, Mass.

International Relations Section

The "Inexperience" of British Labor

By HERBERT W. HORWILL

THE British Labor Government, we are told, is "inexperienced." No doubt it is. The new Prime Minister comes to his task as a novice—as much a novice as any American President who occupies the White House for the first time. Most of the members of his Cabinet, too, are strangers to the work of a government department—as unfamiliar with it, indeed, as are usually the majority of the official family of a new President of the United States. Many people whose attitude to British Labor is quite friendly cannot altogether banish from their minds the fear that a Labor Government must suffer seriously from this handicap of inexperience. They are willing to admit all that may be claimed for it on the score of personal ability. But ability is not everything. Experience counts. And must not a Labor Cabinet undertake its responsibilities as a group of raw hands grappling with entirely unfamiliar problems?

It may be useful, then, to consider precisely what is required of a British cabinet minister. There are two kinds of experience, in particular, that are of value to him when he enters upon office. In the first place, the member of a British Cabinet, unlike the occupant of a corresponding position in America, has to discharge the function of representing his department in Parliament. The perfect minister should therefore be familiar with the Parliament's methods of doing business and should be a master of parliamentary debate. He must be able to present the affairs of his department lucidly and effectively when the annual estimates are laid before the House and whenever at other times any question relating to it comes into controversy. Upon him falls the task of introducing any government measure affecting matters within the province of his department, and of piloting it through its successive stages until it has passed its third reading. More than that, as a member of the Cabinet he is expected to take his fair share in defending the general policy of the Government in the event of its being challenged. This account of the parliamentary duties of cabinet ministers applies also, though in less degree, to the political under-secretaries of the departments, as distinguished from the permanent under-secretaries who are civil-service officials and have no seats in Parliament.

Now the MacDonald Government is certainly not below the normal standard in its equipment of qualifications for this side of a cabinet minister's functions. It includes some of the most capable debaters in the House, who will be well able to hold their own in any discussions that may arise. Several of them, too, have sat in the House for a considerable period, are experts in parliamentary procedure, and understand as well as anyone else what tactics must be employed in order to achieve any particular purpose.

The other particular responsibility of a British minister is administrative. It is in this respect that the criticism of lack of experience may most justly be made, for comparatively few members of the new Ministry have previously been heads of government departments or have held any of those minor offices which are generally stepping-stones to cabinet rank. But every new minister, immediately he takes office, has at his command the resources of a highly trained civil service, which, whatever may be the private opinions of its members, rigidly follows a tradition of carrying out its duties without respect of party. The permanent under-secretaries and their staff form a body of experts whose knowledge and skill will be placed as readily and as fully at the disposal of Mr. MacDonald as of any of his predecessors. There will be draftsmen to prepare government bills, lawyers to advise on knotty legal questions, and a multitude of other competent officials who will provide as complete a technical equipment as any head of a department could desire.

Moreover, a good many Labor members who have not previously held office have nevertheless enjoyed considerable opportunities of observing how a government department is run. Of late years the leading representatives of Labor have spent no small fraction of their time at Whitehall in the transaction of business with ministers, and this contact must have given them not a little insight into government methods and routine, which will be all to the good now that they are themselves called upon to take part in the actual operation of the government machine.

Again, many have had a training in municipal government which will prove of the highest value as an apprenticeship to the management of national concerns. The man who has discharged responsible functions in connection with the government of such cities as London or Manchester or Leeds, with their large enterprises and big budgets, does not approach the task of national government as a novice in the handling of complicated and important affairs. Even experience in trade-union matters may count for a good deal in this respect. It is not child's play to hold, like J. H. Thomas, the post of secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen, or, like Frank Hodges, that of secretary of the Miners' Federation. To manage the business of such organizations as these calls forth and develops precisely the qualities that are of most service to the chief of a government department, and provides in itself a preparation for public service far superior to that possessed by the traditional type of politician-minister when he takes office for the first time. The Baldwin Cabinet contained one member whose previous experience in administration had been gained as a master of stag hounds!

As regards the appointment of men whose administrative record lies outside government office, it may be noted that, quite unwittingly, Mr. Lloyd George has smoothed the way for Mr. MacDonald in the formation of his cabinet slate. Ten years ago it would have been an unheard-of thing for anyone to be taken into a British Cabinet who had neither sat in Parliament nor held a subordinate governmental office. But when Mr. Lloyd George brought Neville Chamberlain and the brothers Geddes into his Cabinet, although they were destitute of both official and parliamentary experience, he set a new precedent which will work out today to the advantage of the Labor Party. To make ministers out of parliamentary novices may be wise or unwise, but at any rate it is no longer an innovation, and in England that means a good deal.

There remains something to be said about the knowledge that the Labor Government possesses of the specific problems with which it will have to deal. On industrial problems, obviously, it will be able to speak with expert authority. However biased or one-sided its policies may be in the judgment of its opponents and critics, it will at any rate know the facts, and it will know them at first hand. The trade-union representatives in the Ministry will have the great advantage of understanding, from intimate personal contact, the conditions under which some of the principal industries of the country are carried on. Further, the Government will have at its command the services not only of several men who have been concerned with industrial problems all their lives in the most practical fashion, but also of a smaller number, constituting a sort of elite or headquarters staff, who have gained a reputation as thinkers and writers on economic topics. Such men, for instance, as Ramsay MacDonald himself and his Chancellor of the Exchequer, Philip Snowden, could not be outrivaled from the Conservative or Liberal benches when subjects of this kind come up for consideration. Most conspicuous of all in this respect is Sidney Webb, the nearest approach in England to a walking encyclopedia of economics. There will be many a debate in the new Parliament for which a speaker, whatever side he may take, will best equip himself by the study of Sidney Webb's books.

If one had been contemplating the formation of a Labor Government a decade or two ago, there would have been good reason to believe that foreign policy would be a province entirely outside the range of its acquaintance. That exception can no longer be made. The British Labor leaders nowadays are in close touch with men and affairs on the continent of Europe. Only one Labor M.P., Arthur Ponsonby, the new Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has himself held posts in the diplomatic service, but Labor's lack of familiarity with foreign courts and chancelleries finds abundant compensation in the intercourse its leaders have had with the more democratic forces abroad. These democratic forces are exerting a constantly increasing influence over the policies of European governments, and an appreciation of their significance is likely to bring more benefit to a British Foreign Minister nowadays than he could derive from the most extensive personal acquaintance among the members of foreign aristocracies. It may be presumed that J. Ramsay MacDonald has never been presented at any European court, but, after all, the European countries that retain courts are a rapidly diminishing number, and he possesses the much more useful asset of an intimate knowledge of the political, social, and economic conditions of nearly every foreign Power whose policies are likely to affect those of Great Britain. His travels during the last few years have taken him far afield, and when he has been abroad he has not limited his observations to the scenery or his conversation to a discussion of railroad schedules with the hotel clerk. There will be at hand, too, in minor offices or as private members on the Labor benches, supporters who can contribute expert information on specific questions, such as Noel Buxton, the specialist in Balkan affairs, and E. D. Morel, who has at his fingers' ends every detail of the moves on the chess-board of European diplomacy for the last twenty years. In the past, one of the most unfortunate defects of the British Foreign Office, as pointed out in the evidence given before a royal commission just before the outbreak of the war, has been its reliance on the reports of representatives abroad who neither knew nor cared anything about any movements of public opinion outside fashionable circles. A revolution might be brewing under their very noses and they would be blissfully unaware of it. From that handicap, at any rate, the Foreign Office of a Labor Administration may hope to be preserved.

So far we have been considering the question of inexperience as it affects the qualifications of those ministers only who have for many years been members of the Labor Party. But Mr. MacDonald has been fortunate enough to secure the assistance of a few distinguished men from outside its ranks whom no one could describe as neophytes in the public service. Conspicuous among them is Lord Haldane, who has on his record a period of ten years spent in cabinet offices, and thus links this new governmental experiment with the older tradition. The duties of the Lord Chancellorship will by no means absorb the whole of his abounding energies, and there are few of the more important problems confronting the Administration that will not be brought nearer solution by the application to them of his powerful mind, his wide knowledge, and his genius for organization.

The Franco-Czech Alliance

FRANCE and Czecho-Slovakia signed a treaty of alliance on January 25, 1924. This treaty, although long anticipated, caused a sensation among the nations of Central and Eastern Europe, and may have profound political consequences. It is generally understood that certain economic agreements were signed at the same time; and France recently made a loan of 300,000,000 francs to Czecho-Slovakia, to be expended on armament. The text of the published treaty is given below as printed in the Temps (Paris) of January 28, 1924; certain further texts, necessary for its elucidation, are added:

The President of the French Republic and the President of the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia, firmly attached to the principle of respect for international agreements solemnly confirmed by the Covenant of the League of Nations, and equally desirous of safeguarding peace, the maintenance of which is necessary to the political stability and economic revival of Europe, and therefore resolved to insure respect for the juridical order and international policy established by the treaties which they have signed; and

Considering that mutual guaranties of security against an eventual aggression and for the defense of their common interests are indispensable to that end, have named as their plenipotentiaries:

By the President of the French Republic: M. Raymond Poincaré, Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs;

By the President of the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia: M. Edward Benes, Minister of Foreign Affairs;

Who having communicated their full powers found in good and due order have agreed as follows:

Article I. The governments of the republics of France and of Czecho-Slovakia agree to discuss in common foreign questions which might endanger their security or affect the order established by the peace treaties which they have both signed;

Art. II. The high contracting parties will agree upon measures adapted to safeguard their common interests in case they are menaced;

Art. III. The high contracting parties, fully agreeing upon the importance for the maintenance of peace of the political principles included in Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye of September 10, 1919 [see Appendix A], as well as in the Geneva Protocols of October 4, 1922 [see Appendix A], which they both signed, agree to discuss in common the measures to be taken in case these principles are menaced;

Art. IV. The high contracting parties, taking into particular consideration the declarations made by the Conference of Ambassadors on February 3, 1920 [see Appendix C], and on April 1, 1921 [see Appendix D], by which their policy will continue to be inspired, as well as the declaration made by the Hungarian Government, on November 10, 1921 [see Appendix E], to the diplomatic representatives of the Allies, agree, in case their interests are menaced by failure to observe the principles enunciated in these various declarations to discuss the matter in common;

Art. V. The high contracting parties confirm their full agreement regarding the necessity imposed upon them, in order to maintain peace, of adopting a common attitude in the presence of any attempt to restore the Hohenzollern dynasty in Germany, and agree to discuss in common the measures to be taken in such an eventuality.

Art. VI. In accordance with the principles of the Covenant of the League of Nations the high contracting parties agree that in case litigious questions which cannot be settled by friendly agreement and by diplomatic means shall arise between them in future they shall submit the questions either to the Permanent Court of Justice or to one or several arbitrators to be chosen by them.

Art. VII. The high contracting parties agree to communicate to each other agreements concerning their policy in Central Europe which they have hitherto concluded, and to consult with each other before concluding new agreements. They declare that nothing contained in the present treaty is contrary to such agreements, in particular to the treaty of alliance between France and Poland, to the agreements or arrangements between Czecho-Slovakia and the federal Republic of Austria, Rumania, or the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, or to the agreement confirmed by the exchange of notes on February 8, 1921, between the Italian Government and the Czecho-Slovak Government.

Art. VIII. The present treaty shall be communicated to the League of Nations in accordance with Article 18 of the Covenant. The present treaty shall be ratified and the instruments of ratification will be exchanged at Paris as soon as possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries, duly authorized to that effect, have signed and sealed the present treaty.

R. POINCARÉ

DR. EDWARD BENES

Done at Paris in duplicate, January 25, 1924

APPENDIX A

Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, between Austria and the Allied Powers, reads as follows:

The independence of Austria is inalienable otherwise than with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations. Consequently Austria undertakes in the absence of the consent of the said council to abstain from any act which might directly or indirectly or by any means whatever compromise her independence, particularly, and until her admission to membership of the League of Nations, by participation in the affairs of another Power.

APPENDIX B

The Geneva protocols of October 4, 1922, established the basis for the rehabilitation of Austria by means of an international loan and under the direction of a commissioner appointed by the League of Nations. The first of these protocols substantially recapitulated Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain, adding:

This undertaking shall not prevent Austria from maintaining, subject to the provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain, her freedom in the matter of customs tariffs and commercial or financial agreements, provided, however, that she shall not violate her economic independence by granting to any state a special regime or exclusive advantages calculated to threaten this independence.

APPENDIX C

In February, 1920, when formal negotiations for the Treaty of the Trianon, between Hungary and the Allied and Associated Powers, had just begun, a strong Hapsburg agitation developed in Hungary. Charles IV, despite his renunciation of the crown in 1918, had written on August 14, 1919, from his exile in Switzerland, "I am still king." Various rumors were current, and the Conference of Ambassadors issued the following statement on February 3, 1920:

The Principal Allied and Associated Powers believe it necessary to give a formal denial to the rumors which are current and which are calculated to mislead public opinion. They are represented as ready to recognize or to favor the establishment of the Hapsburg dynasty upon the throne of Hungary. The Principal Allied Powers believe that the restoration of a dynasty which personifies in the eyes of its subjects a system of oppression and domination of other races, in alliance with Germany, would not be compatible either with the principles for which they fought or with the results which they were able to secure through the war for the liberation of peoples formerly subservient. It is not within their intention to regard it as the duty of the Principal Allied Powers to intervene in the internal affairs of Hungary or to dictate to the Hungarian people the form of government or constitution which it should adopt for itself. However, the Powers cannot admit that the restoration of the Hapsburg dynasty should be regarded as a question affecting only the Hungarian nation. They declare that a restoration of this nature would be contrary to the very bases of the peace settlement and would be neither recognized nor tolerated by them.

APPENDIX D

Charles IV returned to Hungary, attempting a coup d'état, on March 27, 1921. On April 1, 1921, following a threat by the Little Entente, on March 30, of a "blockade," followed by a "military demonstration," the Conference of Ambassadors issued the following statement:

The events of which Hungary is the theater place upon the Principal Allied Powers the obligation of recalling to the Government and people of Hungary the declaration of February 4 [3], 1920. Faithful to the principles set forth in this declaration, the Allies have the duty to repeat that the restoration of a Hapsburg would imperil the very basis of peace and that it could be neither recognized nor tolerated by them.

The Allied Powers expect the Hungarian Government, conscious of the gravity of the situation which the return to the throne of Hungary of the former sovereign would cause, to take efficacious measures to deal with the attempt, the momentary success of which could have for Hungary only disastrous consequences.

APPENDIX E

On November 10, 1921, Baron Banffy, for the Hungarian Government, made the following formal statement:

In order to insure more effectively the intentions of the law and to safeguard the responsibility of the Government, Hungary has the intention of making a law which, in addition to the penal provisions now in force, will allow it to combat effectively any attempt or any propaganda in favor of the Hapsburgs, or of any other person whose candidacy does not fall within the terms above mentioned.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 5, 1924

No. 3061

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	243
EDITORIALS:
The Brighter Side in Washington.....	246
Set the War Truths Free!.....	247
Talent and Character.....	247
The Sea Repeats Itself.....	248
THE BETRAYAL OF OUR WAR VICTIMS. By Arthur Warner.....	249
AMERICA IN POLYNESIA:
II. Hawaiian Village Life. By Padraic Colum.....	251
NATIONAL MINORITIES IN SOVIET RUSSIA. By Louis Fischer.....	253
HENRY BACON. By Eric Kebbon.....	256
OIL AND IRONY. By William Hard.....	256
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	257
CORRESPONDENCE	258
BOOKS:
Some Gallant Rogues. By Harry Hansen.....	259
The True Function of History. By Harold J. Laski.....	260
India. By Emil Lengyel.....	260
The Right to a Home. By Agnes Dyer Warbasse.....	261
Life's Undergraduates. By Lisle Bell.....	262
Books in Brief.....	262
"JAZZ" AND "THE RHAPSODY IN BLUE." By Henrietta Straus.....	263
DRAMA:
Cross-Section. By Ludwig Lewisohn.....	263
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Compromise or Republicanism in India? By Taraknath Das.....	264
China and the Boxer Indemnity.....	265
Lenin's Widow Speaks.....	268

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY
MANAGING EDITOR

IRITA VAN DOREN
LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

ANATOLE FRANCE
ROBERT HERRICK

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON
H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS
CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

SOME QUESTIONS for Charles D. Hilles, chairman of the National Republican Campaign Committee:

Is it true or not true that three of the sixteen Republican infractions in 1920 of the law limiting campaign contributions to $1,000 each were listed as coming from Tulsa, Oklahoma?

Did or did not oil influence play a very considerable part in carrying Oklahoma for the first time for the Republican Party?

What part did Jake Hamon, late Republican boss of Oklahoma, play in this matter? Are you aware that it is being widely declared that the whole oil scandal originated with this man?

Is it true or not true that at the close of the Republican campaign of 1920 your committee owed $1,683,000?

Is it true or not true that of this $1,683,000, $100,000 was owed to the banking firm of Hornblower and Weeks of Boston, the junior partner of which, John W. Weeks, subsequently became Secretary of War?

On January 25, 1922, just a few weeks before the Teapot Dome lease was signed, the press declared that your committee's debt had been reduced to $708,161. Recently it was stated that the debt had entirely disappeared. Is it or is it not true that this favorable change in your committee's situation was brought about largely by gifts or loans or contributions by Harry F. Sinclair and William Boyce Thompson? Was the latter, reputed to be one of the largest stockholders in the Sinclair oil companies, not long associated with you in raising your committee's funds?

"HOW MANY OIL COMPANIES do you represent?" "Why, only twenty-eight including the Sinclair, Doheny, and Standard Oil companies." This was a colloquy between a friend and one of those Mr. Coolidge "mentioned" as ideal for the job of prosecutor. The lawyer's name was promptly dropped; but the incident is illuminating as showing with what carelessness the President went about his job of getting the right kind of men to prosecute the rascals. Mr. Coolidge is plainly in distress. He has had to withdraw Mr. George B. Christian, Jr.'s name for a position on the Federal Trade Commission because it appeared that Mr. Christian had used his influence when Secretary to President Harding to lecture the chairman of the Commission in the President's room, on his attitude toward a certain motion-picture company. By declaring that he would veto any tax bill which did not follow Mr. Mellon's proposals to the very letter Mr. Coolidge has put himself in the position of either defeating any tax reduction or eating his own words—as he did in the case of Mr. Denby and will probably have to in the matter of Mr. Daugherty. If, as now appears probable, the bonus bill is passed and vetoed by the President, he will stand before the country with empty hands, with no record of any legislative accomplishment to point to, and the Republican politicians will begin to see the utter folly of nominating Mr. Coolidge and will cast about for a dark horse.

BASCOM SLEMP—of all the best minds in the Coolidge Administration we think Bascom Slemple's the most remarkable. For self-control, for ability to check any normal impulse of curiosity and to hold one's tongue at just the right moment, commend us to Bascom. History records few if any like him. By pure accident the Secretary to the President drifted to Palm Beach just when Mr. Fall and Mr. McLean were there. By a mere coincidence he dined four or five times with Mr. Fall at Mr. McLean's cottage. The conversation, he tells us, inevitably ran on the weather, on golf, the Volstead law and the Mellon tax bill. Burning as he inwardly must have been to ask both Mr. McLean and Mr. Fall about the oil inquiry, his lips were sealed. Once his curiosity got the better of him—doubtless over the cigars, wines, and nuts. Turning to Mr. Fall he said: "Well, what are the facts about this thing, Senator?" "Young man," replied Mr. Fall gravely, "I wish you would read the record." Bascom, with his delicate and sensitive nature, feeling the implied rebuke, realized he had made a faux pas and changed the conversation. Later, when Senator Walsh appeared to ask his deadly questions, Mr. McLean remarked to Bascom on the beach that he was "going to tell all." Marvelous Slemple! He admits his surprise and astonishment, but he declares that he never commented upon this remark even to the extent of saying "Whaddye-mean, Ned?" After Senator Walsh left, another after-dinner conversation occurred, Bascom playing the role of a white-robed sponsor of the truth. Both his pals having admitted that they had lied to the committee, Bascom declares: "I urged him [Fall] to tell you the whole truth about the matter." Let no one think Bascom's self-control is limited to Palm Beach; it extends to Washington, as this colloquy shows:

Q. Have you seen Mr. McLean since your return?

A. Yes, I called on the McLeans on Thursday.

Q. Was the matter discussed?

A. No, I called socially.

MR. McADOO seems to be money-mad. Not content with having received close to a million dollars from Mr. C. W. Morse and others, he arranged to receive one million dollars from Mr. Doheny for his services in Mexico—conditioned upon his success in serving that gentleman's interests. Obviously Mr. McAdoo's mission was not strictly legal business—whoever heard of any lawyer earning a million dollars for one piece of straight legal work? It was an effort to get concessions or privileges for Mr. Doheny, or changes in the political and economic policy of Mexico. Mr. Doheny, of course, was willing to pay a million-dollar commission to Mr. McAdoo, not because of his skill as a lawyer but because of his prestige as an ex-Secretary of the Treasury and son-in-law to the then President. Mr. McAdoo may not consciously have said to himself "I had rather be rich than President" but that must have been his subconscious thought. At any rate, he cannot become President. His inability to understand the fitness of things and his readiness to sell his personal and political influence in the guise of legal service combine to stamp him as an unfit candidate, despite the fact that he has been the hope of the railroad workers and the progressive wing of his party.

THOSE WHO DELIGHT to testify to the integrity and intelligence of our press will doubtless be much strengthened in their belief by the remarks of Clarence W. Barron, owner of the Wall Street Journal, before the British Empire Chamber of Commerce at a luncheon in New York City. Mr. Barron pins a pure white rose on the coat lapel of both Mr. Denby and Mr. Fall. "I don't think Mr. Fall or any of these other men has ever been for sale, so don't be misled by a lot of politicians in Washington that are endeavoring to run the people of the United States off their feet," says Mr. Barron cheerily. Harry F. Sinclair, he is sure, has not attempted to buy anybody at Washington, and as for Edward L. Doheny—well, in him the country has at last the true conservationist. "Doheny is the best conservationist that I know of. The only way to conserve anything for the government or anybody else is to put it into service." That is, Mr. Barron would doubtless add, the only way to save is to spend; the deepest shade of black is white.

IN CZECHO-SLOVAKIA, TOO, oil leaves a slimy trail. M. Tucny, Minister of Public Works, has been forced to resign because of revelations which concern him in two scandals. One deals with the liquor trade; the other with the agreement which Tucny signed, giving the Standard Oil Company a thirty-year near-monopoly on Czecho-Slovak oil. Our newspapers catch but feeble echoes of the titanic battle which has been raging all around the world between the Standard and its British rivals. In January, 1922, M. Tucny signed the agreement covering Czecho-Slovakia; in March, 1922, a Dutch paper (the Dutch, too, are interested in oil) reported that M. Benes, the Czech Foreign Minister who negotiated the Franco-Czech alliance, had cancelled the agreement. In April the report came that the Standard might after all get the concession; in August a report that it had got it; in December that all was off. What commercial, financial, and diplomatic wire-pulling lay behind these pullings and haulings we do not know; this is a form of secret diplomacy as significant to the historian as the secret treaties of the old days. Only this is clear: that oil works in much the same way in Czecho-Slovakia, in Persia (where Mr. Sinclair's concession is before the Parliament), and in Washington, D. C., and Three Rivers, N. M.

"TORIES HELP LABOR PASS NAVY PROGRAM."

"LABOR WILL CONTINUE BRITISH AIR EXPANSION."

"LABORITES DEFEAT TEMPERANCE MEASURE."

"BRITISH LABOR PASSES SOCIALIST RENT BILL."

HEADLINES SUCH AS THESE from the press of the past week tell the story of the strangely varied course taken by the British Government. Half the time its supporters must find it difficult to recognize their party; sometimes it must be hard for the party to recognize itself. First a speech upholding the previous government policy of "adequate protection against an air attack by the strongest air force within striking distance of the British shores," with passing adjurations to "trust in God and keep your powder dry." Next a victory for Labor and seven new warships won with the help of the Conservatives. Third a union with Conservatives and Liberals against a few reformers of all three parties to kill in its infancy a temperance measure designed to give local option to Wales and Monmouthshire. Then, another victory for Labor—this time by the grace of the Liberals—with a majority in favor of a law continuing control of rents for four more years, and a speech by John Wheatley, Minister of Health, "throwing the gage of class warfare on the floor of the House of Commons"—we quote the London correspondent of the New York Times. India lurks behind a corner as the next adversary to be faced and as we go to press no one, not even the Prime Minister himself, seems to know whether he will meet it with an outstretched hand or a closed fist. But in any event the dock strike is over and its settlement has done more than any number of successful parliamentary dodges to establish the ability of the Labor ministers to face the hazards of actual government.

MORE THAN 8½ PER CENT of the owner-farmers in fifteen corn and wheat-producing States lost their farms with or without legal process between January, 1920, and March, 1923, we learn from an inquiry made by the Department of Agriculture in the upper Mississippi Valley. Besides these, 15 per cent were for a time actually insolvent, but held their land "through the leniency of creditors," as the Department of Agriculture puts it, although a more likely reason is that it was obviously impossible to foreclose on much of this property at anything like the face value of the mortgage carried upon it. Tenant-farmers fared still worse—14 per cent lost their farms, while on top of that 21 per cent were spared such losses only because their creditors did not push them to the wall. These are staggering figures. They are personal tragedies to large numbers of our countrymen, and they mean also a huge loss in our industrial system. They represent a labor turnover of the most costly kind—in the field of ownership and management—with the cost added to the burdens of the consumer.

GOVERNOR McRAE of Arkansas has finally granted a tardy justice to Verlin D. Orr and L. A. Wise, who were convicted a year ago of burning railway bridges during a strike. With Harrison, Arkansas, patrolled by an anti-union mob, and J. C. Gregor, a railroad worker, dead at the hands of lynchers, the attorney for Orr and Wise felt the only way to save them from a like fate was to plead guilty. The men protested their innocence to the judge, but were sentenced to a term of seven to ten years. Later the judge united with the prosecuting attorney in recommending a pardon. The action of a committee appointed by the State Senate, which failed to fix any responsibility for the murder of Gregor or the fate of Orr and Wise, despite the known facts, was branded as high treason by Jacob R. Wilson, the courageous president of the Senate. Still the Governor refused to interfere. Finally the strike was concluded on December 22, 1923, and six weeks later the two men, against whom "not a scintilla of evidence has ever been advanced . . . [although] a mass of evidence has developed to show that the bridge burnings were traceable to red-hot coals which fell from defective locomotives," were released and restored to citizenship. Unfortunately the year stolen from them cannot also be restored.

SYRACUSE, NEW YORK, established a new record in zero per cent Americanism when its Board of Aldermen adopted with but one dissenting vote Alderman Haley's ordinance "that any persons who congregate for the purpose of disseminating information about the subject of birth control shall be guilty of misdemeanor." This extraordinary assault on the constitutional rights of free assemblage and free speech was designed to prevent the holding of the two-day New York State conference of the American Birth Control League. As usual, of course, attempted suppression served as the finest kind of advertising. The city's papers were full of the matter. In Baptist and Unitarian churches sermons on birth control were preached, and finally the mayor vetoed the ordinance, which was not aimed at the dissemination of contraceptive information, already forbidden under the New York State law, but at discussion of the merit of the existing law.

PHILIP GIBBS, writing in the Saturday Evening Post, has uttered a stirring plea for peace—peace, he says, that "hangs by a slender thread."

It is only ignorance that leads to misunderstanding and hatred. . . . If for a single month the newspapers of Europe could, by some miracle, devote themselves to telling the plain truth of what another war will be, and how easily the interests and burdens of each nation could be readjusted and reconciled by a little give and take, to the vast advantage of all of them, with a simple plea for the comradeship of all common folk across the frontiers in the spirit of Christian charity, there would be a tremendous, an emotional, a joyous response from hundreds of millions of humble men and women. . . . The next war would be made impossible. . . . There is one world-wide organization of people already pledged in the most solemn way to the principles of peace, charity, and human brotherhood, without distinction of class or race. . . . They are under the most sacred obligation to forgive their enemies; they are under a law which forbids them to kill their fellow-men. . . . They are the people of the Christian churches. Is it asking too much that these people should get busy to fulfil their vows and prove the sincerity of their faith?

Turn from this to the daily press of this our Christian country. It is filled with cynical suggestions from Washington of ways of evading the purpose of the Disarmament Conference. We need a distant naval base, our professional militarists say; the treaties ban it directly, but perhaps it "might be realized in time by developing facilities for American trade in a foreign port." Capital ships are restricted; let us make up for it by building cruisers, submarines, airplanes, airplane carriers, so that we get "in shape to fight in the traditional American style."

"GIANT POWER"—the very words hint of magic and of fairyland. We have more than once discussed in the columns of The Nation the technical revolution before us; the Giant Power Number of the Survey Graphic, just out, gives an extraordinarily vivid and comprehensive picture of the possibilities of the future. In it Henry Ford predicts that "fifty years from now there will be a great many more small cities, rather than a few bigger ones"; Joseph Stella with charcoal and Lewis Hine with his camera picture the factories and the men who man them; Robert Bruère suggests that a billion dollars a year could be saved by burning coal at the mines and transmitting power instead of wasting it in miscellaneous inefficient furnaces. Gifford Pinchot and Governor Smith urge the importance of State control of water-power; Philip Cabot tells how bad it is for the State to intrude into private business, and Sir Adam Beck shows how Canada has made government ownership pay; and Herbert Hoover argues that "waterfalls could be constructed with a view to their better public availability as scenery; and the sheet of water used to produce the scenic effect could be much thinner." Every national issue—oil, coal, conservation, public ownership, Muscle Shoals—is related to the question of giant power; our future as a nation may be determined by it. The editors of the Survey deserve public gratitude for presenting so significant and neglected a subject so attractively.

FASHIONS IN PHOTOGRAPHY, like fashions in manners, change with each generation. The notion of the agonized small boy of fifty years ago, facing the camera with head clamped in position, now amuses the rotarian whose photograph, expensive and conspicuous, is displayed in the collection of artistic bunk along Fifth Avenue. But in the spring of 1921 there was held at the Anderson Galleries an exhibition of photography which astonished, impressed, and made uneasy rotarians, painters, and photographers. This was the work of Alfred Stieglitz. In his photographs was an intellectual sympathy with his subjects and an almost troubling exposure of their psychology. Photography had become a creative art. A bewildering array of medals and honors attesting the technique of Stieglitz's work was crowned on January 7, 1924, by the supreme award of the Progress Medal voted unanimously by the Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain to Alfred Stieglitz, who "founded and fostered" pictorial photography in America. The even more recent action of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, an institution proverbially conservative in its enthusiasms, indicates the victory which such men as Stieglitz, Sheeler, and Paul Strand have won for photography: the museum has accepted twenty-seven photographs by Stieglitz to be exhibited as art along with Chinese, Indian, and American paintings.

The Brighter Side in Washington

OUT of the murk and gloom of Washington come bright rays of encouragement. It is not only that the veil is in some measure being torn aside so that the American people may see what is going on behind it. It is not only that men utterly unworthy of the offices they hold are being shown up for what they are, or even that the public is now being convinced that both parties are alike in their rottenness and incapacity. Perhaps the most cheering fact is that men have been found worthy to grapple with this shocking mess, to defy the ties of party, and to insist that the housecleaning be thorough. It is something to discover that besides Senator La Follette, Senator Borah, Senator Norris, and other standbys, the country has a man to be proud of in Senator Thomas P. Walsh and that the new members of the much-feared "radical bloc" are coming to the front with a verve and a courage which gives great promise for the future. This group, which the conservative press has denounced and derided, which has once more earned the disapprobation of all the millionaire-owned dailies by defeating the Mellon tax bill, is rendering service of incalculable value to the whole country.

Take Senator Wheeler, for instance. His speech on February 19 demanding an investigation of Attorney General Daugherty's performances went all over the country. Not in years has the speech of a brand-new Senator counted for so much. It was not merely because its sincerity and earnestness were so obvious or because it was sensational in character. He had the hardihood to venture to upset all senatorial precedents. There was a crime for you, and it thoroughly fluttered the Republican doves. This brash, inexperienced man actually wanted to designate in his resolution the men to dig into Daugherty's record. He had no desire to have repeated the fiasco of last year when the Representative who moved to impeach the Attorney General found himself put on trial by the Republican machine. He had no desire to let the president of the Senate appoint to the chairmanship another Lenroot, a Bursum, or a Lodge. So he specified that a majority of the committee of inquiry should consist of so-called liberals, that is, trustworthy men, uninfluenced by party considerations, willing to dig to the bottom. He did not wish a recurrence in the Daugherty investigation of that extraordinary spectacle furnished by the Lenroot committee which is investigating the oil scandals, when it neglected to ask a single question of the publishers of the Marion Star, after they had read their prepared statement which left so much in doubt.

What happened? The minute Mr. Lodge and his associates heard that speech of Senator Wheeler they hurried off to President Coolidge and besought him to end the agony by putting Mr. Daugherty out of the Cabinet. They must know that even that will not now call off Senator Wheeler's inquiry; that if Daugherty is kicked out of the Cabinet there must still be an investigation into the charges that men around the Attorney General (one of whom committed suicide in Mr. Daugherty's apartment) enriched themselves by the sale of governmental favors; that if Mr. Daugherty did not profit by their activities, he was "a bigger fool than the American people take him for." It only calls for a few men of Senator Wheeler's caliber to let in the light of day. A single man, armored in rightcousness, can still put whole hosts to flight.

This opportunity, of course, brings its responsibilities. The new men and the new bloc are facing a searching test. They must have more than courage; they must have the wisdom of the serpent. They must have skill and self-control, for they are fighting against the trained forces of darkness and intrigue, against every possible social and political influence. It is they who have been trying to compel Edward B. McLean to testify fully and freely, knowing as they do that if he does so we shall really get the facts as to the activity of the group around Mr. Harding and of Mr. Harding himself. A single serious slip on the part of these avenging spirits of the Senate will go far to discredit them in the public eye; their opponents will be only too quick to seize upon it to besmirch the only men whose presence in the Senate affords hope that we shall get to the bottom of the mess.

These men have suddenly taken upon themselves tremendous powers. They hold the balance between both the rotten old parties. Some are Democrats, some are Republicans, and some Farmer-Labor. Together they are putting country above party. They are determined to clear the American name, and honest citizens everywhere, whether they believe in all the political and economic doctrines of the bloc or not, should stand behind them. In a sense their situation is not unlike that of the British Labor Party; our progressives, too, are a minority; their strength comes chiefly from an unselfish devotion to the public welfare and from an accidental balance of power; they, too, are a wedge destined to split apart the two old parties. Who knows what they may not achieve in the next few months? Around them may—and can—be built a new and, if you please, a radical party, if by radical is meant an incorruptible party, a party not bound together by the cohesive bonds of public plunder but by an unflinching determination to serve the public in accordance with a program that cuts through to the conditions that create and hold in power our masters of privilege, who are therefore masters of the people.

Who shall be the chief leaders? At the moment no answer is possible. Whether it shall be La Follette or Borah or Norris from the older men time alone will show; it may be that it will prove to be a Wheeler, a Dill, or someone else. That the emergency will call out a worthy standard-bearer, if not this year then later, no one dare doubt. What adds to the terror of the Old Guard at Washington is their realization that when you open the floodgates as they are opened now no one can foresee whither anyone will be borne by the torrent of popular indignation. Once start revelations like these and you cannot tell from day to day or hour to hour where the next break will come, who will be the next to fall or who will come out on top to lead.

The anger of the public is tremendous; it must not be allowed to subside or to spend itself upon individuals. It is not enough to oust Mr. Denby and Mr. Daugherty from the Cabinet. These men are but symbols and symptoms. They represent a chapter in the history of the United States, an era in which the corrupt ethics of business were established in Washington and sanctified as "normalcy." The encouragement of the hour is that a new type of man is winning public confidence. If the general disgust with the old system can be organized by these men and made permanent the scandals will have been a public gain.

Set the War Truths Free!

SENATOR ROBERT L. OWEN has made a wise suggestion which is so wise that it will almost certainly be left unrealized. He has offered a resolution directing the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate to appoint a committee to study the question of the origin of the war. "More than 100,000,000 people in Central Europe now, five years after the cessation of hostilities, are still convinced," he says, "that their governments were not the only ones at fault in the days and months and years preceding the fatal first of August, 1914." And since these people know that the whole Treaty of Versailles rests upon the assumption of Germany's sole responsibility for the war, they attribute their present misery to a lie. Officially, our American Government still shares the assumption of 1914. Senator Owen, however, having studied the secret documents revealed since the armistice, has come to a very different conclusion; and he believes that any impartial commission would do likewise.

England's Labor Government is more likely to act on such a principle than the American Senate, or than Mr. Coolidge or Mr. Hughes. Indeed, Ramsay MacDonald could hardly render any greater service to the world than to appoint a committee consisting, say, of E. D. Morel, that brave prober of the dark corners of diplomacy; G. P. Gooch, the distinguished author of the "History of Modern Europe," and Professor Raymond Beazley, or some other equally fearless historian, and to instruct this committee to search the files of the British Foreign Office for material bearing upon the origin of the war. The German, Austrian, and Russian files have been searched by men far less friendly to their own pre-war governments, and the world, or at least that fraction of it which is willing to study facts and to revise prejudgments, knows what there lay hidden.

Only the French and the British archives remain secret. The same men rule in the French Foreign Office today as ruled there in the decade that brought on the Great War; Poincaré, the premier who cemented the Franco-Russian military and naval alliances in the days of the Czar, is at the helm again, busily building new alliances and signing military and economic "agreements," some public, some secret, just as in the days of 1912 and 1913. But in England there is new blood. Charles P. Trevelyan, who resigned from the British Cabinet in 1914 in disgust at the revelation of secret agreements made by Sir Edward Grey, has returned to office; Ramsay MacDonald and Philip Snowden, who throughout the war worked shoulder to shoulder with E. D. Morel in that Union for Democratic Control which has made so powerful a fight for open diplomacy in Great Britain, are in high office. They may not stay in power forever; it is an opportunity not to be lost.

England's archives, to be sure, are unlikely to contain such startling revelations as those dug out of the Russian file-cabinets. Senator Owen has rendered another public service by his study of the Russian documents, and by his public analysis of them in a speech before the Senate of the United States. This is a speech which should go far and wide, and be studied with care. There are points in which it goes beyond the considered judgment of the editors of The Nation. We think, for instance, that he passes too lightly over the stubborn determination of the Austrian military and diplomatic chiefs to humiliate Serbia, and treats too casually the attitude of Germany through most of July, 1914, when he sums up thus:

The German militaristic rulers did not will the war, tried to avoid the war, and only went into war because of their conviction that the persistent mobilizations of Russia and France meant a determination on war and were secretly intended as a declaration of war by Russia and France against Germany. The records show that the Russian and French leaders were determined for war, and intended the mobilization as the beginning of a war which had for many years been deliberately prepared and worked out by the complete plans of campaign through annual military conferences.

Yet these conclusions, like those of Judge Bausman in his "Let France Explain," are the product of research and analysis, and are supported by documents of which most Americans are still ignorant. It cannot be denied that in the last days of July, when Europe was on the brink of war, the Kaiser and Bethmann-Hollweg did try frantically to put a check-rein on Austria; it is true that the Russian Foreign Minister telegraphed at a critical moment that "if there is a question of exercising a moderating influence in Petrograd we reject it in advance," and thereby deliberately destroyed a chance of peace; it is true that on July 30 the Russian Ambassador in Paris was able to telegraph to Petrograd that the French Minister of War had informed him enthusiastically "that the Government is firmly decided upon war"; it is true that the French and Russians had prepared every detail of their common military action and that the story of their being taken by surprise and caught "unprepared" was a legend; it is true that both the Russian and the French governments, and the British as well, deliberately falsified the texts of the rainbow books in which they professed to reveal to their peoples the negotiations which preceded the war.

Oil absorbs American attention for the present; and, probably the American diplomatic documents concerning oil—in Costa Rica, Colombia, Venezuela, Mesopotamia, and the Dutch East Indies—will, if Senator Dill forces Mr. Hughes to reveal them, be almost as significant reading as the pre-war papers. Nevertheless we still play a role in European affairs, and our attitude toward the European struggle is largely determined by the distorted views of Germany's sole responsibility for the war which are still so prevalent. If any commission could take action which would lead to a juster historical assessment of the causes of that catastrophe and force a deep revulsion of American feeling, it would perform an enormous service.

Talent and Character

PLAIN people intent, necessarily, upon the questions of bread and salt, child and shelter, dislike and distrust talent, which they oppose to character. And by character they mean the ability to roll down the grooves of common habit to a paid-up life-insurance policy and a decorous funeral. Sometimes this fear of talent which the commonest sense harbors expresses itself in wild and comic exaggerations as when, in a recent number of a popular magazine, an anonymous rich man explains "why I never hire brilliant men." And in smoking-rooms and other places where ordinary citizens air their sagacity one comes upon a pride and satisfaction in mediocrity that have reached the stature of a cult and a religion.

Anyone absorbed in thought and letters watches the workings of this strange legend with both sorrow and amusement. For what he sees about him in his special field is abundant talent and very little character. Only he is afraid of using the latter word lest, by any chance, it be confused with the word that comes from the lips of drummers. Of character in this sense he finds far too much. A young novelist shows a flash almost of genius and settles down to concocting stories that bring no less than a thousand dollars a piece; a young playwright whose tragedy has failed in the special sense of Broadway writes a salacious concoction for a well-known hetaira. Canniness is plentiful in the arts; character is rare—the strength to hold out, defy, endure want, obscurity, even obloquy. The ideal, as Ibsen knew, kills. Very well. That, then, is the appointed death.

What our artists do not know is that art is not a craft to be practiced but a life to be lived. This life cannot be lived in any desultory, in any hit or miss fashion. Neither has it any true relation to whim or mere change or what the crowd, often enough mistakenly, to be sure, calls lawlessness or licentiousness. The life of art and thought is the reverse of lawless. But the law it obeys is an inner law, a law that has grown from reasoned necessities of the human spirit, a law that has its kinship to the laws by which the stars revolve in their courses and is utterly alien to the laws passed by congressmen and executed by magistrates. This distinction should be no strange one in a country predominantly Protestant in tradition, a country that gave rise to New England transcendentalism, a country in which the names of Thoreau and Emerson are still a power. But the sad truth is that business and prosperity and the sense of the common have so corrupted the life of art and thought that the right and necessary distinction between talent and character has almost disappeared and the grocer of today need hardly rebel if his son go in for literature instead of law, for typescripts rather than titles.

The literature thus produced in abundance is, necessarily, competent only at its very best. The common proverb that you cannot eat your cake and have it too, applies to this, as to many other situations. The artist whose work is to have in any fashion or to any degree the immortal accent must pay a price. This price is heavier as the community in which he lives and works is canny and heavy-handed and alienated from any tradition of true freedom. But there is no way out. The price must be paid. Sooner or later, upon some concern or other, the artist will have to stand alone or almost alone and will have to draw from an inner source that strength of the solitary which Ibsen wrote about in "An Enemy of the People." He will have to learn to bear that and the consequent calumny with an equal mind and an unsoured temper. He will have to defeat and disprove the silly saying that where much mud is flung some will stick, for if it does stick it can stick only to his garments and not to his mind. That mind must remain serene at its core, above battle and hubbub and the crying of fools, ready to make of this, as of all experience, beauty, truth, vision, whereby the very foulness and folly of this world from which it suffers may be cleansed and illumined. Such is the task of the artist, such the responsibility of talent. You may shirk that task and still write good imagist verse and clever stories. You cannot shirk it if you are to write one word that is to count in the long salvation of mankind.

The Sea Repeats Itself

LIKE a tale from the long ago is that brought from Chile of the voyage of the sailing ship Garthwray from Grangemouth, Scotland, to Iquique. It has all the elements of old-time adventure at sea: a trip of prodigious length, a battle with storms, long-continuing danger and hardship, reduced rations, and final victory.

The length of the voyage itself stirs an uneasy sense of loneliness in any one brought up in this gregarious and tense-living age. Five hundred and nineteen days at sea with brief stops at only three ports during this time! Nearly a year and a half of life with an endless vision of sea in all directions! No city lights, no stirring crowds, no shop windows, no motion pictures, no girl that you left behind; just the company of your shipmates, the narrow confines of fore-castle and deck, the monotonous rotation of watches on and watches off, the endless routine of wheel and lookout, of setting and taking in sail, of repairing gear, of cleaning and painting; the same old food, the same old jokes, the same old pastimes. Seventeen months of water and sky, of working and shirking in the same old way. And yet—many times less tedious, less lonely, less futile, less gray than the lives of many in our teeming cities.

The Garthwray left Grangemouth on June 12, 1922, headed for the West Coast by way of the Horn. Delayed first by head winds and calms as she made her way south-westward through tropic seas, and then lashed and broken and dismayed by a pampero off the River Plate, she was obliged to seek the help of a passing steamship and be towed into Montevideo for repairs. With a new captain and largely a new crew, the Garthwray then pointed her bow again for old Cape Stiff but could not get around this giant that for years has fought off all comers. Gale after gale blew and blew—always out of the west, howling and shaking their fists furiously in the face of the Garthwray. Sail after sail was torn to pieces; icy waves poured over the bulwarks and rushed aft over the deck. At last the captain gave up in despair, put his vessel about, and with the wind at his back, started to run the other way around the world for his destination. For 4,000 miles the ship then sailed eastward toward the Cape of Good Hope. Provisions were short, and for ninety-nine days the crew was reduced virtually to "salt horse" and hard biscuit—the rude fare of years ago. The Garthwray put in at Cape Town to clean off the barnacles and seaweed that had now attached themselves to her bottom and were impeding her progress. Here also a new captain came aboard and another mate in place of the original one, who went home sick. Then the Garthwray was off again, and with the exception of a brief stop for fresh water and provisions at Hobart, Tasmania, continued uninterrupted across the Pacific to the Chilean coast, finally dropping anchor in the roadstead outside the sand-swept, sun-dried nitrate port of Iquique on December 23, 1923. Of the original ship's company only the carpenter, the steward, and nine apprentices remained. Even the ship's cat, which had made seven passages around the Horn, got fed up on sea life before the trip was over, and was last seen in Cape Town heading toward the Congo and the calmer life of the African jungle.

The sea's dangers and difficulties never grow less. The most we do is to devise better methods to elude them, or to rescue ourselves when overtaken.

The Betrayal of Our War Victims

By ARTHUR WARNER

THE film of oil which covers the national political waters should not be allowed to obscure one especially dark and filthy pool. The puddle in question is our treatment of the sick and disabled ex-service men of the World War. There has been an almost continuous stench from this source since the armistice, culminating in the investigation of the Veterans' Bureau last year by a select committee of the United States Senate. A report just issued by this committee, along with two volumes of testimony, mirrors an even more disgraceful and sordid condition of affairs than was suggested by the newspaper accounts at the time of the public hearings last autumn or the still earlier revelations by Samuel Danziger in The Nation of August 22, 1923.

The orgy of corruption and inefficiency in connection with our unfortunate ex-service men is without question the most tragic failure and disgrace of our war effort. It is no more inexcusable than the collapse of our airplane program; no more gigantic than the waste of the Shipping Board; no more corrupt than various post-war sales of supplies and materials by officers of the War Department. But these scandals and swindles were at the worst a rape upon American citizens and taxpayers in general; they were not at the expense of a particular class—a group which the nation was under a sacred obligation to deal with generously and humanely. Besides, these other scandals are over and done with, while hundreds of veterans are still the victims of graft and incompetence in the organization intrusted with their care. Undeniably there has been great improvement in the administration of the Veterans' Bureau since the disappearance of the malodorous Colonel Forbes and the arrival of General Hines as director last March. It is too early to judge the efforts of the latter, but obviously there is still much to be done. Indeed, as these lines are written, conditions have come to light in the offices of the New York district which are described by United States Attorney Hayward by the short but comprehensive word "rotten." The Senate committee, while commending General Hines for certain improvements, says that he will fail unless he gets rid of "a substantial number of the men whom he inherited from his predecessor."

Probably there is no branch of the public service in recent years in which the morale of the organization has sunk so low as in the Veterans' Bureau under Colonel Forbes. It seems incredible that a great humanitarian public work, costing the American people half a billion dollars a year, should have slipped into the hands of such a gang of blackguards. General John F. O'Ryan, as counsel to the Senate committee, and Senator Reed of Pennsylvania, as its chairman, leave Colonel Forbes without a shred of character or integrity. They strip him even of the cloak of good-natured incapacity which friends have tried to wrap about the former director, charging him unequivocally with criminal conduct and conspiring to defraud the Government. Consider these paragraphs from the report:

Colonel Forbes had been vice-president of the Hurley-Mason Construction Company of Tacoma, Washington, and held that position at the time of his appointment by the President as director of the Veterans' Bureau. This company operated largely on the Pacific coast. Operating in the East and the Middle West were a number of contracting companies, all owned or controlled by J. W. Thompson and James W. Black of St. Louis, Missouri, and Chicago, Illinois. A man named Mortimer, who represented Thompson and Black in their plans to secure construction contracts from the Veterans' Bureau, became the intimate of Director Forbes. The testimony of Mortimer, Forbes, Mrs. Mortimer, Williams, Hogshhead, Milliken, Sweet, all show that Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer accompanied Director Forbes on trips of inspection, going in and out of hospitals and visiting proposed sites in various parts of the country. These supposedly official occasions were pleasantly combined with a continuous round of social pleasure. Lavish entertainment and special accommodations were provided during these trips, and where those were not paid for by local hosts, they were paid for by Mortimer, the contractors' agent seeking the favor of Director Forbes. . . .

After Director Forbes and Mr. Mortimer had come to know and understand each other's character and purposes, Forbes, stating he was short of funds, asked Mortimer whether he could arrange to let him (Forbes) have a $5,000 loan. This was arranged. The money was to be advanced by Thompson and Black. The ten $500 bills were actually delivered to Forbes by Mortimer in the bathroom of Forbes's suite at the Drake Hotel in Chicago, June 22, 1922. The conspirators then consisted of Forbes, Mortimer, Thompson, and Black. After Forbes and Mortimer arrived at the Fairmount Hotel in San Francisco, Forbes introduced Mortimer to his former partner and intimate friend, Hurley, of the Hurley-Mason Company, saying that he wanted Mortimer to know him intimately. This intimacy promptly developed. Hurley gave Mortimer a copy and explanation of a secret code to be used by the conspirators in telegraphic communications affecting their interests. When at Hayden Lake, Washington, Forbes, Hurley, and Mortimer agreed to combine with the Thompson-Black combination already existing, upon terms and conditions stated in the testimony of Mortimer. Thus the ring of conspirators was increased in number by the admission of Hurley. Later Hurley's company secured, after advertisement for bids by the bureau, the contract for the construction of the hospital at American Lake for the contract price of $1,397,000, although the company was the third lowest bidder.

Mortimer, by Colonel Forbes's own testimony, was a drunkard and a wife-beater. The former director's attitude toward this man appears in an excerpt from the official testimony when the examination turned upon a certain inspection trip, especially upon a social gathering that was part of it:

MAJOR GENERAL O'RYAN. Was Mortimer drunk again? COLONEL FORBES. He was.

MAJOR GENERAL O'RYAN. How was it, Colonel, that you, on this official trip of yours, carried this drunk around with you?

COLONEL FORBES. He would have his little souse parties, and I would tell him unless he cut it out he would have to leave the party. He would always apologize and say, "I am perfectly all right, and I won't do it again."

With conditions like these at the top of the Veterans' Bureau it was inevitable that rottenness should permeate downward, disorganizing and corrupting the whole machine. Some idea of the spirit and discipline of the field force is suggested by the following coarse and familiar letter from an employee named Tripp to Chief Clerk Black, a man of high responsibility in the bureau in Washington:

MY DEAR MR. BLACK: Just a line to thank you for sending our checks. Evans leaves tonight for D. C. after loafing around here for the past week. Say, this is some town. You are missing the real old times. Hunting season is on—rabbit dinners, pheasant suppers, wines, beers, and booze—and, by God, we haven't missed a one yet. Collins and I get invitations to 'em all. Last Wed. I was soused to the gills on rabbit, etc. Last Sat. wines—Oh, Boy! New Jersey is "dry" but Ohio—you pronounce it O-HI-O—and these fellows here are some "treaters." We eat and wine with the mayor, the sheriff, the prosecuting atty. . . .

Dexter sold the buildings here—now there's an argument on—and he wants to include it in my sale—nothing doing—unless Forbes wires so. When he sold 'em, I offered to do it but was hinted "hands off." Tell Witman that McAuliffe is wrong to include 'em in my sale, it can't be did—as the authority came too late to advertise in my sale & the auctioneer had to hold a separate sale on the 28th of Oct. Have Witman write a letter to Dexter and authorize him to pay the auctioneer his commission separate from mine but on the scale I accepted. Other words treat 'em as two separate sales—for I sold merchandise only—and Dexter sold the buildings. Damn if I'll be the goat. . . .

Let me know when Forbes is going to sell by sealed proposals, then's when I get a Rolls-Royce. Got a good drink coming, so here's back to you.

Bribery, graft, waste, and ineffectiveness were, of course, the consequences of a personnel of this sort. It would be a work of supererogation to pile up details. It is enough to recount a single instance—the sale to the Thompson-Kelly Company of Boston for about twenty cents on the dollar of over $3,000,000 worth of property and supplies at Perryville, Maryland, "most of it new and in original packages," for which there was continuing use by the government. Of this sale, made in an irregular and illegal way, the Senate committee says:

In the list of supplies offered for clearance by the director of the Veterans' Bureau to the Chief Coordinator of the Budget Bureau, the number of bed sheets was given as 2,622, described as assorted bed sheets. In the list of property attached to the Thompson-Kelly contract, the number of sheets of the same description is 2,866. Actually there were delivered to the Thompson-Kelly Company 84,930 bed sheets. Most of these sheets were of high quality and in excellent condition. They were not only sold for 20 cents on the dollar, but at the time the contractor was taking them away other sheets, purchased at $1.03 each by the Veterans' Bureau, were being delivered at the depot. Such were the conditions at the depot that some of these bales of new sheets upon arrival at the storehouse were run through and out the other side to the waiting cars of the contractor, who carried them off as part of the booty. Thus the director was selling 84,000 sheets for one-fifth their value at a time when they were needed and when he was purchasing sheets at their full value.

When the President of the United States questioned the propriety of the sales, he was informed by Director Forbes and Commander O'Leary that the property being disposed of and sold to the Thompson-Kelly Company was in fact surplus and in some instances unserviceable. Articles were produced and represented to the President as being true samples of the goods being sold, but according to the testimony of Brigadier General Sawyer and Mr. Hendrix, the storekeeper at Perryville, as well as Mr. Bierman, associate medical purveyor at Perryville, about 75 per cent of the property sold to the Thompson-Kelly Company was not only serviceable, but as good as new, and needed by the Public Health Service, the soldiers' homes, and the Veterans' Bureau.

It is pleasanter to turn from this sordid picture to some of the reforms made in the Veterans' Bureau under General Hines. A few of those mentioned by the Senate committee follow:

The number of employees on the pay rolls has been reduced by 2,500.

Thousands of claimants were being subjected to repeated physical examinations. A survey by General Hines indicated that 100,000 of such men were entitled to permanent ratings; such ratings are now being given.

Discipline in hospitals was lax and supervision inadequate. Visiting Drexel Hospital, Chicago, last May, the new director found 85 per cent of the patients away from the institution, although the time was between 8 and 10:30 in the evening. He therefore closed the hospital.

A cut of about $800,000 per year in unnecessary rentals and $1,500,000 in superfluous salaries has been made.

The expenses for long-distance telephone calls at the central office alone were reduced from $453 in January, 1923, to $25 for July.

The bids for Livermore Hospital were regarded as so wasteful that they were rejected, with an ultimate saving of $150,000 in cost of construction.

There were 1,593 cases pending in Washington before the board of appeals, subject to be called up irrespective of their order through political or personal influence. The system was changed and the cases have been reduced to 900.

Expenditures for dentistry, regarded as extravagant, have been reduced from $6,000,000 to $3,000,000 a year.

From 400 to 500 complaints were coming in daily, few of which received even an acknowledgment. A method for replying was arranged and a great reduction in the number of complaints has been made.

Director Hines stated in his testimony that patients in hospitals could be reduced 25 per cent at once; that abuse exists because a premium is now placed upon men remaining in hospitals; that in effect they have been actually paid to stay there; that the present system is making government wards out of numbers of men; that in relation to some hospitals a visitor has almost to push his way through the automobiles parked about the building, which are the property of patients, who purchased them out of money received from the Government. These abuses, the Senate committee says, are now in process of correction.

To put an end to the era of waste and corruption is undoubtedly the first and most necessary job in the Veterans' Bureau. But that is not the final end. Eventually the bureau must be made, at whatever cost, to do justice by our sick and disabled ex-service men. This means permanent care for some and for others as speedy a return as possible to self-respecting self-support. Among the suggestions for betterment made by the Senate committee is one that the President of the United States be empowered to appoint a board of three medical officers, one each from the Army, the Navy, and the Public Health Service (one with experience in nervous diseases and another a specialist in tuberculosis), this board to make recommendations for a reorganization of the medical services of the Veterans' Bureau; and also that a committee of five persons conversant with life insurance be appointed to report on that aspect of the question.

America in Polynesia*

By PADRAIC COLUM

II. Hawaiian Village Life

THE island of Hawaii may be as big as the State of Connecticut. Its chief town is Hilo, where "the rain walks softly through the lehua trees." Hawaii has the active volcano Kilauea, the snow-topped mountains Mauna Loa and Mauna Kea; it has shining vistas of the Pacific, it has great lava-covered tracts that are terribly impressive, and it has deep gorges in which old-world Polynesia still lives on.

Very well do I remember a pastoral part of that island—a country of green slopes and rises that in the brilliant sunshine were greener than any green places I ever looked on. The place was dominated by Mauna Kea, a mountain that has snow on its top that is like frosting on a cake. The place had high geraniums and white lilies; its doves were cooing and its larks were singing and its calves were upon green hills. Men ride by on horses with wreaths of flowers on their hats; the roads are a tangle of blue and purple morning-glory.

Further down the blue ocean makes a great frill of lace on the black-lava shingle; opening to the ocean is one of Waipaio's thirteen valleys. The hills bear down in gulches that are furrowed by narrow white streams; below there is a flat that is marked into different squares by rice patches and taro patches. Down into the valley and up out of it come men on horseback leading horses that carry high packs. So they go into and out of the valley, bringing down stores or bringing up produce.

A man is on the road that will bring him by winding and zigzag ways down into the valley. He wears a yellow oilskin, and the foot that protrudes out of his wooden stirrup is bare. It rains; he has on a hat of lau-hala fiber.

What mixture has his Hawaiian blood? I ask myself as he stops and speaks to us in Hawaiian and English. A pure Hawaiian would be genial if he spoke to us in this off-hand way; he would laugh with us. But this man smiles only, and as he smiles he looks into our faces in a childlike and pathetic way. He talks lengthily, holding his roan horse. Hawaiians are dramatic, but they are never actors; this man sees himself and he is acting a part—he is a play-boy.

There is pathos in his eyes, there is a sense of loneliness about the man. Hawaiians have distinction, but it is race distinction, not personal distinction. And this man, for all his Hawaiian speech, has a personal distinction. He was Kanaka pure, he told us; father Kanaka, mother Kanaka—a Kanaka of the valleys he was.

"What do they live on in the valley?" I asked. On what they grew—taro, sweet potatoes, rice. They had fish, too, he said, and then he spoke of that splendid Hawaiian fish, the mullet. They had poi and fish—nothing else; no tea, no coffee, no pig now.

He apologized for his inexpressiveness in English. He was three months at school, and then—pau—no more. He tapped his head—not good. On account of his poor brain, he suggested, he had remained poor. "Man no shoe, horse no shoe," said he. Sure enough his horse was unshod. He protruded his bare foot and gazed at it pathetically. "Man bare, horse bare," said he.

Then he brightened up. "If you fellow," said he, "come down we give you poi, potatoes, fish." As a further inducement he added oklehou. Oklehou is the native alcohol. He added something more. "If you fellow come down wahine hula." His wife would dance for me.

I thought of a middle-aged Hawaiian woman dancing and I was not fired at the thought. Then I asked him how long he had been married.

"Three months, two days," he told me.

"What age are you?" I asked.

"Forty-three," he said.

"Not married before?" I asked.

"Three wahine before—four wahine altogether."

Four wives! I expressed astonishment. I thought that perhaps he was dignifying mere casual connections. But he held up his hand solemnly. "I promise. I Christian."

"Which kind of Christian?"

"Christian, Hawaiian style," he said.

Could he mean Mormon? I wondered. The Mormons are creating something like a national church for the Polynesians. But the Mormon missionaries whom I knew gave a very strict discipline to their converts; in the houses into which we went with them there was no oklehou—no talk of a hula either.

"Mormon," he said.

"Then how does it come," I asked, "that you made promises to four wahine?"

"One was living in the valley now. One dead. One in Hilo. One in Molokai."

Molokai sounded ominous. Was the wahine sick? I asked.

"Sick, yes. Pake-sickness."

Pake-sickness—Chinese sickness. That meant leprosy! I looked at the man; he sat on his horse in the rain, a childlike and pathetic smile on his face. But he brightened again. The wahine that lived with him now would do a hula for me if I came down with him into the valley.

"How many men and women were below?"

"Thirty wahine, thirty. . . ."

"Kanaka," I suggested.

He paused, not accepting the word. "Thirty kane," he said. Kanaka means men; kane means husbands or heads of families.

"Thirty kane, thirty wahine," I said. "Keiki (children) too?"

"Plenty keiki," he assented.

"And the Pake—had they children too?"

"Pake grow rice, not grow mans," he said.

Suddenly he started off and went down zigzag in the rain. He waved his hand as he went. For all that he claimed to be straight Polynesian, there was something about the man that reminded me of Connacht or Castile. He was a play-boy because of some dash of Iberian blood.

The heavy surge of the ocean is pounding on the shore.

* This is the second of a series of three articles on Hawaiian life. The third will be on Polynesian folk stories.

The sky above is all covered with shroudlike clouds. The little fields are green, and they are marked off from each other by walls of loose stone. If, before my faculties were awake I stood outside this dwelling, I might fancy myself in the west of Ireland.

But the unfamiliarities of the landscape would soon break in. The walls that mark off the fields seem to be made of black coals—they are of lumps of lava. Then there are the stringy trees—a long piece of string with a knot on its top, kept upright and swaying—these are the Pacific trees, the coconut palms, and they are everywhere around. Then there are other trees that are still more extraordinary. I look with amazement upon a grove of them—the hala trees. Their trunks and their branches grow bare. Then at the end of the branch there is a sheaf of green streamers like reeds. And each sheaf has in it a big, cone-shaped fruit that is serrated like a pine-apple. The branches grow out and then twist back and twist back again—as if someone had twisted the back of his hand toward us and then twisted the fingers of the hand he had twisted. These trees grow out of the blackness of lava soil and lava blocks. This particular grove is filled with the roar of the ocean, and I think that if there was ever a place where I might see the Menehune, the goblin fairies of Hawaii, this is the place.

This district, cut off from the plantation area by great tracts of lava-covered ground, has no Japanese, Portuguese, or Filipinos resident; there are two Chinese families here, but they have Hawaiian speech. It is one of the few places on the large islands that the Polynesian Hawaiians have reserved for themselves. English is the language of instruction in the schools, but the children learn Hawaiian songs and Hawaiian is the language one hears them use in their play. The Hawaiian language and the Hawaiian way of living may hold their own here for at least another generation.

Near by is a heiau—a pagan temple, or rather a precinct for pagan sacrifices. It is an oblong mound of black stones, with holes where the idols stood, and with an inclosure where human beings were sacrificed. The coconut palms near it may be the trees that Captain Cook's sailors looked upon. On the beach are the canoes with their outriggers. In a garden that I pass a man is working with a primitive digging tool, the wooden spade that was used when iron was a precious metal in the islands. In a shelter near by a bleary-eyed woman, who looks a hundred years of age at least, is plaiting the lau-hala fiber into a mat such as the first white visitors to the islands slept on. A boy with a stone pestle in his hands is pounding the taro into poi.

I could easily imagine myself a first comer to this place. But at night, in the house, we are very up-to-date. We sit around a kerosene lamp. The Hawaiians are not quite used to tables and chairs; the lamp is left on the floor; we sit on the mats and read the weekly journals, the Hoku o Hawaii (the Star of Hawaii) and the Nupepa Kuokua (the Independent Newspaper).

The life on this farm by the sea is leisurely, and by leisurely I do not mean lazy. They are a fine people, the folk in whose house I am living, with active bodies. Like most Hawaiians they have ability in handicraft and decoration: all day the taciturn grandmother, seated on the floor, plaits a mat of the streams of the hala tree—long, reed-like fibers softened in water, split, and then plaited as a child at home would plait a little mat of rushes. Beautifully clean mats of the kind she is making cover the floors of the different rooms. The bedspread in the room I sleep in, with its bold branching design of bread-fruit, has been made in the house. This bread-fruit design was given to the Hawaiians by the missionaries.

And all day the little girl—I must write her name carefully—Ka-puna-puke-lani, "The Well at the Heavenly Gate," works with her needle. What charming interiors they might have, I think, if they would give their decorative impulses free play! The different lei of lima-blossoms that hang on the walls make a real decoration. They have no pictures, but they have what every Hawaiian house has, a row of photographs enlarged; the mild men and women who are their subjects look fearfully grim. I have come to think that the Hawaiians do not look on photographs as we look on them, as pictured mementos of friends and admired people: to the Hawaiians, I believe, a collection of photographs means a real society. Every Hawaiian has, or used to have, a mele inoa, a name-song that was known to their friends. I have a notion that the Hawaiians in whose houses I have been often chant a brother's or a sister's, a son's or a daughter's name-song under one of these photographs; they can, I believe, bring up a presence in a way that we could not bring up the presence of any of our friends.

The women of this house have not to make ready food for pigs or cattle. There are pigs here in plenty, but they are turned into the guava-fields, and there, with their litters around them, they stay, knocking the wild guava fruit off the bushes or eating it where it lies on the ground—the guava that we know only when it comes to us as delicious jelly. The guava was introduced into the islands, and, like many other plants brought into it, has become a pest. The pigs have it all. And the women do not have to go to milk in the mornings and evenings; we do without milk and butter here, although there is plenty of pasture for cattle. The Hawaiians, in spite of the fact that they have had cattle since Vancouver's day, are not a milk or a butter using people.

As in the old days, they live near the beach. They have always been a beach-dwelling people, and I note that the Rev. Mr. Ellis, who was here a hundred years ago, says that the interior of the island of Hawaii was an unexplored wilderness. And, as in the old days, the people are partly fishermen, partly farmers. I go with one of the boys of the house to a cultivated field. Instead of ridges there are little mounds in the field—mounds of black earth. In these mounds the sweet potatoes grow. We grub them up and take home a bagful for supper. There is another vegetable in the field—the small-leaved Chinese cabbage; these, too, we pull up, and we cut down some branches of bananas. Then we make our way back through the guava bushes and across the walls of lava-stone.

In the evening, after supper, we sit for a while on the veranda. Relations of the family come from the houses near by and talk an Hawaiian that is full of barks and grunts. The boys and girls of the house take out their ukuleles or their steel guitars and play and sing Hawaiian melodies. They love music and song; like all their country-folk, they sing without apology or self-consciousness. I ask the little boy who has been playing the ukulele to tell me what the song is about that has just been sung. "It is about a girl who runs away from her step-mother; she makes the girl work too hard and she gives her nothing to eat. The girl goes into the forest and she lives on guavas and shrimps out of the stream. There is an owl that helps her—I guess the owl is the ghost of her grandmother. One day the cowboys see her. They lasso her when she is in the stream.” “Do they bring her back to her step-mother?” I ask. “No. They take her to their camp. I guess she stays with the boys.” His mother has a different ending for the story. The boys take her to a show-place and show her off as a wild girl. The song is called “The Mountain Girl.”

It is not easy to know who is who in a Polynesian family. There are uncles and aunts in the house, and they seem to have as much authority as father or mother. Children come and stay: there is no way for an outsider to know whether they have been adopted into the family or not. Officially the family I am with is quite a large one; the mother tells me she has given birth to twelve children. There are plenty of children in the Hawaiian family, but the infant mortality is very high—higher among them than it is among any of the other races on the islands. I have a notion that if the Hawaiians made friends with the cowboys their infant mortality would be lessened, and the race would have a better chance—and I believe it has quite a good chance—of coming back to a place in the world.

Marriage as we understand it—the family as we understand it—is only beginning to emerge among the Polynesian people. The word for “marriage” that one sees over announcements in the Hawaiian papers has been borrowed from the English. There is no clear-cut word for “mother” or “father” in Hawaiian. “Makua” means something like “relation,” one adds “wahine” to it, meaning “woman,” or “kane,” meaning “male,” and one gets the terms for “mother” and “father.” The grandfather was as close to the child as the father, the grandmother as the mother, and aunts and uncles were “makua” too. If children were scolded in their parents’ house they went to their uncle’s or their aunt’s and stayed there; they had the right to dip in the poi bowl. Children were always being adopted or given away—the custom still flourishes—and all this went toward making the family life indistinct.

And what of the Hawaiian girls? When they are beautiful it is the beauty of abundance—the swelling bosom, the lustrous hair, the eyes large and dark. And their charm is the charm of softness—softness of curve, of smile, of speech. But there is something stolid about them, and when one sees them in the country places, with their dark faces under the high-crowned, broad-brimmed hat of lau-hala one knows that in Polynesia love could never have been the gay science. Their eyes have their psychic history—eyes large and dark, but un luminous. They are girls who have summer, but no spring.

They are not keen on marrying men of their own race; they marry Chinese, Japanese, Filipinos, Porto Ricans, and, of course, haoles, the men of European stock. If the Hawaiians cease to exist as a distinct race in the near future it will be mainly because their women prefer to marry men of other races than their own. They say that the Hawaiians are not good providers, but that may be only a rationalization of some biological urge—the race has been isolated for thousands of years, and it may be that there is a necessity for them to mingle with other peoples.

National Minorities in Soviet Russia

By LOUIS FISCHER

THERE is one non-Russian in Russia for every Russian. The non-Russian peoples, for the most part, are inferior in culture and general development to the real Russian, the Great Russian. He is therefore prone to look down upon the racial minorities and to treat them as a ruling nation does its backward colonies—a tendency which aggravates a problem already serious enough. Still further difficulties arise from the circumstance that many of the small nationalities—the Tartars, Georgians, Armenians, and Bashkirs, to mention only a few—are Moslems whose eyes are directed rather to Mecca than to Moscow. Moreover the nationalities are concentrated on their own territories. If in the United States, New York State were 90 per cent Italian, Ohio 90 per cent Jewish, Illinois 90 per cent German, and ten other commonwealths similarly predominantly non-American in blood, the situation would begin to offer a parallel with that which exists in Russia. Not being distributed over wide areas, the non-Russian races are not exposed to assimilation. They have their own languages, customs, traditions, and ideals.

Czarism attempted to solve the problem by applying an aggressive policy of Russification which, very naturally, defeated its purpose and added zest to the anti-Russian movements among the submerged nationalities. Poland was the best case in point.

In a letter written by Lenin from Zurich on April 18, 1917, he stated that if and when the Bolsheviks seized power “we would immediately free all the nationalities subject to the Great Russians.” Before seven months had elapsed Lenin had made his famous trip in a sealed car through Germany, his party had overthrown Kerensky’s Provisional Government, and he, weighted with the responsibilities of Soviet Russia’s premiership, was in the Kremlin face to face with the problem whose solution he had so readily dashed off in the low-vaulted room of a Swiss cottage. Five days after the reins of government passed into their hands the Bolsheviks accorded each nationality “the right of self-determination even to the extent of secession and the creation of a separate state.”

Not all the Communists gave this pronouncement their approval. In January, 1918, at the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, there was a sharp tilt between Bucharin and Lenin. Bucharin, always the guardian as well as the enunciator of pure communist theory, objected to the “bourgeois” war cry of self-determination of nationalities. For the Communist, he argued, only the class, never the nation, exists. He therefore advanced the slogan “Self-Determination for the Working Classes of all Nationalities.” But Lenin was the practical statesman and rebuked the theoreticians. Russia’s backward peoples of the East, he maintained, possessed no proletariat. They still lived in a patriarchal condition with their sheiks, beys, and mulahs. Now, continued Lenin, if the Soviets fail to grant these nationalities their freedom their anti-Bolshevik elements would exploit the fact by sowing resentment and revolt against Moscow. Bucharin's internationalism would merely fan the national fires. Lenin's view prevailed.

Hard fact rather than abstract doctrine has always determined the Soviet program toward the nationalities. The result has been a policy of concessions to nationalism which has made a difficult road an easy one and has transformed the nationalities into one of the chief pillars of support of the Bolshevik regime, for, though they, like the peasants, may complain and express dissatisfaction, they realize that no government that might conceivably succeed the present could be more considerate of their desires.

Nor can they entertain any illusions as to the benefits of secession. The White Russian Republic, if it seceded, would in the natural course of events be swallowed up by Poland, and the White Russians, knowing to what restrictions and repressions their fellow-nationals are subjected in Poland, hesitate to supply the morsel. The Ukraine, without Russia's protective prestige would, because of its immense bread resources, become a bone of contention among several European Powers and ultimately fall to the lot of one of them. The Far Eastern (Chita) Republic, were it not for the aid from Moscow which it enjoyed even while nominally unaffiliated with Russia, would be the prey of the Japanese, while Georgia and Azerbaijan, coveted for their oil, and Armenia, all three Mohammedan in faith and semi-Turanian in blood, would either gravitate toward Turkey whose record for ruling subject races leaves much to be desired, or become British colonies on which Royal Dutch and Shell could poach undisturbed.

If, however, one of the national republics were to decide to sever its relations with Russia, the communistic "self-determination even unto secession" experiences a peculiar interpretation. Paraphrased from a statement to me by the assistant Commissar of Nationalities, the interpretation is much to this effect: Each national republic in the Russian union of racial states has of course a communist government. As long as this state remains communist it could not conceivably leave the socialist family of nations; the very idea of the Union to which the governments of all the nationalities are committed is to unite the socialist countries of the world. The will to secede could only arise simultaneously with a will to overthrow the Soviet regime in the particular national republic. The Communists of the national republic would resist the effort to drive them from power. In such a civil war Moscow would feel itself called upon to intervene. In other words, their programmatic "self-determination even unto secession" notwithstanding, the Bolsheviks would never view secession with inactive indifference.

But the individual national republics enjoy large measures of autonomy. Stalin who, since the death of Lenin and the retirement of Trotzky, has become one of the most powerful political personalities in Russia, has as Commissar of Nationalities made it abundantly clear that there must be no blanket laws for the national republics. A decree that fits every requirement in White Russia may be impossible of execution in Dagestan. Thus one commissariat whose task it was to replenish the supply of live stock after its depletion through the famine ordered the distribution of a certain number of hogs in each of the provinces of Russia. But, as Stalin pointed out, there was no use sending pigs to the Kirghiz Republic because the Kirghiz, being Moslems, would neither herd nor eat them. It is Moscow's conscious policy to win the good favor of the minorities by vouchsafing them the highest measure of freedom that is compatible with general security and their continued allegiance. Each republic has its full-fledged and independent government manned, as far as possible, by members of its own race. Each republic has its representatives in Moscow; Georgia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and the Ukraine sent their own delegates to the Genoa Conference, and Georgia and the Ukraine to Lausanne. No effort is spared to gratify the self-pride of the nationalities—at least of the larger ones; their appetite grows with the gratification thereof.

The popularity which the Russian Government enjoys among the racial minorities is augmented by their appreciation of its land policy. Half the peasants of the Union live outside of Great Russia. Among these the Bolsheviks have parceled out the nationalized estates of the crown, the nobles, and the church. In the realm of education the advent of the Soviets has likewise been of benefit to the minorities. Czarism was proverbial for its encouragement of illiteracy among Russians; how much more so among the non-Russian populations which it oppressed. Ninety-seven per cent of the inhabitants of Turkestan are illiterate. In regions removed from the center there were none but crude religious schools, and vast territories were steeped in primitive barbarism. But hundreds of schools have sprung up where before 1917 there were none. Modern methods have superseded the floor-squatting, chorus-shouting system of the mosque school. The Moslems and the Jews have offered mighty, albeit passive, resistance to the Government's prohibition of religious instruction to minors, but many of the Mohammedan schools and almost all the Hebrew have disappeared and been replaced by institutions which instead of teaching only religious subjects teach everything but religious subjects. Pedagogical seminaries have been founded on the territories of the several nationalities, and the University of the Western Minorities in Moscow and Petrograd, the University of the Toilers of the East in Moscow and Tiflis, the Ukrainian University in Kiev, and the White Russian in Minsk are preparing intellectual leaders for the coming generation.

In each republic the language of the majority is, side by side with Russian, the official language. The central authorities in Moscow take pains to encourage the use of the languages of the minorities by establishing special faculties for the study of their grammars, and by the printing of national textbooks. Often more elementary work is necessary, as in the cases of the Chechentzi and Ingushi of the Caucasus, for whose dialects, never before reduced to writing, alphabets had to be invented.

The primitive character of many of these languages and their number—there are several hundred in use—greatly aggravate the difficulties of educational work. In the Dagestan Republic near the Caspian, for instance, there are six fundamental languages and thirty-two dialects. The entire population numbers 798,000. In the neighboring Mountain Republic with 808,000 inhabitants there are two Ossetini schools, and one school each for Persians, Armenians, Tartars, Greeks, Georgians, Jews, Germans, and Poles. Anywhere in the Russian Union a group of people may petition the Government to open a school in which their language will be the language of instruction. A hundred or more nationalities have their own schools in Great Russia; on the other hand the autonomous national republics maintain schools for persons who are not of their racial stock.

Nor are the difficulties inherent in Russian geography to be lost sight of. The autonomous republic of the Yakuti in northeastern Siberia is seven times the size of France but has a population of only 300,000. Vladivostok on the Pacific is twelve days' ride by express train from Moscow. The republics of Khiva and Bokhara, till very recently the scene of Enver Pasha's activities, are situated in the heart of Asia and remain wild and unsubdued.

The Soviet Government distinguishes between autonomous territories which receive what liberties their civilization warrants, autonomous republics which exercise considerable freedom, and independent republics which are almost entirely self-governing. The independent republics are Great Russia, White Russia, the Ukraine, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia, Khiva, Bokhara, the Far Eastern (Chita) Republic, and Yakut. The autonomous republics are Tataria, Bashkiria, Kirghizia, Turkestan, Dagestan, Crimea, and the Mountain Republic. The autonomous territories are those of the Voti, Chuvashi, Kalmicki, Buriati, Kabardini, Mari, Zuriani, and the Germans of the Volga.

All these nationalities are now represented in the Soviet of Nationalities which constitutes the upper house of the country's highest legislative and executive body—the Central Executive Committee. This Soviet is an innovation in the governmental structure of Russia and was only made possible by the abolition, in June, 1923, of the 1917 constitution and the adoption of a new one* by virtue of which Russia as a political entity stretching from Petrograd to Vladivostok ceased to exist and was replaced by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, thus absolving the independent republics from carrying the name of Russia. The raison d'être of the Soviet of Nationalities is much like that of the United States Senate. Just as the Senate with its equal representation was a concession to less-populous States like Rhode Island whose influence in the House of Representatives was necessarily limited, so the Soviet of Nationalities similarly resting on a basis of equal representation was created to satisfy the national republics and territories which had claimed that they were insufficiently represented in the Central Executive Committee. The formation of the Soviet of Nationalities marked the liquidation of the All-Russian Commissariat of Nationalities.

With all the readiness of the Communists to set the republics on a plane with Great Russia they have not yet succeeded in exterminating the Great Russian chauvinism inherited from the days of Czarism. It persists even in their own ranks and certainly among a large number of non-Communist officials in Moscow. Stalin, himself a Georgian, has stated that "these vestiges of Great Russian chauvinism find expression in the haughty and heartless bureaucratic relationship of Russian government employees toward the needs and requirements of the national republics." On the other hand—again it is Stalin who makes the charge—the Communists of the autonomous republics have not yet divested themselves of the hatred toward Russia which they absorbed during the period of Czarist persecution. Nor have even the Communists of the Caucasus shed every trace of Pan-Islamism and Pan-Turanism in which, in prerevolutionary days, they saw the solution of the problems of their oppressed fatherlands. Stalin further points out that whereas the various republics vociferate against the minutest evidence of Great Russian jingoism, they often sin themselves. Georgia does not treat her own minorities, the Abchazi, Adshari, and Ossetini, as she expects to be treated by Russia. And the same is true of the other independent republics.

There is yet another heritage of the monarchy which the Bolshevik regime now strives to destroy. Czarist Russia looked upon its rich frontier provinces, now the autonomous republics, as spheres to be exploited economically by and for the benefit of Great Russia. But the policy of the Soviets is to encourage domestic industry in the republics. Turkestan and Azerbaijan, for example, are to manufacture their own cotton goods instead of sending the raw material to Moscow.

Seeking the comfort of the minorities has had the effect of reconciling them to Moscow's rule. But the salutary effect does not stop at the Russian boundary. The Ruthenians of Galicia, writhing under the Polish lash, look fondly across the frontier toward their free and independent racial brothers, the Ukrainians. It would be far-fetched to suppose that Galicia will by reason of this circumstance soon become part of an enlarged Ukrainian soviet republic, but the discontent of the Ruthenians is certainly a factor in Russo-Polish relations. In Esthonia, Latvia, and Lithuania many people have the feeling that their countries cannot permanently remain politically detached from Russia. The jingoism of the ruling, estate-owning classes has not spent itself, and the effervescent patriotism natural to newborn nations still abounds, but the Russian, Jewish, and German minorities already constitute a nucleus of disaffection, and the peasants are beginning to realize that without losing their political or cultural autonomy they could, by returning to the body of Russia from which the Brest-Litovsk treaty tore them, gain the free use of the large Baltic estates which the Bolsheviks would nationalize. These movements toward reaffiliation, nursed, especially in Latvia, by a strong Communist faction, await, however, an improvement in the economic situation of Soviet Russia.

Henry Bacon

By ERIC KEBBON

ARCHITECTURE is the most anonymous of the arts. Unlike paintings or sculpture, buildings are unsigned, and the average man is seldom conscious of their creators unless his attention is challenged by the fact that a building is the largest or the highest or the most expensive in the world. The public has little knowledge of the architect as an individual. This fact makes it all the more remarkable that the acclaim of a nation should have been accorded to so modest a person as the late Henry Bacon, whose contributions to the advancement of taste have been as lacking in ostentation as he has himself.

Henry Bacon's career was a record of steady, undeviating loyalty to his ideal of perfection in architecture and his success was due to his character as well as to his love of beauty. He was born at Watseka, Illinois, in 1866, and was educated in that State. After attending the State University for one year, he began his architectural training in an office in Boston. In 1888 he came to New York and while working as a draftsman in the office of McKim, Mead and White, he succeeded in winning the much-coveted

* Russia's new constitution was published in The Nation of August 15, 1923.

Rotch Scholarship entitling him to two years of travel in Greece and Italy. This early study of the monuments of classic art, and of Greek architecture in particular, definitely directed his taste and developed a desire for the simplicity of composition and refinement of detail which appear in all of his later work.

Returning to New York in 1891, he came under the inspiring influence of Charles F. McKim. There must have existed a deep bond of understanding between the two men; their ideals were similar and Bacon received strong encouragement and excellent training under the sympathetic guidance of the older man. During the next twelve years his art broadened. His unerring instinct for making the right choice in his designs and his ability to execute them with feeling were expressed in the modest buildings which he erected in various sections of the country. He appreciated the value of greater coordination between architecture and the sister art of sculpture, and he was invited to collaborate with many eminent sculptors. Collaborating with Augustus St. Gaudens and Daniel Chester French, he provided architectural settings for at least three score monuments by these two men alone. In every case the spirit of the sculptured figure was emphasized by the beauty of the background or base which he provided.

He worked quietly and studiously, never allowing the imperious demands of an overzealous building committee or the impatience of a client to swerve him from the careful consideration of the logical growth of his design and the progress of the finished structure. To perfect his work by ceaseless meditation was his method of achieving the ideals he was striving for. He constantly referred to the ancient monuments of his youthful travels for inspiration and refreshment and revisited again and again the Mediterranean countries for study and contemplation. His enthusiasm for the antique was shared by his brother Francis, who had been engaged in excavating the ruins of the ancient Greek city of Assos in Asia Minor; the uncovering of the hidden temples and bas reliefs of that once flourishing city contributed further to Henry Bacon's intimate knowledge of the perfected art of the fifth century.

His productive work slowly increased until it included bank buildings, university dormitories, libraries, churches, schoolhouses, and all manner of public and private buildings. But the culmination of his art was the great memorial building in honor of Abraham Lincoln in Washington, which was dedicated in the closing year of his life. In this noble structure, the full flowering of his genius is seen. There never was a more profoundly considered design. Its majesty, its refinement, its monumental serenity combine to make it expressive of the reticent and innate idealism of its creator and worthy of the nation's faith in the immortal leader whose memory it perpetuates.

In reviewing the career and work of Henry Bacon, critics may claim that his adherence to the classic tradition removed him from a free expression of a distinctive American architecture. Yet such buildings as he created are produced in no other country today, because everywhere else it appears that architects are straining to achieve something new. Bacon worked in the language of classic art because it appealed to the promptings of his own nature. The continual study and use of its alphabet became so natural to him that he could finally use it with originality, and he has left to us an imperishable heritage of splendid architectural achievement.

Oil and Irony

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE oil inquiry has come to a stage at which it is making people look simultaneously tragic and ridiculous. What could be more tragic, what could be more ridiculous, than Republican Senators hastening to the White House to ask the President instantly to require the resignation of Attorney General Daugherty?

Here is an Attorney General who throughout Washington has for years been known to be what he is, whatever that may be.

Now a Democratic Senator, Wheeler of Montana, rises in the Senate and shakes his finger in the direction of Mr. Daugherty and charges Mr. Daugherty with having done this and that and with having left this and that undone. He charges these things and believes these things against Mr. Daugherty and promises to prove them. He does not at the time even attempt to prove them. He quite naturally reserves his proofs for the time when he and Mr. Daugherty may be face to face in a committee inquiry room.

Thereupon, with nothing actually known about Mr. Daugherty beyond what had all along been known, Republican Senators are seen to hasten both to the White House and to other points of vantage to equip themselves with levers for prying Mr. Daugherty out of office.

They cannot say that Mr. Daugherty's character and record had been unknown to them until a fledgling Senator from Montana could come forward to enlighten them. They cannot say that Mr. Daugherty's failure to see any war-fraud criminals until they were pointed out to him by Congressman Woodruff of Michigan and Congressman Johnson of South Dakota was news to them. They cannot say that Mr. Daugherty's disposition to drop oil-land cases instead of fighting them through without compromise to a finish was an assertion that had for them any tinge of novelty. They cannot say that Mr. Daugherty's reported or reputed efforts to gain delegates for Warren Gamaliel Harding in the Republican National Convention of 1920 by dickers regarding oil were efforts gossiped in the press gallery of the Senate, but totally unheard and unknown on the Senate floor. Nor can they say that these reported or reputed efforts have ever been proved and established before any tribunal.

The charges against Mr. Daugherty fall absolutely into two classes. One class is of charges known to Washington for a long time. The other class is much smaller. Its existence is unimportant, but is mentioned for the sake of argument and logic. This other class consists of charges which may perhaps be considered new but which never have been proved before any tribunal or by any set of actual facts which would persuade an honest and fair man to call another man guilty.

It happens further that Mr. Daugherty's worst act is not even mentioned in the present proceedings of accusation against him by his enemies and of abandonment of him by the bulk of his party friends. That worst act was the injunction which he secured from a complaisant federal judge in Chicago against the shopcraft railroad strikers in 1922. That injunction was as clear an instance of class warfare and of the employment of the powers of government by one class against another class as was ever exhibited in the history of the republic. With nobody in the United States in any way really suffering from the effects of the strike, with nobody starving, with nobody freezing, with enough trains running to protect the country totally and perfectly against all danger of any real and genuine suffering, Mr. Daugherty went into a federal courtroom in Chicago and persuaded a judge to take jurisdiction over a lot of railroad workers who had struck in order to improve their own working conditions and the financial conditions of their families, and he induced this judge to call all these workers conspirators against the interstate commerce of the United States and to enjoin them and their leaders from the acts necessary to the successful prosecution of their attempt to improve their lot.

This writer sat in that courtroom and saw Judge Wilkerson by every gesture and by every look as well as by his final act make himself not an impartial neutral adjudicator of the litigation between the government and the railroad trade unions, but a nodding, smiling co-conspirator with Attorney General Daugherty to get out a class injunction in the name of the common welfare.

Attorney General Daugherty at that moment helped to lay the foundation of the class resentment and class hatred which speedily showed itself in the subsequent electing of radical senators to office in Washington over the bodies of defeated conservative senators in the Northwest. The railroad trade unions were the fighting core of the radical Northwestern revolt. Attorney General Daugherty did as much as any other one man to make that core a fighting core and to bring to Washington the very Senator—Wheeler of Montana—who now by merely leveling a line of charges at him can make Republican Senators ask the President to put him in the guillotine and separate his shoulders from his head.

That Mr. Daugherty was not making the Department of Justice produce any great harvest of convicted rich criminals: what is there new in that charge—or that fact? That Mr. Daugherty had low friends who were capable of selling their supposed influence with him to alarmed criminals: what is there in that charge to give any experienced Republican in Washington a thrill of surprise?

Meanwhile President Coolidge, having lived in Washington for more than two years as Vice-President and having had every opportunity in Cabinet meetings to make Mr. Daugherty's acquaintance, asked him last summer to remain in the Cabinet under the Coolidge administration.

Perhaps Mr. Daugherty ought to resign. Perhaps it would advantage the Republican Party if he resigned. Perhaps it would advantage President Coolidge if he resigned. Those things may be granted morally and politically. Yet somehow there is something in the affair that goes deeper than politics and deeper—if one may say so—than what customarily passes under the name of morals. That something is unswayed human loyalty to one's own human record. It is fidelity to one's self. It is being a certain thing when it is easy and then being that same thing when it is difficult.

President Coolidge and John T. Adams, chairman of the Republican National Committee, stood for Daugherty when everything important was known about Daugherty and when all Republican Washington stood for him. If they stand for him now, when all the rest of Republican Washington on no new proved facts about Daugherty turns against him, they may be wicked men politically, but humanly they are the best of the lot.

In the Driftway

DURING his varied life the Drifter has been accused of many things: irate young revolutionists have termed him a backward old fool, a rising stock-broker shuns him as a Red, a beautiful waitress once thought he was trying to escape without paying his check, and a farmer in Stacyville Junction, Iowa, almost had the sheriff on him as the criminal who set fire to his barn. Needless to say, none of these things were true and, true or not, none of them caused the Drifter to lose sleep—with the exception of the last. Now, however, an accusation has been leveled at him which gives him pause; and he here and now affirms, to the person from Mt. Vernon who recently wrote a letter to The Nation, and to anyone else who may be interested, that he did not choose the Prize Poem.

* * * * *

FOR some weeks before the announcement of the prize winner, the Drifter was at his desk even less than usual; he knew that if he went there sooner or later a harassed editor, pale with sleeplessness and despair, would wander by. "Poems," the editor would murmur in a strained voice, "thousands of poems; short poems, very, very long poems, rhymed poems, very, very free poems. Poems written in pencil on copy-book paper; poems carefully typed on foolscap, tied with blue ribbon, and decorated with holly. Poems about toothpaste, or the spring, or the poet's last wife but one, or the income tax, or washing dishes, or the moon at the full; poems for breakfast, lunch, dinner; poems!" At this point the Drifter would rise, take the poor creature by the hand, and leading him to the water cooler would pour a lily cup of iced water over his fevered brow. Almost always one cup was enough; after it, the poetry reader would grow calm and thank the Drifter for his ministrations. "I've just been reading a few of the prize poems," he would add apologetically and somewhat superfluously, "and it must have upset me a little. So far, you may be interested to know, we haven't found anything quite as good as 'Lycidas.'"

* * * * *

NO, the Drifter will have nothing to do with the poetry contest; and when it is decided he has trouble enough to escape from the exhausted judges who seek to explain to him just why the Prize Poem was chosen, not to mention those who insist on expounding its meaning. The Drifter, when he is not drifting, likes peace. He likes a desk littered only with newspapers, old magazines, copies of the Congressional Record, theater programs, last year's calendars, slips of paper reminding him of important engagements, and similar things which need not be watched too carefully. He likes to read his poems one at a time and by his own choice; he likes to take his iced water internally on rare occasions. The time may come when, out of pity for the readers, he will send in on the first day of the contest a poem written by himself which, at the time of composition some scores of years ago, seemed a real masterpiece, although he has not read it since. Then he can receive the prize without further fuss, and the contest will be over. Till that day he will remain one of the few persons in the United States who combine the virtue of not contributing a poem to the contest with that of not reading the poems that have been contributed. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Sacredness of Private Property

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In connection with the controversy as to Russian recognition, much has been made of Russia's repudiation of her debts. No one of course questions the legal right of a state to repudiate its obligations. Furthermore, an individual cannot sue a sovereign state without its consent. Thus, legally, Russia's position is quite sound. It is, however, argued, with some degree of truth, that a state cannot ethically and morally take advantage of this power.

States, however, as a rule seem to have little concern as to ethics. They act as best suits their interests. Our own history offers plenty of proof of this. Here is a brief résumé of State repudiations of debts:

Arkansas: By constitutional amendment, this State, in 1884, rid itself of obligations to the amount of $12,000,000.

Alabama: In 1876, the legislature of the State passed funding acts which overlooked $15,000,000 in debts.

Florida: By legislative acts passed in 1840, 1843, and 1870, debts to the amount of $8,000,000 were declared void.

Georgia: The constitutional amendment of 1877 declared void millions of dollars' worth of debts incurred before the Civil War and during the Reconstruction Period.

Louisiana: In 1875 repudiated debts amounting to $14,000,000. This, however, was partly paid by constitutional amendment of 1884.

Mississippi: In 1838 repudiated $5,000,000. This repudiation was perpetuated by the constitutional amendment of 1875.

Minnesota: The constitutional amendment of 1860 repudiated $2,000,000. An act of 1881 made settlement on a 50 per cent basis.

Michigan: Repudiated extensive obligations in 1842. Later settlement was made on a basis of 302 per 1,000. No payment was made on large sums held in bonds by European bankers.

North Carolina: After several efforts in repudiation, finally passed the funding bill of 1879, which completely passed over $13,000,000.

South Carolina: Got rid of troublesome bonds by repudiation in 1879.

Rhode Island: In 1834 and 1847 repudiated registered State bonds and prison-building debts.

Tennessee: After several repudiations, finally settled claims on a 50 per cent basis.

Virginia: After its separation from West Virginia, it maintained that one-third of its debts should be borne by the new State. Disagreement arose as to the proportion, and to date that indebtedness has never been paid. As to the other two-thirds, much confusion arose, particularly so as much of the debt was incurred during the Reconstruction Period. In 1882 the famous Riddleberger Act declared most of this debt null and void. In 1892 settlement was made by issuing of bonds on a basis of 19 to 28.

Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Indiana, as a result of the panic of 1834, repudiated millions of dollars of debts. These were later paid in part. Pennsylvania repudiated several millions held by foreign bond-holders, the debt having been incurred in building a canal that proved a financial loss.

The indebtedness of the several States arose through unwise and hasty improvements, through ill-advised investments in railroads, through corruption of legislatures, through honest investments that circumstances later converted into dead losses, and through the recklessness of the Reconstruction Period. The debts, however, had been legally incurred, and that did not prevent their being legally repudiated.

Whether right or wrong, cannot Russia with an ironic smile point to the precedent we have set?

Washington, D. C., February 22

H. BERMAN

The Shipping Board's Own Scandal

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We seem greatly aroused by the oil revelations; but far greater crimes against the American people—far greater betrayal of the people's interests—have been committed by the Shipping Board during the last seven years. The total of the oil loot may reach $200,000,000, but the total looted from the taxpayers through the Shipping Board is over four billion dollars. Yet nothing has come of it; and those who are responsible for this looting are counted among our most eminent and distinguished citizens, and are singularly honored on every possible occasion and on every possible pretext. The indisputable total of the loot via the Shipping Board route is over four billion dollars; and all the American people have to show for it is a lot of badly built ships that are rusting into complete uselessness, and a few other ships, the total value of all of which, good and bad, will not even equal the interest that the taxpayers must pay every year until this debt of four billion dollars has been paid off.

Revelations which constantly come to hand prove over and over what I have repeatedly stated, that the history of the world does not show such colossal looting and squandering of the public moneys as during the period covered by the existence of the Shipping Board. Not one ship built with these billions of dollars was completed in time to be of any use during the war; in fact, with few exceptions, their keels were not even laid until after the war had passed into history; and the statements the Shipping Board and its apologists constantly make, that its enormous and excessive costs were due to the necessity of haste to defeat Germany, are false.

Israel Zangwill, in a recent public address, said our national defect is our "let it slide" attitude. If Zangwill knew the whole story of the American people's indifference to corruption and faithlessness on the part of our public officials, he could write an article that would shake the conscience of America. Perhaps the oil exposures may do that.

New York, February 25

PHILIP MANSON

A Protest

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should like to protest against Mr. Seligmann's charge of inaccuracy in his review of Katherine Dreier's "Western Art" in The Nation for February 13. He states, for instance, that "she often fails to get her facts about them straight: dadaism, for example, was not, as Miss Dreier says, started by Tzara and taken up by Picabia; it was an off-shoot of Picabia's magazine 391, which in turn had been derived from the American 291 . . ." I happen to know that Miss Dreier's information was received from M. Tzara, M. Picabia, and M. Marcel Duchamp; it could hardly have better authority.

Again he states: "On page 76 she says 'no expression reached us until 1913,' meaning that modern European work was first shown in the Armory Exhibition of that year. On page 123 she contradicts her own statement when she refers to 291, the first gallery to introduce the spirit of modern art in New York. . . ." If Mr. Seligmann had quoted Miss Dreier's statement in full from page 76 others might have understood the meaning of her words more clearly than he did. She says: "We try to hide our ignorance in not understanding this modern art in America, by saying that we will plunge right into it, for no expression reached us until 1913, etc. . . ." She was plainly giving the sentiment of those people who were defending their lack of understanding; the very words "try to hide"—which are the key-note of the sentence—imply inaccuracy.

Mr. Seligmann's claim that the "Nude Descending the Stairs" created only a huge scandal interested me. It seems amazing that a scandal should last for more than ten years, especially when the whole affair revolved around the question whether or not the painting was a work of art. Though I have met many who frankly admitted that they could not understand this painting, I could count on one hand the number who have derided it.

New York, February 20

BERTHA VAN VOSTROW

Another Wyoming

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Wyoming—a glimpse of early railroad history, a glance at the cattle business, snatch of dry farming with a mild climax of oil, and adios.

I do not expect to be wholly articulate about this. To enlarge upon the theme of Wyoming on the heels of the "Maverick Citizenry" in your issue of January 16 seems to me somewhat akin to explaining an internal combustion engine to an Eskimo. Perhaps, however, I can skirt the other side of the fence in a manner as brief as that of Mr. Hawes. To this gentleman the people and topography of Wyoming evidently have meant little. I think, off-hand, of that broad, windy country in the vicinity of Arvada; treeless and barren, the home of the sod-house and the coal-pile with here and there a galvanized iron shanty.

The Powder River with its cottonwoods and Indian lore; Thermopolis, where all Wyoming "doctors" (and marvelous are the tales therefrom); the Pitchfork ranch on the broad valley of the upper Greybull with white-faced cattle in clumps of a thousand or two as far as one can see—seventy miles from the railroad here; the Sunshine stage from Meeteese, this last most certainly a community of Vikings or demi-gods and mother of countless intrepid "Meeteese kids" in days gone by: what of these? Nothing, I suppose, but then I think of ranch cooks and chocolate pie, of dried apples and the Irma Hotel in Cody before the drought laid its blight there; of Homeric feats at guzzling the "Yellowstone" that convention prescribed; and most important of all, the great institution of "Solo," a game certainly peculiar to the West.

A word for the mountains—the game country, moose-hide jackets, meadows, streams, grouse, elk tenderloin, the swaying, bobbing backs of a string of pack horses, willow thickets, coyotes, and of course the game with its grunts and coughs as one sleeps under a tarp'. I wisely avoid the mountain scenery save for remarking that I like it.

The vernacular I bequeath to Mr. Mencken, and a fine one it is. The people are shrewd, humorous, and hard, men and women alike prematurely aged and grizzled; hospitable and friendly and not at all unworthy inheritors of that fine country. A "province of Standard Oil"? I doubt it.

Omaha, Nebraska, January 17

C. W. MORTON, JR.

Magazines for Germany

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Many of the workers who returned from service with our child-feeding mission in Germany have told us of the great need existing in that country today for foreign periodicals. Owing to the depreciation of the mark most German individuals and institutions are unable to subscribe to foreign magazines, and the resulting handicap to Germany's knowledge of current thought in other countries is very great.

We have corresponded regarding this matter with Dr. Jürgens, head of the national library committee of the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft, and he has confirmed the statement that this need is wide-spread. "I should like to say," he writes, "that Germany needs very urgently to get to know America better, but that we cannot now give her such an opportunity owing to lack of means."

Philadelphia, January 1

PUBLICITY SECRETARY,
American Friends Service Committee,
20 South 12th Street

Books

Some Gallant Rogues

Highwaymen. A Book of Gallant Rogues. By Charles J. Finger, with illustrations from wood-blocks by Paul Honoré. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

THERE are two ways of approach to this group of picaresque yarns about half a dozen fellows who broke with the law with a swagger and went to death or distinction, or both, with a flourish. The first is to take the book as if it were a new Sabatini and read in succession the tales of Colonel Blood's theft of the crown jewels from the Tower of London in the days of the Stuarts, Jack Sheppard's jail-breaking, Dick Turpin's legendary ride, Claude Duval's gallantry, and Jonathan Wild's vindictiveness; the second is to open the book at the very last chapter, read the original and circumstantial account of one Bill Downer of Tierra del Fuego, and throw the rest of the book away with a regret because the author wrote no other chapters like this last. Whether the last chapter was an afterthought, whether Mr. Charles J. Finger ran out of historic rogues, is not explained in any footnote; suffice it that this tale of a man's battle with fate has the stamp of authenticity that is lacking in the older narratives.

For the exploits of the seventeenth-century rogues have been chanted in ballads and celebrated in fable and romance so often that only an iconoclast can ring new changes on the theme. Mr. Finger is hardly one to destroy a legend that has been repeated for generations by men with gleaming eyes as they beguile the hours over their cups in ale-houses; he smacks his lips as his heroes issue forth, he drinks with them as they quaff their ale and porter, he is one of the mob that cheers them as they climb over the housetops, he joins in the hisses that greet the executioner at Tyburn. Even when he denounces one of them, when he calls Jonathan Wild "a blood-sucking, loathsome creature, a parasite that thrive on parasites," he is true to the viewpoint of the people, who cursed Wild as a "double-crosser." From the days of Daniel Defoe, who was a contemporary of Jack Sheppard and is said to have obtained a personal statement from him on the day of his execution, down to those of Scott and William Harrison Ainsworth, who wrote romantic tales in early Victorian times, writers have used these themes. In the course of two centuries they have been generously embroidered, and heroes and martyrs have been made of men like Dick Turpin, who began his career as a cattle thief, and Colonel Thomas Blood, who today would find his counterpart in the leader of a gang of partisan sluggers. Were it not for court records and legal documents still extant Mr. Finger's crew of rogues might even end up with memorial plaques in Westminster Abbey as liberators of the people from the tyranny of the rich.

But the chronicle often confutes the legend. Mr. Finger would have Colonel Blood capture the Duke of Ormond [Ormonde], lord lieutenant of Ireland, in St. James Street, drag him to the scaffold, and leave him lying there with a hangman's rope around his neck, after having robbed him of a ring as a talisman. The documents seem to agree that Ormonde overcame his captors before the humiliation was accomplished; the incident was widely known, for James Butler, first Duke of Ormonde, was "a man of Plato's grand nobility" and one of those responsible for the restoration of Charles II. Mr. Finger likes to think, likewise, that Charles pardoned Blood for his theft of the crown jewels because he admired his bravery, and even restored to him the Irish estates that had been given Blood for his services under Henry Cromwell, but it is much more likely that the whole incident is legendary and that good political sense brought about the reconciliation, for Blood was a partisan of Buckingham and reputed to be the head of one hundred oath-bound men who had sworn to "get" Charles. Dick Turpin as an historical character becomes almost as dim a figure as King Arthur; his ride from London to York is now regarded as one of those stories that ought to have happened but didn't, and Ainsworth is credited with adding vastly to Turpin's reputation in his novel "Rookwood," published in 1834. But what boots all this attempt to take the solid ground away from under fanciful figures? Mr. Finger loves the old romantic tales, and so do his readers, just as they love Jesse James, Al Jennings, Villa, the Lone Train Robber, and others that move in an atmosphere of romantic adventure.

But the tale of Bill Downer is of a different sort. In his disregard of the law he was the kin of the old English highwaymen, but he loved humankind much better than they ever did. Mr. Finger tells this story in the first person, and we wonder in how far the squire of Fayetteville, Arkansas, now calmly surveying his acres planted to fodder and grain, took part in the adventure. Downer and the author went down to "Tierra del" upon receiving word of a gold strike. Their first contact with the law came when the agents of a concessionary destroyed their boxes for washing gravel and their tools. Bill Downer took to the road and soon he was heard of as a horse stealer. In the course of his adventures come two fine episodes. The first occurs when Downer meets the Argentine concessionary, Ropper, astride a mare that he covets. Downer's gun proves no match for the smooth drawl of the unarmed Argentine, and in the end Downer enters the employ of Ropper. But not for long. The second episode of importance occurs after Downer has been captured by a band of six and put in a boat to be rowed to the mainland. A storm breaks and Downer assumes command, bidding the men row in the teeth of the gale, urging them on in a strange jargon of English and Spanish and resorting to blows when all else fails. The story of their fight for life, first in the open boat, then across the cold Antarctic rocks, is in Mr. Finger's best manner, and Downer comes out of it not an outlaw but a Titan. His moralizing sounds unreal: "A man ought to prove himself by the punishment he can take, and that's a fact." But his simple comment after the big battle is much more human and probable: "All I want is a good night's sleep and something hot to drink. And I got to get a horse somehow in the morning. Things has been too hot lately." One feels that life was lived with much more intensity and disregard of man-made laws on Tierra del Fuego than on the roads that led from Huntingdon and Epping Forest to London town.

HARRY HANSEN

The True Function of History

The Life and Reign of Edward IV. By Cora L. Scofield. Longmans, Green and Company. Two vols. $16.

DR. SCOFIELD has long been known to historians as the author of an excellent treatise on the Star Chamber. In this work she has attempted to survey a complex period in English history, and to narrate from every angle the record of twenty years. She has pursued her task with unwearying energy. The Record Office and the British Museum, the London Guildhall and the Bibliothèque Nationale, and the mass of manuscripts these collections contain have been devotedly searched for new material. No one, it may confidently be said, has ever written the history of a period with a greater knowledge of the facts it contains.

Yet I confess to a feeling of disappointment. Dr. Scofield has ample learning and the merit of a clear and dignified style. She is content, however, simply to write the annals of her period. She has done that, probably, as well and as efficiently as it could be done. But she has avoided altogether the interpretation of her material. She does not inquire into the meaning of the facts. She does not weigh character, estimate institutions, judge the significance of the changes she records. Edward IV, she thinks, was eager, when he came to the throne, to secure the proper administration of the law; as time proceeded that desire passed away, and trials like that of Burdett, Stacy, and Blake in 1477 show how he was, at the end, willing to pervert justice to his private purposes. But why did the change occur? Was it an inherent weakness in Edward's character, which could pursue no scheme to its end? Was it inevitable that a man brought up in a period of civil war should be careless of right and justice? Dr. Scofield does not tell us. Was Tiptoft's introduction of torture into judicial procedure the result of his Italian tour? Was his management of his parliaments, his skilful use of his popularity, his influence upon the elections, the model upon which the Tudors later founded their popular despotism? What was the condition of the people in this period? Did Edward's cultivation of foreign ships do harm to the native industry? We would have sacrificed much detail of foreign diplomacy for answers to problems like these.

Dr. Scofield knows so much and has taken such pains that she must expect to be judged by the highest standards. Her book will be indispensable to anyone who seeks the actual details of these years in chronological sequence. It is not a book which provokes reflection in the reader, which compels the adjustment of perspective. There are innumerable new details added; there is nothing which suggests the revision of accepted judgments. There is, of course, acute difference of opinion upon the function of the historian. But, at the least, anyone who has spent long years on the critical study of an epoch owes us an analysis of its import. Facts do not speak for themselves. They have to be weighed and measured. The quality of the great historian is, I think, best revealed by his ability to make the facts, so weighed and so measured, reveal a system of ideas. The narrative of incidents is interesting; as well written as Dr. Scofield writes it, it is even possessed of fascination. But it lacks proportion and emphasis simply because, refusing to judge, it regards all incidents as free and equal. That is to desert the true function of history.

HAROLD J. LASKI

India

India in Ferment. By Claude H. Van Tyne. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

A History of Hindu Political Theories. By U. Ghosal. Oxford University Press. $5.50.

A WELL-INTENTIONED gentleman who is well versed in American history goes to India on a trip of a few months in order to learn something on the spot about Indian conditions. The result is a book which is rather the textbook of a self-conscious scholar than the notebook of a modest student of Indian affairs. But although Mr. Van Tyne knows American history and more particularly the history of the American war of independence, he applies his special knowledge to the events in India by condemning in a rather sweeping manner the native non-cooperative movement for independence.

One finds every indication in the book that the author enjoyed his trip to India. Naturally, the British officials who met him on his landing were nice to him. So were their Hindu opponents. Being anxious to win for their cause an influential American scientist each faction displayed for him its best qualities. He was the guest of honor at numerous dinners given by British officials, and he was visited by several delegations of Hindus garbed in their most picturesque apparel. Seeing around him well-fed colonial officialdom and gorgeous gala native costumes which apparently fascinated him, the author was more than inclined, despite his initial good-will, to relegate the case of the starving pariahs to the background, as being of secondary importance, and to be guided by a somewhat hazy optimism.

Despite all his arguments to the contrary, one gains the impression from this book that Mr. Van Tyne does not sufficiently realize the seriousness of the Indian situation. The months he has spent in India were too wonderful to leave him in doubt that ultimately things will be straightened out—provided agitators do not interfere. This complacency leads him to acquiesce in some acts of the rulers of India for which even conservative critics cannot find extenuation. Undoubtedly, the designation of the massacre of Amritsar as only a "blunder," though qualified by the adjective "ghastly," cannot be excused, if one bears in mind that many an act of self-defense on the part of the followers of Gandhi is censured by Mr. Van Tyne with words which are considerably stronger than those applied to the Amritsar affair.

The main contention of the author is that India is not ripe for the "swaraj" (self-rule) because the Indians, in general, are on a very low level of civilization. They must first obtain a thorough political education before they can be permitted to take full command of their own affairs. The Government of India Act is a commendable instrument in the preparation of the Indians for a restricted self-government. Should the English leave at the present time chaos would be inevitable. The Afghans would break into the country and the native princes would embark upon a series of predatory wars. As things are now India "will in time rule herself but will remain one of the self-governing countries of the British Commonwealth of Nations."

However prejudiced the author may be in many respects, he brings up some points which it is well not to forget. What he says about the caste system, the treatment of the "untouchables," and the relation of the religions on the Indian peninsula can be indorsed without hesitation by every true friend of India.

That there is no historical foundation for the belief that caste has been the dominant form of social disintegration of the Indians ever since they appeared on the stage of history is refuted in Mr. Ghosal's able volume. The book is for the most part technical and covers the development of Hindu political theories from the earliest times to the first quarter of the seventeenth century, when the classical period of Hindu political literature ends. A considerable part of the book is devoted to the Dharmasutras and the Hindu conception of law as a derivative of the divine will. The chapters dealing with the Mahabharata lay special emphasis on the development of the principle of authority and more particularly the evolution of the king idea. A few illuminating paragraphs treat the subject of the origin of the king's office and compare the Mahabharata's interpretation with the Hobbesian conception of social contract as the basis of the king's power. Early indications of Machiavellianism in the Hindu scriptures and a treatise on the right of tyrannicide give coloring to a chapter which without them would be too technical. The volume also seems to bear out the theory advocated by Mr. Van Tyne that the religious, as well as the caste system of the Hindu, is built up in such a way as to insure for the Brahmans an undisputed supremacy not only over the subject classes but also over the so-called secular rulers.

The logical conclusion, therefore, seems to be that once the power of the Brahmana order is broken, the caste system, one of the gravest inherent ills of India, will atrophy, lacking the conditions which permitted it to ripen into full bloom.

EMIL LENGYEL

The Right to a Home

Housing Progress in Western Europe: 1923. By Edith Elmer Wood. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

WITH vivid word pictures and illustrations Mrs. Wood describes the thousands upon thousands of new homes that are being built in Great Britain, Holland, Belgium, Italy, and France. In an appendix she adds more recent notes on Spain, Switzerland, and Portugal. Had she wished further to drive home the splendid efforts of still other countries, she might have included Scandinavia, Germany, and Austria. For in the depleted central nations as well as in their more prosperous northern and western neighbors, I have seen heroic efforts being made to meet the need for wholesome homes for the people. Europeans have determined to remove housing from the laissez faire commercial policy of supply and demand. They have accepted it as a necessary public function like schools, roads, water supply, and sanitation. Homes worth working for, and if need be worth fighting for, people of the present generation are going to have: and European politicians know it. If the taxpayers set up a howl that the government cannot afford to subsidize building, the answer is: "Economies in the public budget may be necessary, but we insist that the place for economy is not in homes for our families."

There are two schools of thought with regard to housing in Europe today. There are those who advocate state and municipal action and those who prefer the methods of voluntary cooperative societies. Both are producing solid results.

Government-housing advocates point with satisfaction to achievements in Great Britain and Holland. Its detractors insist that government housing is unduly expensive; that it gets all mixed up with pull, politics, and red tape—as it does. Nevertheless, we must admit that more houses get built that way. It is a fact that despite the wrangling and obstructionism of politicians one new dwelling has been erected for every thirty-four British families; and one for every thirteen Dutch families. The Dutch Government recognizes the sturdy individualism of its people and carries through its plans with a minimum of national machinery and centralization. The British authorities, without consultation or consent, condemn property by the wholesale, tear it down, and set up in place of slums cottages in a garden.

Voluntary cooperation plays a larger part in Belgium, France, and Italy. (In Scandinavia and Central Europe, too, had Mrs. Wood observed housing there.) Under normal conditions the people who occupy the cooperative homes are responsible for them from beginning to end. There is no bureaucratic interference by the state. But self-help, alas, cannot entirely go it alone in these days of fluctuating values. Cooperators are forced to obtain loans from the government, or from friendly private corporations, or from cooperative credit institutions to add to their own scanty resources. Yet it proves the worth of man that despite these discouragements, vast housing schemes are being carried through. In Belgium, 75,000 of the 80,000 houses wiped out in whole or in part by the war have been rebuilt. And in the province of Venetia, which suffered more than any other Italian province, of the 160,000 dwellings that were destroyed, 120,000, better in every respect, have risen anew.

Whether government housing or cooperative housing proves to be the wiser and more enduring policy remains to be seen. Mrs. Wood in her passionate desire to get all the people swiftly and decently, even beautifully, housed leans toward the more powerful apparatus of the state. I admit I prefer the cooperative method. The self-respect, the independence, and the loving care that go with the responsibility for one's own house and garden appeal strongly to me. The cooperative way works a little more slowly, yet in the end, I believe, more surely.

Public opinion on housing questions in Europe is at least a generation ahead of ours in the United States. Europeans find it hard to believe that we are discussing points that they settled forty years ago. Mrs. Wood says:

During the past year I have made a point of seeing the worst houses that remain in London and Paris as well as in Belgian and Dutch cities. And I can assure my fellow countrymen that I have nowhere seen homes even remotely comparable to the ten thousand old-law tenements in lower Manhattan; nor have I seen any layout as bad as that of the North End of Boston. The people of Europe have undertaken national housing schemes not because their need is greater than ours but because they are more convinced than we are of the importance of good housing in the making of good citizens.

The time is ripe for such a book as this to rouse us from our indifference and ignorance. It is replete with information: how to keep up housing standards; how to keep down costs; the best designs and layouts for garden cities; the most model architectural plans for buildings providing for light, air, sanitation, and, not to be neglected, beauty; the respective merits of public or private control and management; the advantages of the cottage in a garden over apartments for family life; even the arguments for and against bath-tubs and showers, the advantages which sewers have over septic tanks.

There is information, too, about housing laws, constructive and restrictive in various countries; information on the borrowing power and credit policies of housing societies; on government subsidies and loans.

But after all, valuable as this information is, in this country we need more than a knowledge of the mechanics of housing. We need to know what kind of lives the people live in the homes that Mrs. Wood describes. In America we have resources, we have able architects, we have city planners, we have skilled artisans, and we can have laws, whenever we want them passed. What we need is the vision and the will.

When once the American people resolve that human values are above property values, we, too, can have the right kind of homes and the right kind of lives for our children.

AGNES DYER WARBASSE

Life's Undergraduates

Wife of the Centaur. By Cyril Hume. George H. Doran and Company. $2.50.

AT the very threshold of Mr. Hume's vivid first novel one encounters a scene which—both in externals and in treatment—bears a significant resemblance to the opening pages of Michael Sadleir's "Privilege." This, in itself, would call for no comment. Mr. Hume may never have read "Privilege," and yet the more deeply one goes into his narrative the more impressive is this young American's intellectual kinship with the British novelist. Mr. Sadleir has described his own style as "a fastidious and purposely rhythmic prose"; his novel, he says, was "written up" to the high level of its own emotionalism. Both these phrases fit Mr. Hume as though they were made for him. "Wife of the Centaur" has manifestly been wrought in the desire to make fiction a more plastic form, modeled more closely to the complex forms of modern living and responsive to them. Even though the result is not as brilliant as the conception, the value of such pioneering work calls for emphasis.

Cyril Hume's mood runs the gamut from an irony which is sharpened with cynicism to a poetic quality which sometimes grows unnecessarily rhapsodic. That initial scene, with the mourning family gathered about an open grave and Jeffrey thinking his detached thoughts, stamps Hume as a writer of lean, high-strung narrative. Jeffrey watched the priest "with his cassock blowing between his thin legs and molding his unhealthy corpulence."

He looked tired and Jeffrey wondered if custom had made him quite used to scenes like this . . . After all it was an ordinary thing, dying. You stopped, and lay still with something gone out of you. Then the undertakers came, walking silently on their rubber heels, and did things to you behind shut doors: when your family saw you again you were quite different and a little disgusting.

There are no lazy loose-ends and no stodgy passages in this story. At times the thread has been spun too fine; Mr. Hume has worked some of his embroidery on cheap fabric.

There is no sorrier figure, says the author, than the professional college man; the unhonored middle-aged boy who is surprised and hurt that his classmates have forgotten his past glory and treat him with abstract kindness or contemptuous carelessness. For they have gone far beyond him, and he has remained, for all his years, a bewildered undergraduate among his elders.

But there is another figure, just as pathetic, and that is the sophisticated puppet—the worldly wise youth who reaches majority without maturity and faces life as if it were a co-ed prom. Mr. Hume has sought to build a novel around such people as this, and they haven't helped him much. While they remain "innocent, star-eyed creatures," they live upon his pages, but when they grow up into the flip, dancing, drinking crowd beloved by F. Scott Fitzgerald, they fade perceptibly, and not all his brilliant talk and counterfeit of passion in their behalf will save them. His characters, one feels, are not big enough for the story he has placed them in; they remain undergraduates in the serious business of life. Before they reach the flapper age, one can believe in them, for the author has been extraordinarily adept in sounding their emotions and tracing their relationships.

On the whole, a first novel of wit and high promise, written by a man who has now given proof of his sound technical equipment. His next—if it lays hold of materials capable of a greater measure of sound development—should mark a genuine advance.

LISLE BELL

Notice

Mr. Geoffrey Bret Harte, grandson of Bret Harte, the story-writer and novelist, is planning to collect Bret Harte's letters for publication. He wishes to be put in touch with persons in possession of Bret Harte letters who will be good enough to lend them to him for copying and publication. The greatest care will be taken of all letters, and they will be copied and returned at the earliest possible moment. Mr. Geoffrey Bret Harte may be addressed

c/o Farmers' Loan & Trust Company
16 William Street
New York, N. Y.

Books in Brief

Essays of a Biologist. By Julian Huxley. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Biology, as Mr. Huxley says, is more closely related to humanism than the other sciences because "whereas the extension of control in physics and chemistry led to a multiplication of the number of things which a man could do and experience, the extension of control in biology will mean inter alia an alteration of the modes of man's experience itself." His essays on such subjects as Progress, Biological and Other, and Rationalism and the Idea of God are not brilliant but they are sensible and they are interesting as giving the ideas of a professional investigator upon the relations of science and life—ideas which the lay reader generally gets only at second hand through his novels and sociology. And such a lay reader, if he has got his opinions from Mr. Wells for instance, will be relieved to find that a scientist's conception of the necessity for conscious evolution and of God as a function of humanity are not very different from the romancer's. On the whole, and in spite of the opinion of the author, those essays in which he sticks closest to the facts of recent biological investigation will probably be the freshest and most interesting to the average reader.

Pictorial Beauty on the Screen. By Victor O. Freeburg. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This book is a valiant attempt to bridge the gap between De Mille and Millet. The author holds that the motion picture can aspire to aesthetic consideration, if the directors will fix their attention upon what passes before the lens of the camera and reject all that is not pictorially satisfying. It is his belief that people would be attracted to the theater by an album, although one who has observed their apathy toward scenic films is inclined to doubt it.

A King's Daughter. A Tragedy in Verse. By John Masefield. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

Having adapted Racine's "Esther" in an earlier volume, Mr. Masefield now writes a Hebrew tragedy of his own. The heroine is Jezebel, and the story is a good one, like many others in the Old Testament which await the dramatist. Mr. Masefield's verse, as always lately, is loose and feebly emphatic; but he has done all, perhaps, that he intended to do—written an actable and exciting play.

Harry. By Neith Boyce. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

The spirit which pervades this memorial—a tribute of a modern mother to her son—would have baffled the readers of a previous generation. There is a detachment in the viewpoint of the book which would have puzzled one's grandmother—and yet the current of sympathy is none the less authentic for all that. Harry has been understood in terms of his own age; it is perhaps significant that he was of an age in which mothers may approach their children by some path other than the maternal. The book is essentially a reflection of life—a picture of the modern family done with feeling and a by no means common degree of artistry.

Jazz and "The Rhapsody in Blue"

By HENRIETTA STRAUS

MR. PAUL WHITEMAN and his Palais Royal Orchestra gave a concert recently in Aeolian Hall to show the development of jazz. The orchestra had been increased, for the occasion, from fourteen to twenty-two members, most of whom, it is interesting to note, like Mr. Whiteman himself, were of legitimate symphonic experience. As for the concert, it was, according to their leader, "a purely educational experiment." But he might have added that as an educational experiment it was revolutionary and successful beyond the wildest dreams of educators. For the public is not usually moved to enthusiasm at the thought of being educated; yet he could have sold out his house three times over to those who were willing to learn. Moreover, music, from an educational standpoint, is not entirely a democratizing force, for there will always be the ultimate mental division of the "high-brow" from the "low-brow." Yet here one had the unique experience of being shoved into a concert hall by a cabaret player from Fourteenth Street, and of being shoved out again by some smug musician from the studio, his smugness for once demoralized by the naked allurements of rhythm. As for the auditorium itself, equality reigned from the back drop to the back row, from the stage, where frying pans, saxophones, and "wah-wahs" hobnobbed with violins, clarinets, and grand pianos to the audience, where Broadway rubbed shoulders fraternally with the classicists. And it may as well be admitted now that the day was to Broadway, and the education to the classicist. For, to the former, there was probably nothing strange in the Oriental decorations of the stage, the exotic coloring of the music, the disheveled-looking instruments lying about in an informal, detached way, the swaying bodies of the players as they beat time with their feet, and the nervous power of the leader, with his shimmying right leg. And above all, there was nothing unfamiliar in the spectacle of an American boy playing with extraordinary ease an original composition of terrific rhythmical difficulty and of individual power and beauty, and winning immediate recognition for his achievement. But to the musician trained in other schools there was something very new and exciting and moving in this utter abandonment of all emotional reserve. And there was also, perhaps, a secret and overwhelming realization that he had been caught napping, that a distinctive and well-developed art having obvious kinship with the world-thought of today had grown up, unheeded, under his very ears while he had been straining his auditory nerves to catch the echoes of sound three thousand miles away.

The question still remains, however, What is jazz? Mr. Whiteman himself confesses that he does not know, that what we call jazz today is jazz in name only. He divides it into four phases. These are, if I remember rightly, the six instrument noise of ten or twelve years ago attained mainly by kitchen utensils which he calls the "true jazz," the "blues," or Negro element, usually slower in tempo, the adaptation of themes from the classics to dance rhythms, and the "modern orchestra," and the evolution from instrumental improvisation to definite orchestral scoring. At his concert he began with "The Livery Stable Blues," a piece of Hogarthian humor as legitimate and vivid in expression as the more classical Till Eulenspiegel with his thumb ever to his nose. Then followed various comic strips, of which the best were done by Zez Confrey at the piano. There were, also, of course, various kinds of modern "blues," besides a jazz fantasy on the "Volga Boat Song," symphonic arrangements of popular tunes including the, what is now, historic "Alexander's Rag-time Band," "modern" orchestral arrangements of semi-classical melodies, like MacDowell's "To a Wild Rose," four beautifully orchestrated serenades by Victor Herbert, a fair amount of trash, George Gershwin's remarkable piano "Rhapsody in Blue," which the composer himself played with a "modern" orchestral accompaniment, and a purely symphonic number now no longer, thank Heaven, played in the concert halls, Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance."

It was, on the whole, a curious orgy of unrestrained laughter and tears, in which East and West met and merged with strange, half-caste results. There were, for instance, sustained, drawn-out Slavic effects in melodic passages of pure, Anglo-Saxon bathos. Perverted brasses and winds depicted, in subtle and intoxicating colors, humor of the slap-stick variety. Aphrodisiacal rhythms alternated with those of the ordinary dance. And in "The Rhapsody in Blue," which takes its title from the Negro phase of jazz, one heard a dialogue between American slang and expressions as elemental as the soil. This work was indeed an extraordinary concoction gathered together during the month preceding its performance. It began with a braying, impudent, laughing cadenza on clarinet and ended with its initial motive, a broad and passionate theme worthy of a Tchaikovsky. In between were orchestral interludes as fantastic and barbaric as any of a Rimsky-Korsakoff or Stravinsky, and piano passages whose intricate and subtle rhythms might have been danced in the rites of Astarte. The form was haphazard, and the playing often ineffectual, but its substance marked a new era.

With it all one cannot but wonder whether this now Slavic, now Oriental element in jazz is not due to the fact that many of those who write, orchestrate, and play it are of Russian-Jewish extraction; whether, in fact, jazz, with its elements of the Russian, the Negro, and the native American is not that first distinctive musical phase of the melting-pot for which we have been waiting so long and which seems to have such endless possibilities. Certainly, Mr. Whiteman and Mr. Gershwin have, in the meantime, added a new chapter to our musical history.

Drama Cross-Section

SOME years ago, writing on this page, I divided the pabulum of the popular theater into sentimental comedy and melodrama. Slowly, since then, if one reckons from month to month; rapidly, if one thinks in terms of years, things have changed. The melodrama is as good as dead. Even as "Bertha, the Sewing Machine Girl" and her many sisters of hair-breadth escapes and much-enduring virtue passed into forgetfulness, so have passed or are passing "The Woman in Room 13" and all her family of crooks and kept women and "snow-birds" and detectives. Crime, pursuit, and pseudo-lynchings are almost gone and will soon be forgotten. I shall not become fatuous and say that the world is getting better. But the world of the theater is certainly a more tolerable one.

Sentimental comedy is still going strong, very strong. The plays with the longest runs now holding the local stage are two of the worst and most slushy plays in the world: "Abie's Irish Rose" and "The Seventh Heaven." Both are inconceivably false and silly. But it is not, I insist, without significance, that the play enjoying the third longest run is "Rain." Next, by this test of endurance, comes "Sun-Up," and next but one, "Tarnish." Things have changed.

This change would not reveal itself to the superficial observer from either Mars or Vienna. Historic perspective is needed. The manner in which "Sun-Up" breaks down and retracts all its assumptions in the last act is shoddy and shameless enough. Yet what worlds lie between "Sun-Up" and "East Is West"! "Sun-Up" and "The Shame Woman" together hardly make one sound realistic folk-play. But the simultaneous run of these two works by one author symbolizes something of the change from that historic season when "East Is West" and "The Woman in Room 13" simultaneously made life unsafe on Broadway, while the same author's "Friendly Enemies" made Chicago safe for democracy.

What has happened? The same thing, in a measure, that has happened to our fictional literature. The eye has met the object. In a measure only. The drama, as must always be remembered, appeals to groups, not to individuals singly, and thus suffers from the crowd's falling below the standards of the individuals who compose it. But the process is strictly the same. Even in the theater people are beginning to take some pleasure in seeing men and things, if not events, somewhat as they are in their real nature, and the new sentimental comedies, comedies and sentimental still, all betray some touch of happy observation, some obligation to truth, some attempt, however feeble, to reflect.

All this is manifestly true in a considerable measure of the two plays by Miss Volmer that I have named. It is true of Mr. Hatcher Hughes's excellent "Hell-Bent fer Heaven." But it is also true of "Meet the Wife," "The Potters," "Neighbors," "The Song and Dance Man," "Mister Pitt," "The Show-Off," "The Goose Hangs High," "The New Englander," "New Toys." None of these plays reaches the level attained now and then by the best of our new realists, by Arthur Richman, Gilbert Emery, Lewis Beach. There is no American play this season as fine as "Ambush" or "A Square Peg." The point is that all the plays that I have somewhat casually grouped together are different from any similar group that one might have assembled several seasons ago by virtue of the essential qualities that separate literature from mere trade-goods and the drama from mere theatrical fodder. Chief of these qualities are an aspiration at least after honesty, soundness of characterization though not yet of fable, an interpretation of things on the basis of their real nature. Our theater aspires even higher. "The Adding Machine" and "Beggars on Horseback" leap beyond observation, which both include, to social and even philosophic satire. I admire and enjoy these works immensely. But the honest effort after realism in many plays of an average quality seems to me to be the most promising sign in the development of our drama.

The reason is obvious. A school of writers accustoms and trains the public, some small public, at least, to accept certain methods and moods. Thus was the way prepared for Shakespeare, thus by the French realists for Ibsen, thus by an entire revolution in literature for Hauptmann. Our literature is in revolution; the movement is at last touching the mass of our dramatic production. Prophecy is foolish. But the prognosis for the contemporary American drama is more favorable than any conscientious observer of three years ago would have held to be possible.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

LECTURES and AMUSEMENTS

THE THRILLING ROMANCE OF YOUTH!
David Belasco in Association with William Harris, Jr., presents
FAY Bainter in
"THE OTHER ROSE"
with HENRY HULL and a Distinguished Cast
MOROSCO THEATRE West 45th Street.
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

A SENSATIONAL TRIUMPH!
DAVID BELASCO Presents
LIONEL BARRYMORE
with IRENE FENWICK in "LAUGH, CLOWN, LAUGH!"
BELASCO THEATRE, West 44th St. Eves. at 8:30.
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30.
Seats now on sale 4 weeks in advance.

NATIONAL THEATRE, 41st St., W. of Broadway. Eves., 8:00.
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday, 2:00.
WALTER HAMPDEN in Cyrano de Bergerac
"A royal revival of one of the world's matchless plays."—Alexander Woolcott, in N. Y. Herald.
SEATS ON SALE FOR 4 WEEKS

"One play in a thousand"
Alexander Woolcott in the Herald.
Outward Bound
with a Distinguished Cast at the
RITZ THEATRE
West 48th St. Eves., 8:30.
Mats. Wed. & Sat., 2:30.

PRINCESS THEATRE 39th Street east of Broadway. Evenings, 8:45. Matinees Thurs. and Sat., 2:45.
SUN UP With LUCILLE LA VERNE
By LULA VOLLMER

YIDDISH ART THEATRE 27th St. and Madison Ave.
Maurice Swartz, Director
Abraham Goldfadden's classic comedy revival
"THE TWO KOONY LAMMELS"
Friday, 8:30
Also Saturday and Sunday, 2:30 and 8:30

The Players Co., Inc., Second Sub. Season
The WONDERFUL VISIT By H. G. WELLS & ST. JOHN ERVINE
"An unusual evening in the theatre."—Herald.
LENOX HILL Theatre, 52 E. 78th St. Rhinclander 8800.
Evenings at 8:30. Matinee Saturday, 2:30.

GREENWICH VILLAGE THEATRE (Sheridan Square)
Sunday, 11 a. m., Mar. 2
WORLD POLITICS
from an Asiatic point of view
No seats reserved.
Free Lecture on Theosophy by B. P. WADIA
Delegate to League of Nations International Labor Conferences at Washington and Geneva.
No collection.

BOSTON SCHOOL of SOCIAL SCIENCE, Lorimer Hall, Tremont Temple
Courses, Wednesday Eves., March 5, 12
Last Two Lectures on American History in the light of economic changes.
Monday Eves., March 3, 10, 17, 24
ECONOMIC CHAOS AND THE WAY OUT Scott Nearing
Thursday Eves., March 13
THE NEED OF BIRTH CONTROL IN AMERICA Margaret Sanger
(This lecture at Steinert Hall, 162 Boylston St.)
Admission to each course $1.00. Single Admission 30c. For Bulletin and tickets write the Secretary, Jacob Kassner, 21 Middlesex St., Boston, Mass.

International Relations Section

Compromise or Republicanism in India?

By TARAKNATH DAS

IN spite of the imprisonment of Mahatma Gandhi and the adoption of repressive measures by which many responsible Indian leaders are being put in jail without trial, opinion in the Indian Nationalist movement seems to be veering toward the idea of complete independence. This is quite clear from the study of the proceedings of the All India National Congress held at Coconada during the Christmas week, 1923. Problems such as the status of Indians in the British Empire and Hindu-Moslem unity were discussed, and many resolutions were adopted. But the most important feature of the deliberations was that the National Congress, although it followed the ideas of Mahatma Gandhi to the extent of boycotting the present legislative councils, unanimously approved a compromise resolution upholding the tactics of the Swarajists led by Mr. C. R. Das of Calcutta, who refused to accept the position of Minister of the "transferred subjects" of the province of Bengal offered by Lord Lytton, the Governor. The compromise resolution was moved by Mr. Rajagopalachari, leader of the orthodox wing of the Gandhites, popularly known as the No-changers.

This Congress reaffirms the non-cooperation resolutions adopted at Calcutta, Nagpur, Ahmedabad, Gaya, and Delhi. Since doubts have been raised by reason of the non-cooperation resolution adopted at Delhi with regard to Council-entry whether there has been any change in the policy of the Congress regarding the Triple Boycott, this Congress affirms that the principle and policy of that boycott remain unaltered. This Congress further declares that the said principle and policy form the foundation of constructive work and appeals to the nation to carry out the program of constructive work as adopted at Bardoli and prepare for the adoption of civil disobedience. This Congress calls upon every provincial congress committee to take immediate steps in this behalf with a view to the speedy attainment of our goal.

Adoption of this compromise resolution by the Congress means indorsement of Parnellite tactics of obstruction of the Government after entering the councils. The tactics of the Swarajists who are intrusted to carry out this policy are described in the following resolution adopted by the general council of the Swarajya Party:

Whereas the reforms introduced by the Government of India Act of 1919 have repeatedly been pronounced by the Indian National Congress and all shades of Indian public opinion to be inadequate and unsatisfactory;

And whereas the events of the last three years and the working of the legislatures inaugurated under the said act during that period have amply justified Indian public opinion and shown beyond all doubt that the said legislatures are not only utterly powerless to protect the various interests of the Indian people and to secure to them the most elementary rights of citizenship but are entirely unable to defend them from national humiliation at home and abroad;

And whereas the Swarajya Party of the Indian National Congress, by its program adopted in 1923, laid down certain lines of political work, including entry into the said legislatures having for its immediate objective the securing of the right to form a constitution adopting such system and machinery as are most suited to the conditions of the country and to the genius of the people;

And whereas in pursuance of the said program the Swarajya Party has succeeded in winning a substantial number of seats in the said legislatures at the general election, the council of the Swarajya Party held at Coconada on December 30 expresses its full agreement with the resolutions passed at the several sessions of the Indian National Congress to the effect that India is fully fit for Swarajya, that there is no justification for withholding it from the Indian people any longer, and demanding that steps be forthwith taken to establish full responsible government in India, and that with a view to insuring a proper atmosphere for the said purpose the following preliminary measures be adopted:

1. That the elected members of the central and provincial legislatures promptly present a demand to the Government asking for (a) the immediate and unconditional release of Mahatma Gandhi, (b) the immediate and unconditional release of all other political prisoners convicted or under trial, or persons detained on political grounds in India or foreign countries, (c) the immediate summoning of a Round Table conference of representatives of whom one-third shall be elected by the elected members of the Indian Legislative Assembly, one-third by the Indian National Congress, and one-third shall be nominated by the Government or elected by such other bodies or communities as the Government may desire, (d) suspension of the operation of all repressive laws or orders passed thereunder.

2. This conference shall negotiate with the Government with a view to determine the principles of the constitution for India which shall provide inter alia (a) for a declaration of rights on the lines of the resolution adopted by the Indian National Congress at Amritsar in 1919, (b) for full control by the legislatures, central and provincial, of all matters of legislation, administration (civil and military), finance, and the various services central or provincial as the case may be, (c) the decision of the conference arrived at, a result of the said negotiations will then be laid before a new legislature elected on a wider franchise than at present, to be determined by the said Round Table conference, and the said legislature shall have power to frame a constitution for India on the basis of the said decision, and the constitution shall then be presented to the Imperial Parliament to be ratified and embodied in a statutory enactment.

The Swarajya Party council met again and passed the following resolutions:

The leader of the Swarajya Party in the Legislative Assembly shall interpellate the Government as to what step it proposes to take on the demand to be presented by the 25th of January. In the event of the Government accepting the principle, he would, in consultation with such other members of the Assembly as may be elected for the purpose, put himself in communication with the Government, provided no modification of the demand is made without the sanction of the Executive Committee of the Swarajya Party. In the event of the Government refusing to entertain the demand, or agreeing only to unacceptable terms, the members of the party shall resort to a policy of uniform, continuous, and consistent obstruction with a view to make government through the councils impossible.

Such obstruction should be offered on all occasions when members of the party by themselves or by joining any other party or group of members in the Assembly are in a position to defeat the Government. On other occasions they shall take no part in the proceedings. The members shall accept no office with or without salary or other remuneration. No member should agree to be on the panel of chairmen and serve on any committee or commission, or take part in voting for the election of members to any such bodies, except when formation of such committee or commission can be made impossible by a majority voting against every person proposed for election.

No member shall move any resolution or introduce a bill, but it will be open to the members to accept invitation from any other party to join for the purpose of defeating the Government. All demands for grants in the Legislative Assembly shall be wholly opposed, thus insuring the total rejection of the budget.

Similarly all demands in the provincial councils shall be opposed, but it shall be open to members to abstain from voting on any item if there are special reasons.

The sum and substance of the method described in these documents is to force the hand of the Government by presenting a demand for a change in conditions which will lead the country a step forward toward the goal of self-government, possibly toward the dominion status.

In the meantime the radical wing of the Indian National Congress is preparing the country for a movement—open and aboveboard—for absolute independence of India. The radicals of India, who are generally termed seditionists by the Government, as early as 1900, and particularly since the Russo-Japanese War, have been working for this end. The following document, which may be of historic value, shows that now some of the responsible leaders of the All India National Congress have come out in the open, to spread the idea of the absolute independence of the country:

AN APPEAL TO THE NATION

We are passing through a series of national crises the gravity of which can hardly be exaggerated. There are moments in the history of nations when a decisive move in the right direction often leads a nation to a triumphant goal, and when that supreme moment is lost in vague imaginations or false and indecisive steps it takes long centuries to retrieve the loss. India is passing through some such crisis and we are extremely fortunate that the crisis is not yet over. The whole world is shivering from the pains of labor, the indications of a new life are manifest everywhere, and a regenerated India must find a place among the new-born nations of the world. This rejuvenated India cannot accept any over-lord, she must be a free and independent nation.

At a time when all the nations of the world are fighting for independence and liberty, at a time when our Indian heroes are championing the cause of India's independence abroad, it is simply ridiculous and shameful that we Indians should hesitate to accept independence as our only legitimate and logical goal; we therefore appeal to our nation to declare in the open Congress in unmistakable terms that independence, complete independence, is our destined goal; let there be no ambiguous phrases to qualify it, let it be preached in all its nakedness. It is the moral force of this ideal that creates nations.

We must educate the country from this very moment in a way so that the people may realize the significance of a republic and a federation. We may postpone it for the future only at the risk of a great national calamity. We therefore appeal to the Congress delegates to define Swaraj as a Federated Republic of the United States of India.

We also appeal to the delegates of this Congress to delete the words "by peaceful and legitimate means" from the Congress creed so that men holding every shade of opinion may have no difficulty in joining the only national organization in the country, though for the present it may be retained as a part of the actual program of Congress work. Our time is short and we cannot dilate upon this point at any length, but we only say that means are after all means and that our object and means should not be confounded with each other.

We are further of opinion that mere changing of the creed and passing of resolutions will not bring us independence. We therefore request the representatives of our nation to engage the whole strength and the whole resources of the Congress in organizing a band of national workers who shall devote all their time and all their energy to the service of their motherland and who must be ready to suffer and even be ready to sacrifice their lives for the national cause. When the Congress is backed by an organization of this kind, then and then alone will the Congress have any strength and only then can we expect the voice of the Congress to be respected.

The other items in our program should be:

- (1) Boycott of British of goods,
- (2) Establishment or helping in the establishment of factories and cottage industries on a strictly cooperative basis,
- (3) Helping the laborers and peasants of our land in obtaining their grievances redressed and organizing them for their own economic good and moral prosperity,
- (4) And finally to organize a federation of all the Asiatic races in the immediate future.

SRISH CNANDRA CHATTERJI (Dacca), JITENDRA LAL BANERJI (Calcutta), BIPIN BIHARI GANGULY (Calcutta), AZAD SOBHANI (Cawnpore) [dissenting to delete the words peaceful, etc., from the Congress creed], SIRDAR LACHMAN SINGH (Punjab), PRIYUSH KANTI GHOSH (Calcutta) [not a member A.I.C.C.], SYED FAZLUR RAHMAN (Patna), MALKHAN SINGH (Aligarh), KANTI LAL PUREKH (Calcutta), RAM PRASAD MISRA (Cawnpore), ARJUN LAL SETHI (Ajmer), NARDEVA SHASTRI (Hardwar), SATYENDRA CHANDRA MITRA (Calcutta), BASANTA KUMAR MASUMDAR (Calcutta), SRIMATI HEMAPRAVA MAZUMDAR (Calcutta), M. Y. IMAM (Bar-at-law Mirzapur),

Members, All India Congress Committee
SACHINDRA NATH SANYAL (Allahabad), NARAYAN PRASAD ARORA (Cawnpore), MANNILAL AWASTHI (Cawnpore), Delegates

Undoubtedly there is no possibility in the near future of transforming the All India National Congress into an organ of the Indian Republicans who advocate a Federated Republic of the United States of India. But there is every possibility of having a "Republican bloc" in the All India National Congress before the year is over. This would mean a distinct evolution in the party politics of the Nationalist movement in India. The moderate Nationalists will form the right wing. The Swarajists will form the Center, making a vigorous demand for the extension of responsible government in India through constitutional means. The Republicans will carry on their work in co-operation with all parties to further the cause of a republic in India by all possible means.

If the Swarajist demand for a Round Table conference to discuss the extension of self-government and such simple and vital propositions as granting a bill of rights, repeal of repressive laws, and release of political prisoners fails, then the progress of republicanism in India will undoubtedly be accelerated.

China and the Boxer Indemnity

IN reply to the joint notes of Great Britain, the United States, France, Japan, Italy, Spain, Belgium, and the Netherlands, sent on February 24 and November 3 of last year demanding that China make future payments of the Boxer indemnity in gold francs, the Chinese Government made the answer printed below, taken from the Peking Daily News for December 29 last. Representatives of the eight Powers have replied that the Powers have not changed their previous attitude but that "for each Haikwan tael owed to each of the Powers China must pay a sum which is shown by Article 7 of the final Protocol (of 1901) as an equivalent of the tael in gold, conforming to weight and respective legal values of each of the gold currencies enumerated in the aforementioned article." The note reiterates the conclusions of the two previous communications and suggests that China may have become confused as to the meaning of the terms in question. The Chinese note follows:

M. LE MINISTRE:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the two joint notes, respectively of February 24 and November 5 last, which Your Excellency and the representatives of the other Signatory Powers of the Protocol of 1901 addressed to this Ministry on the subject of the payment of the indemnity of 1900. I should have made an earlier acknowledgment but for the fact that the importance of the question has rendered it necessary for the Chinese Government to make a careful and comprehensive study.

In the two notes under reply Your Excellency was good enough to inform the Chinese Government of the unanimous opinion of the Signatory Powers that "there is no doubt whatever that the Protocol of 1901 as well as the arrangement of July 2, 1905, provides in a manner absolutely clear and indisputable that the indemnity of 1900 should be paid in gold, i.e., for each Haikwan tael due to each of the Powers China ought to pay the sum in gold which is shown in the said Article 6 as the equivalent of one tael."

Since the foregoing expression of opinion follows closely the language of the arrangement of July 2, 1905, the Chinese Government would have little hesitation to give concurrence if they felt sure of the precise meaning which the Signatory Powers attached to the phrase "in gold." Judging by the context of the arrangement of 1905 as well as Article 6 of the Protocol of 1901 upon which it is based, the Chinese Government are inclined to the view that the said phrase cannot correctly be construed to mean anything but the respective gold currencies of the Signatory Powers in contrast with the Haikwan tael, which is a silver standard and in the terms of which the indemnity of 1900 is stipulated. In other words, by "gold" is not meant the gold metal but simply gold currency. This appears clear from Article 6 of the Protocol which, while declaring that 450,000,000 Haikwan taels of indemnity constitute a gold debt, fixes the equivalent of the Haikwan tael in gold not as a certain quantity of the gold metal but in the currencies of the Signatory Powers issued on the basis of their respective gold standards. Examination of the available records of the discussion among these Signatory Powers which resulted in the final drafting of Article 6 of the Protocol of 1901 leads to the same conclusion.

If there is any doubt as to what was intended to be the manner of payment, it is resolved by the arrangement of July 2, 1905, which, while declaring the indemnity to be a gold debt, settles definitely and once for all the precise mode of payment. It provides that:

"China will make these payments, calculated on the basis set forth above which fixes the value of the Haikwan Protocol tael in relation to the money of each country, either in silver according to the price of silver on the London market, or in gold bills, or in telegraphic transfers, at the choice of each Power. China may obtain bills and telegraphic transfers as best suits her interests at any place and at any bank at the lowest price or by public tender, provided that the payment in gold be made to each Power direct on the due date. It is understood that China is responsible for the exact payment of the transfer and the bills. Each Power in accepting the present proposal must inform the Chinese Government which of the three methods cited above is the one it chooses until the debt is extinguished."

On the same day (July 2, 1905) by separate notes addressed to the Waiwupu the Signatory Powers indicated their preference, each for itself, for one or another of the three stipulated methods of payment. The selection made by the Powers signatory of the notes under reply were as follows:

Method of Payment	Country
For telegraphic transfers in their respective currencies.	Belgium, France, Great Britain, Holland, Italy, and the United States of America.
Provisionally for payment in silver according to price of silver on London market (but in 1906 definitely selected payment by draft).	Spain.
For telegraphic transfers in sterling on London.	Japan.

These selections were proposed and accepted with the express understanding that they were to remain effective "till the debt is extinguished." Ever since the conclusion of the arrangement of 1905, they have been faithfully applied to the respective countries without interruption, and have theretofore given no occasion for a difference of views in their application.

In their notes of December 28, 1922, addressed to the Ministers of Belgium, France, Italy, and Spain, to which the two notes now under consideration were intended to be a reply, the Chinese Government did not wish either to place a new interpretation on the language of Article 6 of the Protocol of 1901, which has been made clear by the arrangement of 1905 or to propose a modification of the precise mode of payment stipulated in the said arrangement. It was and remains their intention to continue to make the indemnity payments to the present Signatory Powers as heretofore, each according to its own selected method of payment, in full conformity with the said Article 6 as interpreted and amended by the arrangement of 1905.

I do not understand that by the two notes under reply the Powers desired to propose a radical change in the established mode of payment; they appear, however, to intimate that the telegraphic transfer should be so effected that the proceeds will not nearly amount to the fixed sums in the respective currencies of the Powers but will also be in gold specie or the equivalent thereof in value. If this should be the view of the Signatory Powers, the Chinese Government do not feel able to accept it.

Telegraphic transfer is not the only stipulated mode of payment for most of the Powers signatory to the Protocol and has been invariably applied to them in the past ever since the arrangement of 1905 was concluded, but it is also a method of international exchange of which the meaning and scope are perfectly well known. The telegraphic transfer rate between China and the gold-standard countries is constantly fluctuating, even more so than that between any two gold-standard countries, as silver is but a marketable metal in those countries that have demonetized it. It fluctuates accordingly as the value of one currency rises or falls in the terms of the other. Such fluctuations may be due to one or more causes, they may be due to an adverse or favorable trade balance, they may be due to currency inflation or deflation of money, or they may be due to a combination of various causes into the intricacies of which it is not necessary to inquire here, but whatever be the cause or causes of fluctuation, it always refers to the money that is current. If therefore for one reason or another specie has been driven out of circulation by currency inflation, as is the case with the franc, the money that can be so purchased must be the money obtainable on the market.

Moreover, exchange fluctuations are unavoidable when payment is required to be made by telegraphic transfer, and since the stipulated medium of payment is the currency of each country, such fluctuations, unfavorable as they may be for the time being to one party or the other, do not appear to constitute a practical ground for abandoning the currency as the medium of payment and adopting specie instead. For it would scarcely be possible to determine at what stage of the fluctuation of the exchange rate should the currency be abandoned in favor of specie to make a settlement.

Indeed, a different application of the chosen method of payment would not only be incompatible with the generally accepted practice of "telegraphic transfer" but also contrary to the intent and purpose of the arrangement of 1905. For it will be recalled that no sooner had the first instalment of the indemnity been paid than a difference of opinion arose as to the precise nature and extent of the obligation which China had assumed under Article 6 of the Protocol of 1901. The controversy was brought about by the unexpected rise of the gold exchange rate which caused a deficit in the respective sums in the gold currency though China paid the stipulated amount in Haikwan taels. China maintains that while the indemnity of the Signatory Powers was a gold debt it had been converted into silver at the rate stated in the said article, and that her total obligation was therefore expressly limited to four hundred and fifty million Haikwan taels with interest at 4 per cent in the bond which she had signed and delivered to the diplomatic body, so that she had fully discharged her obligation when she had paid the stipulated amount of Haikwan taels. For nearly three years the Chinese Government declined either to sign the fractional bonds in gold or to make up the deficit on account of payment in silver. It was only after the Powers subsequently agreed definitely to fix the future mode of payment applicable "till the debt is extinguished" that they consented to sign the fractional bonds stated in the respective currencies of the Powers and in addition to pay to them 8,000,000 Haikwan taels, as compensation for the loss in the gold exchange for the years 1902, 1904. The result was the arrangement of 1905 and the Powers made their selection on the same day.

The Chinese Government accepted the arrangement of 1905 and, with it, the risks of fluctuation on the exchange rate from month to month and from year to year, because they understood that while they might thus incur losses, as they have in fact incurred from time to time in the past, there might also at times be gains in their favor.

In point of fact the fluctuations of the gold exchange rate have varied from month to month. From July, 1905, when the new arrangement was put into force, to November, 1917, when by arrangement between China and certain other Signatory Powers of the Protocol the indemnity payments were suspended for five years, there were actually 140 months during which payments were effected, a few months immediately following the revolution of 1911 being excepted, for no payments were made. As regards the rates of exchange for these 140 months, a good illustration may be found in the fluctuation of the exchange on Paris. During 66 months the rate was favorable to China, as it went above the protocol rate of 3.75 francs per Haikwan tael, and during 74 months it was adverse to China, as it went below the said protocol rate. The highest and therefore most favorable rate for China was 6.69068 francs per Haikwan tael for August, 1917, and the lowest and therefore least favorable rate was 3.36008 francs per Haikwan tael for November, 1914. Although the fluctuations have thus been wide as well as varied, the Powers have always received the stipulated amounts in their respective currencies from month to month and from year to year.

In view of the foregoing considerations, the Chinese Government are of the opinion that the word "gold" as used in Article 6 of the Protocol of 1901 and in the Arrangement of 1905 cannot be reasonably construed to make anything other than the currencies of the Signatory Powers issued on the basis of their respective gold standards and that whatever exchange rates prevail at present or are likely to prevail for some time in future, favorable or unfavorable to China as compared with the Protocol rates, they cannot be considered as a valid ground either for placing a new interpretation on the said Article 6 or for proposing a radical departure from the mode of payment selected by the Signatory Powers in accordance with the said arrangement.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to Your Excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) V. K. WELLINGTON KOO

Peking, December 27

Lenin's Widow Speaks

THE following is the brief and simple and strangely impersonal speech delivered by Lenin's widow, N. K. Krupskaya, at the opening session of the Second Congress of Soviets of the U S S R, on the day preceding her husband's funeral:

My words will bear little resemblance to a parliamentary speech. But I believe that in addressing the representatives of the republics of the toilers and my near and dear comrades, who have taken it upon themselves to reconstruct life upon a new basis, I need not bind myself by form and convention.

As I have stood before the bier of Vladimir Ilyich during these last few days, I have thought over the whole of his life. His heart beat strongly with love for all who toil and all who are oppressed. He himself has never confessed this, and I myself would never have uttered it at a less solemn moment. But I say it because he inherited this feeling from the heroic Russian revolutionary movement. It was this feeling that compelled him to seek so passionately and stubbornly the answer to the question: "What must be the path of emancipation of the workers?" The answer he found in Marx. As a man who was tormented by imperative questionings he turned to Marx. He found the answers he sought, and with them he went to the workers. That was in the nineties. At that time it was not possible for him to appear at meetings, so he went to the workers' circle. He went to tell them what he had learned from Marx and the answers he had received to his questions. He came to them not as a haughty instructor, but as a comrade. He not only spoke and taught, he also listened attentively to what the workers told him in their turn. And the workers of Petrograd did not speak only of the conditions in the factories and of their oppression; they also spoke of their villages. In the House of the Trade Unions, before the bier of Vladimir Ilyich, I saw one of the workers who had been a member of the circle of Vladimir Ilyich. He was a peasant from the province of Tula. This peasant from Tula and worker in the Semenikov factory once said to Vladimir Ilyich: "Here in the town it is hard for me to express myself. I will go back to my Tula province and there I will tell my fellow-peasants who are my friends all that you say. They will believe me; I am one of them. There also the gendarmes will not hinder us."

We now talk a good deal about the bond of the workers and the peasants. This bond, comrades, was created by history itself, for the Russian worker is on one side a worker and on the other a peasant.

Living among the workers of Petrograd, conversing with them, listening attentively to what they had to say, helped Vladimir Ilyich to understand the great thought of Marx that the working class represented the vanguard of all those who toiled. Its strength and the pledge of its final triumph lie in the fact that it is the vanguard, and that after it will follow the masses of the toilers and oppressed. Only by acting as the leader of all who toil can the working class conquer.

That is what Vladimir Ilyich understood when he lived among the workers of Petrograd. This thought, this belief illuminated every step of his subsequent activities. He desired power for the working class, for he knew that it was not in order to build up a comfortable life for itself at the cost of the other toilers that the working class needed power. He knew that the historical mission of the working class was to emancipate all who toiled and all who were oppressed.

This fundamental idea stamped every action in the life of Vladimir Ilyich. Representatives of the Soviet Republics, of the republics of the toilers, take this thought of Vladimir Ilyich very closely to heart. Our Ilyich is dead. Comrades, communists, lift up higher the banner of our beloved Lenin.

Comrades—workingmen and working women; comrades—peasants and peasant women; workers of the whole world, rally your ranks and march forward under the banner of Lenin, under the banner of communism!

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12, 1924

No. 3062

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.....	269
EDITORIALS:
Congress, Inquisitor.....	272
MacDonald vs. Poincaré.....	273
Toby, M. P.....	273
Toot! Toot!.....	274
The Marines on Teapot Dome.....	274
IS POLITICAL ZIONISM DEAD?
Yes. By Israel Zangwill.....	276
Zionism—Alive and Triumphant. By Chaim Weizmann.....	279
THE SCANDAL FISHERIES. By William Hard.....	281
BRITISH LABOR AT WORK. By Harold J. Laski.....	282
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	283
CORRESPONDENCE.....	284
BOOKS:
The Divine Darkness. By Charles H. A. Wager.....	285
Toilers of the Sea. By Herbert W. Horwill.....	286
Wanted: An Executioner. By William MacDonald.....	286
Weary Souls. By Lisle Bell.....	287
The Return of Ovid. By Mark Van Doren.....	288
Taking Stock. By J. W. Krutch.....	288
Books in Brief.....	289
DRAMA:
Serpent of Old Nile. By Ludwig Lewisohn.....	289
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Soviet Government After Lenin.....	291
The Soviet Congress on British Recognition.....	291
Italy Recognizes Soviet Russia.....	292
The Bulgarian Reaction.....	293
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER	LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY	IRITA VAN DOREN
MANAGING EDITOR	LITERARY EDITOR
ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
ANATOLE FRANCE	JOHN A. HOBSON
ROBERT HERRICK	H. L. MENCKEN
	NORMAN THOMAS
	CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 1170 People's Gas Building. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

SO THE VIGOROUS, powerful, all-dominating President, Calvin Coolidge, has been defied by his own Attorney General. There seems to be no doubt whatever that Mr. Daugherty has declined to resign. Why the Jovian incumbent of the White House thus yields is not quite clear; there are those who think Mr. Daugherty has convinced him that he ought to be tried first, and others who believe that "Honest Cal" is terrified at the idea of what Mr. Daugherty and his friends might do to him in the Ohio and other primaries. Meanwhile the President has, to date of this writing, said nothing publicly about the revelations that the chief White House telegrapher ran the McLean private wire for three hours every evening; that a White House secret-service man is also in the McLean entanglements; that his private secretary was freely entertained by the McLeans when in Florida, together with Mr. Fall, and has called on them since; that a secret code of the Department of Justice was used for transmitting McLean messages, and that a Burns employee was tipping off Mr. McLean as to happenings within the Department of Justice. In this connection Edward G. Lowry, writing in the New Republic, declares that visitors to the White House have not found the cool, austere man of legend in full command of himself and all his resources, resolute and alert to meet and subdue any large emergency. They have found instead a rather huddled-up little figure, much dismayed, wondering and asking what he should do.

No, the chances that Mr. Coolidge will succeed himself as President of the United States are rapidly waning.

WILLIAM J. BURNS and A. Mitchell Palmer—somehow it seems rather natural that their names should have come into the oil scandals. Not that their integrity is besmirched. Mr. Palmer was quite within his rights in accepting a retainer from Edward B. McLean. But we agree with the New York World that he must none the less be placed among those who sold their political and party reputations. Mr. Palmer was retained, we venture to guess, simply and solely because he, a former Democratic Attorney General, was expected to influence Senator Walsh to have Mr. McLean "let down easily." Mr. Burns's involvement is far more serious. His secret code was used in transmitting messages to Mr. McLean; one of his employees was in cahoots with Mr. McLean; and the charge is made that some of Mr. Burns's agents have been shadowing the members of the Oil Committee who really mean business. Mr. Burns is on the stand as these lines are written; hence we are unable to record his defense. We cannot, however, see how he can wholly exculpate himself. Curious how often such superpatriots are caught in unpleasant situations! People who so violently assail those of different points of view, like the "Reds," and who misuse their official powers to persecute them as have Messrs. Palmer and Burns, ought themselves to be suspect at all times.

FEDERAL TAX REDUCTION is coming—the politicians will see to that. Nothing sounds better than tax reduction—in New York State the Democratic Governor and the Republican Legislature have united on a 25 per cent cut. But it is a little amusing to find newspapers owned by millionaires proclaiming that the masses are crying for reduction of the surtax rate. We sometimes forget that the bulk of the residents of this country have incomes so low that they pay no income tax whatever. Less than seven million individuals report on taxable incomes, and less than 15 per cent of these, according to the World Almanac, report on incomes which might be subject to a surtax. The masses which clamor for a reduction of surtaxes are a very limited group indeed! The most serious complaint against high surtaxes is that they drive capital into tax-exempt securities, freeing them from any taxation whatever. We suspect that publication of the figures would show a far lower proportion of large incomes invested in "tax-exempts" than is commonly supposed; but in any case the remedy is to abolish the evil of such tax-free securities. The proposed constitutional amendment permitting federal taxation of State issues failed by a few votes to win the necessary two-thirds majority in the House; but the issue should not be forgotten. Fifteen years ago, when Mr. Hughes was governor of New York State, he opposed ratification of the federal income-tax amendment because of his fear that it might permit just such federal taxation of State issues; the obvious next step is for Congress to pass a measure taxing State bonds and let the courts pass upon its constitutionality. No two-thirds vote is needed for that.

BELGIUM'S REJECTION of the French treaty is a hopeful sign. Since the armistice Belgium has been fluttering weakly in the wind, a sort of helpless tail to the soaring kite of French diplomacy. Occasionally worried Belgian ministers have attempted to persuade French statesmen to moderation, but with little effect. Their hands were tied by a series of accords which included financial aid, commercial and industrial privileges, and political and military alliance. When England and Italy broke away from war-time bonds and refused to follow France in the invasion of the Ruhr, little Belgium rather unwillingly followed in the military wake of France. Now the Belgian Chamber of Deputies has, by a vote of 95 to 79, rejected the Franco-Belgian economic conventions, forcing the Theunis Government, which sponsored them, to resign, and, apparently, destroying one of the main props of the French imperialist dream. But Belgium may have to go through another election before she can settle upon a new policy, and it is by no means certain that the anti-French bloc in the Belgian Parliament is permanent.

LUDENDORFF'S TRIAL, in which the officials show themselves almost deferential to the old warrior who tried to overthrow the German Republic, betraying anxiety only lest some hostile demonstrator raise his voice, reveals once more the backward swing of the pendulum in Germany. Chaos and hunger have left fear and anger the dominant emotions. Men hope for little more than to live and eat. The spiritual impulses fostered by the 1918 revolution have lost their strength. Labor has lost the economic gains it made in 1918-19; the Social Democratic forces have almost abdicated; the Reichstag is less potent than in the Kaiser's day, and a dictatorship of big-business rules. Thuringia's and Saxony's elections show the rush to extremes. The liberal center parties are losing strength; the Communists are winning over the Socialist masses, and the middle-class groups are turning more and more reactionary—and on occasion Communist and monarchist find it possible to join hands in their common hate of the power of foreign finance. The mark shows signs of wobbling once more, and a weary people seems ready to promise almost anything to General Dawes and his fellow-experts if only they can produce a magic key to economic productivity.

"FILIPINO FANATICS kill nine troopers" the newspapers cry out in indignant headlines, and then add in mild, conversational-size type that "the Colorums lost 35 killed and scores were wounded." A cable from General Wood, dated January 10, reported that 18 constabulary police had been killed while "pacifying" the "fanatics" in Moroland; two days later further dispatches disclosed that more than four times as many Colorums had died in this clash. On January 28 the papers announced that 54 Moros had been killed, 19 wounded, and 13 captured, while only two insular police were wounded. A week later the captain of an inter-island steamer brought the estimate of 54 Moros slain up to 800. Finally the War Department indicated a doubt concerning "the published report that 1,800 Colorum fanatics have been killed by the Philippine Constabulary since the first battle a few weeks ago." Meanwhile the Philippine Press Bureau at Washington says:

The Colorum disturbance hardly calls for the employment of rigorous measures, because they are armed only with bolos, with a few exceptions. The use of barrage from the United States gunboat is considered ridiculous here, while the burning of the houses was attacked by Senator Clarin on the floor of the Senate as altogether cruel and inhuman. . . . Before the present administration under Governor General Wood was inaugurated and during the entire administration of Governor General Harrison, there was not a single disturbance in Moroland.

Such frankness has had its immediate result. The Press Bureau, as well as the Independence Commission, is suddenly stranded for funds; the Insular Auditor, an appointee of General Wood, has discovered doubts of the "constitutionality" of their appropriations for four years past. But, we are glad to add, the House Committee on Insular Affairs has just voted to report a bill for Filipino independence.

JOHAN W. WEEKS, former member of Hornblower and Weeks, stockbrokers, is also Secretary of War of the United States. According to the New York World Mr. Weeks, speaking as Secretary of War, says, apropos of the Philippines, that "complete independence cannot be given the islands until its bond issues have been fully protected." The last government issue, the World adds, extends for twenty-nine more years. Apparently promises of independence made in the name of the American people, desire for self-determination, fitness for self-government count for nothing with Mr. Weeks; the bonds must be safeguarded, and they have twenty-nine years to run.

AERICAN MARINES on duty at the capital of Nicaragua have been ordered to the Honduran frontier, where they "will guard Americans and American property on the Nicaraguan side of the border," says another Washington dispatch. Still another reports more American troops landed at Ceiba "to guard the Consulate." From Nicaragua comes the news that the marines on the border are not only guarding Americans, but are "searching for arms and preventing gun-running." A curious reader might wonder how American marines came to be stationed in the capital of Nicaragua. The answer was told in The Nation for June 7, 1922. American marines have been in Managua ever since 1912, and they landed on precisely such pretexts as are now being given for the landing in Honduras. They killed some thousands of Nicaraguans, lost a few men themselves, and installed a puppet government which has ever since been under the thumb of New York bankers. With the record of 1912 in mind, not forgetting Secretary Weeks's remarks about Philippine bonds, one may be pardoned for being suspicious about our invasion of Honduras. Are we adding Honduras to Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Nicaragua in the list of our crushed colonies?

THREE THOUSAND PERSONS stormed the Commercial Hotel at Waukesha, Wisconsin, put out the lights, smashed windows, broke doors, and disbanded an attempted Ku Klux Klan organization meeting. The Klansmen escaped to the second floor of the hotel, where they remained at bay two hours until rescued by policemen from Milwaukee. In Boston the city authorities made good their threat to break up Klan meetings on private property when they raided the Caledonian Building and ordered 150 persons out of the hall. This is succumbing to Klanism. The lawlessness of the hooded order is not to be cured by more lawlessness, official or unofficial. Nor are "strong measures" necessary. The Klan is already disintegrating. On the Western coast the Seattle branch is divided into two opposing camps, 300 indignant Klansmen meeting to protest against the high fees and salaries paid the grand dragon, his exalted cyclops, the klokard, and the kligrapp. The Muncie, Indiana, Klan, in a State reputed to be the present center of strength of the organization, has bolted the national organization, "a privately owned concern . . . used for personal gain," and called upon Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan to join in a new order, "Nobles of the Klan of the North." The mother Klan at Atlanta has gathered the insurgents from twelve States to form the "Knights of the Mystic Clan," and virtuously denounces the national organization as a "menace to the integrity of the nation," while William J. Simmons, disavowed founder of the Klan, has formed the "Hidden Hosts, Knights of the Flaming Sword."

Be it Resolved, That it be the policy of the National Negro Press Association, in its efforts to husband strength in and further the industrial destinies of our people, that we as vendors of news will discourage and discredit all forms of unionism and economic radicalism.—From a resolution adopted at Nashville, Tennessee, February 21, 1924.

FORTUNATELY FOR THE NEGRO the National Negro Press Association is not representative of the entire press of the race. For to oppose unionism among Negroes is to advocate a form of economic race suicide. The American Negro belongs by compulsion to the working class, and the color of his skin wins him preference from his employer only if it means that he will work for a lower wage. The open-shop employers in the North who encourage Negro labor do so because for the present it is unorganized and therefore cheap. The Negro can fortify his industrial position only by alliance with his white fellow-workers. That has not always been easy; but the bars are falling. The American Federation of Labor has officially indorsed the policy of organizing colored workers on an equal basis with white, and some unions, like the Moulders, are justly proud of their record of no race discrimination. The Negroes, too, are learning the old American lesson that in union is strength. The extraordinary "Negro Sanhedrin" recently held at Chicago was one symptom of the growing race consciousness; the resolution advocating unionization which almost passed that conference, made up largely of conservative Negro organizations, was another sign of progress.

CARL C. MAGEE has made and is making a brave fight against heavy odds in New Mexico. We have commented before on the extraordinary legal and illegal difficulties put in his way. When his Albuquerque paper was boycotted and undermined financially he was forced to sell; after refusing to sell to Bonfils and to Hearst interests he finally sold to local interests which were, unknown to him, affiliated with a Chicago bank under Standard Oil control. The paper purchased, its attacks upon the oil interests naturally ceased. Mr. Magee, however, was undaunted; he founded another paper and continued his attacks. Two weeks ago, in commenting upon the exposures of press venality made in Washington, we referred to the purchase of Mr. Magee's former paper as an example. We intended no reflection upon Mr. Magee but rather upon the financial power that bought the silence of the Albuquerque Journal; unfortunately he misunderstood our comment and broadcasted a denunciation of us for something which we had never said.

DR. ALEXANDER FICHANDLER, principal of Public School 189 in Brooklyn, New York, and director of education for the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, is an unusual candidate for a district school superintendency. It is natural that politicians accustomed to award educational positions for political service should look askance at a man who "never took up a question of school policy without thrashing it out thoroughly with his teachers," who never permitted youngsters "to become heroes through misbehavior—by the simple device of bringing the culprit before the unofficial jury of his classmates." Dr. Fichandler was long principal of one of the largest public schools in the Brownsville and East New York districts, which have an immigrant wage-earning population of almost 200,000, whose confidence he won to such a degree that virtually all the labor and liberal forces as well as business, religious, and social organizations in the community are spontaneously backing one man to "represent" them on the Board of Superintendents. Only the Brooklyn Eagle cautiously intimates disagreement on the ground that "Mr. Fichandler during the war was severely criticized for acts said to be radical and inimical to patriotism," meaning that he refused to subject the minds of children to the general hysteria. Workers' education might well feel that it had reached its majority if the Board of Education and the Board of Superintendents should recognize this educator's pioneer work rather than mere political services.

IN THE GREAT HALL of Cooper Union men of many nationalities and many beliefs have spoken. It was there that Lincoln, the hero of the Lincoln-Douglas debates, established a respectable ancestry for the radical group then known as the Republican Party. There too Mark Twain, "the wild humorist of the Pacific slope," in his lecture on the Sandwich Islands, first introduced the East to his particular brand of humor. It is there that the People's Institute, a unique educational enterprise in this country, has grown up. Under the singularly successful direction of Everett Dean Martin, audiences drawn largely from the working classes gather to hear lectures on psychology, philosophy, and social science, and stay afterward for pointed, lively, and relevant discussions. In order that some of the stimulation and life of these meetings may be turned into the more obvious permanency of print, the Institute has begun pamphlet publication of some of its important lectures.

FOUR OF MR. MARTIN'S own lectures, which are addressed to the largest class in philosophy and psychology in the world, have already appeared and are being widely distributed. They are models of popular exposition—soundness of thought and thoroughness of fact distilled in captivating and fool-proof simplicity. Their clarity of outline and civilization of interest put them completely out of the class of mere vulgarization of knowledge. "Psychology, What Psychology Really Is, Its Uses and Abuses," makes an admirable and just survey of the typical methods and the hoped-for fruits of recent inquiry in a much-abused field. "Psychology and Physiology" is an adroit translation of involved technical material into food whose nutritive value is not lost in the process of being made digestible. These lectures are hopeful signs that things of depth and significance can be made to reach thousands through the arts of simplicity and scholarship and grace.

Congress, Inquisitor

INQUIRIES galore! They are the order of the day in Washington, so much so that it is not surprising to learn that, beyond passing tax, immigration, and bonus bills, and the routine appropriations, Congress is not likely to achieve anything before it adjourns for the campaign. Probably never in the history of Congress have there been so many inquiries, all of them justified, and most of them bound to produce results of extraordinary value to the public, with the most far-reaching political consequences. Indeed, when one scans the list of these inquiries and recalls how much work is required of our legislators in their regular committees, one wonders how a Representative or a Senator can possibly keep up with it. We can readily understand a newly chosen Senator's remark the other day that he needed eight secretaries instead of his present three, and that even with those he doubted whether he could possibly inform himself adequately for his legislative duties and keep abreast of his non-legislative tasks. Yet it is obvious that some of these committee inquiries are far more important for the public weal than anything that can be accomplished this year in the way of new laws.

The list of the inquiries already under way is formidable. The Senate has committees at work upon the oil leases and Attorney General Daugherty, the Bok peace-prize contest and evidences of propaganda for reduced taxation and the bonus, the question of the recognition of Russia, the Alien Property Custodian, the conduct of the Philippine Government under General Wood, the Veterans' Bureau, the fertilizer industry, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the question of academic "diploma mills"; and is proposing to probe the aircraft scandals and the Shipping Board. The contest over the election of Senator Mayfield of Texas, while in a sense a routine matter, is likely to arouse nation-wide interest since it brings up the whole question of the Ku Klux in politics. The House, too, has its investigations, one of which is into the charge that a member of the Tariff Commission is through his family affiliated with the sugar industry. The Senate is also inquiring into the allegation that the Treasury juggled the figures as to the cost of the bonus; Senator La Follette is pressing for an inquiry into the transfer of the Alaskan coal reserve, and Senator Owen has proposed his inquiry—so vitally needed—into the origins of the war. Not to be outdone, President Coolidge is urging an inquiry into land grants, especially those of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and a joint committee will probably be appointed by House and Senate for this purpose. Nor is the end there, for new suggestions and requests for investigations come up almost every day.

Now this is, of course, not a new development of the functions of Congress; it is significant, however, because of the multitude of the inquiries under way, and because most of these investigations are into the activities of the executive branch of the government. Congress has recently come into the position of being militant defender of the public against acts of malfeasance on the part of the Executive. We have had many treatises on the dangerous encroachments by Congress upon the rights of the Executive—James Bryce devotes several pages to it—but in neither Bryce nor De Tocqueville is there any comment upon the power of Congress through its committees to keep watch over an executive and to reveal to the country at large the malfeasance of any of that executive's appointees. In the Ballinger case the congressional inquiry into what happened in the Interior Department under Mr. Taft wrecked that administration. If history is repeating itself now it is doing so in a way to bring home to the people a hundred times more vividly than ever before the service that Congress is always capable of rendering by the use of its powers to investigate the acts of officials. And if Congress should now go on and really investigate the prohibition-enforcement branch of the government and reveal the endless corruption there existing it would still further serve the country. For there is no doubt that that service is honeycombed with rottenness; that hundreds of law-enforcement agents are in league with the bootleggers and that this form of corruption runs through all official classes. If we are to have honest enforcement of the prohibition law such an inquiry of the present situation seems inevitable.

The use of parliamentary committees for such purposes is not altogether unknown abroad, but in England the great services of the parliamentary commissions constantly being appointed has been more constructive than inquisitorial. To some of the reports of these commissions the whole world owes a body of learning and of information of inestimable value. Few of our many inquiries have achieved as much in assembling facts and proposing solutions. The difference in purpose and procedure is perhaps explained by the inquisitorial powers possessed year in and year out by Parliament itself. We refer, of course, to the question-hour, to the right of any member of Parliament to ask a question, however foolish, of the head of a department, and to have that question answered on the floor of the House, unless the department affected declines to respond for reasons of public safety. No happening of recent years has so reinforced The Nation's contention that we should lose no time in similarly making our Cabinet responsible to Congress as have these oil scandals.

What a barrage of questions Mr. Denby, Mr. Daugherty, and Mr. Fall might have been subjected to at the time of the leases by Senator La Follette and Senator Walsh! We are inclined to think that the mere knowledge that any dissenting Progressive could immediately have cross-examined any of these gentlemen on the floor of the Senate as to his motives and reasons for thus transferring the domain of the people to individuals for exploitation and private enrichment would have prevented the transfer from being made—certainly in the secret and underhand way in which it was. The risk would have been too great to run. Instead of that we have to get at the facts through a committee at great cost of time and money, with all the accompaniments of a sensational exposure of untrustworthy public servants and at the expense of the transaction of other necessary public business. But if the country insists upon electing men of the caliber of Harding and Coolidge to the Presidency we shall continue to need an inquisitorial Congress, and shall continue to thank our lucky stars that we have men seated therein with the courage to investigate and the power to do so, whether the party machines and the Executive approve or not.

MacDonald vs. Poincaré

CAN international issues be debated frankly in public, by the prime ministers of countries at odds with each other, without stirring national passions to irrational defense and attack? That is the strange attempt which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is making in his correspondence with M. Poincaré, and M. Poincaré has replied without animosity. It is enough to recall the bitter arguments which used to occur behind closed doors between Mr. Lloyd George and his French opponents—arguments always followed by mendacious public announcements that the two governments were “in perfect harmony”—to realize the advance made by the publication of Mr. MacDonald’s public criticism of French policy.

It has come about [says Mr. MacDonald] that people in this country regard with anxiety what appears to them to be the determination of France to ruin Germany and to dominate the Continent without consideration of our reasonable interests and the future consequence to a European settlement; that they feel apprehensive of the large military and aerial establishments maintained not only in eastern but also in western France; that they are disturbed by the interest shown by your Government in the military organization of the new states in Central Europe. . . .

These are strong words for diplomacy. In the stilted school of European politics such courteous frankness was wont to be the accompaniment of a brutal ultimatum; when statesmen intended to maintain friendly relations they talked and wrote as if they agreed upon everything. That avoidance of real issues never helped the cause of peace. We might even wish that Ramsay MacDonald’s letter was franker than it is. “It is widely felt in England,” he says, “that France is endeavoring to create a situation which gains for it what it failed to get during the Allied peace negotiations.” This is a little blind, but M. Poincaré understood it well enough. “No reasonable Frenchman,” he answered, “has ever dreamed of annexing a particle of German territory or of turning a single German into a French citizen.” One might deduce from this that M. Poincaré had come to regard those who have supported his policies as unreasonable; or one might conclude that he understood the technique of modern imperialism, which does not bother to go through the form of “annexation” and refuses to grant citizenship rights to those whom it subjects.

The gist of Mr. MacDonald’s argument is in this fine statement of two clashing philosophies:

The French people desire philosophy, the British people cherish an identical ideal, but, whereas France conceives of security as security against Germany alone, the British Empire attributes to the words a far wider significance. What we desire is security against war. To my mind, the problem of security is not merely a French problem, it is a European problem, and one which interests alike England and Germany, Poland and Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary and Jugoslavia, Russia and Rumania, Italy and Greece.

Those are profound words, worthy of a great statesman. France will never have permanent security until Germany also is secure. No nation can be made secure by measures which, like all military measures, whether called “defensive” or not, threaten the security of other nations.

To that argument M. Poincaré made no direct reply; he simply restated the French position in terms of French particularism. France must have reparations and must have security, he said; her military and aerial establishments were exclusively defensive (the argument of Germany and of Russia before the war); she had made loans only “in exchange for positive pledges” from the allied nations of Central Europe; what was needed was a closer entente between France and England.

But the tone of the letter marked a real advance; if Mr. MacDonald and M. Poincaré publicly continue to debate courteously and frankly, and if the newspapers on both sides of the Channel will print their arguments, diplomacy may at last find public opinion in both countries ready to help it toward a settlement.

Toby, M.P.

THE “gaiety of nations”—whatever is left of it in these days—has not been eclipsed by the death of Sir Henry Lucy, but if he had been cut off in his prime the English people, at any rate, would have felt themselves to have lost an unfailing source of cheerful humor. The miracle of bringing forth sweetness out of the strong was rivaled when “Toby, M.P.,” distilled from the dulness of the House of Commons debates the sparkling draft of that Essence of Parliament which once a week revived the drooping spirits of readers of Punch. Lucy used to claim that he originated “lobbying” in the English sense of the word; that, as parliamentary representative of the Daily News, he was the first journalist to get into close personal contact with members and to glean from them material for comments on the political situation and for forecasts of impending events. But he will be most gratefully remembered as the writer of those genial and sprightly sketches of parliamentary proceedings in which he has had many imitators but no superiors.

Somehow, Lucy had discovered how to jump upon a man and leave him with a distinct sense of a favor conferred. Could anything be more cutting and yet less malevolent than this?

Disgusted alike with Whigs and Tories, Lord Stratheden and Campbell has formed a party of his own. Sometimes Stratheden is the leader and Campbell the follower. Sometimes Campbell leads and Stratheden is content to follow. But whichever peer is predominant, the unity of the party is never broken. Stratheden believes that since the days of Pitt there is no man who has a higher, clearer, and more patriotic notion of foreign policy than Campbell. Campbell, on his part, believes that, as far as home legislation is concerned, there is no man in Great Britain who for fulness of information, soundness of judgment, and readiness of resource equals Stratheden.

Whatever he might say about them, there were few British politicians who would not have preferred recognition by “Toby, M.P.,” in a pungent paragraph to eulogy in an editorial column of the Times. One of his practices was occasionally to put into the mouth of an M.P. some clever comment of his own, and there were beneficiaries of his who did not hesitate to profit by this kindly fiction. Lucy once told, for example, how Robert Lowe, when observing a deaf member get his ear-trumpet into position in order to listen to a tedious orator, remarked: “What a pity it is to see a man thus wasting his natural advantages!” It was the sort of thing that Lowe might have said, and Lowe has had the credit of it ever since, but the bon mot was really Lucy’s. One suspects, too, a similar origin for a story related by Lucy of James Lowther, then Secretary for Ireland. There was an Irish member named Synan with an ear-piercing voice. "Where are you going?" someone asked Lowther, who was rushing out of the House immediately on Synan's rising to speak. "On to the terrace to hear Synan," was the reply.

In his forty years in the press gallery Lucy did a great deal more than provide a humorous section for the papers to which he contributed. He helped to make the political leaders of his day living figures, instead of mere dummies, in the public mind, and to quicken popular interest in parliamentary institutions. His influence in this direction was not confined to the British Isles. In the Princeton University Library a student happened one day to come across a series of parliamentary sketches in an English magazine, appearing over the signature, "The Member for the Chiltern Hundreds." These papers first attracted and then fascinated him. They set him reading, thinking, and ultimately writing about the actual working of political systems. So it was Henry Lucy that gave Woodrow Wilson the impulse toward his life-work.

Toot! Toot!

OUR locomotive whistles are quite all wrong. At least a professor of physics in a university of the Middle West has reached the conclusion that the fairly low-pitched chime whistle that is usual on American railways is both ineffective and wasteful. A single high-pitched note would be better; also it should be placed in front of the locomotive instead of toward the rear, where the sound is checked and diverted by the smoke-stack and other paraphernalia.

With the second suggestion we have no quarrel, but we are prepared to break a lance or so in defense of the character of American locomotive whistles. The shrill, thin shriek for which the professor calls has long been familiar in Europe. Nothing else is heard on French or Belgian railways, and it is doubtless effective at short range or when not opposed by too much other sound. But unless physics has been reformed since we went to school a low note carries farther than a high one, and grade crossings—comparatively rare in Europe—are offensively common in America. They are indeed one of the chief reasons why every locomotive should have a good whistle, and to be effective for the purpose it ought to be hearable at least a mile away.

So far as waste goes, that aspect leaves us unmoved. It may be true, as the professor asserts, that American locomotives consumed 2,434,026 tons of coal a year just in tooting and that five million dollars might be saved annually by the adoption of shrill single-tone whistles. What of it? The saving would doubtless go into the pockets of stockholders who need the extra cash less than the whole country needs the romance and the music of the American locomotive whistle "as is." For say what you will—and admitting many exceptions—our locomotive whistles are both romantic and musical. One only needs to compare them with the harsh "Honk! Honk!" of the automobile to realize this. The original simple bulb horn was at least inoffensive; the bugle call that came later was beautiful; but the modern rasping honk sets on edge every musical response in one's body. We would not have such a transformation wrought in our locomotive whistles for all the coal in America. We like, when we cannot sleep at night, to listen to these whistles at a distance, picturing the locomotives themselves roaring through the darkness, their headlights blazing the tracks in front, their smoke-stacks thrusting up a shower of sparks into the sky. We recall especially the whistle of the engines on the Seaboard Air Line—a wailing note, rising and falling into a faint diminuendo—like a bloodhound following a scent or a lost soul ranging through purgatory. Not that we have ever heard either a bloodhound or a lost soul, but both have stirred our imagination, and so have these whistles of the Seaboard engines as they floated up out of a valley in the South in the night time.

Yes, the whistle of the locomotive symbolizes for us much of the romance of the age of steam. Ardent believers as we are in the suppression of unnecessary noise, we look with complacent tolerance upon the whistle of the railway engine even when it is used—as it generally is—somewhat unnecessarily and indiscriminately. Perhaps it could be made more effective, but we regard the locomotive whistle as we do the religion of our grandmother—not wholly scientific or up to date, perhaps, but fitting in its place and by no means to be disturbed.

The Marines on Teapot Dome

HOW and why a handful of armed marines were sent to Wyoming to clear the Teapot Dome Naval Reserve of trespassers on lands later turned over to Harry F. Sinclair was told in some neglected testimony before the Senate Committee by Captain George K. Shuler, the marine captain in charge of the adventure. This officer has since been elected treasurer of the State of New York, a rather sudden rise for a young captain of marines. It has been reported within the last few days that the order for the expedition, transmitted through General Lejeune, came from Assistant Secretary of the Navy Theodore Roosevelt, whose brother Archie was even then in the employ of Mr. Sinclair. Mr. Shuler has stated that after his return to Washington he received letters of praise and thanks from Albert B. Fall and Theodore Roosevelt. His testimony follows:

Q. Are you the officer who had charge of the squad of marines that went out to the naval reserve in the State of Wyoming during that year?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Upon whose order or direction did you go?

A. I went upon orders of the major general commandant of the Marine Corps, General Lejeune. I had instructions from him to confer with the Secretary of the Interior before I left.

Q. I wish you would tell the committee about your interview with General Lejeune and subsequently with the Secretary of the Interior.

A. On the 29th of July, 1922, I was asked by my commanding officer if I wanted to make a trip out to Wyoming, and I told him yes. And this was on a Saturday afternoon, about 2 o'clock. And he said: "General Lejeune wants to see you." So I went up to headquarters and the general said he had a rather delicate mission, and he thought I could carry it out for him. And he said that the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fall, was waiting over in his office and I should go over and talk to him. So I went right over. . . .

Q (interposing). Did General Lejeune tell you anything more in detail about the matter?

A. Not at that time. The general told me about the trip out to Casper, Wyoming, and he showed me where it was on a map, and that is about all the conversation we had then. I went over to the Interior Building, and the Secretary was waiting there, and I went in, and he said: "I have got a job for some marines. We have a naval reservation out in Wyoming, the Salt Creek country, and there is an oil company that is going in there and they are trespassing; that is, they are drilling a well," and he says, "We know that they have no rights there," and that he had called on the Secretary of the Navy to detail some marines to go out and drive them off. And he said that he had taken the matter up with the President that morning and that the President did not want to take this action because an officer of the company that was trespassing was a close personal friend and contributed to the campaign fund. And Mr. Fall told me he had told the President that his friend was a low-down S.O.B., and Mr. Fall said that the President told him that he supposed he was all that when he sent him his check, and Mr. Fall said that he told the President, "Mr. President, by God, he was." But he said the President finally consented, and that was why the marines were to go out. He said: "What would you do if they served an injunction on you, signed by a federal judge?"

I said: "Mr. Secretary, I have never seen an injunction in my life, and wouldn't know one if I saw it, and if they served one on me I would file it."

He said: "I guess you will get along all right out there." And he said he had made arrangements for Mr. Ambrose of the Bureau of Mines to accompany me, and that he had sent for Ambrose and expected him every minute. About that time Mr. Ambrose came in, and Mr. Fall asked me how soon I could go. I said: "Why, I can go immediately, as soon as I get some money." And after conferring with Ambrose, who had some reports to make up before he left, we arranged to leave on the same train the next day; that was Sunday.

I went back to the Marine Corps headquarters and told General Lejeune what the Secretary had told me; that is, I didn't repeat everything, but I told him in substance about the injunction, and the general asked me how many men I wanted. I told him if we were going out there and fight the whole State of Wyoming we probably would have to take quite a few, but if there wasn't going to be any fight I would not need anybody.

He said: "Well, you better take four or five men, and you can have anyone you want." So I told him I would take four, and gave him the names of some men down at the barracks that had been in the war with me and that I knew quite well. And they issued orders there for me to go.

The rest of the conversation was in regard to details regarding the subsistence of the men, and routine matters that we always have to take up before we start out. Those were the directions that I received.

Q. And what did you do?

A. I left Washington Sunday evening with Mr. Ambrose and these four men. Ambrose told me on the train—I had orders from General Lejeune that Mr. Ambrose would give me fuller details as we traveled along. And I was a little curious, and I asked Ambrose what it was all about. He told me that the Secretary of the Interior had made an agreement with the Sinclair oil people that they go into this reservation and to drill and take the oil out for the Navy. They had their pipe lines in there and their refineries and everything, and it would be a considerable expense to the Navy Department to put in their own line, and it was a good, solid proposition. It looked good to me. I thought it was a sensible thing.

And we traveled along and we got out to Cheyenne. There we met Mr. McInerney and Mr. Burt and Mr. Tough of the Bureau of Mines. And we took a train from Cheyenne to Casper. We got to Casper, and we met a Mr. Patterson and Mr. Carnahan of the Bureau of Mines. I was told that Patterson would show me where these trespassers were. I had orders to know where these people were; they were stated by name in my orders.

And we got to Casper about 7:30 in the morning and the Interior Department people had automobiles waiting for us. And we went out to the Salt Creek district, about forty miles. We got out there, and Mr. Patterson was driving the car I was in, and had two marines with me in the same car. He said: "There is your battlefield," and we got out of the car.

There was a rig up there, a drilling rig, operating, and they had built a barbed-wire fence around it; a fence about three or four feet high, inclosing about three-quarters or possibly an acre. The wire was new and bright; it had not been rained on, even. I went up to the fence and yelled out and asked where the boss was, and a man came over and said that he was Harry McDonnell, or O'Donnell. I said: "Do you represent the Mutual oil people?" He said he did. I said: "I am the commandant of this Navy district." I assumed that title, being the only representative of the Navy Department around there, and somebody had to be commandant, so I took the title. I said: "I have orders to stop the work in this part of the reservation." He says: "Well, I have orders to keep everybody outside of this fence." I said: "Well, I have orders here from the Secretary of the Navy that I think will supersede any orders you have." I said: "Do you realize that I am absolutely serious about this thing, and I am going to back up what I say?" He said "Yes." He looked at the marines; they had pistols and rifles and belts full of ammunition, and everything that goes with it. He said he thought we meant business. I said: "You have got to stop drilling." He said: "I can't give the order." I said: "Who is your boss driller?" So he called over a fellow named Harry Martin, and I said: "How long will it take you to stop this work?" He said: "Well, it all depends on what you want me to do."

Well, I hadn't had much experience in that line, so I conferred with Mr. Tough and Mr. McInerney and Ambrose, and they told me to write some orders that they told me would be sufficient to close up the rig. So I wrote them out and signed that as commandant of the Naval Oil Reservation No. 3, I think it was.

I said: "How long is it going to take you to carry that out?" He said: "Five minutes." I said: "I will give you ten."

So he went right in and stopped the rig from working, and Mr. Tough gave me a government seal, and Mr. Tough and I placed the seal on the line, and I was told by the Bureau of Mines representative that that seal was absolutely sacred; it was a government seal, and no one would disturb it. About that time the field superintendent of the Mutual Oil Company came along, and I told him what I had done. He was rather peeved, but wanted to know if he could take the small tools and things that might be stolen if they shut down. I told him he could take anything he wanted, just so he left the ground. So he got a truck and they started taking off the small stuff. And he wanted to know where we were going to eat. I told him we hadn't thought about that up to that time. He said: "Well, you better come over and have lunch with me." So we all did.

And I made arrangements with the Fenceland Oil Company that had a place right there to take these four men and give them their meals. And along the next day the superintendent of the Mutual reported they had taken off all the small stuff. So I posted notices on the fence, "No trespassing," and we stayed around there two days longer.

Of course, I reported by telegraph as soon as the operation ceased there, according to the instructions given by the general of the Marine Corps. And I went up to Salt Creek and made my headquarters there, with the Bureau of Mines people. And about two days later I sent the men back from Casper and I reported by telegraph that I considered the duty completed, and I went down to Denver.

SENATOR WALSH. That is all.

That is the story of the United States Marine Corps at the service of Harry F. Sinclair, by order of Albert B. Fall and Theodore Roosevelt, Jr.

Is Political Zionism Dead?

Yes

By ISRAEL ZANGWILL

(Ever since Israel Zangwill's famous speech in New York last fall, his opinions have been discussed by Jews and Gentiles the world over. In this article Mr. Zangwill presents his attack on the Zionist movement to readers of The Nation.)

THE Jewish problem lies now divided between Palestine and the Diaspora, and under the most favorable development of Palestine the scattered Jewries will long continue the overwhelmingly preponderant section as regards population. Palestine is a country little larger than Wales, from which French imperialism has already lopped off a northern slice, while Arab imperialism has robbed it of its extensibility eastwards; at the best it could barely shelter one-fourth of the sixteen million Jews of the Diaspora. Whether, therefore, the Jewish nationality, at present still permitted to evolve in Palestine, becomes the dominant influence upon the Diaspora, or vice versa, either a very little dog will wag a very large tail or a very large tail will wag a very little dog. It is true the situation may be modified if the Jewish republic now adumbrated in Russia, in the districts of Homel, Witebsk, and Minsk, really brings my own organization's ideal of an autonomous Jewish territory into being.

The picture of the Diaspora, mainly dark, comprises practically the whole globe. Jews are everywhere, and, though only 1 per cent of the population of the world, their finger is in every pie. But let me at once make the reservation that it is an individual finger thrust like little Jack Horner's into his Christmas pie for personal plums. Jewry is not a cosmos, but a chaos. The nearest approach to a unity is a unity of suffering over wide areas of Europe.

In every hell there is a lower deep; and starving Austrian anti-Semites talk gaily about what they call "tiger hunts." In Rumania the local Fascisti conspire and threaten to wipe out the whole Jewish population. In hapless Hungary, where economics seem at last to be teaching toleration, the Danube long was choked with Jewish corpses. In Poland it is unsafe for the Jew to enter a train, and the latest news from this beggar-on-horseback-among-countries is that any limited company has the right to refuse Jewish shareholders. Even in Turkey, land of immemorial Jewish toleration, the new Angora nationalism is reproducing all the economic chauvinism of Christendom; while a "Fascist" gang closes all Jewish shops on Friday, the Moslem Sabbath. "The Jewish National Home" itself is not free from pogroms. As recently as August 31 ten Jews were wounded at Tel-Joseph in an Arab affray. So far, the Jews of Japan have not been accused of the earthquake; but the ruin wrought by nature is less tragic than the ruin wrought by the hooligans of the Ukraine, where, in the grim language of the Chief Rabbi of the British Empire, "150,000 human beings were bayoneted, bombed, buried alive, drowned, thrown alive into lime pits, and subjected to the most diabolical tortures that only a Dantesque imagination could conceive." All Eastern Europe, in fact, is red with the trails of our bleeding fugitives. Mussolini demanded of Greece fifty million lire as compensation for a few murdered Italians. If we had the power to impose blood-money for our murdered, the financing of Palestine would become child's play.

National politics is the realm of might, and if, as Dr. Hertz warns us, the menace of massacre still lies over the whole Russian Jewry should the Soviet Government be overthrown, we must face the sad fact that Jewish might does not exist. We are like those children whose fate Thomas Hardy deplores in one of his novels, trailed helplessly hither and thither in the wake of drunken and improvident parents. Armed defense in the Ghettoes may do something to mitigate pogroms, but the only hope for the Jewish Diaspora, as for so many other racial minorities in the resurrected or parvenu countries created by the Treaty of Versailles, lies in the enforcement by the League of Nations of one of the few righteous sections of that treaty, the clause providing for the protection of minorities.

Sir Willoughby Dickinson, the president of the minorities' commission of the League of Nations Union, says that Great Britain regards the protection of the Jewish minorities as an especial aim. But this union has only moral power; and of political power the League of Nations itself has only a modicum. But however justifiable or practicable America may find isolation, it is otherwise with the Jews of the Diaspora, interlinked with every nation and doomed in every country to murder one another. No landless, faithless Jewry can maintain its being in the Diaspora unless so densely aggregated that it is almost on its own soil.

Of this species of nationalism, however, no pure example yet exists; it is only a tendency. New York's East Side comes nearest to it. But unless the East Side nationalists could be absolutely segregated from the general life in a close-barred Ghetto, they, and still more their children educated in the public schools, would be found responding to all the mass-emotions of the majority. So great is the power of place that not the most consuming passion for Palestine could swamp the influence of the actual seat of residence. It is that which molds the soul in the plastic years, and Russian and Rumanian Jews, even though Zionists and prosperous in other lands, have told me how acutely they suffer from the miseries and humiliations of Russia and Rumania, their whilom lands of persecution. A Jewish millionaire in Rumania has just left his estate of five and a half million dollars to Rumania; in the part of Rumania just annexed from Hungary a rabbi goes to prison for proclaiming himself a Magyar—while in Hungary itself the conversion of sixteen thousand Jews to Christianity in the last decade reveals rather their love of Hungary than of Christ. It is the American Jews from Lithuania that were the main factor in securing for their old home the port of Memel. And is it likely the American Jews from America will grow up less American?

Even as regards those East European aggregations where a "minority nationalism" is in order, it is foolish to imagine that any number of them could cohere in a political unity or that any one of them could be linked politically with Palestine. I believe that with the vanishing of the larger Zionist hope this sort of Diaspora nationalism has disappeared. It was formally repudiated by Dr. Weizmann in a speech at Boston, but as even he cannot control the hot-heads or the muddle-heads of his movement, let me say here to any Diaspora nationalists that may happen to be in America that if they mean seriously that they are not merely sentimental sympathizers with the Palestinian Jewry, as Irish-Americans are with Ireland, but that they are actual subjects of the Jewish National Home, they must naturally give up their American citizenship and all rights save those appertaining to resident aliens; a status which when proposed by a Belloc they are the first to cry out against. The tragic humor of the situation is that the Jewish nationalists could not even register themselves as Jews; the only national label open to them according to the British Mandate, Article 7, reinforced by the White Paper, Clause 4, is "Palestinians," a label which they share with the Palestine Arabs and Christians.

Again, every acknowledged citizen of a state claims the protection of that state wherever he may be. But I cannot find in the British Mandate any obligation to safeguard self-proclaimed Palestinians in the Diaspora. Do they perhaps suppose the Arabs of Palestine will goad Britain to their rescue? But absentee patriotism is at best no admirable form of that virtue. The only way of being a Zionist is to be in Zion. There is to be no Jewish state in Palestine—only a development of the Jewish nationality previously existing in Palestine. That was formally laid down in the Churchill-Samuel White Paper, and as formally accepted by the Zionist leaders. My monition at the great Balfour meeting that Mount Zion in labor must not produce a mouse has been disregarded.

The whittling down of even the semi-Zionism conceded by the Balfour Declaration is the sole justification—apart from money drives—of the continuance of the Zionist organization in the Diaspora, but I fail to see how those who accept this White Paper or white-feather Zionism can continue to call themselves Zionists, unless they join the existing Jewish community in Palestine.

The world's contempt for the Jew is not wholly undeserved. A people, a faith, in so parlous a situation, lives not under peace conditions but under war conditions, and the standard of duty exacted from every Jew is not a peace standard but a war standard. How high that was you know from the summits of sacrifice to which American Jews, no less than American Christians, rose in the late war. To this war standard a small minority of Jews have lived up—or are now trying to live up. But even the faithful few have not done enough. As for the vast majority of Jews, there is not even a peace standard of communal obligation or solidarity. A traveler, Mr. J. Cohen Lask, lately returned from Poland, gives us a picture of Polish Jewry with its multiplicity of Bundists, Zeire-Zionists, Poale-Zionists, Communists, Volkists, Yiddishists, Agudists, and Mizrachists, culminating in a plague of Wonder-Rabbis, each with its own adherents—and Palestine is perhaps more split up than the Diaspora.

It is because Zionism which came to revitalize the Jew lost, like Christianity, its first rapture of sacrifice and sincerity, that it finds itself today in the dismal political situation which evoked at the recent Carlsbad Congress the belated resolutions against the Mandatory of Palestine. When at that congress the Polish Deputy, Grünebaum, declared so passionately that autocracy must not reap what democracy has sown, he forgot that there was nothing for autocracy to reap except the possibility of more sowing. This sounds like an Irish bull, but indeed the whole debate had a farcical element, for the Agency possesses, under the Mandate, no political power whatever, and indeed is held by the Zionist organization only on governmental sufferance and on the express condition that it rally round it "all Jews who are willing to assist in the establishment of the Jewish National Home." For the Zionist Congress therefore to spend heated days discussing whether it should or should not share with others the power which it did not possess, and which even if it did possess it had no power of withholding from them, is a measure of the unreality to which Zionism is now reduced. The further protest of the Carlsbad Congress against the restriction of immigration brings to light another political flaw that may well be fatal. "Immigration," says the White Paper, "will not exceed the economic capacity of the country at the time to absorb new arrivals." But nobody really knows what is the absorbing capacity of a country. The protest of the real Zionist Congress—the one assembled at Tel-Aviv—shows that those on the spot feel that despite the unemployment there is room for more. But, as Moussa Kazim el Hussein, the chief of the Arab Opposition, observed with crushing logic in a letter to the London Times, "if Palestine is to be really a 'home' for the Jews, they must be masters there." A measure of autonomy is, you see, a sine qua non of colonization, indeed of any work, if it is not to be interrupted in the middle.

In the work of the Jewish Territorial Organization, which aimed at a Jewish National Home anywhere "on an autonomous basis," I was soon confronted with this problem. On the one hand, the self-styled practical men, who are the great bunglers of the world, shied at demanding autonomy. On the other hand, every country I approached boggled at conceding it to the Jews even when they possessed enormous unpeopled territories. Carlyle said the population of England was 30,000,000, mostly fools. I discovered the population of the world was 1,650,000,000, mostly dogs in the manger. Not that they would not part with the land; only Jews must turn into them. But coming down to bed-rock, my organization found that the absolute minimum of autonomy was the right to control one's immigration. Without that one was building upon sand, or on soil politically volcanic.

Mr. Herbert Samuel, when he was originally sent to spy out the land of Zion, before being created a knight and a governor, brought back the report that Lebanon, a district of the same character as Palestine, carried, per square mile, three times its population, and that therefore Zionism was a practicable policy. A more naive report was never made by a statesman of experience, and one can only suppose that this admirable ex-Home Secretary of a civilized country was, like the distinguished chemist, Weizmann, entirely out of his element in coping with politics in the rough, and countries in the making. He might as well have reported that Ireland, a country of the same general character as England, carried only a population one-sixth as dense, and that therefore a great Jewish colonization could be established in Ireland.

Though, as the London Times admits, in the stress and confusion of the war the right hand of the British Government did not always know what the left hand was giving away, and the same territory may have been promised to rival applicants, yet I am sure England did not issue the Balfour Declaration merely as a war maneuver, but sincerely meant to solve the Jewish problem by the establishment of a Jewish state. No, though the Balfour Declaration has been reduced to a scrap of White Paper, Balfour was unquestionably sincere. He had long toyed with the Jewish problem. If his statesman-like conception has been reduced to its lowest possible meaning, the blame lies first with the military administration of Palestine, brazenly overruling the home Government, and with our British permanent officialdom, whose function it is to curb the generous impulses of their transient and embarrassed chiefs, and to express the honorable indiscretions of ministers in language which does not so much conceal as cancel them. The fact that no Zionist protest was made at any point on the road to political ruin, combined with the feeble handling of the situation in Palestine itself by the Jewish Governor, precipitated the fiasco of political Zionism.

The truth is that there is a joint British-Jewish interest in Palestine, without which the officialdom of the Foreign Office would have strangled the Balfour Declaration even before birth; and this joint interest, as Herzl who loved England, admired her colonizing capacity, and placed his financial base in London perceived, was the best guaranty of Jewish renaissance in Palestine.

In some respects it might have been better had France and England frankly divided Syria between them as legitimate spoil of war, leaving the Jewish people, whose fate is bound up with the growth of world truth and world justice, unentangled with the ambiguous device of mandates and the dubious justice of peace treaties. There is, however, one surpassing advantage in being under the League of Nations and not nakedly under Britain—that it is a protection to non-British Jews living in such countries as are liable to come into clash with Britain. Imagine the situation of the mildest non-British Zionist in war time if he were supposed to be building up an enemy colony. That is why, imperfect as is the League of Nations, to Zionism it is indispensable. That is why Zionism cannot afford to become the blind and obsequious agent of any Power. At the same time it is unfair that Zionism shall fail to receive from the British Government, still less from our British yellow press, any acknowledgment that its presence is of value to Britain or even to world civilization.

I shall always remain persuaded that a Jewish state was possible at the moment when the Arab was a defeated enemy, liberated from the Turk and glad enough to take on any political impress; that by a policy of racial redistribution such as is now in operation between the Greeks and the Turks under the Treaty of Lausanne, combined with full compensation for expropriated land, the difficulty of making a home out of a territory in which we are only one out of every nine inhabitants and in which our total holding of the soil is still below 4 per cent, could have been largely removed. I shall always believe that at the critical moment the Zionist leadership failed in nerve and will-power. But the hour of destiny has passed. A great moment found, as Herzl had foreboded, a small people.

An expropriation policy, tolerable in the immense tragedy of the war, would be inadvisable today. Think of the world-jungle in which the little Jewry nestles. All countries civilized enough to have chemists and inventors are busy preparing to destroy the remnants of civilization. We are menaced with the possibility of all life being driven underground. Lloyd George reminded us recently that there are ten million more men under arms in Europe than before the "war to end war." Both France and England have the right under their Mandates to raise local militia for the defense respectively of Syria and Palestine and, moreover, to use their ports and railways for the passage of their own troops and munitions of war. Who would throw a match into such a powder factory as the globe has become?

No, not only must all the forces of Israel be mobilized against "the next war," but we must forego our political hopes in Palestine rather than kindle a conflagration which may ravage the whole world. It is true, as even the White Paper concedes, the Carlsbad Congress may take its grievances to the League of Nations. But who believes either that the League of Nations has the power to coerce England or that England will abandon Palestine to the enterprise of France or the lethargy of the Arab? No, Dr. Weizmann has received the freedom of New York; he cannot obtain the freedom of Jerusalem.

Political Zionism is dead. All organizations cling to life, especially when they own funds. But humanity must not become a parasite on its own machinery, and the proudest will must sometimes acknowledge honorable defeat. The Arab race, with millions of square miles to draw on for its renaissance, has shown no spark of magnanimity, although Jewish love, Jewish medical assistance, and Jewish gold have been pouring almost recklessly in its direction. But the case of the Palestine Arabs must be conceded in so far as it is reasonable. By the Balfour Declaration they were promised no prejudice to their civil or religious rights. But as they had already enjoyed a parliamentary status under the tyrant Turk, their refusal to accept the proposed Crown Colony arrangement, their demand for a constitution in Palestine, though probably only an agitation engineered by a Christian minority and the intriguing agents of another Power, is not without some basis. There must be a conference between Arab and Jewish leaders to settle the conditions of peace.

Money must indeed be poured into Palestine, but it will be poured in to much better purpose when the representatives of all pro-Zionist parties have got together so as not to get in one another's way. The Palestine Government, too, must raise its promised loan to develop the resources of the country and Britain must at once, according to the terms of her Mandate, encourage "in cooperation with the Jewish Agency close settlement by Jews on the land, including state lands and waste lands not required for public purposes."

A world congress for our world affairs, Zionism included, would leave no excuse to any Jew of remaining unrepresented in it, unless his solution of the Jewish question was dissolution. The concerns of the Diaspora are all the more important because Zionism, which came to demolish it, has strengthened its foundations.

America stands at the parting of the ways, suffering from the same post-war tendency to violence as Europe, tending to take, as Europe has taken, the wrong turning. And if Europe has taken the wrong turning, it may be that the mission of the Jew is to help America to take the right one.

Zionism—Alive and Triumphant

By CHAIM WEIZMANN

(Dr. Weizmann is at present in the United States in the interests of the Zionist movement. He has chosen to make his answer to Mr. Zangwill in the form of a discussion of the hope that lies in the Zionist ideal and of the solid achievements of the Palestine colonists.)

OF all the concepts which are associated with the Jewish problem and the outstanding effort which is being made toward its solution, perhaps none has become involved in obscurer controversy than "political Zionism." So keen and even acrimonious have the debates become that the doctrine which this phrase inadequately represents has been torn out of its setting of history and reality, like a sentence wrenched out of its context, and has become a sort of Ding an sich, a self-inclosed system of ideas, or, better still, an incantation, capable of effecting a wonderful transformation in the relationship of Palestine to the Jewish people.

Yet political Zionism can no more be dissociated from practical affairs than law from natural process. For us there is only Zionism—and "cultural Zionism," "practical Zionism," "political Zionism" are only convenient figures of speech, arbitrary approaches or methods of discussion. To talk of political Zionism as something which the Zionist can either accept or deny is to talk of granting permission to two and two to make four. Political Zionism is not something outside of the process of building up a homeland in Palestine which may be added to that process or withheld from it. It is inherent in every step. Every affirmative act in the creation of a Jewish center in Palestine is political.

Political Zionism, in brief, is the creation of circumstances favorable to Jewish settlement in Palestine. The circumstance most favorable to Jewish settlement in Palestine is the existence of a Jewish settlement in Palestine. The larger the Jewish settlement the greater the ease with which it can be increased, the less the external opposition to its increase; the smaller the Jewish settlement in Palestine the more difficult its increase, the more obstinate the opposition.

One does not create political Zionism by affirming it, any more than one destroys it by denying it. Men who have never heard the phrase, and others who have combated it, have been political Zionists. Those first pioneers of nearly half a century ago, who went out to Palestine and founded the first modern colonies, who laid the foundations of the still small but flourishing Jewish settlement, were actually the founders of political Zionism. They built up positions, they furnished proof of the practicality of the scheme, they gave the most convincing demonstration of the will behind the demand; their work, whatever they intended, reached beyond the immediate achievement and beyond the Jewish people. The world respects the settlements in Palestine more than all the protestations of the Jews.

Those who believe, or who affect to believe, that some sort of system can be devised whereby Palestine can be "given" to the Jewish people are talking of a Zionism which is not political but metaphysical. A country is not a thing done up in a parcel and delivered on demand. England can no more "give" Palestine to the Jews than it can give them history or a culture. All that England can do—and is making serious efforts to do—is to create conditions whereby the Jews cannot "take" Palestine but can grow into it again, by a natural and organic process.

England could not even give Palestine to the Jews if that country were entirely uninhabited. It could permit Jewish immigration "as of right and not on sufferance"—which is precisely what it is doing now. The rest is in the hands of the Jewish people. That Jewish immigration into Palestine should be recognized as being "of right and not on sufferance" is the triumph of political Zionism. The preamble to that part of the British Mandate over Palestine which says: "Whereas recognition has been given to the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine and to the grounds for reconstituting their National Home in that country," is the triumph of political Zionism. This recognition is not British alone, but is common to all the nations which combined to give the Mandate, and to America, which indorsed the essential part of the Mandate in a special resolution.

But the idea that England should "give" Palestine to the Jews is particularly crude and Utopian when it is linked up with the suggestion of expropriation or removal of the Arabs. Fortunately no such suggestion has ever come from a responsible Zionist leader. For apart from its inherent impracticality and immorality, the idea again betrays a complete dissociation from the realities of the situation. England would not commit such an act even if the Jewish people were to demand it. And the Jewish people would not demand it because it realizes that, in laying the foundations of its old-new home, it must not tolerate even a suspicion of faith in those vicious imperialist principles which have been the source of half its woes.

If there is any significance at all in the rebuilding of a Jewish homeland, it must be made evident first in the attitude of the Jewish people toward the nations in the midst of which that homeland is being built. Friendliness with the Arabs is not simply a matter of convenience or expedience; it is a cardinal doctrine; it is an essential part of the Jewish outlook, an aspect of the spiritual dream which the Jewish homeland is to embody. If we reject the vicious shifts and tricks of what is inaccurately called Realpolitik it is not only because of its essential stupidity and ineffectiveness, but because our entire history has been a living protest against it. To solve one problem by the creation of two others is a method which is not unapproved in the world of practical men. Perhaps it pays in the case of fly-by-night nations, though even most of these live long enough to witness the undoing of their practical wisdom. In the case of the Jews, who are, as it were, a permanent institution, there is a reputation to be cherished and maintained. Nor is Jewish-Arab cooperation a new concept. The ideal already has an illustrious history. It is not so long ago—as history, and particularly Jewish history, goes—that Jews and Arabs worked hand in hand from Granada to Bagdad in founding and spreading one of the most brilliant civilizations; when the rest of Europe was still steeped in the dark slumber of the Middle Ages, Spain, Mesopotamia, and Northern Africa were brightly illumined by a great Arab Jewish culture. That culture has never disappeared; it survived, transmuted and disguised, in the Renaissance to which it contributed generously; its unacknowledged issue today forms part of our Western civilization.

For I would make it clear that the primal appeal of the Jewish homeland in Palestine is spiritual. Zionism cannot solve immediately, it can only relieve to some extent, the Jewish world problem. If Palestine were empty today, if it could absorb fifty thousand immigrants a year (and by the way these two conditions are not supplementary: an empty Palestine could not absorb Jews more rapidly than Palestine as it is), it would still fail to solve the problem of eight million of Jews subject to the moods and caprices of unfriendly surrounding nations. But even at that the refugee problem in its relation to Palestine has another aspect. Our plea to the Western world to open its gates to the persecuted Jews loses much of its cogency if that part of the problem which is in our own hands remains unsolved. When we are sending as many refugees into Palestine as that country can absorb, we have a double claim on the sympathy of the world.

One must not, of course, talk of "sending Jews into Palestine" as though this were purely an arithmetical problem. Jews "sent to Palestine" cannot stay there unless they can be absorbed healthily into the economic life of the country. Preparation must be made for every Jew who wishes to enter Palestine. In the last three years we have sent over thirty thousand Jews into the country. Tens of thousands more await the opportunity to enter it. They cannot be admitted pell-mell and at random, lest the emigration from Palestine finally counterbalance the immigration into it. And by preparation we mean of course the growth and development of the country's resources and the integration of newcomers with its economic life. Money is needed for this task; but we need equally a sense of organic construction. Restriction of immigration into Palestine has nothing to do with political conditions. Given the means we could double and treble the immigration, though we must understand that even unlimited means would not enable us to ship a hundred thousand Jews a year to Palestine. It takes time for a small country like Palestine to digest and assimilate fifteen or twenty thousand newcomers.

It would be false to see the ultimate possibilities of the Zionist experiment in terms of Palestine alone. The peculiar position of Palestine fits it to play a role of extraordinary importance in the Near East—a role which it has already entered on. The development of Palestine is the key to the development of a vast territory once the most fruitful in the world, today cut off from the centers of civilization and given over to neglect and decay. Unfortunately hunger is impatient, and the immense resources of the Mesopotamian hinterland are neglected because they cannot be developed in a day. Yet the first steps toward this development have already been taken. The linking up of Bagdad with Haifa is the tangible evidence. The carrying of mail in seven hours between these two points—separated hitherto by three and a half weeks of laborious traveling; the immediate prospects of a railway track which will carry freight back and forth in three days, these are both symbols and achievements. Their creation was made possible only with the awakening of Palestine by Jewish enterprise, and Jewish enterprise is perhaps destined to play an exceedingly important part in the economic reconstruction of the Near East.

Yet I must repeat that if the question of the Jewish refugee gives a new spur to the Zionist effort, it is not and never was the primal motive. There was something more affirmative behind the first stirrings of the movement—and that something became more coherent and self-conscious as the movement gathered momentum and power. Zionism envisages more than the negative relief of suffering, more than philanthropic effort, and Palestine to the Zionist was never merely a last desperate opportunity to escape the persecution of the world. Indeed, whatever fortuitous co-operation there has been between anti-Semitism and Zionism, it would be quite wrong to make the two interdependent. The Jew does not depend on anti-Semitism for his existence, and Zionism is the strongest expression of the Jewish will to live.

The hope and lure of Palestine, its special appeal to the Zionist, lay in the authentic Jewish life and culture which could again develop there, after an interruption of twenty centuries. The concept of Jewish culture—and even Jewish culture in Palestine—has too often been of a "literary" nature. It is true that Zionist effort has succeeded in reviving the Hebrew language so that throughout an entire public-school and high-school system Hebrew is the language of tuition, so that Jewish children again use Hebrew as their natural medium. It is equally true that within a few months the Hebrew University is to be opened. It is equally true that concomitant with the Zionist renaissance there has come an extraordinary resurgence of Hebrew poetry—certainly the finest we have produced since the time of the Spanish singers—and perhaps the finest since the days of the Hebrew prophets. But culture must not be dissociated from life, and when we talk of a renewed Jewish culture, an authentic Jewish culture, in Palestine, we are not talking only of schools and literary people.

A civilization is whole and complete. The Jewish village in the valley of Jizreel, the Jewish cooperative colony under the shadow of Mount Hermon, the Jewish merchants of Tel-Aviv and Jerusalem, the young men and women who are building roads and draining marshes—these are, after all, the material of the new Jewish culture. These people, working in a world of their own, from clean and unspoiled beginnings, are apt to produce that now forgotten value—the purely Jewish culture. In all other countries, in all other colonies, the Jew comes to add and to adapt. He is nowhere free to be himself; he must be that which an established civilization will permit him to be. With the best will in the world a nation welcoming the Jew cannot remove the tacit pressure and demand of its civilization and culture on the individuality of the Jew. But in Palestine the Jew can, for the first time since his dispersion, enter again into direct relation with his foundations. No one there stands between him and the first principles of life. He is back on the soil in every sense of the word: it would perhaps be better to say that he is back on the earth.

It is idle to speculate as to the forms which Jewish life in Palestine will take in two or three generations from now. To say that the Jew will give this or that to the world, as the result of a restoration of Palestinian Jewish life, is to indulge in vicarious generosity. We must say frankly that we cannot foresee the end of the experiment. We can only say that its beginnings are extraordinarily auspicious, that all circumstances combine to convince us of the value of the effort, that the vitality and richness of the Jewish people precludes the fear that the final product will be either commonplace or meaningless. Given a chance to be himself, the Jew will certainly not serve the world less than when forced to be everybody but himself. And that restoration to himself implies, too, the rehabilitation of his reputation in his own eyes and in the eyes of the world.

The Scandal Fisheries

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE oil inquiry has developed into a multitude of general fishing expeditions for all the scandals of any and all sorts that may infest the Washington waters. If any Senator thinks that by casting a hook into this or that subject he may be able to pull up a disgraceful or a politically useful incident, he brings in a resolution for an inquiry committee equipped with a hook and the power of issuing subpoenas, and hardly any Senator dares to vote against it. To hesitate to inquire is to confess to being a rogue. To speak to a person who is the object of an inquiry is to confess to being an accomplice in his sinfulness. To send him a telegram, hoping, perhaps, that he, after all, may be innocent of the charges brought against him, is to prove oneself as guilty as he. Senators in inquiries ask such questions as: "How many blocks from your hotel was the defendant's house?"

To live near a defendant becomes dangerous. To think that he may be innocent and to try to help him to prove his innocence becomes incriminating. To believe that an accused person should ever do anything but plead guilty and retire from public life becomes an indication of membership in the plunderbund.

This state of mind in Washington (and it exists deeply and widely and permeatingly through Washington) would be taken by Ralph Waldo Emerson as the strongest possible proof of inward corruption festering in the town and occupying its whole structure and impelling it to instant cowardice under any accusation directed from any source at any personage. Emerson held to the view, and expressed it, that fear is a vulture that lives only where there is carrion. In that view Washington must be all carrion. The outward aspect of Washington to the country is scandal. The striking and significant internal aspect of it is fear, terror, panic, and an almost universal inclination to run whenever the finger of a new inquiry throws its shadow upon a friend.

In the midst of this panic two hardy mariners from the Republican side of the village have determined that the gaining of a livelihood on the boisterous waves of the scandal fisheries shall not be confined to their Democratic neighbors and shall not be monopolized by the robust scions of our leading Democratic families. These two ambitious and vengeful characters—Attorney General Daugherty and Republican National Committee Chairman Adams—are now about to sail out on the foggy banks where the largest scandals are caught and they intend to come home with wriggling Democratic scandals filling their ships to the gunwales.

The reader of the daily news put on the wires from Washington during the next few weeks will have a clue to an understanding of his reading if he realizes that now at last there are two really rival firms in the scandal- and suspicion-fishing business. One firm consists of numerous Democrats, with their homes especially in the Senate. The rival firm might reasonably have been expected to exist of Republican senators. No Republican senators formed themselves, however, into any association for prosecuting the business. The Republican President himself did not rise either to make any fervent defense of accused Republicans or to organize any fervent attack upon accusable Democrats. It was in these circumstances, and it was during this situation, that Senator Wheeler of Montana launched his resolution for an inquiry into Mr. Daugherty.

What lies back of Senator Wheeler's attitude and action has not been realized by the public. Senator Wheeler, as a United States prosecuting attorney in Montana during the hysterics of war time, drew back from putting people into jail on charges which superficially had to do with an alleged opposition to the war, but which basically had their origin in the opposition of these people to the industrial managers and masters of Montana.

Wheeler was not willing to see the United States Department of Justice used as an agency of class warfare by the top people against the bottom people. The Department of Justice, on the other hand, under the Democratic Attorney General, A. Mitchell Palmer, and subsequently under the Republican Attorney General, Harry M. Daugherty, was perfectly willing, and perhaps perfectly conscientiously willing, to be an agency for supporting the industrial ins and ups against the industrial downs and outs.

Wheeler, when he ran for United States Senator, was supported by the railroad trade unions. Daugherty, as United States Attorney General, tried to break the shop-craft railroad trade unions in 1922 with an injunction.

Behind the resolution of Wheeler for inquiring into Daugherty lies the struggle of the industrially mastered to raise their heads against those whom they believe to be not only employing them but exploiting and subjugating them.

Wheeler brought numerous charges against Daugherty, reflecting not indeed any theory as to his being an ally of capital against labor, but reflecting strongly a firm theory as to his being personally dishonorable and dishonest.

At that point the whole scandal pageant in Washington broke into a new departure. Daugherty happens to be personally a man of physical and nervous courage. He sought the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Mr. John T. Adams. Adams happens also to have physical and nervous courage abundantly. Against the Eastern aggregated wealth of his party he has refused, for instance, to be for the League of Nations. A conservative, a tory, he has resisted all the pressures of the Eastern conservative tory element in his party for American participation in the Treaty of Versailles. In this respect he stands with those other tory but anti-League and anti-Versailles characters, Senator Brandegee of Connecticut and Senator Moses of New Hampshire.

Adams is a hard-boiled Republican, a hard-boiled American, and a hard-boiled man. Consulting with Attorney General Daugherty, he determined that there were just as many Democratic fish in the scandals seas as there could possibly be Republican fish and he determined to get out his hooks and nets and catch the Democratic ones.

So far he has tied to the Democratic Secretary of the Navy Daniels the alleged horrid crime of originating the policy of leasing naval oil reserve lands to private persons. He also has tied to the Democratic Secretary of the Interior Payne the alleged equally horrid crime of rendering the drilling of naval oil reserves necessary by authorizing the sinking of private wells in the general public domain on the edges of the special naval oil reserves. Day by day and week by week he will go further into the Democratic records and endeavor further to prove that Democrats are the sanctioning godfathers of Republican scandals.

Daugherty meanwhile also intends not only to try to prove himself innocent, but also to try to prove a lot of Democrats abominably guilty. The news of the next few weeks will exhibit the results of this sort of intention and of this sort of quality in him. The Democratic Party will struggle in the net and bleed from the gaff, along with the Republican Party, because it just happened that two certain Republicans—Adams and Daugherty—were by the chemical composition of their blood, or something, unterrified by storms and disposed to take their chances with the hardest and most adventurous Democrats in discovering any and all fish that any depths in Washington may conceal. Mr. Adams and Mr. Daugherty will be the ablest destroyers of the Democratic Party and unintentionally the ablest creators of a new one.

British Labor at Work

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, February 15

THE first Labor Government contains few surprises of any notable kind. Lord Chelmsford, a Conservative Viceroy of India, becomes First Lord of the Admiralty, but those who remembered his association with Indian constitutional reform and his chairmanship of the Miners' Welfare Fund were prepared for his change of view. It is a dramatic Cabinet. It is right and fitting that Sidney Webb should sit on the Treasury bench; he made the Labor Party, and he has mind enough and knowledge enough to fit any dozen officers in the state. Lord Olivier and Lord Haldane are men of vast administrative experience. Lord Thomson is that contradiction in terms, a soldier capable of statesmanship. Mr. Wheatley brings to the Ministry of Health courage and vision and a knowledge of the housing problem second to none in the country. The Ministry outside the Cabinet contains many men of first-rate caliber—Robert Richards in the India Office, Arthur Greenwood at the Ministry of Health, Morgan Jones at the Board of Education. With Miss Bondfield at the Ministry of Labor, the revolution begun by the Franchise Act of 1918 takes a new turn; and one hopes that Mr. MacDonald will be bold enough to find room for her presently in the Cabinet. Presently, too, Mr. Morel ought to be in the Government and Mr. Tawney—the Platonic philosopher in politics—and Miss Susan Lawrence. The Prime Minister has chosen well in a complex situation. There are one or two doubts, and one or two names whose presence I find inexplicable. But every Prime Minister has these difficulties, and I hazard the guess that no Cabinet in our generation has represented so solid or so varied an experience.

Above all, there is MacDonald himself. Friendship always makes judgment a matter of difficulty. But I think these last weeks have made it broadly realized in England that MacDonald is a national asset. It is not only that he has vision and courage. He has a knowledge of Europe to which no other English statesman can pretend. He has a sense of his mission, a power to measure his responsibilities, a love of humble men and the happiness of humble men. Given the chance, I think no other statesman so likely to appease the hatreds of a weary Europe. His judgment is cool, his mind a balanced mind. He has already won the devoted loyalty of his colleagues; and he has struck a new note in the House of Commons. You feel there that members are no longer playing a game; they are set to the solution of problems.

His program was announced on Tuesday. Inevitably, it has disappointed many; but you cannot produce the co-operative commonwealth like a rabbit from a conjurer's hat. Russia is recognized; and in that righting of a great wrong Labor has, as is just, been the first of the Allied Powers to herald a new dawn. With Russia once more in the family of nations, we may hope, not merely for the rebuilding of economic relationships, but, what is even more urgent, the interchange of ideas. Russia has a great experience to bring us; we have, I think, something to contribute to her. At least the barriers between us are down, and the feverish dreams of Mr. Winston Churchill can now affect only the squires and old ladies for whom they are so fitted.

But relations with France are the crux. MacDonald moves cautiously. Dexterity has already solved the problem of the Cologne railways; and France has been made to withdraw her shameful support of the Separatists in the Palatinate. The rest turns on two things. The report of the Expert Commissions is the basis upon which MacDonald must build; and his task will not be made easier by the fact that your internal problem has, I suppose, made the Republicans look askance at adding to the burden they must bear by European commitments. The fall in the franc may make France less unreasonable; and discussion may produce a European conference—with Germany and the neutrals—for the revision of Versailles. Italy certainly will go forward on that road, and, I think, Belgium would take the occasion to separate from France if the latter proved obdurate. With patience and skill MacDonald has the right to hope that he can get France out of the Ruhr. If he can do that he can move directly to a European settlement.

At home, the two immediate issues are housing and unemployment. On the first, the Ministry of Health is formulating a program which will look to 120,000 houses a year at a rent of nine shillings a week. It will not be easy. The building rings are powerful, and the Liberals do not welcome the notion of more taxes for the benefit of the poor. But the unions are at one with Mr. Wheatley; and it will be very difficult for any party to oppose a solid scheme. On unemployment, there is to be a great extension of credit facilities, on which Mr. Webb's plans are almost ready; the gap in unemployment insurance relief is to be abolished; certain constructive works are to be taken in hand. In education, the size of classes is to be immediately decreased, there is to be larger expenditure on meals for school children, an increase in the free places in secondary schools, and in scholarships to the universities. These are already under way. It is hoped, too, to improve the treatment of prisoners, especially by a scheme of prison education, and to revise the system of defending poor prisoners. I ought to put on record here the magnificent spirit in which the civil service has cooperated with the new Government. It has worked with a zest that has encouraged the ministers greatly, and the removal of the shadow of Geddesism has given the best men a new hope in their work.

Imperial preference was killed by the election; it will be decently interred next month by a free vote of the House of Commons. We are not to have a particularist empire within a tariff wall. In a similar spirit, Singapore is to go; and with its disappearance there will, one hopes, be a new spirit in the attitude to disarmament. The Government will, in that same spirit, demand the admission of Germany and Russia to the League of Nations. It proposes to seek the transformation of that timid instrument into a powerful lever. It believes that the League can only win the confidence of the world by being made the center of consistent enterprise. It will not use the Council of Ambassadors. It will insist that the League function in all disputes; and, in the light of the past, it will urge that no disputes are of a non-justiciable kind. We will not have more Corfus if MacDonald can help it.

I have said no word, as yet, of India. That is not going to be an easy problem. The release of Mr. Gandhi was a good beginning; but if the Swarajists are going simply to block administration in the legislatures, the parliamentary situation here will make it impossible for Lord Olivier to move leftward. We in the Labor Party are all agreed that the truest path to Dominion Home Rule for India is such creative use of the present reforms as will permit the acceleration of the period of revision. There will be much less tendency under Lord Olivier to overrule Indian judgment; and, I hope, a new attitude to the Kenya problem. But if the Nationalists refuse a gesture of friendship to Labor, it will be impossible to advance on the present system. I believe myself that Mr. Gandhi is too wise not to see that he is presented with a new and great opportunity.

But, of course, all this depends on whether the Labor Government can retain the confidence of the House of Commons. Obviously, that is not going to be easy since it depends upon what the Liberals will do. And if Mr. Asquith's first gesture is an index to his attitude, he is going to make it as difficult as he can for the Labor Government. He wants to show the country that he is the real master of the House of Commons; and his attack on Poplarism—which he showed a signal inability to understand—proved clearly that his mind still lingers about mid-Victorian economic conceptions. The Government is certainly not going to make itself the creature of his will. It will not resign merely because he maneuvers defeat on details; the challenge must be a frontal attack. How and when that will come lies on the knees of the Gods. I can only assure American radicals that when it comes it will be faced boldly and with no desire to avoid the larger issues. And, in the meantime, we shall inquire into the whole problem of the national debt; we shall revise the present iniquitous poor-law system; we shall gain experience of administration by the actual exercise of power.

For the Labor Party realizes more than any other that this is the critical time of parliamentary institutions. If we can so comport ourselves as to win popular confidence we can hope, after the next election, for a majority that will enable us to take great strides toward great measures. If the Liberal Party tries to prevent our effective functioning, it will convince innumerable people now full of hope that the supporters of the existing regime are not at bottom prepared for its revision in constitutional terms. We may, of course, fail by our own ineptitude; but if we fail through the perversion of tactics by the Liberals, parliamentary government will fall into serious discredit with the masses who still look to it with hope. We live in a period of great events, and great measures are necessary to cope with them. If our political system is so manipulated as to prevent their emergence, the working class will swing rapidly to revolution. But the decision here rests with Mr. Asquith. Mr. MacDonald will go forward if he is given the chance. If it is denied him, the ultimate solution will be found elsewhere.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has always had a particular tenderness for the undergraduates of Barnard College. On occasional driftings in the direction of Columbia University he has observed the keenness, vivacity, and general bouncing air of these young misses with admiration properly tempered by respect and reserve. Now, however, there is danger that his regard for them will burst out of bounds and become positively rapturous. A study of what makes Barnard girls angry is the cause for his delight: "teasing," he reads, "bossing, giving unwelcome advice, contradiction, interruption of sleep, disobedient children, the wrong number on the telephone, inability to open a locker door, being kept waiting, scolding, spilling ink, and breaking one's glasses or watch"—any one of these is ample to put a Barnard girl—or the Drifter—in a towering rage.

* * * * *

LIKE the Drifter, Barnard girls are more prone to anger when they are hungry or sleepy, and generate more fury at persons than at things. When they leave the sheltering confines of their Alma Mater, the Drifter is confident that they will continue to show their appreciation of life's proper values by irritation at persons who seek information over the telephone that is readily accessible in a dictionary, persons who persist in knowing one's destination when one does not know it oneself, persons who like rainy weather, persons who complain at rainy weather, persons who do not wear rubbers and are scornful of those who do, persons who insist on keeping engagements, persons who neglect to keep engagements, and all obnoxious, prying souls who ask personal questions. Besides these the astute Barnard graduates will, the Drifter knows, grow apoplectic over clogged inkwells, desk drawers that refuse to open, desirable books too high in price for the deserving poor, social reform, underdone bacon, jerking Pullman trains, the income tax, and stamps that will not stick. It is evident that education at Barnard really means something: besides the inevitable dryasdust facts these young women are acquiring an enviable capacity for resentment. The Drifter admits proudly that he possesses this quality to a degree; he can almost believe that in some previous incarnation he must have gone to Barnard himself.

* * * * *

IT is not improbable that the Barnard aversions are shared by many besides the Drifter. Yet an editorial writer on the estimable New York Times, who is in accord with almost all of the above, takes exception to the discovery that Barnard anger is more easily aroused over the week-ends than at other times, and is shocked to hear the young ladies attribute it to the fact that they are at home then. "What sort of education is this?" demands the outraged gentleman, "that makes the young dissatisfied with their homes?" To the Drifter nothing seems more natural. The antagonism between parents and children is not peculiar to a college for young women, nor is it the result of any form of education. Sweeping aside smaller, inconsequential irritations, the Drifter is planning to concentrate in the future all his great store of anger stimuli on parents who will not recognize this fact, and particularly on New York Times editorial writers who deny to the present generation the stimulating rages which they themselves must have enjoyed while still young.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Some Readers on Wilson

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article on Woodrow Wilson in The Nation contains more of real truth concerning the deceased than all the other matter printed concerning him during his lifetime and since his death.

On October 15, 1915, while a member of the House, I wrote Wilson as strong a plea as I could make to stop the unlawful seizure of ships and cargoes of American citizens on the high seas by the English; pointed out to him that by tolerating the seizure and indefinite detention of American vessels bound for neutral ports with peaceful cargoes of flour, meat, and other foodstuffs, he was practically withdrawing the protection of the Government of the United States from American citizens on the high seas, thereby forfeiting the respect of all civilized nations and that of our own citizens as well, and violating his own proclamation of neutrality. I received, in reply, a stiff and formal note from Joe Tumulty advising me that he had brought my letter to the attention of the President. Wilson did all in his power, secretly, to defeat me for renomination in 1916 for telling him what he knew to be the truth, and he never forgave me for it.

This incident was characteristic of Wilson; he only tolerated disagreement with him when the political exigencies made it necessary and expedient to do so, and when he had clubbed Congress into transferring to him all power necessary to make him a despot, he used it to the temporary destruction of free institutions and his own undoing. One of the Roman emperors at the end of his career wrote: "Arbitrary power conferred upon the most benevolent man who ever lived will convert him into a wild beast."

Cleveland, Ohio, February 23

WILLIAM GORDON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard has made any contribution in the article appearing in the current issue of The Nation entitled Woodrow Wilson: A Supreme Tragedy it is to give expression to the endurance of German hate. The article is unworthy of a scholar and a thinker.

Mr. Villard and his brother pacifists have never dared to picture a world dominated by a triumphant Germany, in other words, by the success of the German idea. This idea makes the state supreme, the individual an unimportant entity to be utilized at all times for the state's power and glory. Men have fought thousands of years and shed rivers of blood in refutation of this idea. No principal in the conflict possessed more accurate information about the human race's long struggle up from slavery than Woodrow Wilson. He knew the sacrifices that had been made in defense of the democratic idea, which stresses the dignity of the individual and assures him protection in his quest for liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

The Great War was a contest between these contending forms of government. If Mr. Villard and his brother pacifists had any plan whereby Mr. Wilson could have safeguarded the heritage of human freedom bequeathed to him and at the same time permitted Germany to win the war they have consistently held their peace.

New York, February 11

SARA MCPIKE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is now almost three weeks since Wisconsin people had the gratification of reading the admirable editorial on Woodrow Wilson. They are talking about it yet. There was a letter in the Capital Times yesterday in regard to it. Everywhere I go I hear people ask, "Have you read that article in The Nation on Wilson?" It was a wonderful condensation of all the most important things which ought to be said about Wilson's career, so wonderful and inspiring to all liberals up until the time of his tragic downfall.

Madison, Wisconsin, February 22

CHESTER C. PLATT,

Wisconsin Nonpartisan League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Referring to your severe judgment and bitter arraignment of Woodrow Wilson, permit me to quote Abraham Lincoln:

The true rule in determining to embrace or reject anything is not whether it have evil in it, but whether it have more of evil than of good. There are few things that are wholly evil or wholly good. Almost everything, especially government policy, is an inseparable compound of the two, so that our best judgment of the preponderance between them is continually demanded.

Woodrow Wilson, abhorring war as fervently as the sincerest pacifist, having turned the other cheek, there was but one other posture—and the imperial boot was already lifted! Non-combative pride could go no further without ignominy. Not even the "God-given" suggestion of Mr. Bryan could have saved us at this crisis, and so Mr. Wilson had to "judge of the preponderance of evil"; he dared not ignore the inexorable logic of events, nor his supreme duty. And yet you profess to wonder what influence won Woodrow Wilson over to the war!

The price of temporary peace would have been much too high. Germany would undoubtedly have been victorious. Autocracy triumphant, we would, today, be paying tribute to the War Lord compared with whom Charlemagne, Julius Caesar, Napoleon would be mere pikers!

Glen Ridge, New Jersey, February 17 LOUIS CORTAMBERT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Villard's estimate of Wilson seems to me as fine as anything that has ever appeared in The Nation.

Pittsburgh, February 11

BAYARD H. CHRISTY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just read your article in The Nation on Woodrow Wilson and wish to take this opportunity to congratulate you on having written the truth about Wilson at a time when most writers are forgetting his tragic failure to shower him with praises.

Dartmouth, February 10

ROLAND A. GIBSON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to thank you sincerely for your admirable summing up of the Tragedy of Wilson, in the February 13 number of The Nation. It could not have been more trenchant, nor, alas, more true.

I have just seen from William Allen White this (as I remember):

God gave him a vision,
The Devil gave him an imperious temper.
The man has passed on,
The vision remains.

Stanford University, February 15 DAVID STARR JORDAN

Broke, Decorated, but Determined

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am against the bonus and I doubt if I would accept it unless I accepted it as un beau geste, and laughed ironically as I did so, and laughed still more ironically as I split it two ways: one-half to help rebuild devastated France and one-half for starving German babies.

I am against the bonus although I am stony-broke and ten thousand dollars in debt as the result of saving the world for democracy and Poincaré.

I am against the bonus although I served twenty-six months, through the St. Mihiel salient, thirty-one days in the Argonne, saw my regiment lose 45 per cent, 1st personnel, and stayed six months on the Rhine after the armistice.

I am against the bonus although I boast a promotion and field rank, a decoration and a citation, an honorable discharge, and a half-dubious pride in that "I stuck it out" without running away.

In formulating my position I have tried to wipe out of mind memories like these: certain whipper-snapper young West Pointers, more sadistic than the legendary Prussian officer, badgering and driving men in a lust of so-called discipline; farm lads from Kansas wallowing in the same bloody trench as their foe—and both speaking German; a disemboweled man cradled in the shattered bowels of a dead horse; November dawns, acrid with mustard gas and the seven-day corpses of the 32nd Division, rotting in the rain; underfed and blue-eyed Saxon boys—fourteen and fifteen years of age—limbs shattered or dying where they fell.

I have tried to forget the retrospect of hundreds of German children, "ricketed" and undernourished (just as I have wished never to remember Rheims, gaunt against the sky, and a thousand French farm homes ground to powder and dust).

I have tried to forget even my own people war-mad and crazy, calling upon God and Pershing "to can the Kaiser" and slaughter Hans Wilhelm Niederluecke of Neuerburg-im-Eifel, aged twenty-one, and just a stupid Rhenish farm hand. (Well, I shouted with the rest but I also fought. There is a slight distinction implied at this point.)

Yet, of course, I cannot forget all these things—or I would be for the bonus.

But somehow for me to take the bonus would be to acknowledge that it was a just war, that any war is right. It would be to establish one more sophistry, to proclaim once more both the patriotic and moral sanctity of war. Whether we lost pride or principle, a bank roll or a leg—the reasoning would be the same. Money, the great material agent, would justify the cause and heal the wound with the salve of a rabid chauvinism.

I am against the bonus, and if I ever accept it I shall split it two ways: one-half to the German babies dying for lack of milk (there's the body recognized and your foe forgiven); one-half to help rebuild devastated France (there's a swift recognition of the indomitable in man, a tribute to that eternal fortitude of the peasant wherever you find him, and your late brother-in-arms saluted).

Thus the amenities will be observed, although in the meantime I remain decorated and disillusioned, stony-broke and bused.

Yet there's a whole inarticulate legion of us—too proud to speak if not too proud to fight. And probably the whole parcel of us would be deemed unworthy of the designation "the American Legion."

New York, March 1

C. J. MASSECK

Contributors to This Issue

ISRAEL ZANGWILL, writer and lecturer, is president of the Jewish Territorial Organization.

CHAIM WEIZMANN is the president of the international Zionist Organization.

HAROLD J. LASKI, formerly of the Harvard Law School, is professor at the London School of Economics.

CHARLES H. A. WAGER is professor of English at Oberlin.

WILLIAM MACDONALD, a former editor of The Nation, has recently agreed to give a course of lectures in American history at Yale.

HERBERT W. HORWILL is an English correspondent who has been spending the past winter in Washington.

Books

The Divine Darkness

Lamps of Western Mysticism. By Arthur Edward Waite. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

"WHAT do you call mysticism?" asks Antinous, in "Aids to Reflection," "and do you use the word in a good or a bad sense?" "In the latter only," replies Nous, "as far, at least, as we are now concerned with it. When a man refers to inward feelings and experiences, of which mankind at large are not conscious, as evidences of the truth of any opinion—such a man I call a mystic." There speaks the eighteenth century, with its distrust of "enthusiasm" and its conviction that "where mystery begins, religion ends"; there also speaks the twentieth, whose objection is the same, though its language is different. And yet, in the last analysis, mysticism, properly understood, is at the bottom of all religion that is worthy of the name—not the shallow deism of Voltaire and Bolingbroke, to be sure, nor the "morality touched with emotion" to which a good deal of modern Protestantism is reducible, but religion as it has always been understood by experts in the spiritual life. God, as Pascal is never weary of saying, is a Deus Absconditus, who cannot be reached save by "the reasons of the heart." "Formless and vague and fleeting as it is," says Dean Inge, "the mystical experience is the bed-rock of religious faith."

It is this conception of mysticism that underlies Mr. Waite's book—an approach to religion that is direct, personal, independent of creed or rite, that seeks reunion with the Divine Nature as the one goal of man's striving, the end of ends. As the goal is one, so the path is one, whatever the name by which it is called. No religion monopolizes it, whether of the West or the East. While the true mystic makes use of "the lesser means of sanctification," that is to say, the forms and ceremonies and obligations laid upon him as a member of a great society, yet he is essentially of the mind, rather than of the body of the church. He is not an antinomian, for he recognizes the supreme importance of conduct; nor is he an ascetic. Indeed, Mr. Waite appears to think, with Coventry Patmore, that marriage is the medium of the highest mystical experience, and that without it, such experience is impossible. The Catholic church, whose immense services to mystical religion he freely grants, does not, he declares, understand this particular matter at all. The true mystic is not an unsocial being, even though life for him is a long and intense contemplation. What may be called the habit of the interior life does not make him self-centered. On the contrary, it drives him to altruistic action. "Among the first intentions of personal goodness," says Mr. Waite, "is the design of being good to others." But the emphasis upon the mystical basis of religion is a necessary corrective of the externalism, the mere "social service," into which modern Christianity has been so largely transmuted.

The knowledge of divine, supersensible things attained in the mystic state is not knowledge in the intellectual sense at all. The logical understanding has no part in it. It is direct, immediate, intuitive. It comes about, indeed, through "the utter cessation of knowledge." The mystic as such makes no theological discoveries. So far is he from the clear apprehension of intellectual truth that can be set forth in words that he is driven to deny rather than to affirm. He speaks a language of negatives. With many of the mystical writers, the favorite symbol for God is not light, but darkness. The first chapter of the pseudo-Dyonisian treatise on mystical theology, which is the fountainhead of much mystical speculation, speaks of the "supersubstantial ray of the divine darkness" as the goal of the mystic quest. Moreover, the state of union with the Divine Nature toward which the mystic constantly strives is neither conscious nor permanent. Only after such an experience is he aware of it, but its effects are permanent and color all his thought and all his conduct.

The church, though she is the mother of mystics, has never felt quite comfortable with these incalculable children, and her instinct is sound. The mystic is potentially a heretic, though Mr. Waite correctly insists that he is seldom actually or consciously so. He passes, indeed, beyond the rites and doctrines of the church, but they are nevertheless the ladder by which he rises. He transcends without annulling them. The church, Mr. Waite insists, has never had the courage of its own possibilities. If its rulers had experience of the mystic union, "would it not perchance repent of all its dogmas and all the high definitions?" We think not, except at the price of ceasing to be a church at all.

Unfortunately, the doctrine of religious mysticism is historically related to a class of doctrines with which it is less easy to sympathize. Spiritism, various forms of the occult, mystic brotherhoods claiming vast antiquity—Mr. Waite takes account of them all and speaks of them with more deference than many of his readers can feel. He thinks, for example, that there is in spiritism the possibility of genuine mystic discoveries in the future, but he is severe enough upon the "inchoate clamor" of its present pronouncements. Nor does he think better of various mystic cults with which he appears to have the acquaintance of an initiate. "The truth," he found, was "not in these things or in those who sought them." Newman once said, though without humorous intent, "if I must submit my reason to mysteries, it is not much matter whether it is a mystery more or a mystery less"; but Mr. Waite would evidently not go quite so far.

It is impossible, in the space at our command, to give an adequate account of a book like this, for it is really of a good deal of importance. It is badly written, in a kind of jargon that, if the author were an American, the English reviewers would call Americanese. But it is a profound and penetrating account of the mystic idea and its chief interpreters, and it is evidently based upon experience. Mr. Waite's competence to discuss such matters is well known. It ought at any rate to convince any candid reader, however unsympathetic, who has the patience to read it that his own experience is not the measure of the spiritually possible.

CHARLES H. A. WAGER

Toilers of the Sea

Letters of Stephen Reynolds. Edited by Harold Wright. London: The Hogarth Press.

THE English are a seafaring nation and the genus "seafaring man" includes both the sailor and the fisherman, but only the former of these has found his vates sacer. The English fisherman has had neither a Dibdin to make him the hero of popular songs nor a Marryat or Clark Russell or Conrad to present him as a living character in fiction. English literature, indeed, knows nothing about any kind of fishing except the tame variety made famous by Izaak Walton. If Stephen Reynolds had not died at thirty-eight, the gap might have been filled.

A graduate of Manchester University with honors in chemistry, Reynolds attempted to gain a living by writing, but an early breakdown sent him to the coast of Devon, where he regained his health by working for a fisherman whose acquaintance he had made on a holiday visit. The experiment turned out so well that he not only entered into partnership with his Sidmouth friend but made his home with the fisherman's family, and, as a general thing, forsook middle-class society. The difference in social standards brought some trying moments, especially at meal times, but Reynolds was not playing with life, and his fundamental humanity carried him safely over all embarrassments. He soon learned the fisherman's craft from A to Z, and his outside training and experience supplemented his partner's knowledge and skill in many ways. He introduced, though not without a conflict with the conservatism of his fisher colleagues, the profitable innovation of a motor boat. He led a fight against a lord of the manor whose depredations on the foreshore were threatening the local fisheries with ruin. He devised schemes for saving the fishermen from the exactions of the middlemen, and did his best to get them to combine in plans of cooperative marketing. After a few years, he was able to render his friends valuable service on a larger scale by official work for the Fisheries Board, especially during the war. In all this he showed a business capacity not usually associated with the artistic temperament.

But an artist Stephen Reynolds undoubtedly was. A writer whose prose won high commendation from Joseph Conrad was no tyro in literature. The letters collected in this volume, though thrown off hurriedly in the course of an over-busy life, are enough to show his quality. They are couched always in a vigorous English, with a wholesome and refreshing smack of the sea. Yet he had a struggle to make anything like a livelihood by his pen. He would have been content, he said, to make £150 a year out of literature, but he found it hard to get.

His first-hand experiences of the worker's life naturally stimulated Reynolds's thinking on social problems. He cherished the hope that the fisheries might lead the nation toward a better social and economic order. His reaction to the European war may be indicated by quoting his opinion that those who have died for the honor of their nations, on both sides, are sacrifices to the dishonor of the race as a whole, and that to all appearance Kultur has conquered by its traditional method of peaceful penetration, pursued under war instead of peace conditions. As to the post-war situation, "the governing classes are skating not merely on thin ice, but on thin ice over a stream that's gathering pace." They "seem not to be aware that the real bone of contention is not wealth, but life." The talk about reconstruction proves to Reynolds that the people who presume to guide the nation are not thinking. The new generation will not want reconstruction—which has to do only with matter, with bricks and mortar, and will amount only to an effort of the old gang to get back to top-dog—but re-creation, the inseminating of life with more life. These are but samples of the shrewd and penetrating reflections which make one feel that when Reynolds became in 1919 the victim of his over-exertions in the cause dear to him the British nation lost a man of the type it could least spare.

HERBERT W. HORWILL

Wanted: An Executioner

A Study of International Government. By Jessie Wallace Hughan, Ph.D. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $2.75.

The Development of International Law After the World War. By Otfried Nippold. Translated from the German by Amos S. Hershey, Ph.D. Oxford: Clarendon Press. $2.50.

International Society, Its Nature and Interests. By Philip Marshall Brown. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

WHEN Madison, in anticipation of the meeting of the convention which was to frame the Constitution of the United States, drew up an elaborate account of the systems of federal government that had already been tried, he doubtless hoped that the lessons of the past which he had collected would be studied by the men who were shortly to reorganize the American nation. Unfortunately, while we do not know that the work was not read, there is little evidence to show that it was used. It is to be feared that a similar fate may attend Miss Hughan's sketchy survey of the history of international government and administration, as far, at least, as the persons practically connected with those matters are concerned. History is not lacking in lessons, but every generation is about like every other in forgetting or ignoring them and in going about the solution of its own problems as if no one had ever essayed similar problems before.

To most readers, accordingly, what Miss Hughan has to say about the past will probably seem only a rather long introduction to what she has to say about the League of Nations. She is at pains to tell us that the book is not a plea for or against the League, and her discussion of the organization and work of the League is, as a whole, commendably impartial. What is said in her closing chapters, however, about the problems which neither the League nor its members have shown either inclination or capacity to solve, and of the general political and social atmosphere in which internationalism of any kind is today compelled to live, more than suffices to show how futile is the attempt to make the world better by accepting the yoke of the Covenant. Practically every influence that in the past has helped to make war possible is still operating, and some of the most deadly of those influences have been strengthened by the treaties to which the League owes its existence and whose provisions it is in part expected to enforce. When the League is prepared to put its own existence at issue by attacking the unholy internationalism upon which it rests, it will be time to talk about the League as a help in forming an international mind.

Otfried Nippold's learned treatise, already well known to such students of international law as can read German, was published in the spring of 1917, and to readers who are not specialists it will be of interest chiefly because of the author's clear anticipation of a league of nations as the body under whose direction and control the development of international law should properly take place. The league which Mr. Nippold has in mind, however, is not the one-sided structure created by the Paris treaties. The international body upon whose influence he relies is one in which all the nations are represented, "but in which no one nation should have a predominant part"; he is not interested in a league so contrived that a nation like the United States would feel constrained for its own safety to keep out of it, or in one which Great Britain or France, or the two in combination, would be easily able to dominate. Given a league of his planning, any violation of the system would at once concern every member state, and might be punished by combined pressure or even force. The fundamental defect of the plan is that membership in such a league means national subordination rather than free national cooperation, and in the present state of national spirit such cooperation is impossible.

The vigorous and thought-provoking discussion of the conditions and problems of an international society which Mr. Brown offers contains a chapter on the League of Nations which was written before the Corfu incident, and which the author might now feel disposed to modify in the light of that informing episode. Even so, his conclusions are stated with so much caution and such important reservations as to suggest that the League, although recognized by him as a "going concern" and acclaimed for its admirable organization, nevertheless has a perilous road to travel. The League, he points out, "purports to guarantee—at least in a moral sense—the existing status quo either against physical aggression or against the revision of the treaties on which the League is based"; yet the Treaty of Sèvres and the agreements with the Turks (he writes before the Lausanne Treaty had been concluded) show what the Great Powers "may choose to do outside and in derogation of the League's authority." A second function of the League is "to guarantee the fullest discussion of international disputes before nations are permitted to resort to war." Italy's course with Greece in the Corfu controversy did not go beyond a war-like gesture, but the debates in the League were treated with contempt by Italy and ignored by the conference of ambassadors, with the result that discussion and events went on apart. A third guaranty, "that coercion of some sort will be brought to bear against any nation which seeks self-redress through war without having first demonstrated its full right to do so," ebbed its young life away when Mussolini thumbed his nose at the League and Lord Robert Cecil tried to make black appear white, and is seriously questioned by Mr. Brown on the ground that relations between nations ought to be conducted "on the basis of conciliation." In addition, the League is "primarily a European concern," and the regional character of most of its problems makes no particular appeal to the United States. Mr. Brown even goes so far as to suggest the possibility of regional leagues to deal with special problems—an idea which, he thinks, "may prove the saving of the League and indicate the natural wise direction for its evolution."

One puts down these three volumes with the clear impression that the League of Nations needs someone to help it to die. It is built, to use Mr. Brown's phrase, on the "shaky foundation" of vicious treaties; it is dominated by a few Great Powers that flout it when they please; there is no agreement as to whether or not it ought to use force, and it has no force to use; it embodies no moral idea for which anyone would give a sixpence; and it is a regional undertaking anyway. One wonders that well-intentioned souls should still dream of the time when the United States will embrace so decrepit an institution.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Weary Souls

Humble Folk. By Bosworth Crocker. Stewart Kidd Company. $2.

